Day breaks in the forest around Montsalvat, and finds old Gurnemanz and two young esquires asleep under a tree. It is not clear why they choose a bed on the ground, but before they wake let me say that Wagner has made Wolfram's Gurnemanz a Knight of the Grail, and presently gives him the functions discharged in the poem by the recluse, Trevrezent. He has made him, also, an extremely garrulous person—the Wotan of the drama in the matter of long stories. The sleepers having risen, two knights enter and talk with Gurnemanz about the King's incurable wound. They are followed by Kundry, whom Wagner has transformed from a mere messenger and servant of the Grail into one of the most extraordinary and complex characters ever put upon a stage. At present she looks like a mediæval Meg Merrilies—wild, unkempt, and apparently vicious. But the woman is not vicious, only peculiar. She has been to Arabia after a balsam for the King's hurt, and, handing this to Gurnemanz, proceeds to roll about on the ground in a highly eccentric and somewhat indecorous fashion. The King, Amfortas, now enters, borne on a litter. He goes to assuage his pain by bathing in a lake close at hand, but stops to thank Kundry for procuring the balsam. That remarkable person answers, "No thanks! Ha, ha!" and resumes her writhing as the King is carried away. Now is the time for one of Gurnemanz's long stories. Defending Kundry from the harsh words of the esquires, the aged Knight hints that she is seeking shrift by Grail service for grave sins in the past. From this he glides into the subject of Amfortas, telling how the King went out to fight with the magician Klingsor, carrying the sacred spear which had pierced the side of our Lord, how "a maid of fearful beauty" enticed him to her embraces, and how Klingsor, snatching the spear, gave him the incurable wound. In the magician's hands the holy weapon still remains. Gurnemanz then proceeds to sketch the history of the Grail, but we are chiefly concerned to know that Klingsor has raised a castle hard by, whose enchanted gardens are filled with beautiful women luring knights to destruction and to the shameful service of their master. Thus in time Klingsor hopes to obtain possession of the Grail. We are further told that, according to Divine intimation, Amfortas can only be healed by a pitying "guileless Fool." The long story ended, cries of alarm are heard and a wild swan falls dead upon the ground. Knights and esquires rush in horror-stricken, bringing with them a rudely-clad youth, whose bow and arrows proclaim him the murderer. The esquires demand his punishment, and Gurnemanz reproaches him for disturbing the peace of the sacred forest, working so upon his feelings that the culprit breaks his arrows on the spot. Questioned as to his name and parentage, the lad knows nothing, but Kundry, still writhing on the ground, knows all, and between her revelations and the youth's recollections, the story of Parsifal's birth and bringing up, as told by Wolfram, is substantially reproduced. From this Gurnemanz draws such conclusions that when Kundry, after painful nervous symptoms and interjectional remarks, has fallen asleep behind a bush, and Amfortas has been carried back to the castle, he invites the stranger to go with him and see the Grail. Parsifal accepts, and the two seem to walk through the forest, but really "mark time," as the scenery moves from left to right. The device is not unknown in England at Christmas time, and seems rather puerile in a serious work, especially when, as on Tuesday last, a hitch occurs, and the curtain has to be ignominiously lowered. However, thus they arrive at the castle and enter a large hall, under the dome of which tables are arranged in horseshoe form before a kind of raised altar. Here Parsifal stands in a corner and waits. Presently the Knights of the Grail, clad in blue, with blood-red mantles, slowly enter, singing as they come, and trains of youths and boys cross the stage. The knights take their places at the tables while the invisible boys and youths sing hymns referring to the sacrifice of Christ and the efficacy of His blood. Amfortas next appears on his litter, the Holy Grail carried in its shrine before him. Esquires also bear flagons for the wine and baskets for the bread. The Grail being on the altar and the King reclining behind it a mysterious voice issues from a niche. It is that of the old King, Titurel, who, though entombed, lives still by virtue of the Grail, and is impatient for its uncovering. Amfortas, on the other hand, dreads to see the sacred vessel. It causes him intolerable anguish, and renews the bleeding of his wound. Nevertheless, duty must be done. He gives the order; the esquires uncover the cup, and all kneel while the boys in the dome sing the words of the Saviour, "Take my body and eat," &c. As they chant the hall darkens, but the cup becomes radiant and seems filled with blood. Amfortas raises it above his head, then replaces it on the altar; its splendour fades, the hall is re-illuminated, and lo! the baskets are seen to contain bread and the flagons wine. A love-feast follows, to the solemn hymns of the concealed choir, and when it is ended the several processions retire as they came. Meanwhile, Parsifal has remained stedfastly gazing, only moving to clutch his heart as Amfortas cried out in the agony of the bleeding wound. Now comes a remarkable illustration of Wagner's Gothic fancy; a fancy of the kind which was wont, in mediæval times, to carve hideous monsters and fantastic horrors upon the walls of sacred places. Gurnemanz approaches Parsifal, and says, "Wist thou what thou saw'st?" Receiving for answer only a shake of the head, he opens a side door, and pushes the youth without, exclaiming, "Let then our swans for the future alone, and seek thyself, gander, a goose." Then the act ends, leaving us strangely moved by a solemnity that led up only to a frivolous, and under the circumstances almost ribald, attempt at humour.

I need hardly point out how Wagner has dealt in this act with his mythical materials. His aim was—always in the direction of sensationalism—to heighten the mysticism of the story, to give it a deeper religious significance, and to bring it into close connection with the form of sin which he has used so much, and, apparently, found to pay. For the heightened mysticism we have the spear that wounded Christ, not that of the Saracen with whom, according to Wolfram, Amfortas fought. For the deeper religious significance stands a ceremony that elevates the ordinary meal of the Grail knights into a celebration of the Eucharist, while the reference to Klingsor's seductive maidens, and the fault of Amfortas, foreshadows one of those lust-orgies without which a Wagner opera does not now seem to be complete. Adding to this the phenomenon of the entombed yet living Titurel, and the dark mystery of the wild woman, Kundry, we see a supreme illustration of Wagner's present tendencies. Can drama find a parallel to an act in which the characters are a king who in death is yet alive; another king who in life is as good as dead; a "pure Fool," and a woman to all appearance only fit for a madhouse? Touching the scene of the Supper, let me admit that Wagner treats it with much solemnity and beauty. He has, beyond dispute, risen to the occasion, and produced that which deeply impresses. No one, having looked on the moving spectacle, can ever forget it. The thing remains photographed on the brain—crystallized in the memory. A question, of course, arises whether the profoundest mysteries of religion should be made into a theatrical spectacle, but the point hardly admits of argument. It is a matter of feeling and taste as to which, I fancy, all English people are like minded. They, at any rate, will never admit Parsifal among them. Turning to the music of the act, Wagner is found still true to his theory of representative themes. There are no fewer than fourteen such motives in this part of the work, the more important being the "Love Feast," an archaic strain having in it a strong Gregorian element; the "Grail," which is simply the church theme used by Mendelssohn in his "Reformation" symphony; the "Faith," an extended and hymn-like melody, largely employed in the religious episodes; the "Amfortas," expressive of the wounded King's condition; the "Kundry," which, appropriately enough, is a sort of indiscriminate tumble down the chromatic scale; the "Parsifal," having a character of the chase, and suggesting the hero's forest origin and occupation; and the "Bell," a short subject of eight notes supposed to be played by the chimes of the Castle during the Grail ceremonial. Three of these are found in the orchestral introduction, which is simply a piece of musical patchwork intended to exhibit them. For an idea of the general treatment of themes and dialogue inquirers may be referred to almost any of Wagner's later operas, whose modes and mannerisms, dodges and devices, Parsifal faithfully reproduces. Indeed, it would seem that the master has nothing new to tell us; at any rate in this fashion. Knowing the motives and the story, it is easy to guess what the orchestra will be doing at a given moment, and, with interest thus discounted, the patchy, disjointed, flighty music, never in the same key or rhythm for many bars together, becomes singularly wearisome and unsatisfactory. Clever it is always, and at times singularly beautiful, but one has no time to admire before the kaleidoscope turns and another combination, probably offensive, invites notice. From this criticism, however, the music of the Supper scene must be exempt. Not that it is less Wagnerian than the rest. No other master could have written it. But here the verbal text, apart from the monologue of Amfortas, is almost entirely lyrical, and music properly becomes its end and aim. Moreover, it admits of broad and impressive treatment. In such circumstances Wagner is rarely or never found wanting. His peculiar genius expands when free from the trammels of an artificial theory, and appears in native majesty. Hence the Supper, with its processional music and sacred hymns, is a splendid artistic creation, before which criticism yields place to praise. Nothing in opera was ever more cunningly devised. The noble hall, with its radiant dome, the glowing, blood-red cup; the mantled knights; the King reclining at the altar-table in the attitude of his Lord; the choruses of the adoring devotees, now blending with, now detached from, the invisible choirs, whose voices fall from the height of the dome—all these make up a wonderful whole. No marvel that the spectators here let the curtain fall in silence, and tread softly as they retire. But this is only one scene; how as to the remaining acts? I shall answer the question in another letter.

WAGNER'S "PARSIFAL."—Impartial opinion with regard to the merits of this last Bühnenweihfestspiel can in no way be influenced by the dicta of "patrons" and uncompromising worshippers who enjoyed the inestimable privilege of witnessing the first two performances, in the house that Richard Wagner built upon a hill commanding the "City of the Margravine" and the residence of Jean Paul. As might have been expected, their verdict, loudly enunciated, is one of unanimous approval, and, if we adhere to the letter—not the spirit—of the word, unanimously enthusiastic. Happily, the "Second Bayreuthiad" is not destined for such barren results. It will find historiographers in critics and connoisseurs of more or less repute from foreign countries, who, debarred from the exclusively aristocratic manifestations with which that Bayreuthiad was inaugurated, may, like sturdy Plebeians, conscious of their social inferiority, take eager advantage of what is to follow. These, by the payment of thirty marks—ten marks less than the value of the "seal-ring of my grandfather," stolen from the pocket of Sir John Falstaff, while taking his ease at his inn—may have opportunity enough for testing the Patronic decision. Parsifal is to be given three times weekly up to the end of the current month; and it is well that it should be so, Wagner peremptorily opposing its being played anywhere outside Bayreuth. Thus, whoever desires to hear it, must travel to the small and by no means inviting Franconian town. True, the poet-musician, after the first Bayreuthiad, prohibited with equal sternness the reproduction of his complete Tetralogy elsewhere; but circumstances, to which even Wagner is as much a slave as the most uninitiated, altered his resolution, and the sympathetic Herr Neumann obtained leave to farm out the Ring des Nibelungen in its integrity, when, where, and however he might find it expedient. The issue is that Wagner grows rich on the profits derived from public representations of this erst forbidden masterpiece. Such also may be the destiny of Parsifal; in which case, freshly converted neophytes, trembling at the threshold of the temple, and shy catechumens, who, though anxious for admission, have not yet mastered the simple rudiments of Wagnerism, will stand some chance of making acquaintance with it nearer home. It requires a full purse and much leisure for amateurs living far off to undertake a pilgrimage to the Shrine—a fact which many of the Knights of the Round Table, who followed in the quest of the "Sancgreall" (as Malory sometimes spells the word), discovered to their cost. The plan and character of the drama, which Wagner has built out of materials derived from more than one version of the Parsifal (or as Wolfram von Eschenbach, the mediæval poet, styles it, Perceval) saga, have been frequently referred to. Its poetical distinction, notwithstanding violations of good taste that materially weaken the impression it might otherwise create, has been cheerfully recognized. On the other hand, its immoral tendency, as demonstrated in the second act, where the maiden virtue of the hero is exposed to so trying an ordeal, and the free use of ceremonies sacred to the Catholic Christian Church, employed for the purposes of theatrical effect, so as to fit in with the development of a fantastic and ridiculous legend, have been as frankly condemned. The scene in the last act, where Kundry, Magdalen-like, washes Parsifal's feet, and dries them with her hair (in return for which Parsifal baptizes her), and the Sacramental feast in the scene following, out-Wagners Wagner himself, who seems to regard all themes, sacred or secular, as his rightful prerogative, when he has a mind to appropriate them. These passages, however, are insurmountable obstacles to the production of his last dramatic work—his magnum opus, as it is already pronounced by fanatical advocates quand même—from ever being heard in England, which, while causing regret to some, will afford unqualified satisfaction to the many who would not willingly see music deprived of its legitimate position as an independent art, and formlessness substituted for form. The first public representation of Parsifal took place on Tuesday, when they with wistful eyes and parched ears, until now outside the Temple, after long draughts from the Wagnerianly-shaped "hanap," doubtless adjudged the work on its merits, and will make their impressions generally known. Until then we reserve future remarks. The vocal score of the new opera-drama is published, and he who runs may "rede."—Graphic, Aug. 5.

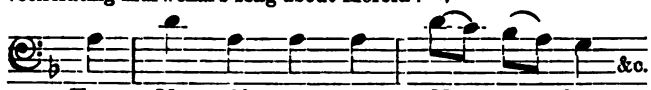
DEAR SAG.—Teach your grandmother to suck eggs.

Frisch weht der Wind der Hei - mat zu.

After the second performance of Tristan und (as F. C. B. has it) "He sold her," this same tune (Wagner is famous for sailor's tunes*) was running in my head for hours, so that I could not sleep. Luckily, I had my "fretful" close by, and (happy thought) with much effort succeeded in brushing it out. But before I tried again to sleep the tune came back, with its unclean harmony on the dominant pedal of E flat, and this I could not drive away, however desperately I used my "fretful." There was no alternative but to get up, have a plunge, and take a walk. Near Hampstead Heath I spied Herr Grubemann, who, with half-uttered maledictions, was, in spite of himself, vociferating Kurwenal's song about Morold :—†



Herr Mo - rold zog zu Mee - re her.

"I can't," said Herr Grubemann, "get rid of this infernal tune. Will you help me?" I knew the "fretful" would be useless, so we took off our hats, and made these "Leit-motives" sound together as a two-part song, at which, one of these days, you shall look and wonder. Don't teach your grandmother to suck eggs—at any rate by the mere interchanging of keys; pronounce Gawaine, Gäwäine; and believe me, old 'oss, your always attached and loving

PROFESSOR WYLDE ON THE TONIC SOL-FA SYSTEM.

In reply to remarks made by Mr Curwen at the June meeting of the Tonic Sol-fa Institution in Exeter Hall, as well as to an article headed "Dr Wylde on Musical Systems," which appeared last month in the Tonic Sol-fa Reporter, the Gresham Professor has written the following letter to the editor of that journal. A better illustration of a "Roland for an Oliver" could scarcely be desired :—

"SIR,—My attention has been called to the June number of your paper, and the report of a speech of yours at Exeter Hall, in which you make a volume of my Gresham lectures the subject of certain remarks, which I claim the privilege of answering through the columns of the journal in which those remarks appear. In respect to my quotation of Sir John Herschel's opinion on the Tonic Sol-fa system, you attribute to me the words, 'This Tonic Sol-fa system is the greatest retrograde step ever taken.' Permit me to say you misquote me by omitting the two words 'this practice,' which precedes the sentence. As Sir John Herschel's opinions are sufficiently well-known, I deemed it unnecessary to publish his language in extenso. My allusion referred to the innovations which he strongly deprecated upon what he called 'the good old system of representing by Do, Re, Mi,' &c.—'the scale of natural notes in any key whatever,' &c., &c. Now when you accuse me of perverting Sir John Herschel's opinions concerning the Tonic Sol-fa system you forget that the present mode in which it is taught is not the system that Sir John Herschel endorsed. In Mr John Curwen's Tonic Sol-fa Primer, page 12, he acknowledges that the mode of teaching, in a certain instance there illustrated, departs from the true Tonic principle, that is to say, when 'the change of key is short,' and he defends the departure on the ground that it is 'for the convenience of the singers.' If compromises of this character are to be made whenever 'the convenience of the singers' seems to demand it, the sooner you cease to use Sir John Herschel's name as the advocate of your system the better.

"I do not propose in this place to reiterate the arguments adduced in my lectures, complain of you for defending the system which it is your interest to maintain, nor enter into any further analysis concerning it, but I do protest against your appropriating the eulogies of a great authority to sanction that system, when it has been perverted from the simplicity of the very principle for which he commended it. That the disregard of the 'Tonic principle' lays Mr Curwen's Tonic Sol-fa system open to criticism in more directions than one, when judged by the rules of science, may be affirmed by reference to page 54, part 2, of Mr John Curwen's Standard Course of Lessons and Exercises; there the notation, at the commencement of the sixth bar, indicates that the interval of the fourth, between the tenor and alto parts, should be that which occurs between la and re, whereas, according to true Tonic principles, it should indicate that interval of a fourth which occurs between sol and do. Sir John Herschel shows that the difference between the two kinds of 'fourths' amounts to the value of a comma.

"In this instance again I must remark that so long as Mr Curwen's Tonic Sol-fa system ignores this difference, he has no right to claim Sir John Herschel as its champion; whilst I have a prefect right to infer that the eminent musical mathematician intended his reproof, 'the greatest retrograde step ever taken,' &c., to apply to Mr John Curwen, and all departures from 'the good old system.'

"As to the 'state of muddle' which you are pleased to attribute to me because I call the Tonic Sol-fa system that of 'fixed syllables,' I beg to say the 'muddle' is all on your own side, and belongs to your own treatment of the system in question. Whilst the syllable do is representative of the key-note or tonic of any key, the succession of syllables that follow it are fixed, at any rate, they should be so, to conform to the method commended by Sir John Herschel, and if they are not, they come under that category of new departures 'for the convenience of the singers' which would make 'retrograde steps,' in the Tonic Sol-fa system, something more than a mere figure of speech. Meantime, the original Tonic Sol-fa system consists of a succession of 'fixed syllables' following the key-note, irrespective of pitch. In that sense I used the words, and shall continue to do so, even at the risk of violating the technical phraseology of the Tonic Sol-fa Institution.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"H. WYLDE."

HYMN.

(From an unpublished Cantata, entitled "Ethelbert.")

Almighty God, sustained by Thee,
In grace alone we stand,
With confidence we nestle in
The hollow of Thy hand.
Though Hell should muster all its force,
Its power Thou wilt disarm;
Who dare dispute Thy sovereign sway?
Or stay Thy mighty arm?

O Christ, our Leader in the strife,
Our living, loving Head,
May we Thy glorious image bear,
And in Thy footsteps tread.
With consecrated noble deed
May we our lives adorn,
Prepared to brave the world's abuse,
Its malice and its scorn.

O Spirit of the Mighty God,
Thou blessèd Heavenly Guest,
When wrestling with the storms of life,
Its turmoil and unrest,
Breathe o'er our hearts Thy deep, deep calm,
And grant that we may know
The heights and depths of love divine
With all Thy saints below.

WAGNER'S PARSIFAL.*

II.

Everyone familiar with Wagner's genial theatrical talent will derive from the perusal of this book the impression that it must be highly effective on the stage. A drama put together with extraordinary skill and containing both new and dazzling situations is built up boldly before us. With regard to form, it possesses brilliant excellences, in intelligible construction, closer treatment than usual, and effective gradation, surpasses the poem of the Nibelungen Trilogy. It marks, moreover, a gratifying advance (or healthy retrogression) in the diction. True, even in this work there is no want of forced verbal combinations, tortured sentences of intentional obscurity, and bombastic ornamentation; but we are spared at least the childish jingle of stave-lines and alliteration. Compared with the linguistically murderous style of Siegfried and Tristan, the language in Parsifal is simple and natural—as far, at least, as Richard Wagner is capable of speaking simply and naturally. Though—as we shall soon see—he has, to the prejudice of the motives of action, changed essential details in the narrative of Wolfram von Eschenbach, he has, with practical good sense, rejected everything which could disturb the unity of his plan. Thus he cuts out the knightly figure of Gawain, who, as an enamoured adventurer, forms the counterpart of Parsival, as also King Arthur's Round Table, that secular contrast to the hyper-spiritual band of the Knights of the Graal. By this omission of everything episodical, he has gained a sober and continuously progressive plot,† which in three well constructed acts displays six artistic pictures. The born theatrical composer stands revealed in every scene, so vividly does he perceive and forsee everything as it must infallibly work on the stage. And what a rich store of new and striking effects is exhibited to us in Parsifal! The moving panorama and the celebration of the sacrament in the first act; the animated flowers, the miracle of the Lance, and the sinking of the magic castle, in the second; Titurel's funeral, and the concluding scene of the third, are fresh proofs of Wagner's inexhaustible dramatic fancy. In this strange plot, enigmatically shining with an intermittent light, marvel follows marvel. He who, with naïvely contented mind, will and can regard Wagner's Parsifal as a superior kind of fairy opera, as an unlimited play of fancy rejoicing in the Wondrous, looks at it in the best light and derives from it unalloyed enjoyment. All he will have to do will be to disassociate from the magic of this Festival Play the false pretension, that at the bottom of the whole there lies an unfathomably deep and sacred meaning, a philosophical and religious revelation. Unfortunately, it is upon this pretended deep and moral significance, of the Christian-Mystic element in the poem, that the greatest importance is laid.‡ On such ground we entertain serious objections to this new "Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play" and its dramatic purport.

It is precisely in their dramatic core, no matter how brilliant its outward envelope, that most of Wagner's works§ are morbid and defective, because the characters act less from their own free will than from compulsion exerted by some transcendental power. This applies to Parsifal in a much higher degree than to any of Wagner's previous efforts. Not a single personage reveals the first condition of a legitimately dramatic character: free self-guidance in good and evil. Good or bad in this sense, that is: dramatically good or bad, is neither that virtuous hero, Parsifal, nor his diabolical counterpart, Klingsor, nor Kundry, who, also without any will of her own, oscillates between two irreconcilable postulates, nor the shadowy company of the Graal. In the first place, Parcival himself, with his crime and subsequent moral purification, is, as represented by Wagner, unintelligible. An inexperienced, good-natured simpleton. In mediæval romance he is a favourite character, interpreted by Wolfram von Eschenbach through a deeper conception of his qualities. In the first act he is treated by Wagner with perfect consistency; a sort of Siegfried, only tamer. Impelled by youthful love of sport and without intending any harm, he shoots a swan; answers every question with "I do not know;" and, possessing no will of his own, allows himself to be taken to the Gralsburg, where he gazes in dumb astonishment at its strange paraphernalia and surroundings. Quite incomprehensible, on the contrary, is it, how, in the second act, the same "pure fool" can suddenly see in himself one who has to atone for deep and fearful sin. Here vengeance follows the alteration made by Wagner in the Parcival saga and Wolfram's narrative — an alteration which quite nullifies the psychological motives actuating the hero and the logical development of the plot. The Saga and Wolfram tell us that the sick Amfortas, according to a declaration of the Graal, shall be delivered by a pure youth who, unintentionally finding his way to the Gralsburg, asks the King, of his own free

* From the Neue Freie Presse.

will, "What is the matter?" By this question alone Amfortas is to be cured and the questioner appointed King in his place. But, it having been impressed on him as a rule of life that he is not to ask many questions, he omits putting this one where and when he might be expected to do so—at the moment of beholding the suffering Amfortas. He quits the Gralsburg unconscious of having committed any crime. It is not till Kundry, the messenger of the Graal, with fearful maledictions, accuses him, at Arthur's Round Table, of being a traitor, because by his silence he has neglected to effect the cure of Amfortas, which was in his hands, that he is conscious of his error and rails against Heaven for permitting it. Fallen out with himself, and in despair, he meets, in his wanderings, with an old hermit, Trevrezent, who, becoming his teacher and deliverer, reveals all about the Graal and interprets the state of Parcival's own mind. Repentant and reconciled to God, after long wanderings and heavy trials, Parcival, finding his way once more to the Graal, appears before Amfortas with the question: "Uncle, what is the matter with you?" The sick King rises cured, and delivers up his crown to Parcival. Thus Wolfram tells the story, the solution of which is poetical and intelligible. By omitting the motive of the question, Wagner, however, makes it impossible to divine what wrong Parcival has committed and what he ought properly to have done in order to bring about the cure of Amfortas, in conformity with the oracle. In Wolfram, the utterance of the Graal is perfectly clear; in Wagner, it is more obscure than anything to which we are accustomed, even from oracles: "Through pity knowing, the pure fool:—Await him, whom I chose." We do not understand this. It is in vain we ask, and again and again, how it comes to pass that Wagner's Parsifal, who has not heard from anyone about his neglect, and is conscious of no wrong, suddenly, and, moreover, during the love-scene in the second act, collapsing in repentance and completely broken down with grief, from a perfect fool becomes a perfect saint. Without a single thought of the sick King, and without the shadow of conscious guilt, Parsifal, "with childish ecstacy," rides forth in the second act to seek adventures, and meets with the seductive maidens* in Klingsor's gardens. Kundry, changed into a bewitching fairy, gives him "the first kiss of love," when he springs up with the cry: "Amfortas! the wound, the wound!" and then, sinking on his knees, says: "Redeemer, Saviour, Lord of Grace! How shall I, sinner that I am, atone for such guilt?"†

Let him who can understand this. Kundry herself asks him, "So, then, it was my kiss which made you all-clear-sighted?" As in the third act dogmatic, so, in the second, psychological wonders are piled up on each other. Among the latter there is a very odious example—that of the picture of Parsifal's dying mother being used to drive him into sensual ecstacy. This commixture of the holy with the unholy is the more repulsive because unnecessary and unnatural. After the deciding kiss, he who has become all-clear-seeing tears himself from Kundry and sets out on the road to Amfortas armed with the miraculous spear, which he has not won in combat, but which has dropped of its own accord, as it were, into his hand. This far-fetched old fable-like motive of the sacred Lance which alone can cure the wounds it has made—the incident does not occur in Wolfram—has been probably introduced by Wagner in his Parsifal for the sake of a miracle the more, and a sensational climax to the act. It is precisely in this same lance, however, that Wagner's expositors, who are frequently more profound and more unintelligible than Wagner himself, revere "the saving act of pity, become endowed with knowledge."‡ To our mind, Wagner with this miraculous spear stabs his own drama to the heart. It strikes us, not as something miraculous, but as something strange, that we are unable to perceive a single trait of heroism, intellectual or material, in Parsifal, unless it be the purely negative one of resistance to sensual temptation. We observe with ever-increasing astonishment that in the course of the piece a greater and greater halo keeps forming around the head of the pure fool, until, in Wagner's hands, the latter absolutely grows up to be the Redeemer of mankind. In the scene where Kundry, as the penitent Magdalene, washes his feet and dries them with her hair, Parsifal glides bodily into the form of Christ. Nay, at the end, even a white dove, as symbol of the Holy Ghost, settles on his head, while invisible singers chant, "Wonder of the highest Salvation! Redemption to the Redeemer!" What Wagner's Parsifal has done to justify his being thus covertly identified with the Saviour must be explained by others, who may also decide whether the spirit of true Christianity is promoted or degraded by such scenes. Seeing in Parsifal events thus lightly disguised from the life of Jesus, we may fairly ask why Wagner did not prefer glorifying Jesus himself in a "Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play." We say this in perfect seriousness. After all, something of the conditions belonging to the Oberammergau Passion Play—its exclusiveness and rare periodical repetition—seems to have been floating before the mind of him who established the Festival Performances at Bayreuth. The person and life of our Saviour are in the highest degree dramatic, and we cannot see why a poet, with a vocation for the task, should not undertake such a drama in the same pious spirit as that in which, for instance, Munkacsy undertook a modern and realistic treatment of the historical Christ. Friedrich Hebbel long entertained the project of writing a "Christ-drama," "the most powerful of all tragedies," but died without putting pen to paper. Wagner is assuredly not inferior to Hebbel in artistic courage; he may, too, venture farther than Hebbel could, or than anyone can at the present day. "Christ's Last Supper with his Disciples," grouped after Leonardo da Vinci's painting, would assuredly be a thousand times a more moving if less pompous picture than the love-feast in Parsifal of the Knights of the Graal, which is merely a transparent masquerade of the Last Supper. The original would probably shock truly Christian minds less than the most earnest parody.

Just as Parsifal is governed only by transcendental powers and unexpectedly raised from a mere good-natured empty-headed youth to be the "Redeemer of the Redeemer," Kundry is a mere tool, without any will of her own, now in the hands of the Graal, and now in Klingsor's. In Wolfram von Eschenbach, Kundry, the wild messenger of the Graal, and Parsifal's beautiful corruptress (Orgeluse) are wholly different personages. Wagner, however, blends the two opposites into one in the person of Kundry. People may call the character new and interesting, but humanly intelligible it is not, and what is meant by all this hysterical confusion scarcely any one without a learned commentary can say. A kindred figure is Klingsor, a peculiar fallen angel, who, thrust forth as self-mutilator from the Graal, has become a wicked magician. He, too, is a bloodless abstraction, like Kundry, confusing us by the numerous contradictions and riddles in his utterances. The sick Amfortas remains a purely suffering personage, of whose "acute pains,"* bleeding wounds, baths, and medicaments, so much is said that we feel for him a clinico-pathological rather than tragic pity. The further the action progresses the more arbitrary, mystical, and symbolical does it become. Human nature in us at last loses all interest in these events circling exclusively amid holy miracles, and abnormal, supernatural beings and monsters, set in motion before us as though by some divine marionette-wire. To which of them can we cling with genuine human sympathy? It is, after all, only in the last scene that Lohengrin is the transcendental Knight, the seraphic soldier who must blindly follow his commander, the Graal, and abandon Elsa.——Throughout the other parts of the piece he acts and feels like a human being, and so do those around him. In Parsifal, on the contrary, it is the Holy Graal which is everything, signifies everything, and determines everything. What to us is the Graal? A legendary curiosity utterly unfamiliar to the feelings, whether of the common people or the educated classes, a long-since forgotten relic of fanciful superstition. The hysterical exaltation which in Wagner incessantly environs the Holy Cup, and the Holy Lance, and the Holy Blood, finds no echo at the present day, and never will find one, in German minds and German hearts. Even Calderon, who wrote for the Catholic Spaniards of the 16th century, never lost himself in such heights of the Mystically-Religious, to say nothing of the romantically-Catholic enthusiast, Zacharias Werner. Herr von Wolzogen, Wagner's official interpreter, asserts that out of Wolfram von Eschenbach's epic, "Wagner has taken and invested with additional profundity the general, human, fundamental thought;" but it strikes us that the reverse of this holds true. What Wagner has taken, and taken in a magnifying mirror, is the Mystical and Religiously-Symbolical, while it is precisely the genuinely human element in the animated and richly varied poem which he has suppressed. How beautiful and touching in Wolfram is Parcival's constant thought of his wife! This true love and the uninterrupted yearning for the happiness of home, the Graal is not able to crush in him. Immediately after addressing to Amfortas the question he had previously forgotten, and assuming the regal authority, Parcival rejoins his wife, the lovely Conduiramur, and his two sons, Lohengrin and Kardeiz. Of all this there is no trace in Wagner, whose Christian ideal evidently demands celibacy. It is admiringly cited as Wagner's greatest deed that "he has glorified the Graal, the highest Christianly religious ideal." But for whom among us is the Graal a religious ideal? For whom was it ever such an ideal? The Christianity of our time is a very different thing to the wonder-seeking Christianity of the Knights of the Holy Graal, and perhaps not worse than the latter. It has been aptly said of Shakspere that he is never and yet always religious. The Christian ecstacy in Parsifal is the direct opposite of Shakspere's poetic healthfulness, and not unfrequently reminds us of the rhymed devotional convulsions of the German pietists.

Is that really Wagner, it will be asked, the same Richard Wagner, who, in his famous book: Art and Religion * (1850) combatted so energetically against the "lamentable influence of Christianity."†

At that period Wagner regarded Christianity as the hostile opposite of true art and the only desirable development of man—to-day he appears, going to the other extreme, to find the salvation of art exclusively in the mysteries of Christianity. If, on the threshold of his seventieth year, Wagner has turned pious, it would not be the first example of such a change and would concern no one but himself. "Religiosity is the vinous fermentation of a mind when in process of formation, and the putrefactive fermentation of a mind in a state of decomposition," says Grillparzer. We almost suspect the mind is in the course of decomposition when a great artist sees in Graal relics and saintly miracles the mission of German art, and would therewith effect the "regeneration of the human race."‡ Wagner's own utterances, and still more those of his fellow-workers and disciples, are in favour of such a generalization of his newest ideal, just as Wagner's entire theory raises into a general and exclusive law in art that only which corresponds to his own peculiar talent. Despite the efforts of a hundred Wagner Associations to greet the redeeming future in Christian mysticism, the present age will hardly find it necessary seriously to take up again Göthe's campaign against "new German religiously-patriotic art." We will—as Scherer exclaimed in reference to Wagner's Nibelungen—live and work on in Göthe's spirit, "not troubling ourselves about the barbarous nonsense of a half understood northern mythology, which some are attempting to force upon us as a new gospel." The most recent art-gospel of all, that of Christian mysticism, will, too, remain isolated probably in Parsifal, despite the most striking embodiment. It would, like the resurrection of the extinct world of the gods, bring about only intellectual retrogression and lead art to absolute poverty.

We know that injustice is done to every Wagnerian opera by considering the text-book apart from the music and all the apparatus of the stage. If we have done so in the present instance, we have only complied with Wagner's own utterances, inasmuch as he claims for his text-books the value and importance of independent poems, and, therefore, publishes them, as such, in book form, a considerable time before the appearance of the scores. Wagner's pretension, too, was the more certain of being gratified, because the book of Parsifal was received with a tumult of admiration in the great Wagnerian camp. In all Wagner's operas the music has softened the faults and greatly enhanced the excellences of the book. The same thing will, no doubt, be repeated with Parsifal, and we anxiously look forward to the first performance.

CONCERT.

THE first of a series of Promenade Concerts was given at Covent Garden Theatre on Saturday night before a numerous audience. The stage has been converted into the market-place of a Spanish town, and the theatre is lighted by electric lamps on the Brush system. An efficient band, comprising Mr Carrodus (leader), Mr Val Nicholson, Mr Howell, Mr Radcliff, Mr Dubrucq, and other excellent artists, has been secured, Mr W. G. Crowe acting as conductor. The programme, consisting, as usual, of a mixture of "classical" and extremely popular pieces, does not call for notice, but it fully satisfied the audience, which applauded Mr Carrodus, Miss Florence Waud, and other soloists, to the echo.—Times, Aug. 8.

PROVINCIAL.

SWANSEA.—A grand Eisteddfod was held in the Albert Hall on Monday afternoon, August 8th, when seven choirs, numbering about 1,500 voices, competed for various money-prizes, the highest (£33) being gained by the Pembroke Dock choir. The Mayor of Swansea (Alderman Davies) presided. Mr John Thomas, Llanwrtyd, was adjudicator; the Rev E. Edwards, conductor; and Miss B. Williams, Swansea, accompanist.

WIGAN.—To-day, at the County Court, before Judge Ffoulkes, George Wood, trading as J. B. Cramer & Co., of 201, Regent Street, London, music publishers and proprietor, who has the sole liberty of representing, or causing to be represented, the opera entitled La Fille du Tambour Major, claimed from Barry Stuart, manager of the Theatre Royal, Wigan, the sum of £15, as damages, for representing, or causing it to be represented, at his theatre in the week ending May 13th. The defendant did not dispute that plaintiff owned the copyright of the opera. His defence to the action was that he did not represent or cause the piece to be represented, but that the performance was given by Mr R. South and his company, who, in his agreement, undertook to pay author's fees. Mr. South, it was admitted by Mr Paraday, witness for the plaintiff, had originally some sort of arrangement with plaintiff as regards the performance of this opera, but that he had not paid the fees, and had been written to discontinue representing it. His Honour gave judgment for defendant.

OTLEY.—The sixteenth annual concert of the Otley Choral Union was celebrated in the Parish Church at Otley on Saturday, July 29. Regarded from a musical point of view the proceedings were a success, but the congregation was not so large as usual, and the amount realized by the offertory was trifling. The choirs comprising the Union and the number of choristers from each were as follows:—Esholt 13, Guiseley 19, Horsforth 28, Leathley 1, Otley 33, Pool 18, Kirkstall 43, Woodside 29; total 174, divided as follows:—Soprano 100, Alto 17, tenor 30, bass 27. The service, which commenced at three o'clock, was full choral. The choristers, robed in white surplices, entered the sacred edifice at the north door, singing the processional, "Rejoice, ye pure in heart," to a tune by the Rev. A. L. Lewington. The prayers were intoned by the Rev. H. J. Wilkinson. The proper psalms for the occasion were the 90th, 91st, and 92nd, sung with great effect to double chants by Soaper and Sir John Goss. The Rev. W. Goodall read the first, and the Rev. T. R. W. Pearson the second lesson. The Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis were sung to Dr. Stainer's setting of the Parisian Tone. The anthem, "Send out Thy light," adapted to music by Gounod, though well given, was not calculated to demonstrate the full power of so large a body of voices. The hymn "Nearer, my God, to Thee" preceding the sermon, a composition of Professor Hullah's, and the hymn at the close of the sermon, set to music by the Rev. J. B. Dykes, "Hark, the sound of holy voices," were effectively rendered.

* Die Kunst und die Religion.

† We will quote some passages from this old profession of faith of Wagner's:—"What the loyal poet sees at the first glance is that Christianity was neither art nor able in any way to bring from out itself really living art.‡ . . . . Hypocrisy is the most prominent feature, the proper physiognomy, of all Christian ages down to our own days, and this vice became more glaring and shameless in exact proportion as mankind refreshed themselves anew from their inward inexhaustible spring, and in despite of Christianity, were maturing for the performance of their real task. . . . . The artistic expression of this new world could never assert itself save as in opposition to and battling against the spirit of Christianity. . . . . Knightly poetry was the honourable hypocrisy of fanaticism. The Christian art-ideal could, in truth, manifest itself only as a fixed idea as the creation of a fever paroxysm, because it was precisely from beyond human nature that it was compelled to take its purpose and aim, and, consequently, must find in that nature its negation and end. The human art of the Future will strike firm root in the ever fresh and verdant soil of Nature."

‡ Thus Christianity, according to the Book of Wagner, is no better than Judaism.—D. B.

The Rev. J. Myddleton-Evans preached an appropriate sermon. Perhaps the most striking vocal display was in the concluding "Amen," of Dr. Stainer. The recessional, "Glorious things of Thee are spoken," was sung to music by J. Schop. Mr. A. Longfield presided at the organ, and Mr Stables, of Kirkstall, conducted.

BRIGHTON.—At the "fashionable concert" given in the Royal Aquarium on Saturday morning last, Madame Antoinette Sterling was the attraction, singing with her accustomed charm "Quando a te lieta," (Dinorah), "The Star and the Child," and Hullah's setting of the "Three Fishers." At the theatre Les Cloches de Corneville has been played, but did not attract particular attention. Mdme Sarah Bernhardt is coming next week and will play on Monday and Wednesday in Adrienne Lecouvreur, and on Tuesday in La Dame aux Camelias. On Thursday Mr and Mrs German Reed gave their entertainment in the Royal Pavilion with success.

MISS PRYTHERCK.

We regret to announce the death of Miss Harriet Prytherck (Madame Gerard Coventry), which occurred at Southend on Monday last. She was the daughter of Dr Prytherck, an eminent physician of Ruthen (North Wales), and at an early age exhibited great musical capacity, obtaining the silver medal prize for the best performance on the pianoforte at an Eisteddfod held in her native town, having received instructions from Mr Charles Hallé and other esteemed professors. Miss Prytherck played successfully at M. Riviere's concerts at Covent Garden, at Sir Julius Benedict's at the Royal Aquarium, and for some years was pianist at the Royal Polytechnic Institution. Her loss is deeply felt by her husband (the well-known vocalist), as well as by numerous friends to whom she had endeared herself by her amiable and unassuming manners.

PARK MUSIC.

Many thousands of people were to be seen, last Monday evening, clustered around the music platform in Regent's Park, listening to the performance of a band striving, and that not unsuccessfully, to enliven a Londoner's holiday. Their efforts certainly were not unappreciated by those present, who, unfortunately, found it inconvenient or impossible to spend the Bank holiday in the country—for does not the boon, associated with Sir John Lubbock's name, need the pebbly beach, breezy down, or rural lane for full realization? Those forced to stay at home are glad, however, to leave, if only for an hour or two, the cheerless house and deserted street, and roam in the Parks, where still, though autumn is so near, green grass, bright flowers, and leafy trees keep up some kind of summer state. It would be interesting to know how many trudged along the Broad walk in Regent's Park on Monday last. Certain it is that if each had taken a twig away, the trees would now be as bare as if unrobing winter had come weeks before its time, and in a single clutch had stript them of their dress. The band, forming the nucleus of this vast crowd, was perched upon a stand, erected in a corner of the ground near the enclosure allotted to the Zoological Gardens, and from that eminence discoursed to man and neighbouring beast, music which poets say is good for both. Is it not a far-seeing policy, as well as a delicate compliment, on the part of the Park Ranger to place the musicians' stand so near the lions and tigers? If, however, the caged "wild fowl" in the near Zoo were as mild under the influence of sweet sounds as the multitude at large on the green, then assuredly the lion may lie down with the lamb; for no flock, soothed by shepherd pipe, was ever gentler than the listening crowd on Monday.

The one characteristic of the audience was placidity. But the holiday fixed in the van of autumn is perhaps the most sober of the four observed in the year. Christmas is avowedly the season for Bacchanalian revels, whilst Easter-tide is not so free as it should be from the taint of drunkenness which mars English festivals, but in the August holiday, without taking into account the agressive force at present felt of "blue ribbon" men, more sobriety is observed. It is noteworthy that no brawling men and women were in Regent's Park on Monday evening; neither did the hysterical ravings of the "Salvation Army" break the harmony of the orchestra. Only the cry, "Run it out! run it out!" of the cricketer in the distance was heard during the pauses in the music. Dance strains even did not move nimble feet to foot it on the grass. True, now and again the child in arms rocked its head and beat its tiny hands, when the mother would sway her lively burden to and fro to the measure; and sprightly boys and girls betrayed giddiness in awkward gambols; but youths and maidens were constrained by the sobriety of the scene to forego the levity of the waltz. Men, tired with toil, stretched themselves upon the ground, whilst their little ones clambered over their brawny chests; and here and there matrons, not a few with the sad look of care upon their brows, unbent to the hour and romped with their offspring as though they themselves felt young again; but the great mass of the throng sat, or stood, listening to the music without excitement, and apparently without emotion.

No sound of applause was heard at the close of any of the pieces; every number of the programme was received with a silence worthy of concerts of the nobility. Why, the Regent's Park audience felt no more impulse to clap hands at the music than they did to cheer the sinking sun, who, by the way, was going down behind trees, at the western part of the grounds, in right kingly fashion. His majesty seemed to be flooding the foliage with molten gold, as if making a cast of the scene to take with him on his ocean voyage. He mantled near clouds with robes of crimson and orange, and in wantonness of wealth threw rubies upon the skirts of the high cloud that stretched like a lace curtain across the heavens. Now, it is almost beyond belief, the holiday folk seemed as indifferent to the sight as a rich man to his servants' liveries. Why, it may be asked by some fanatic, did they not all leap to their feet and shout Haydn's hymn, "The heavens are telling"? Alas, such vocal utterance is not given them. Still, possibly, feelings of pleasure and joy might have been hidden somewhere behind the stolid appearance, dumb tongue, and unkindled eye—nay, it is certain that both sight and sound were in some measure enjoyed by the people in the undemonstrative manner of their class and race.

The Band upon the whole was fairly good, especially when it is considered that the funds come chiefly from two sources, the sale of penny programmes, and the penny charge for a seat. Indeed, under these circumstances, it is suprising to find the music so well performed. Still, the orchestra might easily be enlarged and enriched, and choral forces could then be added. No doubt it is useless to address the Legislature to attend to such a want, for they are too much engaged in party wranglings and scramblings to spare a moment upon music, the want of which they themselves rarely feel. Neither can aid be expected from the leaders of society. True, they are at this moment busily engaged in working out plans for the better education of music professors, whose occupation will be teaching the upper and middle classes. It must be long, however, before such teachings reach the lower orders, who need first of all to become familiar with, and then gradually to know the use and value of, music. At present they stand in need of plain music well done, and free from "music-hall" taint; the academical or collegiate class-room can affect them now as little as the South Kensington School of Cookery does their daily meal. Who, watching the sober, orderly, and self-contained holiday folk in Regent's Park on Monday last, can doubt their capacity, when aroused into activity, of working out their own musical history? Let the labouring classes be but really in earnest in the pursuit of music, and they will most assuredly do better without, than with, state guidance or aristocratic patronage.

PENCERDD GWEFFYN.

VIENNA.—The Society of the Friends of Music at Vienna have issued the report of their Conservatory, founded in 1817, for the scholastic year, 1881–82. The professorial staff consisted of 50 ordinary and 4 extraordinary members. The school for music was attended by 694 (ordinary) native and 53 foreign (extraordinary) students; the school for acting by 31 native (ordinary) and 4 foreign (extraordinary) students, making a total of 782 (extraordinary and ordinary).* Of these, 80 simply completed their course of study, 50 (ordinary) received diplomas, and 14 (extraordinary) gained the Society's medal. Although not extraordinary, this result cannot fairly be set down as ordinary.

EXOTIC MUSICPLANT (Musikpflanzen) a corespondant of the "Evening post" writes, Liszt has brought a few new startling pupils to Bayreuth—the first a Turc he is Christian altough son of a Pasha of Constaninopil, a real Turkish face with a bold nose —2nd a still more interesting young man of 27 an Alto of colossal dimension, he sings in the Chorus in Parcifal—He is the son of a Railway Manager of Paris, he is beardless and looks like a female, but his speech is that of a man—His feet are small like a ladys foot, he is very small, but well made and very neat and gracefull looking His face is pretty, a bold nose and long curled hair, combed back—He sings Handel's Lascia che io pianga a forth lower but with perfect pure Alto tone and voice—The wonder is a follower of the Liszt train and suite, and will he or she be the Lion of the season—

Extracts from the Frankfurt Gazzette Wednesday July 26 Bayreuth has put on a festivity garement, flags and garements are flying fom all the houses, the population are in the favour of the great event of the Festival of a new work Wagner's Percifal —No more adversaries of the new shool, all are for him and the oponers are silent.—

The Evenings are spend at Angermans public place, where the circle of artists drink beer and discuss the words that cam from the masters lips, and the elite of Solists and patrons assemble at the "Sonne" and the Meister is the topic of all praise.

Wagner gave a garden fete and a Banquet, to which were 600 guests invited. Wagner spoke first in a toast to his artists he said—"It is six years since we met here."

PARSIVAL.

(From the same.)

Bayreuth, Aug. 8.

Here, even more than in the "Niebelungen has Wagner steped over the border of all art, and this step has taken in the performance, its revenge—Form too widely spread, and he would but canot, and leves a blank. We want in art see humans and no Gods, and mystic unnatural element of the action, which Wagner already tried in Tristan, has proved his faintness. To make a subject of religion in music, is a desperate attempt, for musical art has only one object, which is beauty—A union of both is only posibel in its simple form. As long as this is the case a special religious christian art can exist as in Raphael or Palestrina— Those grand times are gone bye—art and religion go since long their own way and the artist does not look upon both with the same eyes as in those times He who will bring religion on the stage—and Bayreuth theatre is the stage will naturally have to fight against prejudicious dificulties.

Who likes his religion will look at this profanisation, with stage scenery and effects, many romantic experimentals have been made, ever without sucsess. The old masters have told us the real truth, what Wagner tries to say in Parcifal.

The text to Parsifal, comes from Wolfram v Eshenbach Epos, but is changed in word and action, already the name Parzival— old provencial, translated Reine Thor, pure inocent.

Parzival is a melange of a Siegfried or Christus,—Kundry is a less happy combination a litle Orgeluse, Herodias or Walkure— The Conjuror Klingsor plays here a prominent part, and is a kind of proprietor of a "Venusberg." Gurnamenz has become from a knight a Gralsritter,—and King Amfortas, has had several changes of his character. The whole opera is written in Leitmotive, which are instrumenttaly beautifully arranged—but of melody no trace—We find now and then a blossom of melody which is soon overtaken by the clever combination of instruments in the Orchestre. Admirers of the Meister, will find this to be the style of the Opera, requires it so, if this to be a style, I prefere none than a tedious one.

An Adagio movement of great effect opens the Opera, and when the curtain rises, the Scene represents a very pretty forest-scene. In the foreground is Gurnemanz and his 2 Pages and the Morningcall sounds from 2 Trumpets. Gurnemenz wakes and calls his 2 attendants, 2 Knights appear and say that Amfortis wound will not heal untill the holly spear is found, with which Kundry had wounded him—this weapon can only be discovered by a holly Knight, through pitty knowing the pure inocent, Reine Thor, when Parcifal appears, in similar style as in Lohengrin he had killed a Swan, most likely the grandfather of the one that brings Lohengrin, and when he is told of his wrong he breaks his arrows and spear—Kundry tells him from whence he came. Meanwhile the King Amfortas returns from his bath, and Gurnemenz and Parcifal go off to the Gralsburg. Here the wandering scenery comenses through forest Hills the 2 Knights come to the Gralstower.

Solemn bells are heard first soft than louder and louder with an Instrumentel acompanment of grand power, and ends in a Chorus, Teum litzten Liebesmakl beginng by Basses followed by the Tenor, Altos and Boys ending Der Glaube libt, die Taube steubt Amfortas is brought in the holly Gral put down and Titurell the invisibel. With painfull cries from Amfortas the holly shrine is opened where the blood of Christ is preserved. Then the Chorus of the Knights in thre parts "Selig im Glauben which ends in the distance by Juvenil voice is of musical beauty and Gurnemanz pushes Parcifal out of the room with the words, leave in future the swan alone and hunt the goos—which ends the first act, after some lengthened recitatives.

The second act opens with Klingsor Enchanting Castle, the Orchestra playes the Enchanting Motif, Klingsor seas in his mirror Parcifal approaching and summons Kundry, to try her art with him. In a blue light she come up, crying. The laughing Motif is played. The Knights are called to fight the laughing Parcifal. The whole fight passes behind the scene acompanied by the Orchestra with the Reit motif. Parcifal is the victor, Kundry and Klingsor Sink in the ground.

The scene changes to the enchanting garden Flower girls appear at the garden wall Parsifal looks at the enchanting scene the crowd trie to seduce him in the midst of a Ballet and an acomponent of the Minnemotif, Parsifal keeps firm, and Kundry this time young and beautifull comes and sings of his mother's love and her own and tries her seductif art but she also fails, untill Kundry calls Klingsor and the holly speer, which lances at him, but oh wonder, it remains over his head and Percifal seazes it and then with a crush and cry the enchanting garden disappears in the Ground—This second act is full of beautifull Chorus—but the duett between Parsifal and Kundry lacks the freshness of the similar seductiv freshness of the Tannhäuser.

The third act again opens with the Graltemple—it is Good Friday—a lovely springscenry. Gurnemenz as an old man comes from his house, and listens to the screems of Kundry. He wakes her with the beautifull springmotif. She is again attired as in the first act. She wakes and is now again the penitence feeling Parsifal appears in black harness, Gurnemanz meets him and Parsifal takes his helmet off Gurnemanz recognizes the holly speer and calls "Heil, heil"—he tells how all knights are in morning and Titurell had died, that the Gral had not been seen —Parsifal falls fainting, Kundry brings him to the Hill and washes his feet Parsifal baptises her and then with Gurnemanz goes to the Gralsburg.

The wandering scenery does not take place here as in the first act, the curtain falls and the Orchestre plays the wandering motif. Again the Gral knights appear with the dying Amfortas Titurel's coffin is placed on the Highalter. All make room now for Parcifal who touches the King with the holly Speer, Amfortas is beeming with a heavenly light, and Parcifal orders the Gral to be opened, it becomes glowing, from the roof appears a pigeon; all knights bow to the new King, and the Chorus with a pp sing the "Hochsten Heiles Wunder Erlösung dem Erleser." The whole act bears a peacfull aspect and melodious strains. At the end scene we are in church again, but it is curious to see all painted and roushed in such a holly scene. MAX SCHÖNAN.

COVENT GARDEN PROMENADE CONCERTS.

These entertainments, which for a good many years have constituted an essential feature of the summer and early autumn season, were resumed on Saturday under precisely the same conditions as last year. A new decoration was, of course, a sine quâ non, and it must be admitted that the set-scene behind the orchestra, representing a Spanish town, its Moorish gates and picturesque surroundings, not to enter into further details which have already been described at length, says much for the taste of Messrs Jones & Barber, who, with the artistic aid of Mr Bruce Smith and the co-operation of Mr C. Tod Pullen, have effected the whole transformation in the brief lapse of time between the last performance of Italian opera and the first Promenade Concert. That the Floral Hall is again appropriated as a lounge, where smoking is the rule rather than the exception—whatever may in strict conscience be said against the desecration of a place which, ever and anon during the operatic season, is the cherished home of rare unfeathered singing-birds and fashionable assemblies—will be taken for granted. Those, however, who go to the theatre neither to while away an hour in the Floral Hall, nor to chat with the ladies behind the counters of the restaurant (all, by the way, clad in appropriate Iberian costume), but simply to hear the music, have little cause for disappointment. There is, as before, a numerous and highly efficient orchestra, almost exclusively consisting of English players, with Mr Carrodus, whose name is a tower of strength, as leading violin, and professors of well-earned eminence at the head of each separate department—Messrs Doyle, Howell, Ould, Radcliff, Barrett, Egerton, Standen, Hughes, Cheshire, passing necessarily over many others, for example. Mr A. Gwyllym Crowe, again musical director and conductor, bids fair to confirm the favourable impression created by his exertions a twelvemonth since. Without any pretence of finesse or intellectually "new readings," he handles the bâton firmly and discreetly, and his orchestra goes well accordingly, as was shown, among other things, by the excellent performance of Rossini's ever fresh and brilliant overture to La Gazza Ladra, and the andante, in A flat, from Beethoven's great C minor Symphony, in the first part of the concert. It was also demonstrated in the andante and rondo from Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto No. 1, played with spirit by Miss Florence Waud, and the more trying accompaniments to the opening movement of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, magnificently executed by our great English violinist, Mr Carrodus, who introduced the elaborate and difficult cadenza of his friend and preceptor, the late Bernhard Molique. Other proofs of the efficiency of the orchestra were given in the ballet-music from Gounod's Faust, and a "grand selection" from Wagner's Tannhaüser; and it was agreeable for genuine lovers of music to observe how attentively these pieces were listened to by a majority of the overflowing audience, and how loudly they were applauded. The second part began with a pot-pourri on familiar English melodies, well selected and cleverly put together by Mr Fred Godfrey, in which solos for the cornet-à-pistons (Mr Howard Reynolds, the Koenig of the period), ophicleide (Mr S. Hughes, who, not for the first time, showed what music could be got out of that seemingly intractable instrument, when ably and judiciously handled), piccolo (Mr W. L. Barrett, as consummate a master of the little flute as his constant associate, Mr Radcliff, is of the big one), and trombone (Mr Hadfield), were prominent features, the pompous march from Gounod's Reine de Saba bringing the concert to a close. The vocalists were Mdlle Elly Warnots (late of the Royal Italian Opera), Mdme Enriquez, Messrs Vernon Rigby and Thurley Beale, a thoroughly competent quartet, from whom a part-song by Mendelssohn, or our own regretted Henry Smart, would have been thrice welcome. As it chanced, however, their exertions were limited to solos. Mdlle Warnots sang the air, with violin obbligato, from Hérold's Près aux Clercs (so often heard from the mellifluous lips of Albani), in such finished style, and was so admirably accompanied by Mr Carrodus, that an "encore" became inevitable. A similar compliment was paid to Mr Vernon Rigby, who gave the ballad, "Anita" (Brinley Richards), with genuine expression, but instead of repeating it when called back to the orchestra substituted "La donna e mobile," from Verdi's Rigoletto; Madame Enriquez, too, was equally and as deservedly successful with Ciro Pinsuti's "Heaven and Earth," which, in obedience to the unanimous wish of the audience, she was compelled to sing again. Into further particulars it is needless to enter. The concert, unexceptionable of its kind throughout and giving unqualified satisfaction augured favourably for the performances to come. On Wednesday, the first "Classical Night," the orchestral symphony chosen for the occasion was Mozart's incomparable C major, with the fugued finale, which the famous pianist and composer J. B. Cramer (not Mozart) christened "Jupiter," a name long been accepted as gospel, and likely to stick to it for ever.—Graphic.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

M. Ketten has been singing in Le Trouvère, Rigoletto, &c., since my last communication, and Giroflé-Girofla, La fille du Tambour Majeur, and other opera-bouffes, &c., have been given with fair success: but Mdme Hasselmans as Léonore in the Trouvère, and Ophélie in Hamlet, carried off the palm. Our afternoon concerts have improved under M. Etesse, who has become more accustomed to conduct chamber music. The fair is in full swing, wild beasts, theatres, fat parties and lean parties being in great force. The lion's wife, hight Sultania, gave birth to twins on her way here, but they died at the age of seven and nine days respectively, and have been given to Dr Chater to place in the local Museum. The learned doctor has the superintendence of the Anatomical Human and Comparative Department, and, no doubt, will have the skins stuffed and the skeletons prepared for the Comparative Anatomy Section of the Museum.

MUSIC AT THE ANTIPODES.

The most successful opera season in this city for years past was brought to a close on the evening of the 3rd inst. at the Bijou Theatre. Since I wrote last the company has produced (in English) the Rose of Castile, Il Trovatore, Lucia di Lammermoor, Martha, Maritana, Lucrezia Borgia, and, for the first time in Melbourne, Ambroise Thomas's Mignon. Mr Edward Farley, principal bass, having seceded, was replaced by Mr J. Barrington. In all the operas the leading parts were taken by Miss Annis Montague and Mr Charles Turner, Signora Venosta, Miss Josephine Deakin, and Mr J. Gordon being valuable coadjutors. The theatre was closed on the 18th ult. owing to the indisposition of Miss Montague, and on the two following nights Miss Deakin assumed the part of Maritana. Mignon was produced on the 22nd ult. with Miss Montague as the heroine, Mr Turner as Wilhelm Meister, Miss Deakin as Filina, Signora Venosta as Federic, and Mr Gainor as Lotario. The performance was effective, particularly as regards the impersonation of Mignon. On the 3rd inst. Miss Montague took a farewell benefit, appearing in two acts of Lucia and two acts of Faust. Between the selections a bracelet set with diamonds and sapphires was presented to her on behalf of the company. The season, which opened with the Bohemian Girl on the 27th March, closed with Mignon. The success achieved is due, in a great measure, to the exertions of the impressario, Signor D. De Vivo. The company will now perform at Sandhurst, Ballarat, and Geelong, and, after a week at the Melbourne Operahouse, proceed to Queensland.—A concert was given in the Melbourne Town Hall on the 13th ult., in aid of the persecuted Jews in Southern Russia. The vocalists were Mdme. Simonsen, Misses Hill, F. Leon, and Christian, Signor Paladini, Messrs S. Lamble, B. T. Moroney, W. A. Staker, and A. Brennir; the instrumentalists were Mdme Tasca, Mr M. Simonsen, Miss King, Mr David Lee, and the Melbourne Quartet Company (Messrs Curtis, Jäger, P. and A. Montague); the accompanists were Messrs A. Moul, W. Hunter, and C. Sykes. The orchestra, led by Mr G. Weston, was conducted by Signor A. Zelmoni; Mr A. Plumpton superintending the whole.—The Toorak Harmonic Society, on the 16th ult., performed Sterndale Bennett's May Queen at the Town Hall, Prahenn, near Melbourne, with full chorus and orchestra. The vocalists were Miss Louise Siedl, Mrs Forster, Messrs W. A. Staker, Bede Walsh, and B. T. Moroney.—On the evening of the Queen's birthday, Tennyson's "Hands all round" was sung by 4,000 State school children, under the direction of Mr J. Summers, before a very large audience. The performance was by "command" of the Minister of Education; but neither the poetry nor the music made any great impression.—The third concert of the Melbourne School of Music, Mr C. W. Russell, Principal, was given in the Athenæum Hall on the 24th ult. The performers were Miss Rosina Carandini, vocalist; Mr Curtis (violin); Mr Hart (violoncello); Misses A. King, C. Atchison, and F. Hay (piano).—The first of a series of Popular Concerts, inaugurated by Mr T. E. Guenett, was held in the Athenæum on the 31st ult. The programme included Schumann's pianoforte quartet in E flat (Messrs O. Linden, G. Weston, Cope, tenor, and Hart). Mr Linden played Beethoven's Sonata in D minor, Op. 31, No. 2, which was followed by Schubert's octet, Op. 116, for stringed instruments, combined with clarionet, horn, and trombone, played by Messrs Weston, P. Montague, Wiedemann, Harte, Hore, Lundberg, White, and Berg. Miss Rosina contributed songs by Mendelssohn and Schubert.—The Hewett Musettes opened at St George's Hall, on the 3rd inst., with the operetta of Rain. The principals of the company are Miss Eva Pear, a cornet soloist, and Mr Hewett, who plays eight instruments.

The bi-weekly recitals at the Town Hall, by Mr D. Lee, city organist, continue to be well patronised.—A new oratorio, by the Rev. G. W. Torrance, Mus.Doc., T.C.D., incumbent of Holy Trinity Church, Balaclava, near Melbourne, is in active rehearsal.—A benefit concert was given in the Town Hall, on the 3rd inst., to Signora Agnes Palma, the contralto who first came to Australia, in 1879, with the late Mr Lyster's opera company, which included Mdme Rose Hersee. The vocalists at the concert were Signora Palma, Misses Rosina Carandini, Nellie Stuart, J. O'Brien, Mr B. T. Moroney, and several amateurs.

Melbourne, June 5, 1882.

[If our correspondent wishes his communications to appear henceforth in the Musical World, he is earnestly requested to write only upon one side of the paper; otherwise we are compelled to say, with much regret, that we cannot answer for their being published.—D. B.]

Arezzo.—The statue of Guido Monaco, due to the chisel of Sig. Salvini, the sculptor, arrived from Bologna some time since, and, together with the bas-reliefs from Florence which were to follow, was to be erected on the chosen site by the 15th inst. During the Festival there will be eight performances of Arrigo Boito's Mefistofele, and three grand orchestral concerts, all under the direction of Luigi Mancinelli.

St Petersburgh.—According to a correspondent of the Schlesische Zeitung, the Emperor of Russia, who is extremely fond of music, has given orders for the formation of a regular Court Band. Hitherto, the best bands of the Guard Regiments have officiated at the Imperial Court, but this arrangement was attended by all kinds of inconvenience for the military service of the bands and by other drawbacks. In order, however, not to incur too heavy an expenditure, the band of the Chevalier (Garde-du-Corps) Regiment will be done away with, and most of its members drafted into the new band. Strict orders have been issued that none but Russians shall be members. In all the bands of the Guard Regiments there are many German and Austrian subjects, the bandmasters being almost exclusively Germans. In contradiction to the orders above mentioned is the fact that a former Austrian bandmaster, who now holds a similar position in a Guard Regiment here, has been appointed conductor of the Court Band. As the members will not be allowed to give private concerts, and will thus have to sacrifice a lucrative source of income, the pay will, measured by a Russian standard, be exceptionally high. The conductor, it is said, will receive 5,000 roubles a year. A post of Chief Director of the Imperial Court Band will also be created, and Herr von Beers, till now captain in a Guard Regiment, appointed to it.

Sydney.—A complimentary concert, under distinguished patronage, given to the renowned violinist, August Wilhelmj, last evening, was attended by one of the largest and most fashionable audiences ever assembled in the Masonic Hall. The programme opened with a piano solo, "Forest Scenes," by Mr Max Vogrich, and followed by Cowen's "The Better Land," for which Miss Marie Conron received an encore. The bénéficiaire next appeared, and was received with enthusiastic applause. His first number was one of his own compositions, In Memory of Vieuxtemps, in which his wonderful mastery over the instrument was well displayed, an encore being vociferously demanded and responded to. The second part of the concert began with Wilhelmj's German song, "Das Vöglein," sung by Miss Conron, who again secured an encore. Herr Wilhelmj's second performance—Wieniawski's Grande Polonaise—marked by marvellous vigour, combined with delicacy of touch and refinement of phrasing, was heard by the whole assembly with rapt attention, and was succeeded by another unanimous encore. He then gave the well-known air of Hans Sachs, from the Meistersinger of Wagner, to which, the audience being still unsatisfied, the distinguished fiddler added his own transcription of a beautiful aria by J. S. Bach. The concert was in every sense a marked success.—Sydney "Daily Telegraph," May 23.

THE HOLY GRAIL.

The subjoined letter was addressed to The Times not long since:—

Sir,—Wagner's opera suggests the question, "What is the meaning of the Sangreal?" Mr Tennyson has translated it into Holy Grail, and Wagner has the Castle of the Grail, and his hero is crowned King of the Grail. The true explanation I believe to be this—the Legend of the Sudarium, which is one of the mysteries of the Rosary, makes St Veronica present a handkerchief to our Lord, on which the Virtus Sanctus remained imprinted. This portraiture was called "Vera Eikon," or true image, and thence the name of Veronica was derived, the name of the woman being Berenice. In the same way the Sang-reel, or Sang-real, the real blood, became Sangreal. It was in the cup preserved by Joseph of Arimathæa, and which was used in the Last Supper, or Cœna Domini. A corruption of the word Sangreal made Grail and Holy Grail. The key to the story of the quest of the Sangreal is in the Sermon on the Mount, which says, "Blessed are the pure of heart, for they shall see God." The quest was for the Real Presence in the holy sacrifice and the true blood preserved by Joseph of Arimathæa. But Sir Percival was disqualified. He was not pure of heart, on account of his intrigue with Queen Guinevere. Those who know anything of mystical theology will easily understand the obscure passages in the original legend.

George Bowyer.

What does Sir George mean by Percival's "intrigue with Queen Guinevere"? Percival has nothing to say to that Queen. Sir George confounds him (confound him!) with Launcelot. In other respects his letter did not remain unanswered, as will be seen by what follows:—

Sir,—The letter of Sir G. Bowyer on the subject of the Holy Grail induces me to send you an extract from two of the late Bishop Thirlwall's "Letters to a Friend" upon the same subject. I think they can hardly have come under the notice of Sir G. Bowyer, or he would not have retained such confidence in his own interpretation:—

Abergwili Palace, Jan., 25, 1870.

". . . . . Sir George Bowyer apparently believes that real is common to French and English in the same sense. Real might mean royal, only that it is not the French and Provençal, but the Spanish and Italian form. Of the meaning of the variously-spelt Grail Sir George Bowyer appears never to have heard. Or of the Sacro Catino. I have a guide to Genoa which accurately describes the emerald vase shown in the sacristy of S. Lorenzo, and gives a plate of it. It is an hexagonal open vessel, very narrow at the base. When Sir George says that the 'vessel' of the legend 'was undoubtedly the chalice' he contradicts himself, for, according to his etymology, no vessel at all is 'alluded to' in the name. Among scholars there is, I believe, perfect unanimity on this question. The authority of Littré would, to those who know his work, be sufficient; but it is confirmed by that of Diez, who devotes a page of his 'Lexicon of the Romance Languages' to the word Graal, which he explains in the same way as Littré. He observes (I translate his German), 'Saint Graal, the origin of which from Sang Royal is refuted by the Provençal forms, is in the epic poems the dish out of which Christ partook of the Last Supper with his disciples. . . .'

"Jan., 1870.

". . . . . The only reason that at present occurs to me as one which may have governed Tennyson's spelling of Holy Grail is that he wished to mark the pronunciation. It is, however, possible that he meant to warn the reader against the false etymology into which, I see, you have fallen. Nothing, I believe, is more certain than that the name has nothing to do with sang, either real or royal. Indeed, if you only reflect for a moment on the wildness of a quest after a liquid, I think you will see that this etymology is out of the question. Littré gives the true one—'Provenc., grasal, grazal, grazans; anc. Catal., gresal; anc. Espagn., grial; bas Latin, gradalis, gradalus—sorte de vase, origine inconnue.' There never has been any doubt that it was the name of a vessel. Did not you know that it was brought from the Holy Land to Genoa, where it is still shown under the name of 'il sacro catino' and by persons not in the secret believed to be a single emerald, being, in fact, a piece of green glass?"

WAIFS.

MAD. ESSIPOFF "of the fairy fingers" has made arrangements for another tour in Germany, which will begin at her favourite town of Breslau, during the current month.

In obedience to the unwritten law which has for many past years prescribed that the Wednesday nights of the Covent Garden Promenade Concert season shall be devoted to "classical" music, the first of the current season was given last night, and attracted a very large audience. The programme included (in the classical Part I.) Schubert's overture to Rosamunde, Reinecke's prelude to King Manfred, Mozart's Jupiter symphony, played without abridgment, the andante and rondo from Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in E flat, the andante and rondo finale from Mendelssohn's violin concerto, and an orchestral selection from Mozart's Zauberflöte, arranged by Mr W. Gwyllym Crowe. The orchestral selections above-named were admirably played, and Mr Crowe's Zauberflöte selection, although open to criticism in some respects, merited the applause it received. The young lady who attempted the extracts from Beethoven's concerto was greatly overtasked. Happily it was a musician of the highest rank, Mr J. T. Carrodus, to whom Mendelssohn's violin concerto was entrusted. He played the lovely andante exquisitely, and his perfect mechanism in the rondo elicited well-merited and prolonged applause. The second part of the concert was "miscellaneous."

Bevignani is drinking waters at Recoaro.

Gaetano Braga, the violoncellist, is at Giulianuova.

Mr T. A. Wallworth and his cara sposa are passing their holidays at Malvern.

Mrs E. A. Osgood has been visiting some friends at Garden City, Minnesota, U.S.

Bellini's monument at Catania is to be inaugurated in the early part of next month.

The, in her way, incomparable Théo lately fulfilled a short engagement at the Theatre, Spa.

The French Minister of Public Instruction has made Talazac, the tenor, "Officier d'Académie."

The Nibelungen performances at Brussels will probably be given in November at the Alhambra Theatre.

M. François Heugel, brother of M. J. L. Heugel, director of the Ménestrel, has died at Nantes, in his 69th year.

Mdlles Victoria and Felicia de Bunsen have been invited by Lady Yardley to pass their vacation at Hardlow Park.

Luigi Mancinelli is in Florence. Having completed his march for the Arezzo Festival, he is now finishing his opera.

A concert was given not long since at Pampeluna by Sarasate, the violinist, and Gayarre, the operatic tenor (both Spaniards).

Schomburg, clarinet player in the Court Band, Sondershausen, has been created Chamber Virtuoso by the reigning Prince.

Ferdinand Strakosch opens his campaign at Barcelona with Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet, Bianca Donadio being the Ophelia.

The Señorita Doña Natividad Martinez has sung with much success in Aïda, Faust, and Ernani, at the Theatre Royal, Athens.

The tenor Nouvelli has become a general favourite at the Teatro Nacional, Buenos-Ayres.—(Why did Mr Gye let him go?—Dr Bluge.)

After leaving Bayreuth, Marie Brandt, the Kundry par excellence, will sing during September in Austria, and in October at the Theatre Royal, Munich.

A new tenor, Tobia Bertini, will make his début at the Teatro Apollo, Rome, during the Carnival season, singing first in Le Prophète and then in Mercadante's Vestale.

From Italy Emma Nevada has gone to Prague, where she has appeared with success in La Sonnambula. She was announced to sing also in Rigoletto, Faust, and Mignon.

The ballet of Yedda, with Sangalli in the leading part, is in rehearsal at St Petersburgh, under the superintendence of Olivier Métra himself, who will conduct on the first night.

Miss Ella Lemmens, having been detained at Brussels, by the grave indisposition of her youngest sister (since dead), will be unable for some time to appear at the Covent Garden Concerts.

Mdme Damala (Sarah Bernhardt) has purchased for her son, who will be 18 in six months, the lease of the Ambigu Théâtre. She gives 85,000 fr., with 40,000 fr. as half a year's rent in advance, all stage properties being included, and the lease having five years to run. Mdme Damala is also said to be one of the proprietors of the Théâtre des Nations, where she will play in the winter of 1883, the Vaudeville having secured her services for next winter.—Globe.

FANTAISIE MARZIALE.

MORCEAU DE SALON,
FOR THE PIANOFORTE.
By
LILLIE ALBRECHT.
Price 4s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"'Fantaisie Marziale,' morceau de salon, is another attractive piece by Lillie Albrecht, a young lady who has gained considerable popularity by her pianoforte playing."—"The Era," August 12.

"Fantaisie Marziale,' morceau de salon, by Lillie Albrecht, is a singularly bright and spirited martial movement in the key of G, which, if we claimed to be prophets (and we do not), we would predict will become popular."—"The Queen," August 12.

"'Fantaisie Marziale' is the title of Miss Lillie Albrecht's latest addition to her already numerous list of Morceaux de Salon for the pianoforte. This young lady writes for her instrument almost as well as she performs upon it, and her compositions are invariably characterised by elegance and brilliancy. The present piece is no exception to the rule, but manifests in some respects an advancement in mastery of device and effect that justifies us in encouraging Miss Albrecht to persevere until she can undertake even more weighty tasks. The 'Fantaisie Marziale' comes well within the reach of the ordinary player."—Sunday Times.

"There is an ample supply of dash and spirit in Lillie Albrecht's 'Fantaisie Marziale.'"—Graphic.

"Next I would call attention to the brilliant and effective pianoforte piece recently published by the popular young pianist, Miss Lillie Albrecht, a 'Fantaisie Marziale,' a work that will be found acceptable by all who wish to possess facile and bright pieces. It is my duty no less than my pleasure to encourage ladies in all their artistic efforts."—Lady's Pictorial.

"Miss Albrecht is not only a pianist of remarkable power and ability, but a composer of very elegant music for her 'instrument de prédilection.' This spirited 'Martial Fantasia,' in G major, boldly asserts its title, and is indeed a stirring effusion, that might be made effective, in score, for a military band. The piece is no child's play, but will require study. The staccato octave passages alone supply work for fire-eating players."—"Musical Standard," May, 1882.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.
DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. A MUSICAL PILGRIMAGE.

Bayreuth, Aug. 7.

At the end of the first act of Parsifal, the "pure fool" is ignominiously thrust out of the Grail Castle, because he has nothing to say to the wonders of the mystic cup and the feasting knights. How long an interval elapses before we see him again, in the second act, the poem sayeth not. He may have wandered far and long, but now his time of trial has come. Before him lies the choice of Hercules in a particularly embarrassing form, and it has to be seen whether, while retaining his character as fool, he is doomed to change the qualifying adjective from "pure" to "impure." Let me remark here upon the nature of Parsifal's temptation, as showing that Meyerbeer never went farther after sensationalism than does Wagner in this instance. The offence of Amfortas lay, according to Wolfram von Eschenbach, in simply giving to a woman the love that should have been bestowed upon things Divine. Wagner, as we have seen, makes him yield to the promptings of lust. So in Parsifal's case. The hero might have been tried in ways free from offence, while suggesting high and noble lessons. But this course did not suit our sensation-monger, who preferred the magician Klingsor, with his enchanted gardens and beautiful she-devils. No surprise need be felt thereat. Wagner is a professor in the school of artistic carnality, and he knows what the rules of the institution exact. If a pure art be dragged through the dirt so much the worse for the art, but not for Wagner, who has already found shameless adultery and foul incest none too strong for his disciples and admirers.

The second act opens in Klingsor's castle, where we see the magician surrounded by the conventional apparatus of his craft, including a mirror which reflects all that is passing. By its aid he notes the approach of Parsifal, whom he would tempt to ruin. "Up then, to work." Causing a blue vapour to rise from the depths, he invokes the presence of a "nameless woman," politely termed "She-Lucifer," "Rose of Hades," and "Herodias." The call is answered, and along with the blue vapour, uplifts itself the form of our old acquaintance, Kundry; servant of the Grail in the first act; servant of Klingsor here. Kundry screams as she comes up; screams again as Klingsor intimates that there is work for her to do, and remains inarticulate or interjectional to the end of the interview. Here is the longest of her speeches: "Ah! ah! Dismal night—frenzy—Oh!—Fear!—Oh anguish!—Sleep, sleep—Deepest sleep!—Death!" When, however, Klingsor looks from the rampart and describes how Parsifal makes havoc of the knights sent to resist his entrance, Kundry begins to take an active interest in the business. The demoniacal part of her complex nature gets the upper hand. First she "laughs gloomily;" then goes off into "more and more ecstatic laughter;" then gives "a spasmodic cry of anguish," and disappears. She has gone to work, and, as she lured Amfortas to ruin, so will she seek to decoy Parsifal. Klingsor is pleased, and already anticipates the coming into his power of this "babyish sprig"—who, we remember, has just driven the garrison before him like a flock of sheep. Here a change of scene occurs. By a masterly stage contrivance, the castle sinks with startling suddenness into the ground, revealing the enchanted gardens. The painter of this picture has committed an artistic offence. Its violent colours shock the eye, and its ill-arranged groups of gigantic flowers—roses bigger than prize pumpkins, and fuchsias vying in size with Great Paul—would hardly be admitted on the stage of a second-rate English theatre at Christmas time. On one side the abutments of the castle are visible, and on a terrace at the back stands Parsifal, sword in hand, still wearing his forest-dress, and looking down in astonishment as a number of loosely dressed and lovely damsels run about in alarm and dismay. They lament their dead and wounded knights, and rail at Parsifal, cursing him, and demanding "Why hast thou slaughtered our lovers?" The "pure fool" now shows himself anything but a fool in the matter of gallant speeches. "Was not I bound to slay them when they barred the way to your charms?" This pretty question alters the case. The damsels forget their knights, and resolve to catch the new hero. Some run away and decorate themselves, "appearing like flowers," according to the libretto, but really put on flapping, ungraceful and "loud" head-dresses. The rest do the same, and then ensues a competition, with Parsifal as the prize. All the damsels swarm around the youth, stroking his beardless chin. "Unto thy bosom take me," says one; "Turn thy fair cheek that I may smooth it," cries a second; "Thy mouth give to my kisses," pleads a third. "Do be quiet," remonstrates the embarrassed hero. The damsels continue, "Back with you. See, he wants me;" "No, me;" "Me, rather;" "No, me;" and so on till the object of their desire, more and more embarrassed, turns to run away. Then a voice is heard calling "Parsifal!" and commanding the "frivolous wantons" to go and attend to their bleeding knights. Parsifal remains; the damsels reluctantly depart; the foliage concealing a bower moves aside, and a "female of exquisite beauty, clad in light drapery," is seen reclining on a flowery couch. This is Kundry, changed by magic art to play the temptress, as erst she did with Amfortas. Of course, her assault on the young man's virtue takes the, to us, most offensive form possible. After telling him his name, and kindly giving its etymology, Kundry talks of his mother, describing her grief at the loss of him, and her speedy death. Parsifal, in an agony of remorse, sinks down at Kundry's feet, while the temptress wreaths her arms around his neck, whispering "Seek consolation in love." But the climax is reached when Kundry, exclaiming "Now thy mother sends benediction from above in this first kiss of Love," presses her lips ardently to his. Can anything more horrible be conceived than such an abuse of the name of love and the name of mother? It is vain to urge that the woman plays a devil's part. That is a poor reason why devilry should be exhibited, for no adequate purpose, on an artistic or any other stage; above all, immediately after a scene wherein the sacred mysteries of religion are displayed. Here, surely, we have the consummation of Wagner's Mephistophelian cynicism, and that which should make his new work hateful to all right-minded men. Kundry's kiss lasts long, but eventually Parsifal starts up in anguish and terror, exclaiming, "The spear wound! the spear wound!" Mark how he, the redeemer to be of Amfortas, endures that sinner's pain. Then he cries out in stress of struggle with carnal desires; then sees again, in fancy, the sacred Grail, and reproaches himself, like Wolfram's Parcival, for neglecting to use the opportunity afforded him. Next, his thoughts turn to the sin of Amfortas, and, as Kundry embraces and kisses him, recognizes the King's temptress and spurns her from him. Kundry now changes the nature of her assault. She appeals to his pity, and describes herself as a kind of wandering Jewess, condemned to live on in remorse because she laughed at the Saviour in His suffering. Here we get an explanation of her uncouth noises and peculiar manners. "Weep I cannot; But only shriek And rage and wallow In night and madness never slaked." Her prayer is "Let me lie sobbing upon thy breast for an hour and I shall be saved." Against this and all other entreaties Parsifal remains proof, till at last Kundry falls to shrieking and summons help to prevent the hero's escape. At her cry, Klingsor appears on the castle wall, with the sacred spear in his hand. This he hurls at Parsifal, who, catching it, makes with its point the sign of the cross in the air. Straightway the castle tumbles into ruin, and the foliage shrivels and falls, while from the "flies" rain the head-dresses of the damsels—this being the stage equivalent for changing those ravishing creatures into flowers. Kundry lies prostrate among the débris as Parsifal goes away with the spear, saying, "Thou knowest where only we shall meet again." The curtain falls. Apropos to the entire act I will only ask, "Is this healthy or unhealthy drama? Can any possible excuse be found for putting on the stage a series of unblushing appeals to lust? Is it tolerable that mixed up with such a scene should be sacred names and things?" Surely the triple "No" of the English public will settle the fate of Parsifal, as far, at least, as they are concerned, for ever and a day.

If, in the second act, Wagner has carried out his notion of dramatic propriety to the bitter end, the same act shows him pushing no less far his peculiar theory as to the functions of dramatic music. His work in this respect may here be sharply divided, so as to have on one side the choruses of the damsels with some portions of Kundry's first address to Parsifal, and on the other all the rest. To the right lies coherence and more or less of charm; to the left is found ugliness well-nigh unredeemed. The choruses, occasionally written in twelve parts—of course for female voices—are put together with the master's undoubted skill; they are all dramatic, and one especially, "Come, lovely stripling," is of real beauty, enhanced, like the grace of a desert flower, by its sterile surroundings. Wagner is happy, moreover, in treating the lines which refer to the sorrow and death of Parsifal's mother. Under such circumstances he may always be depended on, for when verses really demand music he cannot keep from giving them that which is music indeed. But I stand amazed at the hardihood which imposes such chaotic stuff as the rest of the act upon a long-suffering public. This is worse than "Midsummer madness," and brings the Bayreuth Theatre into a closer relationship than that of contiguity with the Bayreuth Lunatic Asylum, whither a poor demented chorus singer was the other day conducted. Such melodic and harmonic progressions as are here, such laborious interweaving of stubborn themes, such extravagance and distortion, were never before dreamed of even by Wagner. It is music in an epileptic fit. Alas, poor music! What crimes have been committed, not in thy name, but upon thee. And yet, if good taste, and common sense, and even religion are violated, why should the Divine art escape?

Between the second and third acts a long interval is supposed to elapse, during which time Gurnemanz has grown feeble and retired to a hermitage, near Montsalvat. When the curtain rises we see him looking for the cause of a groaning noise, and discovering our incoherent friend, Kundry, who apparently has been sleeping the years away in her original uncanny form. No wonder the ancient man exclaims, "Ha! she—here again! However, he revives her, and Kundry, tying up her hair, meekly goes "charing" in the hermitage without a word, greatly to the amazement of the hermit. Presently a knight enters in black armour, and bearing a spear. It is Parsifal, whose woe-begone look tells of many trials and sufferings. The two knights recognize each other, and have much to say. Parsifal describes his weary wanderings in search of the Grail Castle, and Gurnemanz speaks of the resolve of Amfortas not to uncover the Holy Cup, hoping thus to find relief in death. Left unsupported by Divine food, old Titurel has expired, and the knights, a melancholy band, subsist like ordinary men. Again stricken with remorse, Parsifal faints. In this condition he remains while Gurnemanz and Kundry remove his armour, leaving him dressed in white, with the flowing hair and short beard of the Grail's Divine Lord. Now the religious mysticism of the scene deepens. Kundry, like Mary Magdalene, pours ointment upon Parsifal's feet and wipes them with the hair of her head; while Gurnemanz, who had previously sprinkled him with water, anoints his head as King of the Grail, and speaks these lines: "Thou—pure one—all-pitying sufferer, All-knowing rescuer! Thou who the sinner's sorrows thus hast suffered, Assist his soul to cast one burden more." Parsifal then baptises Kundry, who is at last able to find relief in tears. The dialogue that ensues is, both as regards idea and expression, of exquisite beauty. Parsifal, looking round, remarks the loveliness of the fields and flowers. "It is the spell of Good Friday," explains Gurnemanz, and is answered that on such a day all things should mourn. The old knight replies that tears of repentance have watered the fields, and that on such a day Nature rejoices because of rest and peace. Now distant bells are heard, as in the first act, and the two knights set out for the Grail Castle, Kundry following humbly behind. According to the book the scenery should again move panorama-wise, but in performance the curtain comes down while a change to the great hall is effected. The tables are gone; the trains of choristers do not pass to their places; the rites of Montsalvat are "maimed." But the brethren appear in their usual order, while, as the body of Titurel is borne in at one door, the Grail, followed by Amfortas in his litter, enters at another, the two processions singing antiphonally. Then, the body having been uncovered, Amfortas, in highest anguish, prays that the revelation of the Holy vessel, while giving life to others, may bring to him death. Yet he shrinks from giving the order, and, when the knights urge him to duty, bares his breast, and entreats them to strike home. Meanwhile, Parsifal has entered, carrying the sacred spear, and now, stepping forward, touches the King's wound with the point. Immediately the hurt is healed, while Parsifal, claiming the royalty of the Grail, holds aloft the spear, from the head of which streams a blood-red light. All do glad homage to their new king; the Grail is uncovered; Parsifal holds it aloft; it glows with crimson radiance; Kundry falls dead, gone to rest at last; a white dove flutters above Parsifal; and, as the curtain descends, voices are heard singing, "Wondrous work of mercy: Salvation to the Saviour!" The third act, even more than the first, raises the question whether, in this age, the public are to be entertained with miracle plays and religious symbolism. In the first place, is such a course useful? in the second, is it right? I do not suppose that Wagner troubled himself with either query, because to do so is to leave the second act utterly unaccountable. No man with a religious purpose or feeling would ally such scenes as those in Klingsor's garden with the profoundly solemn ceremonies of the Grail. No; Wagner sought to astonish at any cost, and he has succeeded. None the less, however, does the question of propriety remain for the public, whose reverence for sacred things will be shocked, wherever it exists, by the audacious handling they here receive; most of all by the blasphemous parallelism sought to be established between the hero of this strange story and the Saviour of the World.

The music to the third act, while it does not equal that of the first, far surpasses that of the second both in interest and beauty. Much of it, I need hardly say, is tortured and twisted out of all resemblance to what most men recognize as art. This comes now to my memory, like a bad dream—something to wonder at as an inexplicable phenomenon of creative force. But Wagner's work is ever like the image in the Book of Daniel. There may be a good deal of clay in its composition, but there is always some sterling metal. So here, at any rate. I am bound to admire much of the music illustrating the reference of the knights to the peace and loveliness of nature, and some portions of that to the final scene. The funeral march, for example, though not equal to the one in Der Ring des Nibelungen, has a very impressive effect. Yet, the peroration, as a whole, is disappointing. Neither in interest nor beauty does it approach the finale to the first act, with which a comparison is inevitable. Of the work in its entirety it is difficult to speak with patience and good temper, so much does it assert an enormous talent wasted in the vain carrying out of an artificial theory which will disappear with its originator and arch-advocate. Concerning this matter, however, enough has recently been said. It is more to the purpose to note that Wagner has taken another step towards the intolerable in extravagance, audacity, and cynicism. He is driving the chariot of "sensation," and for him there is no stopping short of the point where that vehicle inevitably shatters itself, to the ruin or the ridicule of its occupants.

Leipsic, Aug. 10.

I have escaped from Bayreuth, and put between myself and that melancholy Franconian borough as much distance as is required for a calm and comprehensive retrospect. Truly, when looked at from afar, Wagnerian Bayreuth appears a singular phenomenon. Why it should be Wagnerian at all is a puzzle, to begin with, especially when we consider that consequences in this world are not altogether the creations of chance. Yet where is the affinity between the town and the creed of which it is the Mecca? Bayreuth belongs to the past; Wagnerism, we are told, is the inheritance of the future. Bayreuth is slow and decorous; Wagnerism is fast and often "improper." The light of Bayreuth, if it have one, burns under a bushel; Wagnerism is a candle set on a hill. The town resembles the deliberate ox that draws burdens through its streets; the creed may be likened to a roaring lion attended by many jackals. But a truce to such marshalling of opposites. In the fact of their opposition lies, perhaps, their raison d'être. Wagner, let it be granted him, is no hum-drum prophet. He loves signs and wonders, and to astonish the minds of men. Among the traditions of Dresden is one which tells that when revolution broke out in the Saxon capital Richard had charge of the alarm-bells and rang so wild a peal that even now its terrible sounds haunt the ears of memory. In one sense he has always been up in a tower, hurling through the air attention-compelling clangour. Wagner is no believer in the "still small voice." 'Tis a busy and a noisy world, and the man who would keep himself in evidence must be busier and noisier than his neighbours. So, promulgate new doctrines; sneer at the prophets of the ancient faith; pose as a martyr persecuted by an entire people; put on the dress of a buffoon and make jokes at the expense of a fallen city; serve up on the stage the most highly-spiced dialogues and situations and, without restriction to camels'-hair, shirts, locusts, and wild honey, go into the wilderness that people may value the oracle according to the length and pains of the pilgrimage to its temple. Undoubtedly these things have paid. Many believe that the man in the tower thunders from heaven; that the voice in the wilderness is inspired; and that he who swears not by Wagner is heathen and excommunicate. Seriously, the phenomenon now on view at Bayreuth excites both sorrow and rejoicing. It calls forth regret that so much genius should be allied to clap-trap procedure, sectarian narrowness, and pure Phariseeism of spirit. And it makes one glad because not thus does the abiding in art spring up and grow. The great masters of music who, like our Shakspere, were "for all time," had no such dreams as those of Wagner, and no such lines of action. They were content to labour and to let their work take its chance of the reward that never, in the long run, faileth merit. So, for example, laboured and waited the gifted man whose name is indissolubly connected with the old church of St Thomas over yonder. He and the rest, though dead, are now a living power, more enduring than monuments of brass. Beethoven built no temple and formulated no order of worship, with himself as god. Yet Beethoven is so mighty that even Wagner cannot ignore him, but bends down so much in homage as to point out his faults and amend his mistakes. Granted that extremes sometimes meet, will the aggressive and pretentious cult centered at Bayreuth also command everlasting reverence? As well might one expect the gourd of a night to afford a shade no less abiding than that of the oak which was an acorn centuries ago. But, while regarding the principles and practice of this "new art" as inimical to the interests of the art which is old—and true—the fact should not be overlooked that, whatever the intentions of Wagner, the Bayreuth Festival Theatre is in effect a protest against a degraded lyric stage. The music-drama of the Dresden revolutionist may perish with its founder; not so the serious interest with which he has invested opera. That will survive all remembrance of his vanity and self-seeking, and be his worthiest memorial.—D. T.

Wagneriana.

The subjoined, from "Our Teutonic Correspondent," must be taken cum grano salis, and sous toutes reserves. "Our Teutonic Correspondent" is (more or less) a confirmed Wagnerite, a spectre of one of that remarkable confederacy immortalized by Henri De Balzac, in his Histoire des Treize.

Frankfurt.—At the operahouse a very fine and creditable performance of Wagner's Walküre was played before a brillant audience. All the parts were played by the members of the theatre. The only "Gast" was Madame Scubert Hausen from the town theatre of Mannheim a most acomplished dramatic singer, of great and high aspiration whith such clear and good intonation to take the audience by storm, after each act a perfect ovation followed her splendid performance.

Bayruth.—The 5th and 6th performance of Parcifal took place by a crowded house, all seats sold. Herr Jäger the celebrated Siegfried performer took Parcifal this time, Malten Kundry and Fuchs München Klingsor. All these artists gave a new version to the music, which was by Wagner and house highly appreciated. The whole expense is covered, and a surplus is destined for future works of Wagner Operas.

Wagner and his Patronatsherrn.—In the Wagner camp is great excitement—The Meister hereby makes known to the Patrons that they have done their duty and gives them leave to go. The Patronat is disolved for a fund for poor Wagner's scholars. The 400 patronats holder protest with a 1 or 400 voiced "Hallo" motif —"Oho." The said 400 Patronatsherrn have collected a sum of 225000 marks for the foundation of a School and the performance of Parcifal. The school has not come up the holly Gral has swallowed up the money. In future the gentlemen are to pay without any right whatever to any visit performance. Wagner will not be patronized by anyone who pays 15 marks a year. This resolution is found arbitrary. Musicians without means are to be brought to Bayruth—By what means? This resolution has cooled down the rather hot Wagner Enthusiasts who on previous day drank the new baptised Champain Klingsor Enchantingdrink—and drink now comun Seltzer Water drink.

MEETING OF WAGNER AND WILHELMJ AT BAYREUTH.

The following account of this touchingly interesting event is translated from the Berliner Fremdenblatt of Aug. 12th. No worshipper at the Shrine of Bayreuth is likely to read it without emotion.

BAYREUTH (August 8th).—August Wilhelmj, the accomplished master of the violin, has been stopping here for some days. He once more forms, as during the memorable Nibelungen period of 1876, the central topic of conversation. Now, as then, his witty and caustic remarks are circulated about. It is well known that Wilhelmj is no less admired for his jokes and quickness of repartee than for his talent as an artist. His four years' voyage round the world, as far as it is possible to judge, has not in the least affected him; on the contrary, many declare that he looks more youthful and vigorous than six years ago. At the Parsifal performance he sits between Richard and Mdme Wagner, both of whom are extremely partial to him. His first meeting with Wagner is described by an eye-witness as very cordial. Hurrying up to him with the words: "Why, there is Wilhelmj"—Wagner held him in his embrace a long time. Tears stood in the eyes of both. "How could you stop away so long?" "There was nothing I neglected in Europe, my dear Master!" replied Wilhelmj. "Nothing of importance was going on; the first artistic event has brought me back, and I have hastened hither to you." "That was very, very kind," observed the poet-composer—"I cannot tell you how happy I feel to have you near me!—I am anxious to hear how you like Parsifal; I took great pains with it."—"Dare I venture to pronounce an opinion?" answered Wilhelmj.—"Yes, yes, yes, you must—I attach much value to your judgment"—said Wagner. According to report, Wilhelmj was enthusiastic about the new revelation, describing it to his friends as "the most perfect wonder of our time!" "Germany," he remarked, "could not be sufficiently proud of an artist who followed up his object with such unexampled earnestness and dignity."—The meeting of Mdme Cosima Wagner and Wilhelmj was equally cordial. The Countess von Schleinitz having invited Wilhelmj to visit her at Berlin, he announced his intention of passing the winter in that capital.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

After Fidelio's soliloquy, there is a period of rest from emotional excitement. There is more chattering between Jacquino and Marcellina, and this, as well as some conversation between Fidelio and Rocco, is spoken. Towards the end, Fidelio asks and receives permission to let out the prisoners for a short time into the court-yard, and presently they all emerge from their cells and are in joy at the sight of the outside world. From this point up to the end of the first act the music is continuous, and events and music both constitute a finale, that is, a series of connected movements working up to a climax at the close of an act.

While the men are coming out of their cells a very quiet symphony is played which introduces the chorus in which they express their thoughts. These thoughts are solemnly quiet, and, therefore, the form in which the music is laid, as well as the musical ideas themselves, is regular and smooth. The whole chorus is in the form of a large Rondo, with a tranquil undercurrent in the accompaniment (as a in the next example) which befits the restrained joy of the prisoners. Their first thought, joy at the sunshine and fresh air, is allotted to the principal subject of the Rondo; this is a complete miniature sonata, with tonic section beginning and dominant section, each corresponding to divisions in the verbal idea, and followed by a recapitulation in which the ideas are thought over again in a new light. At the close of this a single prisoner gives expression to a hope that help is near and soon they will be free. This, the beginning of the episode of the Rondo, is a simple ballad-like strain in the same time, with half cadence and full cadence, its key (G) is also closely connected with the key of the principal subject by the note D, which is fifth of the one and third of the other tonic. After the solo strain the chorus of the prisoners cry to Freedom to shine on their night, and under their broken utterances the band repeats part of the solo strain, as if to express more clearly that which is the cause of their emotion. This section does not close in its own key but modulates to the next idea. Now one of their number warns them that they are watched still and that they must speak softly. This is in recitative, and the thought is taken up by the rest of the prisoners; and, as it is a terrible check upon their happiness in the fresh air, so the two ideas are alternated in music up to the close of the movement. The "speak softly" of the chorus is little more than repetition of single notes, while the band has more melodious passages.

Ex. 196.

Ex. 197.

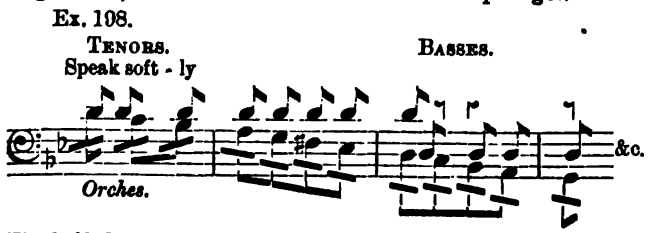
Ex. 198.

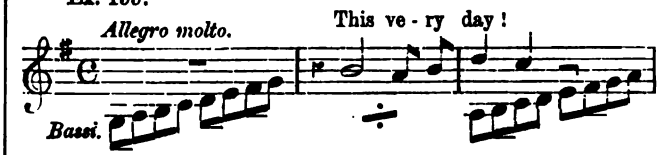


The half close of this section is the end of the episode. After it follows a repetition of the principal subject (Ex. 196), complete, but shortened, and all in the main key, B flat. Immediately after that is a repetition in B flat of a portion of the episode (Ex. 198), which is worked as a coda and so ends the movement. In this chorus the long sustained musical ideas of the principal subject and its recapitulation correspond with the joy of the prisoners at seeing light and breathing fresh air, which is the most sustained verbal idea of the piece; and the broken changeful ideas of the episode and its repetition as coda correspond with the cries for Freedom, broken and interrupted by the recollection of their bondage. During the singing of the chorus Fidelio has been walking about the stage, anxiously looking at each man without uttering a word; she has a lingering hope that the man whom she seeks may be one of these prisoners, and not that solitary sufferer whom she has heard Pizarro planning to destroy. It was for this that she asked the temporary freedom of the men.

Immediately on the close of the prisoners' chorus, Rocco comes to Fidelio, and tells her that Pizarro consents to the marriage and to her assisting him in attending to the prisoners, and that to-day they will go together to the lower dungeons. Fidelio cries, with excitement, "To-day?" All this is in accompanied recitative, for the interest of the situation is deepening, and, therefore, a deeper expression is needed in these dialogues than was given to those which were simply spoken.

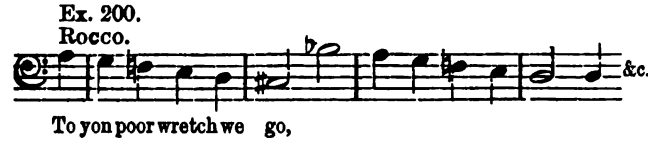
From this grows a short movement founded on the dialogue of Fidelio and Rocco; the vocal ideas often change, and some of them are little more than exclamations, but the whole is welded together by consistency of key and by the continuity of the accompaniment. It begins with Fidelio's cry of joy at the thought of, perhaps, so soon meeting her husband, and with Rocco's sympathy with what he deems the lad's excitement in a new work. This, a continuous idea of joy, is all in the principal key, G.

Ex. 199.



When Rocco speaks of the melancholy state of the man to whom they are to go, and constant question and answer follow between the two, the modulating part ensues.

Ex. 200.



When Rocco asserts confidently that the governor himself will kill the prisoner, that they are but to dig his grave and it is all settled, the main key returns and remains some time.

Ex. 201.

The last four notes (a) which are allotted to the orchestral basses after the close of the vocal phrase must be noticed as an example of leit-motiv. They form the most pointed part of the phrase in which Pizarro, in the duet with Rocco, uttered his determination to kill Florestan (Ex. 192). The repetition of the same expression recalls the passage to the minds of the audience, and connects the two occasions by lighting up the latter with the lamp of the former. Sadder thoughts in the same direction bring the present duet into the minor form of the key: Rocco thinking of the starving state of the prisoner, and Fidelio thinking "Perhaps it is my husband's grave." This movement does not close in its own key, but, by a half-close in E flat, leads to the next movement, which is in E flat.

The movement in E flat is a rondo with a modulating episode; but the return to the key is with a fresh idea, followed by another new idea as coda. Rocco and Fidelio speak, in alternation, of their errand to the dungeon, he, at times, doubting her strength of mind, and she eager and in anxiety to see the prisoner. The musical phrases follow one another in their places in the design as naturally as do the verbal phrases from one speaker to the other. In the coda, the verbal idea is the same for both characters, and they, therefore, sing it together.

A SCAMPER THROUGH THE DAMS.

Most persons visiting the town of Haarlem make at once for the Groote Kerk. They don't go there to say their prayers, although it is an imposing and lofty cruciform church; their object is to see the organ, and, if possible, to hear it played. It is decidedly one of the largest and most powerful instruments in the world, and is also, externally, handsome. At the base is a group in marble, representing ecclesiastical poetry and music, expressing gratitude to Haarlem for the erection of the organ, without doubt one of the finest toned instruments in existence. Its 60 stops and 4,088 pipes are not, however, much used, although some of them are 15 inches in diameter and 32 feet long. Truth is, the service on a Sunday is free from every kind of musical display, two single chants alone being sung by a congregation devoid of taste or musical culture. Indeed, the coldness of the whole affair contrasts unfavourably even with the English churches. The congregation on Sundays appear to be neither numerous nor devout at the Groote Kerk. Whether it is the orthodox thing not to pay attention to the outward forms of religion I am unable to decide. Most of the worshippers sat through the whole service lounging in a manner anything but devotional. During week days, the uncovering of the head is not demanded, nor do the officials cease from smoking while exhibiting the edifice. Indeed, most of the shops remain open on a Sunday throughout Holland, and, as far as I could judge, the provision dealers on that day do a good stroke of business.

The true capabilities of the organ appear to be reserved for recitals to be paid for, and even then "overwhelming thunderstorm" performances are left out, from a fear that the sacred edifice might tumble about the visitor's ears. Another very fine organ is in the church of St Lawrence, at Rotterdam. This I had an opportunity of hearing to greater advantage, and certainly its 72 stops and 4,762 pipes, the largest of which is 32 feet long and 17 inches in diameter, made the brick edifice echo alarmingly. The summer is not the season of the year to hear concerts indoors, but in the open air several very good bands, principally composed of wind instruments, can be listened to with pleasure. At Scheveningen the visitors to the hotels are charged a certain sum per week for music; and in the evening, after dinner, a concert is provided that would not disgrace the promenades of London or Paris. Through the courtesy of a friend at the Hague, I was able to attend a select musical tea party in the "Bosch." This is a reserved part of the park, with grand avenues of trees and handsome orchestra. On the present occasion, the Literary Society of the Hague gave an instrumental concert, under the direction of Herr C. Coenen, and it is impossible to imagine anything more pleasurable. The situation is beautiful, the lofty trees forming a shade of the most grateful character, and the primitive condition of the ground adding to the charm of the surrounding prospect. As the evening advances, lamps of opaque glass are dotted about in every direction, and the company seat themselves at little round tables, most of them occupied in making and drinking tea. This is conducted with undeviating serenity, for the Dutch have not only the finest tea in the world but brew their agreeable decoction with a tender solicitude that would astonish an English matron. First of all, the waiter brings a little bronze vessel like a pail, in which there is a charcoal fire, and on this fire the tea-kettle is put; he then arranges the cups and saucers and brings a suitable tea-pot and caddy, so that the visitor may help himself. The water boiling, the tea is made, and then the skilful handmaid takes off the lid of the kettle and replaces it with the base of the tea-pot, so that a cup hot and strong can be enjoyed. Throughout the whole of Holland I did not see a cup of tea made until the water was boiling. Housewives in England, kindly remember!

The music was all instrumental, and the orchestra numbered about eighty performers, composed principally of wind instruments. Their playing of the overture to Egmont did not disgrace Beethoven, and the performance of an air from Handel's opera, Rinaldo, was most effective, the wooden wind instruments taking the solo with excellent precision. They have an operatic composer here whose name is hardly known in England—Mynheer Dunkler—a selection from whose opera, Lalla Roukh, was particularly effective. The daylight was gradually dying away when the Lobgesang of Mendelssohn began, and whether it was the time of evening or the effect of the music I will not pretend to say, but the nightingales burst out into an accompaniment of song I have never heard equalled, and I must say the opening movements of this heart-stirring symphony never sounded to me more devotional. With the resources at his command, Herr Coenen did wonders, but, when he concluded, the applause seemed to disperse the nightingales, or it may have been that they did not care to take part in a less distinguished work; be this as it may, they never sang another note that evening, but took Mendelssohn's music off to bed with them. The conductor, Herr Coenen, introduced a menuetto, adagio, and serenade of his own composing, well worthy being played by a string band in a concert room. Although the concert was in the open air, the utmost stillness reigned throughout. Tea-drinking is not a noisy operation, nor are the Dutch given to boisterous behaviour, whatever they may have been in the days of Teniers, Ostade, and Jan Steen, who seemed to glory in representations of drunken roysterers and frantic gamblers. The inhabitants of the Hague are evidently a sober, refined, and educated class, and when the audience dispersed to the music of Sahan's military march, the half-mile of walk through the wood was not the least agreeable part of the entertainment, for the evening was delightfully warm and the smell of the pine trees wonderfully refreshing.

It will surprise the visitor to the various museums and picture galleries of Holland to find so few works by the artists of other nations, but this surprise will disappear when he comes to enquire into the histories of these galleries. They have mostly belonged to rich and enthusiastic Dutchmen, who took but little interest in art away from home. Throughout the whole of the picture exhibitions in Rotterdam, the Hague, and Amsterdam, I did not see one English work. At a first glance, this might cause some dissatisfaction, but recalling the immense price that all the high-class English works command, that surprise must disappear. A few hundred pounds would be considered a large sum to the authorities of these places, and it is well known that thousands are paid for the works of English artists the moment they become famous. In the Fodor museum of Amsterdam I saw one French work, some horses by Rosa Bonheur, and in the private collections a few foreign works may be found, but our greatest enjoyment will be an examination of the Dutch school, of which the best specimens have not been allowed to leave the country.

NICE.—Benjamin Godard has completed an opera, L'Alcalde di Zalamea, which will be played this winter at the new Italian Theatre, Mdlle Griswold sustaining the principal part. The libretto is by Détroyat and Silvestre; the translation, by de Lauzières.

STRASSBURGH.—Walking in the outskirts of this city, Sellier, the tenor, slipped down a ravine, disfiguring his face, and severely bruising his right side. "When"—Auber used to say—"will our artists understand that they should be content with excursions on the stage, or in photographic albums? I never travel otherwise."

The decision recently pronounced by the superior court is in so far favourable to the Society that the orders of the civic authorities have been considerably modified.—Herr Hans Makart, the well-known painter, lately married, at Hitzing, a village not far from here, Berthe Linda, formerly a star of the ballet at the Imperial Opera. WAGNER'S *PARSIFAL.

III.

The first performance of Parsifal took place yesterday (the 25th of July), with full and unalloyed success. In endeavouring to describe to our readers the effect upon myself as a purely individual one, I do so with all the becoming reservation which is, so to speak, a matter of course in dealing with a new art-work of such magnitude. In its grand plan as well as in its smallest detail, Parsifal loudly proclaims the originality of him to whom we owe it. Just as the Babylonian sovereign had his name burnt into every one of the tiles used in the new and mighty edifices he erected, as a testimony for thousands of years to come, so has the author of Parsifal stamped, as it were, upon each bar an invisible "R. W." The very latest labourers in the field of research will certainly recognize every page torn out of this score. The various parts of the extensive work act upon us in turns favourably and unfavourably; now producing a strong and elevating effect, and then a sensation of indifference or oppression. Still, we always feel we are in the power of a mighty individuality of the most peculiar and unshakably firm convictions. The energy of a strong and never-doubting will works at all times imposingly in art as in life. It compels respect and admiration—but not invariably sympathy. Such are the principal features which the Bayreuth Festival Performances of 1882 have in common with the first ones of 1876. Compared with the Nibelungen Cycle, Parsifal proves the advantage of an independent definite form and the homogeneous impression thereby obtained. The very fact that Wagner has now abandoned the dramatically false and unfortunate form of the trilogy or tetralogy which rendered all enjoyment in 1876 an effort, secures for Parsifal, of which the theatres will one day doubtless take possession, a purer effect.

The method of musical composition is now, as then, consistently the same. The style is that determined by the "endless orchestral melody" which Wagner began by strictly carrying out in Tristan, which he then brightened up in Die Meistersinger with blooming oases of melodic and multi-part song, and finally in the Nibelungen worked into an imposingly rigid law. This method, by which opera is to be raised to real drama, has for result, as we know, the old forms of the air, the duet, the trio, the chorus, in short, the organic form, and therefore the independence of the musical thought are put on one side, and the principal part is assigned to an incessantly active orchestra, while the voices declaim rather than sing. The materials out of which the orchestra spins its ever-changing and endless web are the "leading" or "guiding motives," * as they are termed. In Parsifal, also, every character has its appointed leading-motive, or, rather, according to the various dramatic circumstances, several such motives. Wolfzogen's Key† contains 26 such motives; another by Heintz, 66; while a third by Eichberg (there is already a small library of such little Bayreuth manuals) only 23. But these 23, as the author emphatically says, "are intended for nothing more nor less than to be learned by heart." This express intimation is characteristic. The spectator, if he wishes to understand and enjoy Parsifal, must begin by learning these guiding motives by heart; then during his audition of the work it is incumbent on him to employ his intellect and memory in the task of restless comparison.‡ Out of the breakers of a heaving orchestra we have to recognize, whenever it is heard, the "Graal motive proper," the "love-feast motive," the "belief motive," the "promise motive," &c. All these are guiding-motives relating to the Graal. Besides them, there are naturally several motives for Kundry ("Kundry's wild ride-motive," "Kundry's love-motive," "Kundry's laugh-motive"), as well as others for Parsifal, Klingsor, and the rest. These guiding-motives, always combined afresh, varied afresh, and scored afresh, supply the orchestra with a continuous symphonic web. Any one not knowing the fact from the composer's intimate friends, would guess for himself that Wagner first sketched in the orchestral-accompaniment, and did not write the vocal portion till afterwards.§ The connected and connecting whole is the symphonic, independent orchestral part; what is sung to it are fragments, the sense of which lies in the words and not in the notes. With a few exceptions, shining forth in strong relief, of melodious song, intelligible of itself, Parsifal, also, exhibits an instance of an orchestral composition, full of allusions and working on exclusively in "significance," with the bits of excited conversational song swimming about in it. A second essential characteristic of the later Wagnerian style is the unbounded freedom of the modulations. In Parsifal, as in former works, we have, properly speaking, no longer modulations, but only a modulating, a ceaselessly surging modulating, in which the listener loses every idea of tonality. We feel as if out at sea with no firm ground under our feet. Wagner has got into a chromatically enharmonic train of thoughts quite peculiar to himself, which is constantly intertwining and then untwining the most remote keys. As in the Nibelungen, so in Parsifal there are passages of more reposeful tonality, pleasing, and, sometimes, charming exceptions, but exceptions only, and, as a rule, flitting rapidly by. We feel that the tyrannic sway of the guiding-motives in the orchestra, and the limitless freedom of modulation,‖ are serious drawbacks in operatic music; but Wagner and his adherents value them as a test of the most advanced progress. These, however, are strongly marked, fundamental differences of opinion, which it is no longer of any use to discuss.

A lengthy and simply treated prelude, which, with its solemn wearisomeness, has evidently but one object, namely, to produce a proper "frame of mind,"¶ serves as introduction to the first act and at once gives us the three most important "Graal motives." In the different guiding-motives of Parsifal I fail to perceive either any great musical charm or especially characterising force and pregnancy. In Lohengrin Wagner gave us the model of a guiding-motive and its application. "Never shalt thou question me!" Proclaimed as a dogma by Lohengrin himself, this theme is presented to us at the very first in all its significance. It does not require to be sought out and divined, but, whenever employed, cuts into the score like a sharp sword. The guiding-motives in the Nibelungen and those in Parsifal are far from possessing the same distinctly marked physiognomy, or the same strong power, if only because there are too many of them. When each short series of notes is to serve as a guide full of significance, not one serves the purpose. The Graal motives of the prelude blend as orchestral accompaniment with the opening scenes which are treated in rather a conversational tone and a more natural style of expression, contrasting advantageously with the dialogue of the Nibelungen. Gurnemanz, the bass, is, despite his long-windedness, an amiable old man compared to Wotan. With the declamation, which is made the most important element in Wagnerian characters, he takes, it is true, strange liberties. We perceive he is acquainted with Die Meistersinger. He repeatedly utters words like "Linderung," "lindern," "schaden," "hämisch," with an emphatically false stress on the last syllables which ascend now a sixth and now an octave. The scenes before Parsifal appears do not contain much that is musically striking, unless we accept as such some isolated effects of sonority in the orchestral accompaniment, which, by the way, are not wanting in any page of the score. After these monotonously spun out scenes, we see the wounded swan (a magnificent piece of stage mechanism, the appearance of which is a most welcome relief) fly across the stage, the knights and squires rushing on in great excitement with the offender, Parsifal, and making a picture full of stirring life. It is a dramatically contrived scene, in which we greet a pleasing reminiscence of the "Swan motive" in Lohengrin. Parsifal's entrance at once creates sympathy, the "sadness" of the inexperienced youth being represented naturally and without strained pathos. It is a psychologically proved fact that we are accustomed to admire most in others virtues of which we are not ourselves possessed. Wagner, a reflective artist, of such subtle intellect, is fond of glorifying naif ingeniousness (simplicitas), though with him even the Unconscious is somewhat too conscious. Let the reader call to mind the Sailor's Song in Tristan,* the Cobbler's Song in Die Meistersinger, and the Forge Song of Siegfried, that most unnatural of all the vocal children of nature. It is different with Parsifal in his early scenes; he is there what he should be. But Kundry! It is true that Kundry is what she should be according to the author's intention—something unnatural and full of contradictions. A psychological and physiological hermaphrodite, she sings or rather cries and stammers disjointedly in a way to make one's hair stand on end, while at the same time she has continually to do the most unheard of things histrionically. We may as well at once state that only an artist possessing Mad. Materna's extraordinary powers and passionate temperament could succeed in rendering this part†—the most difficult and fatiguing perhaps in existence—so as to make it all probable and impressive. Now comes the great effect of the moving panorama, a masterpiece of scenic art, supported in a somewhat step-motherly fashion by the composer. Parsifal and Gurnemanz march along to heavy and fatiguingly monotonous chords until they reach the Graal Temple. From this point the music, supported by the peculiar scenic effect,‡ culminates in a highly impressive manner. Very striking are the vocal unison of the Knights, the chorus of Youths, and, lastly, the promise floating down from above: "Through pity knowing, the pure fool." In this combination of pure high voices the "promise motive" creates all the intended impression; though, of itself, the somewhat empty theme, ascending in fifths, will scarcely be found particularly original or interesting. The solemn supper of the Knights of the Graal in the magnificent Moorish hall, with the three different groups of singers, Knights, Youths, and Boys (up in the dome), the heavy pealing of the bells, the strange and picturesque costumes, the solemn uncovering of the Graal—unite in making up a grandiose picture. The finale belongs indisputably to those dazzling musically-scenic effects in which Wagner has no rival. It may be my fault, the fault of expectations pitched too high, but I did not find the result so powerful as I had imagined it from the book and the score. I had anticipated an extraordinary brilliancy in the orchestra and something overpowering from the chorus—an effect of sonority, in short, uninterruptedly rising to the climax. The reader of Wagnerian scores ordinarily finds his expectations surpassed in the actual representation; but here, at least to my mind, hope is not completely fulfilled, the continuous slow tempi in a very long first act, together with the structure of the Bayreuth orchestra, which, sunk underground and covered, materially impedes if not deadens the sonority, contributing doubtless to the result.* Nevertheless after the first half of the act, thus declamatorily sung and swallowed up by the instrumental accompaniment, the second was a musical boon, containing rhythmical and independent song-melody, not only solo, but in harmoniously combined parts. One thing only detracts from the boon; the fact of scene after scene being so interminably spun out. This inability to bring to an end scenes that stop the progress of the action is no less remarkable in Parsifal than in the Nibelungen. Everything from great to small, from the solemn Love-feast to Kundry's impossible kiss, is hopelessly so long as at times to pass the limits of endurance.

The second act is opened by the wicked magician, Klingsor, summoning Kundry to his presence. The demoniacal element is expressed musically by not unusual but striking means; the vocal portion is again hurried, jerky declamation; the orchestra, a witches' cauldron of bubbling guiding-motives; and Kundry, a dramatic musical convulsion. Did Wagner, perhaps, here purposely employ his whole stock of sulphurous vapours in order to render us more susceptible to the perfume of the flowers in the following scene? If so, he has thoroughly succeeded. True, the "poetry" of the lovely Flower-Maidens sinks occasionally down to very questionable rhyming: "Willst du auf Trost uns sinnen, —Solltest den abgewinnen! Dir zur wonnigen Labe gilt mein minniges Mühen.—Kannst du uns nicht lieben und minnen,—Wir welken und sterben d a h i n n e n, &c." But who cares about the words, when they flow charmingly from the lips of thirty young and beautiful girls! The mere confusion in which these rush on amid a swarm of dainty triplet figures for the violins, is full of dramatic life. And then the second half of the scene, when the girls appear as flowers! their "motive" in A flat, "Come, O beauteous Boy," somewhat in the time of a slow waltz, melodious, piquant, and simply harmonized, is one of Wagner's happiest inspirations. And how admirably is everything arranged! with what delicate calculation are the thirty voices parcelled out in groups, now alternating, now singing together, and some occasionally making room for short solo passages! One must see and hear this himself; words fail to picture it. Among the scenes in Parsifal, I am inclined to rank this musically the highest. It achieves the purest and most certain effect simply by the aid of a charming and expressive melody. In all we know of Wagner, this girls' chorus is absolutely unique, the one scene carried out from first to last in a brightly graceful style. It is indeed an inspiration and a masterpiece.

When the Flower-Girls, or Girl-Flowers, laughingly vanish, Kundry, now young and seductively beautiful, calls Parsifal by name. Upon this follows the great scene in which she first tells him about his Mother and then attacks him with ever increasing lustful ardour. The commencement of her narrative: "I saw the child"—thank goodness, this time not "the sucking child"†—begins in a natural and singable manner; it is one of the promising buds of melody not seldom found in Wagner, only to be too soon snapped off before they can blossom. From this point, the music is lost in greater and greater depths of sham pathos. Every moment we are afraid lest the composer should be stopped for want of breath. Any one who does not know his guiding-motives by heart stands confounded before the blustering fermentation of the orchestra, and, if he does know them, he is not much better off. It is rather hard upon us to be expected to go through all the motiveless and fearful changes of feeling in which Parsifal and Kundry are hurled through the whole of this long scene: from wearisome narratives into sensual ardour, and from sensual ardour into religious ecstasy, but always fleeing from what is musically beautiful and moderate. For such scenes of passionate expression have grown up in Wagner's music certain standing phrases which are now solidified almost into mannerisms. I know that sworn Wagnerites regard these standing phrases, these mannerisms, as natural utterances of the deepest feeling and will extol the scene between Kundry and Parsifal as the finest the composer has ever conceived. The question turns on the standpoint from which it is considered. To me the whole scene appears in the highest degree false, and the music outwardly glowing while inwardly cold—baked ice. We already begin to grow tired and absent amid the tumult of this fruitless passion when Parsifal's hand grasps the sacred Lance and we are saved by this palpable climax. Under the power of some wonderful earthquake music, the magic castle falls crashingly to the ground, and the curtain closes on the events in Klingsor's domain.

The third act commences with a sort of religious idyll, treated by Wagner with great love but with the utmost prolixity. We have a poetical and tranquilly agreeable picture, when Parsifal in snow-white, Christ-like garments, sits near the holy spring and praises the beauty of the "flowery mead," while Kundry washes his feet and the old man, Gurnemanz, anoints his flowing locks. The whole belongs to one of those scenes peculiar to Wagner, which fascinate as might a picture full of feeling. But we are able to contemplate a painted picture for a longer time than the most beautiful tableau without movement in drama, where the action should press forward to its culminating point. It seems as if the author could not have enough of the plastic repose distinguishing this scene of the third act. The music stretches out like a dreary waste in suggestive monotony. Parsifal's lyrical outburst about the beauty of the flowery mead takes us by surprise as a fragrant blossom; but even that soon withers in the arid soil of instrumental "endlessness."

At last, Parsifal, Gurnemanz, and Kundry start off for the Gralsburg. According to the directions in the book and the score, another moving scene, like that in the first act, should here magically transport the stationary travellers through all kinds of country to their destination. Technical doubts, however, severally expressed at the rehearsals, induced Wagner to abandon this effect, and so at the performance, instead of the moving panorama, we witness a mere occasional curtain close upon the three Graal pilgrims, as they are about to depart. This is certainly preferable to the original direction. The repetition of the same bit of scenic enchantment, reminding one of fairy pieces, pantomimes, &c., for children, struck me from the beginning as open to objection, being a confessed poverty of invention on the part of the author. A second and equally praiseworthy deviation from the directions in the text also occurs in the third act: the dead Titurel "newly endowed for the moment with life," had to raise himself in his coffin, but now remains a respectable corpse, quietly recumbent. The introductory funeral music is, I think, too much spread out. How much the story, after long lyrical contemplation, requires something energetically dramatic, we see by the great effect when Amfortas passionately springs up against the knights of the Gaaal who are pressing him hard. From the words: "My Father," we are moved by what he sings (on a very expressive figure, first for the violoncellos and then for the violins, in the accompaniment).

The final scene is another instance of the employment of extraordinarily brilliant resources—the same, by the way, which served for the Graal scene in the first act. The solemn sounds of the harp, the Boys' voices wafted from the dome, the Graal glowing into brightness, the appearance of the white dove—all work up together into a grand picture similar to the first finale.

The third act may be regarded as the most homogeneous and tone-giving, but it is not the richest musically.

And how about Wagner's creative power? For a man of Wagner's age and with——Wagner's system, it strikes me as being in Parsifal still wonderful. He who can create music with the fascinating melodic charm of the Flower Maidens and the energy of the finale has yet at command a power which the youngest among us might envy. True, so voluminous a work as Parsifal does not consist exclusively of corruscations of light. It would be "purely foolish" to assert that Wagner's fancy and in particular his specifically musical invention has preserved untouched the freshness and lightness of former days. It is impossible not to see in Parsifal a certain sterility and flatness side by side with increasing prolixity. Are not the irresistible Kundry's attempts at seduction almost stiff and cool compared with the similar scene in Tannhäuser? Then the prelude to Parsifal. Was it not dictated by the same frame of mind and with the same intention as the prelude to Lohengrin? It is the same tree, but first in full bloom and then stripped of its leaves and trembling in the autumn breeze. Let the reader further compare what Gurnemanz sings about "the magic of Good Friday" (third act) with the description, nearly related to it melodically, of The Festival of John the Baptist in Die Meistersinger. Pogner's spirited song appears to have floated before Wagner's mind during the composition of "the magic of Good Friday"—but where was the inward strength, the vocal soul of the model? The most powerful numbers, too, in the Nibelungen, considered by themselves, would scarcely find in Parsifal their match, always excepting the thoroughly isolated chorus of the Flower-Girls. It is true that when we reflect that the brilliant pieces in the Nibelungen Ring—pieces separated from each other by absolute musical deserts—are distributed over four whole evenings, the needle of the balance will perhaps remain even between the two scales. Compared with the Nibelungen, Parsifal enjoys the advantage of a more effective book. Though perfectly indefensible as a "dramatic poem," Parsifal is a better operatic text than the four-membered Nibelungen Ring. In short, it is more musical, both as regards the subject as a whole and the decisive situations. If we regard Parsifal as a festival and magic opera, ignoring, as under all circumstances we must frequently do, its logical and psychological impossibilities and false religiously-philosophical pretentions, we shall find in it many instances of significant artistic suggestiveness, of the most dazzling effect, and many occasions for sincere admiration.

A NIGHT-AND-DAY-MARE.

DEAR SIR DODINAS,—Something of this kind keeps on running slowly in my head:—

Please explain the phenomenon and thereby oblige yours most solicitously, SAGRAMORE THE DESIROUS.

Take my counsel of last Saturday. The Mare will flee incontinent and vanish into space. DODINAS.

MDME CHRISTINE NILSSON will sing, next season, in New Orleans for the first time.

Forty thousand dollars are said to be already subscribed for the Patti Italian operatic season at the New York Academy of Music. —(Good!—Dr Bridge.)

DR HANS VON BÜLOW was married recently at Meiningen to Mdlle Schawzer, an actress at the Ducal Theatre. The lady will remain on the stage, her marriage notwithstanding.

THE Western Mail of August 12th states that the announcement made in Friday's impression, that Mdme Patti, with other distinguished artists, would give a morning concert at the Albert Hall on Thursday, the 14th of September, in aid of the Swansea Hospital, has been confirmed.

SINCE Gounod's Faust was produced in 1859 at the old Théâtre-Lyrique on the Boulevard du Temple, twenty-one different ladies have appeared successively as Marguerite in the French capital. They are Miolan-Carvalho, Vandenheuvel-Duprez, Schrœder, Christine Nilsson, Hisson, Marie Roze, Berthe Thibault, Fidès Devriès, Arnaud, Derivis, Fouquet, Adelina Patti, Fursch-Madi, De Reszké, Daram, Heilbron, Marie Vachot, Baldi, Griswold, Krauss, and Nordica.

BLACKHEATH CONSERVATOIRE OF MUSIC.—The following examinations were held last month:—Free Scholarship for Singing, given by the hon. sec., W. Webster, junr.; examiner—Mr J. B. Welch; successful candidate—Miss Langley (pupil of Signor Garcia). Free Scholarship for Pianoforte: examiner—Mr Walter Macfarren; successful candidate—Miss Andrews (pupil of Mr C. Gardiner). Harmony Prize, given by the president, H. Hersee, Esq.; examiner—Dr Bridge; successful candidate—Miss Sadler (pupil of Mr J. T. Field.)

PROVINCIAL.

CARDIFF.—SIR,—As reported in your columns, the choral festival held at Carmarthen on the 8th inst. by the Choral Union of the Carmarthen Archdeaconry, was a grand success. Taking everything into account, it was decidedly the best yet held in this archdeaconry. But, while heartily rejoicing in this fact, I cannot help feeling that the success was due in a large measure to the noble effort and great sacrifice made by the country choirs to attend in the midst of the hay harvest. And perhaps I may be permitted to suggest to the committee that the festival in future be held about the end of May. July, August, and September find the farmers plenty to do, and if their convenience is to be studied they must not be called upon to leave their farms during those months. In May they have very little to do, and I do not see why the festival should not be held about the end of that month. The books ought to be ready about Christmas time, and the training to commence early in January. This is the best time of the year to secure good attendances at the practices, and May is certainly the most convenient time for all to attend the festival.—I am, &c., N. THOMAS, Vicar of Llanddarog, Aug. 11.

[The above letter was addressed to the Western Mail, and published in its columns on Saturday, Aug. 12.]

BUXTON.—At the "Special Concert" given in the Gardens on the evening of August 10th, the singers were Mdme Enriquez and Mr Henry Pyatt; the instrumentalists, M. Victor Buziau (violin), and Mdlle Nina Buziau (pianoforte). The orchestra played, among other things, the overture to Der Freyschütz, and Fidelio. The ripe and mellow contralto voice of Mdme Enriquez found ample room for display in "Voi che sapete," which she rendered with irreproachable taste. Later in the evening she gave Pinsuti's always popular "Heaven and Earth," being encored in which, she substituted "Robin Adair;" and, later still, a new song entitled, "Lord Mayor Whittington." This being also encored, brought forth "The Minstrel Boy." Mr Pyatt gave the "Two Grenadiers" and "The Village Blacksmith" (both encored). M. Buziau played with his accustomed skill a polonaise by Vieuxtemps, and variations on the "Carnival of Venice," and Mdlle Buziau selected Thalberg's "Home, sweet home" for her solo, winning merited applause. The concert was highly appreciated by a large audience.

EASTBOURNE.—A special Orchestral Saturday Concert was given on the 12th inst., the programme of which contained some compositions of interest finely executed by Mr Julian Adams' famous band, including Wagner's overture to Rienzi, Schubert's overture to Rosamunda, and a new "Song of Welcome," for voice, flute and piano, by Charles Salaman; sung for the first time by Miss Catherine Penna, and admirably accompanied by Mr Charles Lax the eminent flautist. Miss Penna, who is deservedly advancing in public estimation, was enthusiastically applauded—alike in Mr Salaman's new song, and Gounod's brilliant Valse from Faust. Mr Julian Adams conducted throughout.

TEIGNMOUTH.—An attractive concert was given here by Miss C. E. Linter on Tuesday, August 8th. One of the most striking features of the programme was the singing of Fraulein von Schwedler, this young lady has studied in both Paris and Rome under the best masters, and certainly her performance of the two songs set down for her, "Serenade" (Braga), and "Ave, Maria" (Luzzi); and her two "encores" "Frühlingslied" (Fesca), and "Qui la voce" (Puritani), proved her to be a really finished artist. Miss Ida Meynell (of the National Training School) also took part, her first song being "Deh vieni" (Mozart). Local talent was well represented by Mr Wills, Misses M. Parson and Berthon, the audience frequently shewing their appreciation in the shape of bouquets. The instrumental part was entirely "classical," and also much appreciated. Miss Linter played Beethoven's Sonata in C minor "Pathétique," Mr V. V. Williams, Handel's Sonata in D for the violin, and Miss Cleminshaw, Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor. The concert was opened by Misses Linter and Grant with an "arrangement" from Tannhäuser as a duet. The chorus-singing, under the direction of the Rev. H. C. Hylton, (Precentor of Chester Cathedral)—who also in Scuderi's "Dormi pur," especially proved himself the possessor of a well-cultivated voice of excellent quality—was throughout commendable.

MADRID.—The Italian-opera company next season at the Teatro Real will be thus constituted:—Sopranos—Elena Theodorini, Fursch-Madi, Marcella Sembrich (two months), Matilde Rodriguez, A. Gini, Carlotta Leria; Mezzo-soprano-contraltos—Tremelli, Adele Borghi; Tenors—Angelo Masini, Lestellier, Giannini, Antonio Bianchini; Baritones—Pandolfini, Dufriche; Basses—Nannetti, Bopp, Gaetano Roveri; Comic Bass—Aristide Fiorini; Conductor—Giovanni Goula.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The Prince of Wales has, through the honorary secretary of the Royal College of Music, sent a circular to the beneficed clergy of England and Wales, in which he says:—

"His Royal Highness is fully aware of the large demands on clergymen which often make it impossible for them to give pecuniary aid even in the best cause. On the other hand, they have peculiar opportunities for bringing subjects requiring such support before their parishioners, and, by forming committees, can obtain small subscriptions from those who, though not wealthy, are willing to assist a worthy object. The Prince of Wales desires me, therefore, to ask your aid by bringing the subject of the Royal College of Music under the notice of your parishioners and acquaintances, and by inviting them to contribute to it. I am also to express the hope that you will be able to form a committee in the parish with the view of collecting smaller contributions towards this national object. Music increases the sum of harmless and elevating pleasures, binds families together, alleviates the sorrows and quickens the joys of life, and not only enlivens the social meetings, but is the best accompaniment to the worship of Almighty God. All this the Royal College of Music will assist. The foundation scholarships of the college may, it is hoped, often be the means of evoking talent in quarters where otherwise it would have lain dormant. On these grounds, his Royal Highness commends the college to your early and best attention, and I shall be glad to hear for his information whether, and if so in which way, it will be in your power to assist the object in view."

Meetings in support of the college have been held in various towns of Devonshire; Mr Grove, at the desire of H.R.H., attending on each occasion to explain and comment on the object and character of the proposed institution.

[It might, perhaps, have been as well (certainly it would have been only fair), at the meeting held lately in Exeter, to make public and discuss the letter addressed to the authorities by Professor Macfarren, who so worthily fills the musical chair at Cambridge University, and is, moreover, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music.—D. T.]

(From the Operetta, "A Story of Seville.")

How fondly as the years fleet by Mem'ry recalls the time
When life held not a sigh or tear,
And love was in its prime.

When each high impulse of our heart
Nor doubt or danger knew,
But in the fray bore well its part—
To faith and honour true.

Oh! could we keep our hearts still young
Time's course we might defy;
The roselight o'er our lives be flung
Of love's eternity.

PROFESSOR MACFARREN is taking some well-earned repose at Woodnesboro', near Sandwich.

SIG. SCHIRA is still at Milan, enjoying the otium cum dignitate under the bright skies of his native land.

MAD. MONTIGNY-RÉMAURY, the opal-amethyst-emerald-pearl-and-diamond (crowned Empress, in short) of French pianists (pace M. Planté), has been created by the Ministre des Beaux Arts "Officier de L'Academie"—a distinction very rarely awarded to artists of her sex. She was first named. Salut bel' Officier! Mad. Rémaury is engaged to play at the Baden-Baden Festival early in September, and then visits other German towns, at every one of which she may count upon a hearty welcome. Such purely "classical" talent as hers, is, just now, by no means superabundant.

MONTE CARLO.—The promised operas for the approaching season are: Le Nozze di Figaro, with Marie Vanzandt, Heilbron, Maurel, and Dufriche; Dinorah, with Vanzandt and Maurel; Faust, with Vanzandt, Talazac, Maurel, and Dufriche; La Traviata, with Heilbron, Talazac, and Maurel; La Figlia del Reggimento, with Heilbron; the Domino Noir and Les Dragons de Villars.

MILAN.—According to the Pungolo, the ballets next season at the Scala will be Danesi's Arduino d'Ivrea and Excelsior. The idea of giving Hamlet or La Juive has been abandoned. Tannhäuser, it is said, will be performed if Gayarre agrees to play the leading part. There is, also, some talk of Goldmark's Königin von Saba, and of Dejanice, a new opera by Catalani.

Parsifal, the King, &c.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—His Majesty of Bavaria is still alive, and yet has not enjoyed the foreshadowed private and peculiar audition of the latest offspring of Wagner's genius. How is this? All that surrounds Parsifal assumes a mystical aspect. All is more or less Kundryfied. I heard the first performance, was utterly bewildered, and left by post-chaise for Bamberg the same night. I dreamt I had attended two solemn services of the Roman Catholic Church, with an Alhambra ballet of the most déchevelé and décollété separating one from another. But I was suddenly awakened by the shrieking, tumble-down-the-ladder "Kundrymotiv:"—

This at once dispersed my dream, and "took me from my error."* Thenceforward sleep eschewed me. I could not close my eyes, or even get forty winks with my eyes wide open. Such was my hoped-for repose at Bamberg. So I went next day to Wurzburg and had the same dream, the same lever de rideau, due to the same "Kundrymotiv." "Kundry, my she-devil"—said I, inwardly—"were I a man you should have none of me." Next day I went to the Hotel de Russie, Frankfort, where I was well treated by the incomparable Drexels, pearls of landlords. There I had a pleasant dream—a dream of Kundry-Orgeluse in the fairy gardens of Klingsor. Thought I to myself—were I a man I should say "Booby, Parsifal." Thereupon I woke and found myself still at that dreary Bayreuth, with the sun just peeping into my chamber. It had been all a dream—Bamberg, Wurzburg, Frankfort and all!

Parsifal goes on, and I am going off. I have seen three Parsifals and three Kundrys (Marian Brandt by far the subtlest). I don't want any more. I don't want any more of such an out-of-the-way drama, or any more such go-a-tail music. Parsifal is not by any means a financial success, say what they will. The house is but rarely crowded now. In another sense—except by some enthusiasts, who think that Wagner cannot step backward if he would, or his invention wane, however years may creep upon him—Parsifal is not considered equal to preceding works by that master. I am of the same opinion. By the way, there is some dispute between Wagner and his patrons, about which, not knowing the particulars, I can tell you nothing that would make you wiser than you are already.

Please when I send you another telegram (which is unlikely) don't garble it by leaving out whole sentences that explain the context and are necessary to the sense of my observations. But where is the King of Bavaria?

Your American Correspondent at Bayreuth.

[Our fair correspondent accuses us of a fault that is virtually her own. She must have forgotten or mislaid several slips of her telegram, the loss of which we were compelled to supply by asterisks. Voilà tout. Meanwhile, from wherever she pleases to address us her communications will always be welcome.—D. T.]

Leipsic.—The Stadttheater opened on the 1st inst., under its new manager, Stägemann, with Lessing's Minna von Barnhelm, preceded by a Prologue by Wilhelm Henzen, for which Richard Kleinmichel had written appropriate music. The Prologue was followed by Beethoven's overture, Zur Weihe des Hauses, under the direction of Nikisch.

Bayreuth.—The Parsifal performances are said to be still numerously attended, despite the wretched weather. The first success is confirmed; the more the work is heard and the more familiar the public become with it, the more do they learn to appreciate it. The day before yesterday, Fischer, of Munich, conducted for the first time. The singers on this occasion were Gudehus (Parsifal), Malten (Kundry), and Siehr (Gurnemanz). On the Friday following, Jäger, as Parsifal, created a favourable impression especially by his acting. The character, however, would be very different, were Albert Niemann to undertake it.†—Berliner Fremdenblatt, Aug. 8th.

† Why then was this veteran Wagnerite, Tannhäuser of Tannhäusers, Lohengrin of Lohengrins, Tristan of Tristans, Siegmund of Siegmunds, not present to declare himself also Parsifal of Parsifals?—Dr Blidge.

UNSOLICITED FAVOUR.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—I beg you to allow me to protest, through the columns of your journal, against the imposition practised by Chinese and Japanese publishers, in voluntarily sending musical newspapers without paying postage? This day my servant paid elevenpence for the postal delivery of some undesired periodical transmitted from the far Pacific. I withhold the name, as I have no wish to supply a gratuitous advertisement of the work in your columns, apologizing for troubling you, I am, Sir, A Constant Reader.

Pimlico, August 14.

[I am also troubled with such complimentary sheets. My way, however, is to tell the postman—who knows me—to call again. After perusing their contents I return them *re*gummed, with the intimation, "Not for me." My last were from Sumatra, Formosa, the Corea and North Borneo.—Dr Blidge.]

FROM AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—As I know you like to know where your wandering sheep are straying, I just send you a few lines. Aix, I am told, is the best place to get rid of one's pains—not that I am troubled with any (thank goodness). I fear I have nothing very interesting to communicate in the musical way, for since hearing Wagner's operas in London nothing astonishes me, not even A sharp against B flat, which are supposed to be the same by some folks, but are not. The Operahouse is not open. Burnart's Theatre is for opera-bouffe—Boccaccio, Der Lustige Krieg, Madame Favart, &c., &c. There are plenty of bands in the various gardens, and some "classical" music at the Kurhaus. The weather is very cold and wet, and people are going about with thick overcoats; I would do the same, but I brought only light clothing with me, for I have always found it very hot in Germany at this time of year. I expect to leave here early in the next week; for what place I am not decided—perhaps to Frankfort.* I hope to take Paris or Brussels on my way back. In any case, if anything is going on at either place worth your notice, you shall hear from me. H. G.

MUSIC v. DRAWING OF CORKS.

In a communication published by the Brighton Guardian, apropos to the Covent Garden Concerts, our frequent and valued contributor, "Phosphor," says:—

"Now that the Floral Hall has been converted into a smoking lounge and promenade, there can be no excuse for noise in the theatre, and it behoves the conductor to do all in his power to enforce silence. In no country in Europe is so little attention paid to these matters, and if the officials and musical director allow loud talk to continue unchecked, the public will at last come to regard Messrs Jones and Barber's refreshments as the main consideration, enlivened by a little music as at ordinary dining saloons. I have had an opportunity of seeing more than one strict conductor, and can remember a memorable occasion when M. Jullien stopped the orchestra in the middle of a slow movement because there was unseemly talking in a private box. I have seen Mr Alfred Mellon and Mr Weist Hill do the same thing, rewarded by loudly expressed approval from the general audience. As I have said, let talkers and bottle openers go to the Floral Hall, for I can assert that, abroad, even the open air concerts are conducted with more propriety than those instituted in this country for the advancement of "classical" art in a theatre or music hall. Let every waiter be made to understand that it is as much as his place is worth to open a bottle noisily during the performance of a piece of music; between the pieces he can do what he likes. Inattention begets inattention, and frivolous chatter in the few encourages it in the many. I know that the answer to all this has been given by Dr Johnson, 'For we that live to please must please to live.' But if a director of concerts considers that the encouragement of noise increases his receipts he is mistaken. The frivolous element is, at all times, too conspicuous, but it should not be allowed to intrude itself to the destruction of rational amusement, and music has now taken so firm a hold in England that its culture can only be advanced by making it respected by all those who enter its concert rooms."

Phosphor has more than once broached this argument on the spit of his intelligence; but he handles it with such extreme delicacy that he may broach again whenever he is in the "humour of it." D. T.

CHERUBINI.

But, if not called on at the outset to fulfil his obligation as regards the composition of French operas, Cherubini was not so situated with respect to the Italian scores produced at the Théâtre de Monsieur. We know that the Italian public was never as exacting as ours about the structure and conduct of opera-librettos; they care little for the book which for them serves as a simple pretext for the music, while among us great and just importance is set upon the dramatic subject and the manner in which it is developed. These considerations did not escape the notice of the managers of the Théâtre de Monsieur, who, when they presented Italian works to their audiences, had those works, for the above reason, considerably altered. The modifications effected in the book naturally involved others in the music, and it was for this, as the composers were not present, that Cherubini was specially engaged to remodel, when requisite, the scores.* In this respect it may be said that his place was no sinecure, because, independently of the careful vigilance he devoted to the artists' study, and of the attentive way in which he superintended the rehearsals,† he wrote, in the space of three years and a half, no less than forty-three dramatic pieces or fragments. These detached compositions, which cannot have failed to be attended by certain peculiar difficulties, from the fact of their requiring great suppleness on his part, as it was necessary for him in some degree to adopt the tone of each composer and approximate to his individual style, gained him great applause and at once rendered him popular.

"M. Cherubini," said a contemporary, "already so celebrated at an age when others do not yet even think of becoming so, has remodelled several pieces of music in most of the Italian operas we have just mentioned. To the music of Paisiello, Sarti, and Cimarosa, he adds pieces which revive the vigour of those great masters, and the first composers of Italy pay homage to a genius whose superiority they acknowledge. In L'Italiana in Londra he has written several numbers such as, by the confession of every one, have never before been heard on any stage in Europe. Fears are entertained lest any excess of work and the fire of genius should prove injurious to his health, which is already delicate."‡

In his Memorandum-Book, Cherubini has drawn up in the most precise manner a special list of the pieces thus composed by him for the Bouffes. This list is more complete than that to be derived from the Catalogue of his works, exactly published by Bottée de Toulmon, but in which some are wanting; I think therefore, it will not be uninteresting to reproduce it here, absolutely as the master wrote it:

Catalogue of the airs and concerted pieces of my composition which I have added to different buffo operas performed at the Théâtre Feydeau from the month of November, 1789, to the month of October, 1792, when the Bouffons left Paris:—La Molinarella (Paisiello). Two airs for Mdme Raffanelli; two airs for M. Mandini; an air for M. Viganoni; an air for Mdme Mandini; an air for M. Scalzi; and the final chorus.—Il Fanatico burlato (Cimarosa). An air for Mdme Galli.—La Pastorella nobile (Guglielmi). An air for Mdme Mandini.—La Grotta di Trofonio (Salieri). A duet; an air for Mdlle Balletti.—Le Gelosie villane (Sarti). The allegro of an air for Mdlle Balletti.—Le Due Gemelle (Guglielmi). An air for M. Viganoni; an air for Mdme Barchielli.—La Frascatana (Paisiello). An air for M. Mengozzi; an air for Mdlle Nebel.—I Viaggiatori Felici (by different authors).—A quartet; an air for M. Viganoni; the end of the last finale; the allegro of an air for Mdme Morichelli.—L'Italiana in Londra (Cimarosa). An air for Mdme Mandini; three airs for M. Cherubini did not, therefore, waste his time at the Théâtre de Monsieur. He found means to distinguish himself and gain applause there, and, by the successes which he shared with the masters of the Grand Italian School whose collaborator he became, led up to those that he was soon to achieve alone, when, transforming his talent, he applied it to works written in the French language. We must here emphasize the breadth and suppleness of his artistic aims and the rectitude of his judgment at the same time as the flexibility he could, when circumstances required it, impart to his style and inspiration. Purely Italian with Italians, he saw that, directly he resolved to write again for the French stage, he must adopt once more the ideas which served to guide him in his first attempt with Démophon and follow principles which, if they did not make him seek a system of æsthetics absolutely new as regards the lyric drama, caused him at any rate to establish a close, logical, and intimate connection between the dramatic subject and the character of the music intended to support it. We find no small matter for astonishment in this remarkable work of the intellect, in this double object on the part of a young artist, who, following in the same order of production two distinct currents, exerts himself to manifest his individuality in two different manners and succeeds in bending his genius to the exigencies of both. Raoul Rochette has characterised very clearly the effect of this intellectual process on Cherubini.

". . . . The Bouffons, as people then termed them, were installed in a kind of hole called the Théâtre de la Foire Saint-Germain, and also gave some performances at the Court Theatre in the Tuileries.† It was there that, aided by such accomplished singers as Viganoni, Mandini, and Mdme Morichelli, as well as by that excellent actor, Raffanelli, and thanks to the care bestowed on everything connected with the chorus and the accompaniment, M. Cherubini rendered France familiar with the best operas of Anfossi, Paisiello, Guglielmi, and Cimarosa, adding in most instances pieces of his own composition, which, bearing the stamp of superior talent, excited general admiration. People still recollect in Paris the enthusiasm excited by the delicious quartet, 'Cara, da voi dipende,' inserted in the Viaggiatori felici; by another quartet, equally meritorious but of a different character, interpolated in Gazzaniga's Don Juan; and by the charming trio, 'Son tre, sei, nove,' added to Cimarosa's Italiana in Londra. Thus, at the same time that he was working on a grand French opera, Marguerite d'Anjou, in the new style he wanted to introduce on our stage, M. Cherubini proved himself a worthy rival of the masters of the Italian theatre on their ground; he contended with Cimarosa, Paisiello, and Guglielmi, in the special style of each, and, while exhibiting the melodic wealth and vocal abundance which characterized their school, and which in him were combined with a purity of superior style, he was distinguished from them by a larger employment of harmonic resources and instrumental effects, which announced a thorough musical revolution. In all the history of the art, there is not, perhaps, another example of a composer's writing, at one and the same time, in two different manners and passing with equal success from one theatre to another, an Italian at the Foire Saint-Germain and a Frenchman at the Tuileries, an emulator of Cimarosa in a corner of Paris and the creator of French opera at the Feydeau."‡

For the space of two years and a half Cherubini went on familiarizing himself with the French public and rendering his name very advantageously known by pieces which he wrote for Italian operas, and which, always received with the greatest favour,

* An Italian poet named Andrei was specially attached to the Théâtre de Monsieur with a view to make these alterations in the librettos just as Cherubini was engaged to touch up and complete the scores.

† "M. Cherubini himself superintended the getting up of the works, and it is as much to his advice and wise severity as to the talent of the virtuosos that we owe the perfect execution distinguishing this incomparable company, of whom only an imperfect idea has been given by aught afterwards." (Choron and Fayolle: Dictionnaire historique des Musiciens. Paris, 1810.)

* This last work was not performed.

† This is an error, for these two houses figured as the Théâtre de Monsieur only successively, and not simultaneously.

‡ Notice historique sur la vie et les ouvrages de M. Cherubini, by Raoul Rochette, Perpetual Secretary to the Academy of Fine Arts.—The last phrase, evidently written with the object of giving a little movement and picturesqueness to the narrative, repeats the error contained in the opening lines. The fact is that, at this period, Cherubini worked exclusively for the Théâtre de Monsieur, which he followed to the three houses where it was in turn located. Having said thus much, I must remark that Raoul Rochette, who was not, to my knowledge, a musician, must have been assisted by the opinion of some competent person, characterizing as he does the double tendencies of Cherubini at this moment of his career. I am very much mistaken if Halévy was completely a stranger to this interesting passage in Raoul Rochette's notice.

were sometimes, as we have seen, greeted with absolute enthusiasm. We will now judge of the effect of his first steps on the French style at the Théâtre de Monsieur, where he had previously written only in the Italian style.

LORD BEACONSFIELD ON INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.

"I have a passion for instrumental music. A grand orchestra fills my mind with ideas; I forget everything in the stream of invention. The effect of music upon the faculty of invention is a subject on which I have long curiously observed and deeply meditated. It is a finer prelude to creation than to execution. It is well to meditate upon a subject under the influence of music, but to execute we should be alone, and supported only by our essential and internal strength. Were I writing, music would produce the same effect upon me as wine. I should for a moment feel an unnatural energy and fire, but, in a few minutes, I should discover that I shadowed forth only phantoms; my power of expression would die away, and my pen would fall upon the insipid and lifeless page. The greatest advantage that a writer can derive from music is, that it teaches most exquisitely the art of development. It is in remarking the varying recurrence of a great composer to the same theme that a poet may learn how to dwell upon the phases of a passion, how to exhibit a mood of mind under all its alternations, and gradually to pour forth the full tide of feeling.—(Contarini Fleming, Part 3rd, Chap. 8th. By the Right Hon. Benjamin Disraeli. 1831-2.)

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—In Pencerdd Gwffyn's admirable article on "Park Music," in the Musical World of August 12th, the following occurs:—"They (the leaders of the society) are at this moment busily engaged in working out plans for the better education of music professors, whose occupation will be teaching the upper and middle classes." Is this to be understood as irony?* If not, may I be informed since when is it that the "upper and middle classes" have exhausted the stock of teaching supplied by the present race of music professors?—Yours faithfully, ENQUIRER.

[* It has been a stringent rule of long standing with the Musical World that no writer can be engaged as a member of its staff unless, among other endowments, he possesses that of irony. The purely satirical gift is not indispensable.—D. T.]

BAVENO (Lago Maggiore).—A correspondent from Milan writes:—"Being at Milan I took a short trip to Baveno, and there I found at the hotel a goodly company, including Mr and Mrs Maas, Mr Ball (brother to Mrs Maas), Mr Santley, with his son Michael, and, last not least, Mr Charles Lyall. I was just in time for a matinée musicale at the Villa Clara (Henfrey's—where Queen Victoria was residing when the Crown Prince and Princess of Germany paid Her Majesty a visit). The performers were Santley, Maas, and Lyall, Mrs Lyall holding, with great ability, the position of accompanist and solo player on the pianoforte. This display of exclusively English talent appeared somewhat to astonish the natives; the artists were applauded without stint. The matinée was a great success, and I was well repaid for my trip. I only wish the Commendatore Francesco Schira had been with me, instead of sunning himself in the day and mooning himself in the night, day after day and night after night, at the café near the Cathedral, or the hotel of the Anchor. By the way, the Lago Maggiore resounds with the preparations for the approaching Birmingham Festival.

HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—The forthcoming festival promises to be of more than ordinary interest. The committee have wisely determined to revive the oratorio Abraham, by Bernard Molique, which, when produced at Birmingham some twenty years ago, was received with great favour, both on account of the brightness of its melodies and the cleverness of its orchestration. They have also done well in according a place in the programme to Dr Garrett's sacred cantata, The Shunamite. The effective representation of all the music is secured by the engagement of a fine band, led by Mr Carrodus; by a chorus the nucleus of which is formed by the choir from Bradford; and by a staff of vocalists comprising Mesdames Albani and Patey, Misses Anna Williams and Hilda Wilson, Messrs Boyle, F. King, and Santley.—Times, August 18th.

WAIFS.

The Emperor of Austria has conferred on Mdme Pauline Lucca the Gold Cross for Merit with the Crown, and Baron von Hofmann, Intendant-General, himself presented it to her.

BALFE'S POSTHUMOUS SACRED WORK.—The movements from a sacred composition left unfinished by Michael William Balfe, which are to be performed at Westminster Abbey on the 20th October, when the tablet erected to his memory is uncovered, comprises a "Gratias agimus," in the key of B flat; a "Sanctus," in the minor of the same key; and an "Agnus Dei," in F major. Having had an opportunity of perusing the score of each, we can testify to the genuine merits of these excerpts left us by our popular countryman, and only regret that a work promising so well should not have been completed. They have been adapted and edited by Mr W. A. Barrett, who in the cause of Balfe is indefatigable.—Graphic.

Joachim has been appointed Capellmeister of the Royal Academy of Arts, Berlin.

Emma Thursby and her director, Maurice Strakosch, have returned from Mont Dore, Puy-de-Dôme. The charming young American lady, "la Patti des concerts," as she is frequently styled, will, on no consideration, go on the stage.

LLANDAFF CATHEDRAL.—Mr Hugh Brooksbank, Mus. B., Oxon., has been appointed by the Dean and Chapter of Llandaff organist and choirmaster of the Cathedral, in succession to Mr C. L. Williams, now organist of Gloucester Cathedral. Mr Brooksbank was trained under Sir George Elvey at St George's Chapel, Windsor, and was afterwards assistant to Dr Keeton, organist of Peterborough Cathedral. He is now organist and choirmaster at St Alban's, Birmingham, and has been chosen by the authorities of Llandaff Cathedral out of about a hundred candidates.

Mad. Théo embarked on the 12th inst. for America.

Mrs F. B. Jewson and family are at St Leonard's-on-Sea.

How to serve a dinner.—Eat it.—(O Jupiter!—Dr Blitge.)

Mad. Galli-Marié is taking a holiday at Bourbonne-les-Bains.

Gialdino Gialdini is writing an opera entitled Le Metamorfosi.

The Teatro Nicolini, Florence, will be opened in October for opera.

A new theatre, the Arena Garibaldi, has been erected in Parma.

Carlo Gomez is writing the music of a new opera, Leona, book by Paravicini.

The project of having German opera in Warsaw has been abandoned.

Terese Singer is said to be engaged for the approaching season at the Scala, Milan.

Mr F. B. Jewson has gone to pass the vacation at his favourite resort, Ramsgate.

The Theatre Royal, Dresden, reopened on the 30th ult. with Goldmark's Königin von Saba.

The proprietors of the Liceo, Barcelona, have voted, by a large majority, the closing of that theatre.

Twenty musical bands took part in the civic procession got up at Buenos-Ayres in honour of Garibaldi.

Mierzwinsky, the tenor, is engaged for America, for the consideration, it is said, of 4,000 dollars a month.

Anton Rubinstein will direct the concerts of the Imperial Russian Society of Music this year at St Petersburgh.

Luigi Ravelli, the tenor, returned from America, is staying at Consdorff, in the Grand-Duchy of Luxembourg.

Carl Davidoff, the well-known Russian violoncellist, is projecting an extended autumn concert-tour in Germany and Austria.

A new comico-romantic opera, Manon, by Richard Kleinmichel, is to be produced in Hamburgh at the beginning of next year.

The Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, will re-open with Robert le Diable, to be followed at no very distant date by Jean de Nivelle.

The Emperor of Germany has conferred the Order of the Crown (third class) on Herr Chronegk, of the Ducal Theatre, Meiningen.

M. Nicot, the "tenorino," and his wife, née Bilbaut-Vauchelet, have returned from Switzerland, where they spent the month of July.

A bust of Lassalle, in Guillaume Tell, will shortly be placed in the Museum of the Grand Opera, Paris. The sculptor is M. Le Quesne.

The "Patrons" and "Patronesses" of the Bayreuth performances number 1,368, among them being thirty-one Englishmen and seven Italians. (Total of these contingencies, thirty-eight. Add one Scotchman—thirty-nine.—Dr Blitge.)

The Prefect of the Seine has, in the name of the Municipal Council, presented M. Jules Cohen with a large gold medal, in recognition of the manner in which he organized and directed the musical festival at the Paris Hôtel de Ville on the 13th ult.

Marcella Sembrich is at Anextein, near the Lake of Lucerne, studying Ophelia, Mignon, and Francesca de Rimini. She will next month visit Paris, for the purpose of profiting by M. Ambroise Thomas's suggestions as to her rendering of the three characters.

CARDIGAN.—The triennial musical festival, under the auspices of the Cardigan Archdeaconry Church Choral Union, was held at St Mary's Church on Wednesday, August 9th, and proved a decided success, the proficiency of the singing being considered fully equal to the days when the same choirs were "bâtoned" by "Eos Llechyd." On this occasion the conductorship was entrusted to the Rev Henry Jones, rector of Manordeifi, the last time (owing to advance of age) he was likely to undertake that responsible task. The choirs (over 450 voices) comprised those of St Mary's (Cardigan), St Dogmael's, Cilgerran, Llandugwydd, Llangoodmore, Moylgrove, Newquay, Aberporth, Blaenporth, Tremain, Eglwyswrw, Newport, Nevern, Manordeifi, Llechryd, Capel Colman, Mount, Ferwig, Llanfihangel-Pembedw, Whitechurch, &c. Some thirty clergymen were present.—Western Mail, Aug. 12.

THE NEW LAW ON MUSICAL COMPOSITIONS.—The Act to amend the law of copyright relating to musical compositions, and to protect the public from vexatious proceedings for the recovery of penalties for the unauthorised performance of the same, has just been issued. On and after the passing of the Act the proprietor of the copyright in any musical composition, or his assignee, who shall be entitled and desirous to retain in his own hands exclusively the right of public representation or performance of the same, shall print or cause to be printed upon the title-page of every published copy of such musical composition a notice to the effect that the right of public representation or performance is reserved. There is a provision, when the right of performance and when the copyright are vested in different owners, but a penalty of £20 to be recovered from the owner of the copyright for non-compliance with notice from the owner of the right of performance. By a special provision as to costs, where not more than 40s. are recovered, the same is to vest in the discretion of the Court.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs, giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

FANTAISIE MARZIALE.

MORCEAU DE SALON,
FOR THE PIANOFORTE.
By
LILLIE ALBRECHT.
Price 4s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"'Fantaisie Marziale,' morceau de salon, is another attractive piece by Lillie Albrecht, a young lady who has gained considerable popularity by her pianoforte playing."—"The Era," August 12.

"'Fantaisie Marziale,' morceau de salon, by Lillie Albrecht, is a singularly bright and spirited martial movement in the key of G, which, if we claimed to be prophets (and we do not), we would predict will become popular."—"The Queen," August 12.

"'Fantaisie Marziale' is the title of Miss Lillie Albrecht's latest addition to her already numerous list of Morceaux de Salon for the pianoforte. This young lady writes for her instrument almost as well as she performs upon it, and her compositions are invariably characterised by elegance and brilliancy. The present piece is no exception to the rule, but manifests in some respects an advancement in mastery of device and effect that justifies us in encouraging Miss Albrecht to persevere until she can undertake even more weighty tasks. The 'Fantaisie Marziale' comes well within the reach of the ordinary player."—Sunday Times.

"There is an ample supply of dash and spirit in Lillie Albrecht's 'Fantaisie Marziale.'"—Graphic.

"Next I would call attention to the brilliant and effective pianoforte piece recently published by the popular young pianist, Miss Lillie Albrecht, a 'Fantaisie Marziale,' a work that will be found acceptable by all who wish to possess facile and bright pieces. It is my duty no less than my pleasure to encourage ladies in all their artistic efforts."—Lady's Pictorial.

"Miss Albrecht is not only a pianist of remarkable power and ability, but a composer of very elegant music for her 'instrument de prédilection.' This spirited 'Martial Fantasia,' in G major, boldly asserts its title, and is indeed a stirring effusion, that might be made effective, in score, for a military band. The piece is no child's play, but will require study. The staccato octave passages alone supply work for fire-eating players."—"Musical Standard," May, 1882.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. A MUSICAL PILGRIMAGE.

I cannot say that Wagner has been forced upon me since I crossed the German frontier. In England the notion is popular that the Bayreuth master bestrides his fatherland like a Colossus, and that other composers merely creep in and out his huge legs on sufferance. The street bands, my countrymen suppose, would play Wagner, if the Germans tolerated amongst themselves the sort of performance they inflict so plentifully upon us; while café concerts, garden concerts, and theatres of all kinds minister to the rage for "future-music." Let me assure my countrymen that they are quite in the wrong. I have made it my business to hunt Wagner in all sorts of likely places, and have not once run him down. At the Frankfort Opera House they were playing Carmen, at Dresden the Rigoletto of Verdi, with the Guillaume Tell of Rossini for a change. Imagine these Italians in a centre of Teutonic sweetness and light! Yet, there they were, and nobody flung mud at them, nobody quoted Opera and Drama to show that the whole thing was detestable, or rushed away with stopped ears and voluble protest. On the contrary, Verdi never had a more attentive and seemingly gratified audience than the Dresdeners, who crowded their beautiful new theatre and applauded his melodious strains. Rigoletto was performed carefully and well, there being in the representation nothing whatever of a slipshod character. The orchestra did its work capitally; the chorus deserved admiration from first to last, and the mise-en-scène could scarcely have been more complete in its details. Àpropos, the interior of the Duke of Mantua's palace did not suggest that the broker had recently been in and swept away all but a table and two chairs. The saloon in which Rigoletto met his daughter after her abduction was actually a furnished apartment, made splendid by a show of plate that would do honour to a London guild. It may be said that the Dresden theatre is a Court establishment. That is so; but if a subventioned house can furnish its stage properly, charging no more than three shillings for an orchestra stall, a house without subvention, but charging eight times three shillings, might, by an effort, succeed in keeping the broker out of one's thoughts. The leading artists in Rigoletto were all better than tolerable; some were even excellent, notably Herr Bulos, whose impersonation of the Jester lacked nothing of rugged power and pathos. This gentleman has a fine baritone voice, extensive in range and pure in quality. He should be heard in England, where appreciation certainly awaits him. A word might be said, also, for Frau Schuch (Gilda) and Herr Reise (Duke); but of individual talent we know enough at home. The distinctive merit of this Italian-opera performance lay in its artistic spirit and thorough completeness. Nothing was "scamped"; no character seemed to be played under protest by an injured artist, nor was the smallest detail sacrificed to personal considerations. Moreover, the stage appeared well disciplined. Applause while the curtain remained up passed utterly unnoticed; nor from first to last did the performers betray a consciousness that they had an audience across the footlights. Under these conditions, my old friend Rigoletto put on a new face, and I found myself regarding it with more than the intermitting attention which is all that the work can command at home. For those who do not care to spend summer evenings in a theatre, but who, nevertheless, demand music, Dresden provides a nightly concert at the Belvedere Restaurant, a pleasant place overlooking the Elbe. The good Saxon burghers affect the Belvedere greatly, and take out in sweet sounds quite the worth of the sixpence they pay for admission. Such an opportunity of cheap and decorous enjoyment Londoners will never have till the English capital is more strictly policed, but Dresden finds no difficulty in controlling the objectionable elements of society and protecting the comfort of respectable people. That the frequenters of the Belvedere go to hear music as well as to eat and drink, their silent attention proves. It is an unwritten law of the place that the tap of the conductor's stick hushes all sounds among the audience. On the other hand, the music is worth hearing and fairly well rendered by a complete orchestra.

Vocal pieces do not enter into the programme, but a moderate allowance of dance music gratifies lighter tastes, while more solid wants are supplied by overtures and even symphonies. The Belvedere selections may, no doubt, be taken as showing which way the musical wind blows in Dresden. On this evidence, France has reason to congratulate herself, since French composers, with their easy grace and ready tunefulness are well to the front. On a recent occasion, for example, Bizet, Thomas, Saint-Säens, and Adolphe Adam, delighted the citizens, who as may be supposed, heard their own Handel, Beethoven, and Weber, with profound attention. And Wagner? The Bayreuth master was nowhere. Dresden, it appears, is not one of his strongholds; indeed, something like a condition of war exists between his Majesty of Saxony and his Potentiality of Bayreuth. Wagner, it is said, will not permit his later works to be produced in the Hoftheater until royalty has been paid on the performances of his earlier operas. The King on his part, finding that the Hoftheater can exist without Wagner, refuses to come to terms; hence there is a permanent rupture of diplomatic relations between the two powers. Dresden, I am bound to say, appears quite content. It was rushing like one man to hear Carmen the other night, untroubled by separation from the sweet simplicity of the Nibelung's Ring, and the delightful innocence of Tristan und Isolde, while from the height of his pedestal the composer of Der Freyschütz looked approvingly on.

Weber, as every amateur of his music knows, lies in the Catholic cemetery of Dresden, whither his body was removed from the vaults of the pro-Cathedral, Moorfields, some years after his death. A musical pilgrim must needs visit the grave of so renowned a master, and finds it unworthy of his fame. The burial-ground lies at the back of some mean-looking houses in a suburban street, and is as ill-kept as though no one ever cared for its tenants. Rank grass grows long on and about the graves, smothering the flowers planted by loving hands, while the general appearance of the place is that of gross neglect. It will be "secularised," I am told, and probably built over in a few years, the families of the dead having already received notice to secure space for the remains, if they so please, in a new cemetery. Another removal, therefore, awaits Weber, who meanwhile reposes, like Beethoven and Schubert at Währing, close to the boundary wall. A small enclosure, with a heavy vault stone and a tablet bearing a simple record of name and date, marks the spot. With him rest his wife and son, and over all three droop the branches of a willow. Very little care seems to be taken of the grave. Not a flower blooms near it, and when I visited the spot a few decayed wreaths were all the signs of homage that appeared. Not far from Weber rests Kapellmeister Krebs, father of Marie Krebs, the eminent pianist, himself eminent by position and acquirements. In his case all that love and admiration can do has been done to honour departed worth.

Here in Leipsic the musical wanderer finds little to prolong his stay. The Conservatorium is shut, and its pupils scattered; the doors of the Gewandhaus are closed, and only an occasional opera at the Stadttheather supports the musical character of the place. Wagner has again evaded me, even the mild display that Lohengrin makes being denied through the illness of an artist. Instead of Lohengrin the management put up Die Zauberflöte, and the town filled the house with Mozart's admirers, who sat open-mouthed at the feet of the great Master. Here was, indeed, the triumph of music and of executive skill that, as far as concerned the orchestra, left nothing to wish for. Listening to Die Zauberflöte, in the city of Sebastian Bach and Felix Mendelssohn, was like looking at the Pyramids as they rise from among shifting sand hillocks. It conveyed a sense of abidingness and solidity as well as loftiness and grandeur. This art will not pass away, though there may be raging and the imagining of vain things against it.—D. T.

TRIESTE.—The Politeama-Rossetti opens with Verdi's Nabucco. There are to be sixty performances during the season, the repertory including ten operas and the ballet Excelsior. Mdme Wilt will be a member of the company.

THE MEETING OF CHOIRS AT HAMBURG.

Hamburg, August 13th.

Our typical John Bull, arrving here on any one of the last three days, had a sight to see and a problem to solve. The sight was Hamburg in holiday dress—flags everywhere, inscriptions of welcome by the hundred, streets gay with evergreens, Venetian masts and banners, on all hands brightness and colour. The problem was—What does it mean? And if Mr Bull troubled himself to guess at a solution he no doubt thought of Royalty, or, perhaps, the opening of some new docks. It certainly never occurred to his mind that art had anything to do with so much popular rejoicing. Imagine the Englishman's contemptuous snort at the idea of the thing. "What! all this time, trouble, and expense devoted to the celebration of a mere musical festival. Has Hamburg gone mad?" At any rate, the madness of the place is not likely to affect Mr Bull. His seaports do not concern themselves about musical festivals, as was proved a few years ago when enthusiastic souls made an experiment at Liverpool, and saw no reason to repeat it. But the Englishman's astonishment at the present aspect of the North German town has a measure of reason on its side. It is natural that a melancholy place like Bayreuth should welcome any chance of brightening itself up a little, and one cannot suppose that the citizens of a deadly lively town such as Würzburg make much sacrifice when they devote some hours to dressing their streets. Hamburg, on the contrary, is a busy place that puts a heavy strain on life and regards time as money. Yet the festival demonstrations are universal. The stateliest places of business take part in them; the houses of merchant princes are bright with flags; the dwellers in the poorest streets contrive at least a festoon of greenery. There is no smoke without fire, and at the bottom of all this must be some sentiment which we English do not possess. The desirableness of making it ours, unfortunately, lies beyond the range of practical questions. "The old order changeth," we are told, "and giveth place to new," but English popular enthusiasm about a matter of art is not likely to appear yet awhile.

This is the third occasion on which the "German Singers' Union"—a comparatively youthful body—has kept festival in Hamburg, the choice of place being determined, no doubt, by its power of accommodating a large gathering, and by the possession of a suitable hall. The Union itself is made up of a number of affiliated societies, no fewer than fifty of which are represented here at the present moment. These have come from Berlin, Bavaria, Bohemia, Franconia, Frankfort, Saxony, Mecklenburg, Lower Austria, Thuringia, the Rhine, Schleswig, and, indeed, from nearly every important section of the Empire, as well as from neighbouring countries in which Germans abound. The members, I need hardly say, are all males, Germany not yet having emancipated woman so far as to allow her to be heard on these occasions and in such association. Obviously, the restriction to men's voices lessens the value of the musical work done, not only because it limits the available repertory, but makes inevitable a monotony of effect. The question is one, however, into which other considerations enter than those of an artistic nature, and the German societies must be taken as the national feeling chooses to present them. Into the details of their organization I need not enter. Enough that, in view of the periodical gathering, a programme is determined upon; prepared by the societies separately, under the general direction of the Bundeschormeister, Herr Franz Schmid, Munich, and finally rehearsed en masse at the place of meeting. In this manner the works performed by 7,000 singers last Friday and yesterday were prepared.

The first day of the Festival (Thursday) was devoted to receiving the visiting societies at the railway stations, and to business arrangements of all kinds, but on the following morning real work began with a rehearsal for the concert which took place in the evening. As to what was done I am able to speak from the general programme, but with regard to the manner of its doing I am perforce silent, every ticket having been sold before my arrival in the town. The selection, which opened with Beethoven's rarely-heard chorus for voices and orchestra, "Die Ehre Gottes aus der Natur," continued, as to its first part, with the overture to Euryanthe, arranged for wind instruments, and a number of vocal pieces, some unaccompanied, by Lachner, Kreutzer, Marschner, Schumann, and Reinthaler. In the second part were Max Bruch's Salamis, Schubert's Night Song in the Forest, a chorus from Mendelssohn's Œdipus, and the overture to Die Zauberflöte. The character of these pieces has a significance which the thoughtful reader will not overlook. It shows that the artistic range of the societies is a high one, and that, even when mustered in overwhelming and, as might be supposed, unmanageable numbers, classical music of some difficulty is not thought beyond their means. Hereupon, more presently, when I come to speak of the second concert. Meanwhile, attention is due to the extraordinary scene around the Festival Hall, a huge cruciform edifice of brick, iron, and glass, situated in an open space near the Zoological Gardens. The whole of the ground is roughly enclosed for the occasion, and accessible only to those who pay for the privilege. An enormous crowd having done this, are satisfied to do no more, since the noise of the 7,000 voices inside the building spreads far and wide. Quite as numerous as the audience proper are the outer-court worshippers, and quite as hearty as the applause within is that which rises unimpeded to the "welkin." But it must be said that the devotees of music on the cheap find economy not free from drawbacks. Alas for them! the enclosure is fringed with gigantic refreshment booths, and beer-drinking goes on all the time with a full measure of the earnestness and steady application that distinguish Germans. It may be doubted whether a man, not actually bent upon the deed, could evolve boisterousness from such liquid as is served out here. But doubt cannot exist in view of Teutonic capacity for imbibing. We all remember the aged female to whose tea-drinking achievements the attention of Mr Weller, senior, was drawn at the famous Brick Lane meeting. Said that alarmed gentleman to his son, "She is swellin' wisibly afore my werry eyes." Here there must be a general "swellin' wisibly," and a curious investigator might calculate, upon the basis of so much beer consumed, the increase in the cubic human contents of the enclosure. But we find it more to the purpose that the convivial souls take to cheering, and, when a German crowd does this, it is, in a figurative sense, "all up." Englishmen are not backward wish the national "Hurrah," but their Teutonic cousins—under certain provocation more sentimental and effusive—seem possessed by the very demon of noise. At the same time, those who try to hear the music and those who try to drown it are alike wonderfully good humoured, and the hours run merrily on. The hours are many, by the way. German custom in the matter of "early to bed" yields to the joyousness of such an occasion, and everybody makes a night of it. Will it be credited that there is an instrumental concert in the enclosure after the vocal performance in the hall has ended? and that it is one o'clock a.m. before the officials clear the place and shut the gates? At what hour Hamburg streets become decorously silent I am afraid to say.

Yesterday was the great day of the feast, because of the procession, without which no such gathering as this would be complete. The morning was brilliant, and the noon-tide blazing; all Hamburg was full of colour, and multitudes of people crowded the streets in the route laid down. A more animated spectacle cannot be imagined, but the English eye missed certain features familiar to it on like occasions at home. For instance, hardly any police were visible. From my place of 'vantage, I saw but one helmeted minion of the law, and he seemed bored at having to play such an obviously superfluous part. The real matter was that the "rough"—who exists in Hamburg, I suppose, as elsewhere—did not find the ceremony to his taste, and preferred hanging about the docks. In good sooth, the crowd was over-decorous; wanting life and humour, and having too much patience. It might have been waiting for a funeral. Meanwhile the huge procession was getting itself into order—that is to say, into four columns, which, assembling at as many different points, marched to the general rendezvous. The military training of the men may have been of service in this process, but assuredly they were handled well, the vast parade being formed without let or hindrance of any kind. An idea of the defile will be conveyed when I state that it took an hour and three-quarters to pass in fours. The first column comprised ten societies; the second, thirteen; the third, twenty-three; and the last, five; while fourteen "musikkorps" gave the step to the marching throng. Here, indeed, was the apotheosis of the German band, which rent the air with its noises, and was altogether worthy of the exported article so painfully familiar in the "quiet" streets of London. But the procession did not depend solely upon brass instruments for music. Now and then a society burst into song, while at the slightest demonstration from the onlookers a roar of responsive cheers would pass down the line. That the sight was picturesque cannot be denied; above all in the quaint Steinstrasse, that relic of old Hamburg, with its curiously-gabled houses. The venerable street had been profusely decorated, and as the countless banners of the societies passed down between the throngs of onlookers the scene was charming. Want of variety in the procession itself made the defile monotonous after an hour or so, and, I am sorry to say, the behaviour of many who took part infused into it an element that was both ridiculous and degrading. There is no essential connection between a musical festival and "tomfoolery;" yet not a few of the processionists might have been returning from the Derby, judging by their silly conduct. Some sported Japanese umbrellas and fans; others carried umbrellas of the ordinary size, but blazing with crimson and yellow stripes; others had decorated their persons with a profusion of evergreen wreaths; here and there a fancy costume was visible; while nine out of ten of the singers gave more or less absurd yet convincing proof that the whole affair was one pour rire. I could not possibly recognize these shouting, gesticulating, bedizened processionists in the earnest and musical throng which assembled on the orchestra later in the day. But there is a strong element of childishness in the German nature, and it will come out when occasion offers.

The march of the 7,000 ended at the Festival Hall, or, rather, at the refreshment booths around it; and when the array broke up wonderful was the consumption of beer; for the route had been long, the sun brilliant, and the heat tremendous. I am afraid that some of the weary ones never reached the platform that evening; nevertheless, a multitude answered the call of the trumpets, taking their places in front of an audience that crammed the building and must have numbered many thousands. The arrangements for the singers and orchestra (wind instruments only) were not of the best, much effect being lost both to ear and eye through placing them on a level instead of in a raised gallery. However, with 7,000 voices one can afford to sacrifice something for the sake of convenience or economy. After a long delay, borne with exemplary patience even by those upon whom the sun blazed through unshaded windows, Professor von Bernuth, of Hamburg, ascended the conductor's rostrum—it was high enough to deserve the name of tower—and conducted the performance of a hymn, "Dem Hernn," by Fischer. The plain and simple composition exactly suited so large a choir, and was given with grand and sonorous effect, the voices of the first tenors and second basses thus early distinguishing themselves by excellence of tone. A long speech by the chosen orator of the visiting societies followed, in recognition of Hamburg's hospitality, then a telegram of congratulation and good wishes from Kaiser Wilhelm was read amid enthusiastic applause, and then the musical performance began in good earnest. It included some distinctive compositions of the modern German type, and hardly an example of the melodious part-song once in favour on such occasions. National ruggedness and force seem to be asserting themselves even in this comparatively humble branch of art, and were certainly instanced yesterday by Brahms' "Gebt Acht," and Max Bruch's "Lied der Stadt." Into these compositions what we know by the name of melody hardly enters as an element of effect, reliance being placed upon bold harmonies, and a certain characteristic harshness of outline. This may be profoundly German, and, if so, Germans cannot be blamed for loving it. At the same time, national feeling must take care not to insist upon a form of musical "protection." We all know what the importation of Italian art did for German music in the eighteenth century. Is its softening and refining influence to be altogether destroyed by modern Germanism? If so, so much the worse for Teutonic music, already dominated by idealism rather than feeling, and verging upon the unintelligible. With the pieces above named were given Kreutzer's "An das Vaterland," two over-elaborated choral songs from Hiller's Edda, Attenhofer's "Abendfeier," Rietz's "Im grünen Wald," and Mendelssohn's "Wasserfahrt." The last-mentioned was about the best sung, and its grace and tenderness stood out in charming relief against the prevailing ruggedness of style. A beautiful Finnish volkslied, "Suomi's Song," should also be mentioned with warm approval as a fine example of plaintive northern melody. With regard to the execution of these pieces I can only speak in terms of modified praise, while making all allowance for the dimensions of the choir and its want of opportunities for general rehearsal. As a rule, the singers kept together well, but their intonation was sometimes anything save agreeable. In one instance certain sections of the chorus had got into a different key, and, unable to hear the rest, persevered to the end of the verse with an effect of the most original, if not the most pleasing character. At another time a breakdown occurred and a fresh attempt had to be made. As a matter of fact, many of the selections were too difficult for the singers under the circumstances in which they found themselves placed, notwithstanding the support derived from a powerful orchestra. Simpler pieces are required, and only such can serve for a full display of the vocal resources at command. This fact had ample demonstration yesterday; the less elaborate compositions giving confidence to the performers and coming out with amazing grandeur. On the whole, I felt disappointed with what I heard. In no respect was the singing better than that of our own choirs when assembled in large masses, while as a demonstration of amateur culture and executive ability it could not be named in the same day with a Handel Festival performance at the Crystal Palace. I should add that the wind band played Beethoven's overture to Egmont, and the introduction to the third act of Lohengrin capitally.

To-day the societies have made excursions on the Elbe, and at the moment of writing a concert is being given in the Festival enclosure. To-morrow the singers return to their homes.—D. T.

SIR HERBERT OAKELEY.

(From the Edinburgh "Evening Express.")

Scotland was declared by Beethoven to possess exquisite ballad music; and, charmed by piquant rhythm and plaintive harmonies, Mendelssohn modelled his admirable Scotch Symphony and his Isles of Fingal in imitation of the vagaries of our national lyrics. And yet, despite what is but the outcome of our fervent nature, the critics and musicians of all lands mingle their voices in one cry: "Scotland is essentially unmusical; neither encouragement nor aid is given to its native artists; and when a star arises in their midst, his brilliance soon perishes beneath frigidity of welcome, nay, even by neglect." It would be invidious for any writer, possessed of the smallest amount of knowledge on the subject, to attempt to deny what is only too true an indictment of the characteristic failing, not only of Scotland, but of Great Britain itself. "The English," says a writer on latter-day music in England, "are not a musical people, and the English are not an artistic people. But the English are more artistic than musical; that is to say, they have produced better painters than musicians. A country is not musical or artistic when you can get its people to look at pictures or listen to music, but when its people are themselves composers and painters." And again, we have pointed out to us the cure of our mental blindness. "This will be so until music is felt here, as it is felt in Germany, to be a kind of necessity—to be a thing without which the heart pines and the emotions wither—a need as of light, and air, and fire." London, indeed, revels in a wealth of harmony, of which we only catch the refrain, dispensed by fragments of alien orchestras or by wandering musicians, who are listened to in the provinces by crowded audiences, less from any innate love of music in the listener than because the amusement is fashionable. Nor do we indite so grave a charge without having weighed it well. Provincial fashion deserted Mdme Sophie Menter in her recent tour through the principal cities of the kingdom, and it was only after the performance of Liszt's pupil had become an absorbing topic of conversation in artistic circles that her concerts were flooded by brilliant audiences. The delightful orchestral feasts which Mr Manns spreads before us each winter have proved factors in the propagation of a love for music in Scotland, but perhaps the most direct incentive to the study was given by the foundation of the Reid Chair in the University of Edinburgh, which alone, out of our four academic seats, possesses a Professor of Music. The death of Donaldson in 1865 deprived our University of an eminent professor, and the breach thus caused in the academic circle was well filled when Mr Oakeley, then scarcely known to fame, was summoned from the congenial haunts of the art-student in Germany to the more rugged and less musical Scotland. The influence which he has shed throughout artistic circles in this country is shown by the golden fruit which his teachings and admonitions have succeeded in ripening. In school and college, at home and abroad, the sunshine of his presence is felt, and some struggling musicians have been ushered by his aid over the threshold of fame.

In the pleasant village of Ealing, situated about five miles from London, and near Brentford,—where Japhet set out on his historic search after a parent,—Herbert S. Oakeley was born. Sprung from an ancient English house, his father being Sir Herbert Oakeley, Bart., he yet had the purest Scottish blood in his veins, for his mother was a daughter of Lord Charles Murray, son of the third Duke of Athole. Childhood seems to have revealed unusual aural gifts in our hero, young Oakeley being declared to possess a musical notation within his brain. A favourite amusement consisted in his standing with eyes turned from a musical instrument while some one in sudden surprise would touch a note, the vibrations of which had scarcely ceased ere its name was pronounced by the child. Later, amidst the shadows of the Old Church the boy would linger for many an hour, throwing all his soul and passion into the divine harmonies of those great masters of his art whom he has followed with faithful footsteps during his life. On being sent to Rugby, where stern realities of life now commenced to open before him, young Oakeley had to yield the delightful visions of earlier days, and perforce had to devote his energies to a systematic acquisition of knowledge. And yet many an opportunity was found for playing on piano and organ, and he was at once the wonder and boast of his schoolmates and friends. A host in himself, he aroused a love for music which grew with every year he remained at school. It would be with many regrets that he left the famous school, with its memories and traditions, but he was now destined to enter as a student the classic halls of Oxford. Christ Church, where he graduated in 1854, was a kindly mother to the young artist, furnishing him with a band of congenial spirits, in whose company he was accustomed to while away many an hour in the practice of his favourite art. What share Mr Oakeley took in the Noctes Ambrosianæ of the Amateur Musical Society of Oxford University may be gleaned from the universal admission of his student friends that he left them, perhaps, the most brilliant pianist they had within their ranks.

Shortly after his leaving the University of Oxford, Mr Oakeley, following the example of many young English musicians, proceeded to Germany, where he found scope for the exercise of his musical talents. The Conservatoire at Leipzig during these years was guided by the most eminent artists, and, under Plaidy and Moscheles, his skill as an executive musician was much aided. Papperitz, whose powers as an organist attracted enthusiastic students, took the young Englishman under his kindly care, and the "king of instruments" became at once to Oakeley a delight and an absorbing study. Quitting Leipzig for Dresden, he met in Dr Johann Schneider a musician and friend. Though thus devoting his whole soul to the ripening of his talents as an executive artist, our hero did not linger throughout each successive year in one or other of these old university towns. Like the troubadour of another age, he would roam far afield, hearing in one place a magnificent orchestra, or charming his acquaintances and friends by his own performances. Oakeley's pen seems about this time to have been as facile as his fingers in the service of his art. A London journal now received a new attraction in his contributions, which were piquant in their descriptions of these German concerts. During a period of ten years he continued contributing critical papers, and the favour with which they were universally received spoke eloquently of the now prominent position which the musician had attained. He had ere this spent some time with Professor Breidenstein at the University of Bonn, and his mind seemed determined as to his adoption of the musical profession. In 1865, when Donaldson, the Reid Professor of Music in the University of Edinburgh, died after occupying the chair during twenty years, it was, perhaps, with misgivings that Oakeley entered upon the candidature for the vacant Edinburgh Chair, for his opponents were numerous and pre-eminent in the musical world. The young artist, however, had claims such as few would fail to recognize; music had been his favourite study from his youth; a member of the artistic Quirites of Rome and a graduate of Oxford, he was a composer and executive musician. The many who knew Mr Oakeley's spirit and genius were loud in their assurances that no obstacle would be met in the path to success, and that their prophecies were fully realized is now a matter of history. Seventeen years have now passed away since Sir Herbert entered the circle of Edinburgh academic life, and his popularity, both with his students and with the general public, has been on the increase with every year. He attracts to his camp during the dreary winter session the cream of University talent—professors and students alike. His recitals, which are among the few delightful oases in the sandy desert of six months' study, crowd his class-room, and the enthusiasm with which they are heard must give satisfaction. The University Musical Society owes the spirit which animates it to the skill with which Sir Herbert Oakeley uses the somewhat heterogeneous material at his command, and their March concert displays to what excellence the students can attain under the direction of their conductor. Each of the four Universities of Scotland now possesses a musical society, and this great advance in the dissemination of a love for music is due to the unwearied exertions of the Edinburgh Professor. Aberdeen, recognizing the perennial delight conferred upon its students by the establishment of the musical society, a year ago conferred upon Sir Herbert the degree of LL.D. Laurels had already been lavished upon him; in 1871 the Archbishop of Canterbury had awarded him ex officio the degree Mus. Doc. Cantuar., and in 1879, in company with the eminent Macfarren and Sullivan, he received from Oxford University a similar degree honoris causâ. The golden spurs were won by Oakeley in recognition of his services for music in Scotland, and of his participation in the inauguration ceremony of the Prince Consort Memorial; and it was with universal pleasure that the large circle of his admirers heard the announcement in the September of last year that he had been appointed "Composer to her Majesty in Scotland." With the February of each recurring year comes the Reid Festival, with the delightful feast of orchestral music lavishly dispensed. To Sir Herbert Oakeley is due the swelling out of one important concert into an all-important series which is effecting an immense influence, and pervading many a breast with a hitherto unknown passion for music.

BRUSSELS.—Three characters in Delibes' Jean de Nivelle are definitely cast at the Monnaie, and the composer declares himself perfectly satisfied. Rodier will impersonate Jean de Nivelle; Soulacroix, Charolais; and Blanche Deschamps, Simonne. The Arlette will probably be Mdlle Maurel, a young Genevese, pupil of Henri Ketten, at the Geneva Conservatory, and—no relation to Maurel of the Paris Grand Opera.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

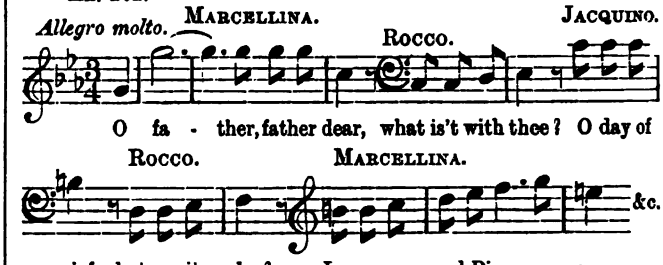
The duet is no sooner ended than the calmness of their resolve is interrupted by the agitated entry of Marcellina and Jacquino; and the greater unity of key and length of ideas of the last section is exchanged for modulation and short ideas, of the nature of the second part of a sonata. Though constructed of the dialogue of short sentences and ejaculations, the phrases are fitted to one another so as to be continuous, the accompaniment taking its share in the continuity.

Ex. 202.



After several phrases of this kind, three of the voices sing together, each expressing different thoughts on a similar subject; this brings all to an interrupted cadence, and the storm culminates with the entry of Pizarro and his fierce cry, "Presumptuous villain!" His expressions of anger at Rocco for daring to loose the prisoners, even for a short time; Rocco's excuses, one, aloud: "It is the King's birthday," and the other, aside: "Below he dies"; Pizarro's direction to him, aside, to go prepare the grave, and, aloud, to send back the prisoners to their cells—all these are contained in the modulating part which began with Marcellina's entry. The keys and musical ideas constantly change, and the rhythm varies so much as to make it of the nature of recitative in time.

After this section, we return to settled idea, when all express their different thoughts of the present occasion in conjunction. The first thought of the prisoners—is after a few bars repeated by the two sopranos, with words of sympathy, the prisoners' ejaculations making an accompaniment. Pizarro, bidding Rocco go to his dungeon-work, and Rocco consenting, fill up the breaks between the phrases of the two sopranos. Jacquino, also sympathizing with the prisoners, takes a similar part in filling up the continuity of the whole; and all parts are drawn up to a half close. New thoughts come then into the minds of all, and are expressed by the second strain of the music, still in the same key. The prisoners already feel the gloom of night coming over them, a night which is ended by no dawn; Rocco's limbs tremble under him at the thought of what he has to do; Pizarro urges him to it; Jacquino is jealous at Rocco's favour to Fidelio; Fidelio is indignant that Pizarro is free to do such terrible things; Marcellina feels more pity for the prisoners. All these separate thoughts, with separate portions of melody, are woven in and out on the basis of a decided but solemn melody given out by the bass instruments.

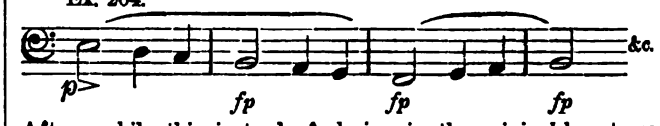
Ex. 204.



After a while, this, instead of closing in the original key, turns off into D flat, and the first strain (Ex. 203), with the first verbal idea, is given in that key, of D. The old thoughts of all are seen in a new light. The strain is introduced by the quotation from Pizarro's duet with Rocco: "And he is dumb" (Ex. 192 and 201), as a terrible suggestion of the living death to which the prisoners are to return.

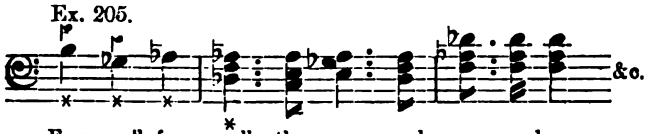
Ex. 205.



Very soon the second strain (Ex. 204) occurs again, and, instead of modulating to D flat, grows into a coda, an extension of the same ideas in the main key of B flat. This gradually draws to a close the whole finale, and, with it, the whole first act of the opera.

It was Logroscino, a Neapolitan composer of comic opera, in the first half of the last century, who first collected all the performers together in a chain of concerted pieces at the end of an act; and this, the finale, has been since considered of the greatest importance in expressing the climax of feeling and action which is required at that point in a drama. It must be felt, in this finale that we have just gone through, how the interest is drawn on from one scene to another; how the connection of key, with the alternation between settled key and modulating portions, draws on the movements one from another; and how the concentration of all the performers in the final section with fixed key is the crown of the whole.

THE NATIONAL ANTHEM.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—I notice in a letter from the Irish Correspondent of the Standard, relative to the Dublin Exhibition, that he has been credibly informed that the non-performance of the National Anthem at the opening is an exaggeration. I trust that his informants may turn out right; but, if they prove so, the decision of the Committee to perform it is of very recent date. I venture to give you my experience in the matter, as it is in itself a sad proof of the present condition of feeling in the country.

Two months ago I received an invitation to compose an Orchestral March for the opening of this Exhibition. Having been invited to do so as an Irishman, and the invitation coming through a personal friend, I accepted—not, however, without some qualms, owing to the well-known opinions of the promoters. I heard shortly afterwards that the National Anthem was not included in the programme. As I did not wish to take upon myself the responsibility of refusing on political grounds, which might have been erroneously represented, I took the course of writing a March on an old Irish melody, introducing "God Save the Queen" on the brass instruments, fortissimo, at the close. The result of this step was a polite letter to say that the March could not be performed, as the introduction of the National Anthem might bring about an unpleasant demonstration.

This episode speaks for itself. It is possible that the musical arrangements with regard to the National Anthem have been suddenly altered without my being informed of it; and I trust, for the sake of what was once a truly loyal town, that the latter supposition is the correct one.

RICHARD WAGNER AND THE COMIC PAPERS OF VIENNA.—Under the heading: "Differences between two celebrated Composers," the Kikeriki makes the following malicious remark:—"Mozart, who played the piano alone and without remuneration, was applauded by hundreds; Richard Wagner requires hundreds of singers and instrumentalists as well as thousands, who pay for their places——and applauds alone." (Give it up; cant see the malice.—Dr Blidge.)—The Floh, referring to the shortness of the speech Wagner made to the public, has this dig at him:—"Do not applaud, my children, lest you should awaken the critics." (Can't see the "dig," for the life of me.—Dr Blidge.)

TO BURNAND, ESQ.

DEAR F. C. B.,—"Ozanna le ever hardy," is a Caxtonian, or Wynkin-de-Wordeian misprint for Ozanna le cœur hardi, just as "Griflet fise de Dieu" is a misprint for Griflet fils du Duc. "Tor le fils vascher" is son of King Pellinore (see Milton—"Launcelot, Pelleas, Pellinore") by the wife of Aries the Cowherd, who said, "I suppose, nay." The late Thomas Wright was somewhat superficial in his editing of Malory, and at times injudicious in the choice of texts. Southey lost breath with his reprint of Caxton before he had even got under weigh. Jarvis, who gave us the most literal and careful (though by no means spiciest) translation of Don Quixote, was, in his period, the man for the task; in our own period, William Chappell before all. He would at least have found out whence came the beautiful and pathetic story of Balin and Balan, which perplexed Southey, sticking half-way in the first volume of Tristan (or Tristram), composed a romance called The Life of Nelson, and did into English both Amadis of Gaul and Palmerin of England. The Laureate in the quick, who has wholly misconceived the story of Pelleas, should take revenge by another "Idyll," with Balin and Balan for theme, bearing in mind the fact that King Ryence of North Wales purfeled his mantle with Kings' beards, "cleane flayne of as much as there was," that he already had overcome eleven Kings and appropriated their beards, that he wanted King Arthur's beard to make up the round dozen, and that King Arthur, being recalcitrant, he of North Wales threatened invasion of the realm of Logris, but being set upon and taken prisoner by Balin, the Knight of the two pummels, aided by his brother Balan, was straightway delivered up unto King Arthur, who let bet the Lady de Vance.

ALBERT NIEMANN has received a telegraphic message from August Wilhelmj at Bayreuth, enquiring, for Richard Wagner, whether Niemann would not sing Parsifal a few times. Great anxiety is evinced to learn the answer of one who, still Germany's greatest heroic tenor, is better qualified for the task than any other.

DEATHS.

On August 25, 1881, CHARLES LAMB KENNEY, Barrister-at-law of the Inner Temple, son of the late James Kenney, Dramatic Author, deeply regretted by his widow, children, and friends. (In loving memory.)

On August 3, 1882, at 26, Portsdown Road, Maida Vale, MARIA, widow of HENRY JOHN TRUST, Professor of the Harp, aged 75 years.

On August 22, at 50, Upper Bedford Place, ELIZABETH, wife of SIGISMUND ROSENTHAL (of Red Lion Square), aged 64 years.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

DILETTANTE.—Tivadar Nachez - Velmi - Bisaccia - Delamontagne-escarpé.

FOIN.—See the German irregular verb, "stoszen," and collate regularly. "Then answered a knight that hight Naram," &c.

SIGURD.—Unquestionably. Wagner has peopled the "terrestial ball"—as Sir Richard Blackmore calls it in his dull poem, The Creation—with new images and phantasmagoria; but what has become of our fierce iconoclasts and subtile spectre quellers? Have they achieved the nimbus?—Or are they mere dust and ashes—symbols of nonentity. Where is Cornelius Agrippa? Sigurd ought to know.

SAGRAMORE LE DESIROUS.—By all means. Hail to the man who wrote about Haydn, Mozart, and Rossini!

Henry Beyle
All heyle!

We have ere now perused L'Abbesse, and shall peruse it again, de castro, if only to chace away those nightmares, the Duchesse de Langeais and her moon-smitten fanatic lover, Montriveau. After you have read the discourses of St Idiot, and Godwin's Essay on Sepulchres (but not before) read Honoré de Balzac's History of the Thirteen.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 26, 1882.

THE TWENTY-FIFTH OF AUGUST.

YESTERDAY was the first anniversary of the death of Charles Lamb Kenney, one of the most genial humourists and brilliant wits of our day. He is not forgotten yet. Nay, he can never be forgotten by those who knew him intimately and gathered wisdom from his lips, whence it flowed in unchecked exuberance, clothed in words as eloquent as the thoughts were subtle and refined. Kenney was one of the most seductive of talkers, but whatever he said, even in his smartest epigrams, was tempered by an indefinable something which showed the heart to be as warm as the brain was lucid. An example of this may be cited in one of those masterly five-line epigrams in verse of which he was so happily prolific. We remember it as it came spontaneously from his mouth, and, though it was never published, are able to quote it from memory. The theme was our own great musician, Sterndale Bennett, who had for some time given little to the world of art of which the world of art could never have too much. Were we not convinced that the friends of Bennett would appreciate the tender grace of the sentiment that inspired it, and that the friends of Kenney would at once accept from the same standpoint, we should not give it publicity, as we do now for the first time with a clear conscience.

STERNDALE BENNETT.

There was a composer called Bennett,
Whose career it won't take long to tell it:
In his youth, like a lark,
Up to Mendelssohn's mark
He rose, since when, silent is Bennett.

What followed? The enchanting concert-overture, Paradise and the Peri, and that gem of all sacred cantatas, The Woman of Samaria. It were well if Kenney were living to make more such epigrams, and Bennett living to profit by them so felicitously. Both these genuine poets, however, have departed from among us, and their vacant places are not easy to fill up.

ORCHESTRA FOR THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

CONDUCTOR:—SIR MICHAEL COSTA.

First Violins.—Messrs P. Sainton (Principal), F. Arnold, J. Brie, E. Campione, V. Collins, A. W. Easton, C. Ersfield, A. Gibson, J. W. Gunniss, E. Jones, C. Jung, M. Klein, V. Nicholson, J. Violas.—Messrs C. W. Doyle (Principal), G. Baird, W. R. Bowie, J. Broedelet, J. O. Brooke, H. Channel, C. Colchester, G. W. Cubit, W. Egerton, G. Grimmett, W. H. Hann, T. Kirby, W. Klippe, T. Lawrence, T. Reynolds, G. Roberts, J. Schreurs, A. Stehling, W. W. Waud, and S. B. Webb.

Violoncellos.—Messrs J. Lasserre (Principal), J. Boatwright, C. Brie, J. A. Brousil, J. R. Gough, W. C. Hann, G. W. Hill, G. Libotton, J. Lloyd, C. Ould, J. Owen, W. F. Reed, H. T. Trust, G. Van de Velde, E. Vieuxtemps, A. W. Waite, and E. Woolhouse.

Double Basses.—Messrs A. C. Whyte (Principal), J. Bishop, A. Collins, W. Griffiths, C. Harper, J. J. Heath, S. J. Jakeway, H. Moreton, F. Neuwirth, E. Ould, H. Progatzky, C. Severn, W. J. Strugnell, F. Tyler, J. P. Waud, J. H. Waud, and C. Winterbottom.

Flutes.—Messrs O. Svendsen, W. L. Barrett, W. Langston, and A. Martin.

Oboes.—Messrs A. Dubrucq, G. Horton, A. Peisel, and G. W. Roberts.

Clarionets.—Messrs H. Lazarus, H. J. Snelling, T. E. Pountney, and J. Roxbee.

Bassoons.—Messrs W. B. Wotton, J. Haveron, A. Edwin, and A. Roberts.

Trumpets.—Messrs T. Harper and P. W. Neuzerling.

Cornets and Trumpets.—Messrs F. McGrath and S. West.

Horns.—Messrs T. E. Mann, R. Keevill, J. W. Standen, and T. Reynolds.

Trombones.—Messrs W. Webster, C. Geard, and J. Harvey.

Ophicleide.—Mr G. Hughes.

Contra Fagotto.—Mr J. W. Hawes.

Double Drums.—Mr J. A. Smith.

Side Drum and Triangle.—Mr P. Calkin, Jun.

Bass Drum and Cymbals.—Mr F. Middleditch.

Harps.—Messrs J. Cheshire and D. F. Davis.

Librarians.—Messrs J. Peck, A. Mapleson, and W. Thompson.

MDME CHRISTINE NILSSON has returned to London from Harrogate, in which pleasant spot she has passed her entire vacation. It is, therefore, puzzling to read in the pages of our excellent contemporary, Le Ménestrel, that she had been slily sojourning at Divonne—"au fond de l'Aine"—where Mr Abbey, her impresario, found her out, and signed an engagement with her, which, having been signed already, wanted no signing at all.

BIRMINGHAM.—All the new works for the Festival which begins on Tuesday have been rehearsed during the week in St George's Hall, Sir Michael Costa presiding on every occasion and affording inestimable aid to the several composers. At the rehearsal of The Redemption one might have imagined it the joint production of Gounod and Costa, for it was not easy to guess which of the two took the greatest interest in its well-going.

Mdlle Victoria de Bunsen has gone on a short visit to Boulogne-sur-Mer.

After a brief sojourn in Paris, Miss Thursby has gone with Maurice Strakosch to Norway, where she was so successful last winter. (And will be just as successful now.—Dr Blitge.)

WAGNER'S PARSIFAL.

(From "The Theatre.")

Although circumstances prevented me from attending any of the Parsifal performances at Bayreuth last month, I propose to tell the readers of The Theatre something about that work and its recent renderings. It will be my privilege, for once in a way, to address them, not in my own words, but in those of my gifted friend, Paul Lindau, from whose inimitable chronicle of the "Festal-Consecration-Stage-Play," I have selected a few paragraphs of general interest. Those who, like myself, revelled six years ago in his Nuechterne Briefe aus Bayreuth—which may be freely paraphrased, "Letters from Bayreuth, written on an empty stomach"—will rejoice to hear from him again upon the congenial subject of a Wagnerian novelty. Many others, who may never hitherto have heard of him (for few German lights of contemporary literature cast their rays as far as this "brumous isle"), will, I am sure, be delighted to make his acquaintance. For the information of these latter I may premise that Paul Lindau is not a specialist in musical criticism, but a feuilletonist of the first water. He is to Berlin what Albert Wolff is to Paris and Spitzer to Vienna. The idiosyncratic force and charm of his style cannot be conveyed in translation, which is a pity, for they have placed him at the head of all living German light essayists. Be it my task to reproduce the matter of his thought, if not the manner of his expression.

* * * * * *

"He whose mission it is to report upon a new creation of Richard Wagner finds himself in much such a fix as that of Faust when the latter desires to render the first chapter of the Gospel of St John into his beloved German: he gets stuck at the very first word. The foremost question: 'What sort of an impression did it make as a whole?'—which his far distant reader has a right to put to him—cannot fail to perplex him inconveniently, and he will find, after pondering over it vainly for some time, that he can only answer by the counter question it naturally suggests: 'Impression upon whom?' Upon the unbiassed public? My goodness gracious! who is unbiassed hereabouts? And how on earth is it possible here to recognise what is the sentence of the majority, seeing that a blathering handkerchief-waving partisan makes more noise than a dozen quiet people who delight in art without grovelling in one-sided hero-worship, whose artistic faith does not prompt them to bow down before the idol of an inflexible Monotheism, and who esteem other musicians besides Richard Wagner—aye, living musicians, even Johannes Brahms! At Bayreuth, vehement rejoicings do not mean very much, and when people talk about 'an enthusiastic reception,' it is simply a meaningless façon de parler. It is a natural necessity that a new work by Richard Wagner, produced here in Bayreuth before the most faithful and energetic admirers of his genius, should be greeted with tempestuous acclamations. When Wagner lightens, it thunders in the Festal-playhouse! Under such circumstances, the best thing the reporter can do is simply to state what he himself has felt and thought, without making any pretension to pronounce a conclusive judgment.

* * * * * *

"In the first scene, a wood by a lake, we are introduced to good old Gurnemanz, who has never a leitmotiv to his name. It seems possible, therefore, to get on in life and even to become tolerably advanced in years without a 'guiding phrase.' In the score of Parsifal, however (with this solitary exception), Wagner has faithfully adhered to his method of musical identification by means of special rhythmic and melodic signs and tokens (leitmotiv), a method timidly suggested in his earlier operas, and developed to its utmost availabilities in his later 'Music-Dramas.' Every one of his characters keeps a musical passport, so to speak, in the orchestra, with which voucher he or she may not part, under heavy penalties, and must invariably also produce when about to put in an appearance. These 'guiding phrases' are of different sorts, not exclusively descriptive of the human being they announce, but of certain occurrences in that person's physical or psychical life as well. . . . ."

* * * * * *

"A stormy passage in the orchestra signals to us the approach of an uncomfortable personage. It is Kundry—a wild terrible woman, the principal cause of all the calamities that have befallen the Brethren of the Grail, and who would fain help them out of their trouble, but that she is subject to the will of Klingsor, a wicked magician, the pious fraternity's inveterate foe. This Kundry is not always so ugly as she now looks; there are days when she is 'in beauty,' and it was upon one of these occasions that she foregathered with Amfortas, the Grail-King and keeper of the sacred chalice containing the Blood of Christ, as well as of the holy spear thrust into the Saviour's side by a Roman mercenary. Amfortas, it seems, could not withstand the charms of this seductive female, and vile Klingsor profited by the King's moment of weakness to snatch from him the wonder-working lance and with it to wound him. Since that mishap, affliction and want have prevailed in the Grail Castle; for the King's hurt will not heal, and, so long as the relic shall remain in the heathen's possession, the Brethren will have to do without supernatural nourishment. Moreover, the arrogant Klingsor takes advantage of the Grail-Knights' embarrassment in an altogether inexcusable manner. In close contiguity to the Grail estate he establishes a magnificent garden, which he peoples with extremely good-looking females of doubtful morality, for the sole purpose of diverting the Grail-Knights from the path of virtue. And it would really appear that a good many of the Brethren are so weak as to prefer the society of these highly-perfumed flower-girls to that of their incessantly sighing and groaning monarch. Not very nice of them, perhaps, but essentially human! Amfortas, whose acquaintance we make on his sick-bed, grunts and wails without intermission; and everybody knows that people who will talk of nothing but their ailments are not the most entertaining companions in the world. Now Amfortas has nought to say that does not refer to his wound or other physical infirmities; and we have scarcely met him for the first time when we begin to wish most earnestly for the fulfilment of the prophecy, to the effect that a 'pure fool' will turn up, capable of healing the King's wound. We hope this fool will come soon."

* * * * * *

In due time Parsifal arrives, shoots a swan, and is lectured at some length for his wanton destructiveness by Gurnemanz, who moreover, volunteers to take him up to the Grail Castle. This he does by a cycloramic road and to orchestral accompaniments of great beauty. Having reached the Burg, Parsifal witnesses a dismal ceremony performed there daily in connection with Amfortas' wound, fails to understand what it is all about, and is sent about his business by Gurnemanz, because he turns out an even greater fool than that gentleman expected, or, it may be said, hoped. This anti-climax is of Wagner's invention, and differs entirely from the Gralsburg incident as originally narrated in verse by Wolfram von Eschenbach.

* * * * * *

"The second act," continues Lindau, "offers the strongest imaginable contrast to the first; indeed, it is a laborious combination of contrasts, as, for instance, hell-fire against holy-water, heathen enchantments against Christian miracles, unchanged sensuality against ascetic continence. The assertion that in Parsifal Wagner has fallen back upon his Lohengrin method and manner, is as incorrect as can be. What resemblances exist between the two music-dramas are quite superficial. Both Parsifal and Lohengrin are 'Knights of the Swan'; and, perhaps, the very swan pierced by Parsifal's bolt is the sire or grandsire of the bird that tows Lohengrin across the Scheldt to extricate Elsa from her embarrassments. Lohengrin is Parsifal's son, so says the legend, and so he himself tells us at the most solemn and distressing moment of his life. But that the Wagnerian Parsifal is Lohengrin's father appears doubtful to me. He looks by no means the sort of person to give up the independence of bachelorhood for the restraints of matrimony. The mere fact that Wagner notifies the slaying of the swan in Parsifal by the same chords with which he announces the advent of the swan in Lohengrin is not at all significant of any community of character in the two plays. Like Figaro's song hummed by Leporello in the banquet-scene of Don Juan, it is nothing more than a composer's self-quotation."

A DISCOVERY.—According to the Dresdener Nachrichten, the "Graal Motive" in Parsifal is neither more nor less than the "Dresden Amen," as it is called, composed by old Johann Gottlieb Naumann, and still sung at numerous churches in Saxony.—(We did not want the Dresdener Nachrichten to tell us that.—Dr Blidge.)

MDME TREBELLI, returned from her highly successful tour in Denmark, has left London for Birmingham, to fulfil an engagement at the forthcoming Musical Festival. On her way home, Mdme Trebelli stopped at Cologne, when the Prince and Princess of Wales were there, en route for Wiesbaden. Their Royal Highnesses honoured the accomplished artist by an invitation to visit them in their private apartments, and expressed to her the pleasure they felt on hearing of the cordial reception with which she had everywhere been greeted. Scandinavia seems to agree with Mdme Trebelli. Every time she returns from the Baltic she looks ten years younger.

PROVINCIAL.

ABERGAVENNY.—There were excursions from all parts of the country to the recent Abergavenny Musical Eisteddfod. The town, peraunter, was never so full of people. Nine choirs and a much larger number of glee parties, made a total of nearly 3,000 competitors, exclusive of the legion of solists and pianists, who had to be first subjected to a "weeding" process before Mr Brinley Richards. Over 8,000 persons were brought to the town by the London and North Western Railway from the mining districts. The market-hall, the largest covered space in the county, was crammed during the choral competition. The Eisteddfod commenced at 11 o'clock, the adjudicators being Messrs Brinley Richards, R. Bartholomew, and Emlyn Evans; accompanists, Messrs H. Tomkins and G. Howells; conductor, Rev. Theophilus Rees, Pentyrch. For the best performance on the piano of Haydn's Gipsy Rondo, candidates not to exceed 17 years of age, there were several. Misses Walker, of Grawen Terrace, Merthyr; Polly Williams, Blaenavon (eight years of age) and Edith Bunting, being selected for the ultimate decision. Mr Brinley Richards was agreeably surprised at the great progress of pianoforte playing in South Wales during the last two or three years. He had gained much experience of late, the Royal Academy of Music having appointed him as one of their examiners, and he was led to the conclusion that the standard of music in Wales is rising rapidly. Not many years ago—he would tell them plainly—their music and playing, and everything else was childish; but now like sensible people they were going to work to educate the country. In this competition the playing was very good, but the music was too easy. He was bound to award the prize to the best performer, and that was Miss Edith Bunting, of London; though the little girl only 8 years of age (Polly Williams, Blaenavon) played in a most remarkably clever manner for her age. The committee, on his recommendation, awarded her a second prize. The competition for the prize of £100 for the best performance of Handel's chorus, "The many rend the skies," was awarded to the Dowlais Harmonic Society.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS.—On Friday evening week Mr Brinley Richards (acting in place of Mr Stephen Evans) presided at a concert and competition, held on behalf of the building fund of the Calvinistic Methodist Chapel. Mr Richards spoke in eulogistic terms of Mr Evans, referring to the interest he showed in Wales and the education movement, which had taken him away that day to Aberystwith. Mr Richards specially alluded to the discreditable way in which the funds of the Welsh Charity School, London, had been appropriated, and nothing could better show the abuses than the election of children, who, instead of being, as was intended, children of the Welsh poor, were children of people in a good position in life. He hoped that all present would exercise their influence throughout Wales to institute an inquiry into the management of this charity. Wales could hold its own with any nation, and particularly if granted facilities for superior education. He thought the Welsh language superior to the German for singing, only that the latter was fashionable, and the Welsh looked down upon by too many. The Welsh language would yet become more popular, and not die out as some people thought. Some years ago, when in ill-health, a lady recommended him to go to Llandrindod Wells. He had never even heard of the place, and had much difficulty in ascertaining its whereabouts. Arriving late in the evening, he was not prepossessed in its favour, and, if he could have obtained a "Hansom" cab to take him home, he would have gone as quickly as possibie. But, next morning viewing the rising sun and the panorama presented to his gaze, a revolution was effected in his mind, and he was delighted. Every year he visited the place it was with greater appreciation of the pleasure and benefits derived. Several visitors and others took part in the programme. The glee party (led by Mr W. Thomas) having given "Hail, smiling morn," Mr Richards remarked that he must congratulate the singers upon their rendering of this piece, the excellence of their intonation, and the taste displayed in regard to light and shade. With such voices he had no doubt but that a successful choral festival may be held at Llandrindod Wells in the future. In reply to a cordial vote of thanks, the chairman said that although a member of the Church of England, he had yet to learn that an act for the benefit of his fellow-countrymen should be limited to any particular church. He was always anxious to assist his Welsh friends, and was very pleased to be present. He had filled similar positions before, and hoped this would not be the last time. He concluded with a tribute of praise to the general performances.—South Wales Daily News, August 15th.

LIVERPOOL.—A choral concert was given on Saturday evening at Hengler's Cirque, by the Cambrian Choral Society and the Liverpool Vocalists' Union, assisted by Mdme Billinie Porter and Mr George Barton. There was a very large audience, who, loud in their applause throughout, were vociferous in encores as their favourites each in turn appeared. Both societies are to appear at the Denbigh National Eisteddfod. The programme included the competitive pieces, "How the giant winds do wrestle" (Stephens), and "The Prayer" (Dr J. Parry), and Benedict's part song "The Wreath," Pinsuti's "Tell me, Flora," and Mendelssohn's chorus "Judge me, O God." All were done full justice to by the well-trained societies, under the baton of Mr T. C. Jones, who conducted. Mdme Billinie Porter had two solos apportioned to her, "Who knows," by Cowen, and "Should he upbraid," by Bishop, both well received. Mr George Barton so delighted the audience with his rendering of the "Maid of Athens" that he was re-called, and good-naturedly added another song. For one of the pieces set down for him—"Bonny Kate" (Balfe)—another had to be substituted, as the former was found to be copyright; but the one chosen called "Sweet love, good night to thee," was received with great favour and an irresistible "encore." Mr Barton also gave with great feeling "I am dreaming of thee, sweet Madeline." Miss Maggie Evans played a pianoforte solo, Thalberg's "Masaniello," as well as accompanying throughout the evening. The last verse of several part songs had to be repeated, which prolonged the concert to a later hour than usual.—Liverpool Daily Post, Aug. 21.

NEW ORGAN FOR RHYL.

Subjoined is the specification of a new organ built for the Wesleyan Chapel, Rhyl, at this, one of the healthiest and most delightful spots in North Wales:—

GREAT ORGAN—CC TO G.—Double Stopped Diapason, 16 feet, 56 pipes: Open Diapason (large scale), 8, 56; Clarabella, 8, 56; Keraulophon, 8, 56: Principal, 4, 56; Twelfth, 2⅔, 56; Fifteenth, 2, 56; Mixture, 4 ranks, 224; Trumpet, 8 feet, 56.

SWELL ORGAN—CC TO G.—Lieblich Bourdon, 16 feet, 56 pipes; Open Diapason, 8, 56; Stopped Diapason, 8, 56; Principal, 4, 56; Salcional, 8, 56; Fifteenth, 2, 56; Mixture, 2 ranks, 112; Horn, 8 feet, 56; Oboe, 8, 56; Clarion, 4, 56.

CHOIR ORGAN—CC TO G.—Viola-di-Gamba, 8 feet, 56 pipes; Flauto Traverso, 4, 56; Piccolo, 2, 56; Dulciana, 8, 44; Clarionet, 8, 44.

PEDAL ORGAN—CCC TO F.—Open Diapason, 16 feet, 30 pipes; Violon (small scale), 16, 30.

COUPLERS.—Swell to Great; Great to Pedals; Swell to Pedals; Choir to Pedals; Choir to Great; Swell to Choir; Swell Sub-Octave—on its own Keyboard; Swell Super-Octave—on its own Keyboard.

COMPOSITION PEDALS.—Double-acting Pedals to Great Organ; Double-acting Pedals to Swell Organ.

The organ was opened on Wednesday, the 23rd inst., by our justly-renowned countryman, Mr W. T. Best, who gave both morning and evening "Recitals," of which the respective programmes were as under:—

WEDNESDAY MORNING, AUGUST 23rd:—

Overture, Die Letzen Dinge	Spohr.
Andante, in G minor	E. Silas.
Toccato, with Pedal Solo, F major	Bach.
Scherzo-Symphonique	Alex. Guilmant.
Selection from the "Water Music"	Handel.
(Andante maestoso, Minuetto, Allegro, Allegretto giocoso, Finale.)
The National Anthem, with Variations and Finale	W. T. Best.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, AUGUST 23rd:—

Festival Prelude on the Lutheran Chorale, "Ein feste Burg" ("A strong fortress is our God")	G. A. Thomas.
Allegro Cantabile, F minor	C. M. Widor.
Festal March	W. T. Best.
Siciliana and Fugue, G minor	Bach.
Scherzo-Symphonique	Alex. Guilmant.
Selection from the "Water Music"	Handel.
The National Anthem, with Variations and Finale	W. T. Best.

The selections were varied and interesting, the performance irreproachable, and the result in the highest degree satisfactory.

MR E. J. HOPKINS.—The Archbishop of Canterbury has recently conferred on this distinguished musician the degree of Doctor of Music. In thus recognizing eminent services rendered to the cause of Church Music, his Grace has given spontaneous expression to the esteem and admiration of the musical profession, and the general public, towards one who has spent many years in unostentatious and successful labours in the art. Mr Hopkins' friends heartily congratulate him upon the attainment of an honour—thought, perhaps, by some, long-deferred—and wish him many years of health to enjoy the well-won distinction.

"MUSIC: IN RELIGION AND IN LIFE."*

"Singing and making melody," was, in part, the text of an eloquent sermon preached by the Rev. Canon Farrar, at the "Festival Service of the Choir Benevolent Fund" recently held in Westminster Abbey. The renowned pulpit orator evidently intended his discourse on this occasion to represent more particularly the melody of language; and if he so desired to show that English prose could, with the aid of a silvery-toned voice, sound really like music, then the result must be pronounced most convincing. For were not the periods—now ringing clear and high like a trumpet, now modulating into gentler strains—ever held in as close relation to each other as strains of music flowing without break or fall? From the starting point, when the key-note was pitched in the brightest of keys, to the end, the long-sustained theme was never allowed to lapse into flatness or dulness. Indeed, had any foreigner been present who understood not the meaning of the words, their simple utterance would have held him in spell; or had any listener shut up his mind to the subject-matter, the ear alone would have felt charm by the procession of rhetorical devices. Need it be said, then, that with music for the subject, such an orator as Canon Farrar could not fail to make "the sound an echo to the sense," nor fall far short of rivalling, by his art, the more ethereal strains upon which he dwelt. The nervous language of the preacher was illumined here and there by the recital of lines of exceeding splendour; verses sung in ages past, that still are, and perhaps ever will be, the groundwork of praise and thanksgiving. The song of Miriam and the Psalms of David, with fervid strains by other members of the mighty Hebrew choir, were laid under contribution; neither were the pæans of classic lore overlooked; while outbursts of our own Anglo-Saxon poets, in celebration of music, shed a dazzling lustre upon the discourse. Whilst, however, attention was called to the high estimation in which music was held by poets secular and divine, the speaker could give no clue as to what the music was, originally set to the glowing words. Unhappily no vestige of it has come down to us. Speech and language remain, but the tune of the singer, to the sound of lute and harp, is no longer heard. Were the musical signs still extant, even then occupants of the pulpit, by the practice of placing music outside their necessary attainments, would be called upon in vain to unfold the meaning of the written characters, for to most of our clergy the construction of the "Grand Chant" is as much a mystery as that of "the music of the spheres."

It need not be said that the reverend orator fully availed himself of the opportunity the occasion afforded of illustrating life and religion by the qualities and capacities of music.† For has not the combination of sweet sounds ever been—alike to poet, sage, and priest—a favourite emblem of things good and pure? Truly, life, with its mystery, changefulness, and brevity, is like, as the preacher indicated, to the tune, falling and rising, but ever speeding on to its final cadence. And, surely, the broken time, false passage, discordant scale, halting theme, with the clear melody and jubilant song, image forth the several states, phases, and characteristics of human life. Music, besides being the natural expression of personal joy and grief, is also in certain forms a kind of shibboleth of party and race. Each nation has its anthem, and most sects and societies have some code of vocal signals. The Marseillaise is now the tune of France, as "God Save the Queen" is that of England. It is unfortunate, therefore, that Canon Farrar should have selected the former for special contempt. Neighbourly goodwill, if not Christian charity, should have kept the preacher from calling the Marseillaise a song of "sombre ferocity." True it is, the air was begotten in tumult, and, after becoming the cry of freedom, became the shriek for vengeance; but it is, at present, the symbol of a great nationality, and, in that capacity, claims respect. Would it not be well for us to remember that the ancient strain, in which Englishmen delight to vent their loyalty, has often been, nay, at this very moment may be, mingled with groans of the vanquished?

It is not a matter of surprise that the reverend speaker should have had some difficulty in estimating the value of music as a pastime. To his appreciation the music-hall and Italian opera run somewhat in the same groove, and, consequently, must be considered deserving of like condemnation. Now this is scarcely just. That Italian opera music is far, very far, removed from music-hall strains is obvious to impartial and unprejudiced minds. True it is that opera music is often associated with words and scenes of impurity; true, that dramatic composers often purposely select libretti with "strong situations" for the exercise of their descriptive and emotional powers; true, that "the luxurious classes and gilded youth" who delight in opera have the moral taint common to human nature; it is not, at the same time, true that the vulgarity, obscenity, viciousness, and unspeakable degradation of the "gaff" or music-hall are found on the Italian opera stage. Moreover, the preacher in this matter is hardly consistent; for, later on in his discourse, Handel, who spent the greater part of his life in Italian opera; Beethoven, who wrote Fidelio; and Mozart, who enriched the repertoire of the lyric stage with several master-pieces—each of these operatic composers receives laudatory recognition. If Italian opera music is essentially "spurious, effeminate, loose, false, and immoral," how came those good and great men to expend their genius upon so vicious an art? But criticism upon music and musicians can scarcely be expected from the pulpit. The reader, however, will find in Canon Farrar's eloquent sermon a glowing eulogy on that branch of the "divine art" associated with the exercises of religion.

TO MARIAN FROM GENERAL MITE.

You, my maid Marian, greatest of your kind,
Beating most others in the way of height—
In sporting phrase—by nearly half a length,
Whom, when the people gaze upon, they say,
With wide-mouthed wonder, "How is that for high?"
You whose fair "presence" is magnificent—
I only know your absence, which is not—
You are a woman with some weight about you,
You are a woman with extended views,
And I, a person of some nine pounds odd, adore you.
'Tis true I'm only eighteen inches high,
While you attain nigh half that sum in feet;
Still I adore you, for, of consequence,
You must be, love, large-hearted.
You are my goddess. There are many maids
I could look up to, none set up like thee.
Return my passion—hardly in the way
MSS. are returned, "Declined with thanks."
Reciprocate it, dearest; do not deem
That my ambition soars a bit too high;
But hold me up (you can) as your ideal;
Wed me, and think what houses we shall draw
Throughout the world, when "agent in advance"
Can advertise, in gaudy-lettered bills,
"The Mightiest Anomaly E'er Known
Is coming upon such and such a day.—
Namely, A Giant and a Dwarf in One!"
Marian, in your own interest, become
My—well—considerably better half.
Woman must have a master, but she likes
One as less masterful as she can get;
Take me. —Fun.

SONDERSHAUSEN.—A Conservatory of Music, with the patronage of the reigning Prince, is to be opened next Easter, under Carl Schröder, its chief object being the training of orchestral performers.

NICE.—Sophie Cruvelli, the once popular prima donna, who married Count Vigier, and lived here for years in grand style, has lost all her property. Even her splendid mansion in this town will be sold.—(At the same time she is organizing her accustomed concert for the benefit of the poor at Nice!—Dr Bridge.)

WÜRZBURG.—According to the seventh annual report of the Royal School of Music, the staff consists of 16 professors besides the director, Dr Carl Kliebert. The number of students last year was 604, of whom only 148 belonged to the gentler sex, an exception to the rule that at such institutions the females outnumber the males. Six Subscription Concerts were given by the professors. There was, also, a performance of The Messiah as well as various concerts at the anniversary of the University.

CHERUBINI.

VI.

At the beginning of 1790, Cherubini set about the composition of a French comic opera, and finished an entire act. I am ignorant of his reason for not completing the work, which was entitled *Marguerite d'Anjou. But he soon turned his attention to another opera, Lodoïska, the libretto of which, taken from Louvet's celebrated romance, Le Chevalier de Faublas, had been entrusted to him by Fillette-Loraux. Two months, however, before the work was brought out, several numbers composed by Cherubini to French words, and introduced in a short occasional drama where music played only a subsidiary part, were executed at the Salle Feydeau; but this was simply an act of complaisance on his part, and he could not have attached much importance to the experiment. The following is how, under the date of 1791, his Catalogue mentions the numbers in question:—"Three choruses placed in a piece entitled La Mort de Mirabeau, and given at Feydeau." The title as thus written is not entirely correct; the piece, described as "a historical fact in one act," had Pujoulx for its author, and was entitled Mirabeau à son lit de mort; it seems to have been a very moving little drama, and was performed for the first time on the 24th May, 1791.

With Lodoïska we enter regularly on Cherubini's real French career, and we have, at the outset, to set down a brilliant success to his credit. It was on the 18th July, 1791, that the work was acted for the first time at the Salle Feydeau, and its production made so deep an impression on the public that Cherubini's name became at once celebrated. It is true that, apart from the talent displayed by him in the work, he was exceptionally well served by a combination of favourable circumstances with regard to it. In the first place, the popularity enjoyed by Louvet's pleasing novel could not fail to excite the sympathy and curiosity of the public and impel them beforehand to go and see a piece taken from it; secondly, the management had got the piece up with an amount of magnificence quite unusual at a second-class theatre, and such as till then had been seen only at the Opera; the costumes and scenery were gorgeous; the masses, considerably augmented, produced an effect hitherto unknown, and the last scene, which represented the burning and destruction of a palace, drew, by its power and truth, cries of admiration from the spectators; lastly, an excellent interpretation on the part of the singers, and the co-operation of a marvellous orchestra, whose superiority stood out the more strongly because the work was treated musically with profound knowledge and an exceptional utilization of symphonic resources, helped to complete the elements of a success, which, for brilliancy, was striking and prolonged.

Lodoïska was in three acts, the principal parts being sustained by Mdme de Justal, Martin, Châteaufort, and Gaveaux. It was one of the first essays in the way of the grand lyric drama which was about being implanted on the two secondary stages of Favart and of Feydeau, and which till then had been seen only at the Opera; the experiment was as successful as it possibly could be, and the public received the new work with a sort of enthusiasm. Contemporary chroniclers—I say chroniclers, for at that period true criticism did not exist—were unanimous in recording the immense success achieved by the composer. One of them said: "It is certain that the splendour of the piece, the richness and variety of the costumes, the magnificence of the scenery, and the conflagration seen at the end, contributed not a little to its success; it is certain, too, that M. Cherubini's music is comparable to nothing less than the sublimest efforts of the greatest masters. . . . M. Cherubini has surpassed himself. Never did French ears listen to more expressive and characteristic music."† Another, though more concise, is no less laudatory: "A grandiose subject, a frightful conflagration, and enchanting music."‡ A third expresses himself as follows: "The music is entrancing, sublime; a broad style, admirable treatment of the masses, profound orchestration, astonishing dash, surprising originality, and grand touches in a word—this is what it offers us and which justifies the enthusiasm of the public, who, during the performances, rose at every piece and applauded the immortal author."§ As for the Journal de Paris, then a highly influential paper, the opinions of which carried great weight, this is how it spoke: ". . . . The style of the words is beneath mediocrity. Just the contrary must be stated of the music, which is that of a great master. The public were informed whose it was, and it was only natural for them to expect a very great deal from the young composer. Despite of this, they were none the less astonished at the brilliant effects with which he has profusely adorned his work. It would be difficult to mention specially all the pieces of different kinds which were applauded. They are nearly all concerted pieces. We scarcely know an instance of more vigorous and more fertile talent. We are compelled sometimes to think it is too much so; if there is anything we could wish in the music, it is a trifle more melody, which would enable the audience to rest after the exceedingly numerous orchestral effects."‖

By the new forms he adopted in his score of Lodoïska, by the vigour displayed in its general conception, by the power he succeeded in giving to his orchestra, and by the truly architectural structure of this virile production of his genius, Cherubini came forward as the determined champion of the evolution which comic opera, that style of composition so eminently French, was about to go through. Dramatic truth, the study of grand situations, and the portrayal of character, which Gluck had so successfully introduced among us in lyric drama properly so called, were all things Cherubini determined to transport to the stage of the Théâtre Feydeau, and endow with them our musical comedy, which, with a few exceptions, had hardly been distinguished for delicacy or wit, grace, or tenderness, and which was pretty generally deficient in breadth and emotion. However, it is not correct to say, as far at least as regards the priority of the results obtained, that Cherubini was the originator of the evolution; with respect to this point Denne-Baron was mistaken in his notice of him, as was, subsequently, the German authoress, who, under the pseudonym of Mad. Mara, published a rapid study, full of interest and overflowing with ingenious views, on the composer. It must be stated that, on the 4th September, 1790, that is to say, about a year previous to the production of Lodoïska, Méhul brought out at the Théâtre Feydeau his first work, Euphrosine et Coradin, and that in this work, so new and daring in character, he laid the foundations of the reform about to be carried out. A pupil of Gluck's, he followed in his master's footsteps, and we must not refuse him the benefit of anteriority, because Cherubini had the intelligence to take the same course and follow it with him. As Fétis has very justly observed in his Curiosités historiques de la Musique, when speaking of Cherubini's first steps on the stage of the Théâtre de Monsieur, and of the score of Lodoïska:

"M. Cherubini, whose name was already celebrated when he settled in France in 1788, and who added to his reputation by the beautiful detached pieces he wrote for the Bouffons at the Théâtre de Monsieur, M. Cherubini, I say, perceived the remarkable character of the path which Méhul had just traced out in his Euphrosine; he abandoned the Italian manner, which he had followed until then, adopted the new one offered him, and, bringing to the task his profound knowledge and the sweet strains of his native land, produced his opera of Lodoïska. An air, a trio, and the finale of the second act are sufficient to place the work in the first rank of masterpieces of the French school, to which by its style it belongs."¶

* This is how Cherubini mentions in his Catalogue the work in question, which was never finished: "The eight following pieces from the first act of Marguerite d'Anjou, an opera I began for the Thuilleries Theatre, but did not complete: Respires tu? air; Tout doucement, trio; O Reine infortunée! air and couplets; Non, n'est ce pas? air; Princes et rois, air; Ne jugez pas, chorus and finale."

¶ Curiosités historiques de la Musique, p. 124.—As we see, it is not quite correct to say, as the writer who signs: Mdme Mara, does: "The event which marked a new era, and in which we recognize the revolution of French lyric drama, was the appearance of Cherubini's opera, Lodoïska."

Those who would like to read Mdme Mara's notice of Cherubini will find it in the second volume which she wrote under the title of Musikalische Studienköpfe, and which was published at Leipsic in 1876. An Italian translation of the notice was given by the Rivista Europea (Florence) in its number for the 1st May, 1877.

Mdme Mara has, in a historical sense, followed rather too servilely Denne-Baron, and, like him, makes a mistake in asserting that it was Mdme Scio

The success of Lodoïska in France was spontaneous, brilliant, and uncontested. Nor was it less so in Germany, where the work was soon afterwards performed and quickly considered a masterpiece. Its popularity, indeed, lasted much longer on the other side of the Rhine than it did among ourselves, for, in 1817, Weber produced it in Dresden, having previously, according to a custom he had adopted, published a long analysis in the Dresdener Zeitung, while, in 1818, it was played in Berlin. It was for its performance in this town that Cherubini was requested to write a new air, the one originally written not suiting the voice of Mdme Milder, the lady charged with the principal part; and it is he himself who informs us the second air was not sung by her, for it is in these terms that he mentions it in his Catalogue under the date of 1817: "A new air, not executed, for the opera of Lodoïska."

A fortnight to a day, after the production of Cherubini's work at the Théâtre Feydeau, the Théâtre Favart brought out another with the same title and on the same subject. The second Lodoïska, first performed on the 1st August, 1791, was less fortunate than its predecessor. It was the work of Dejaure for the words, while the music was due to Rudolphe Kreutzer, the admirable violinist. But the latter was not strong enough as a composer to compete with Cherubini, and his score could not bear comparison with the latter's. An annalist puts the case thus:

"There is a great distance between M. Kreutzer and M. Cherubini, and we cannot, without doing him a wrong, even suspect M. Kreutzer of ever entertaining the notion of rivalling the former. The more we hear the music of M. Cherubini's Lodoïska, the more we regret M. Kreutzer should have written the music of another version." **

It is certain that we do not find in the latter a single piece which comes up to the fine pages of Cherubini's Lodoïska, among which pages we must especially mention, besides the overture and Lodoïska's air, the superb trio in the second act and the famous chorus: "Concertons notre vengeance!" a piece so remarkable for its great power and splendid sonorousness.

Mr William Hutchins Callcott died on Saturday, Aug. 5th, at his residence in Kensington. The deceased composer, born in the year 1807, was the son of Dr John Wall Callcott and nephew of Sir Augustus Wall Callcott, R.A. Mr Callcott's chief compositions are a baritone song, "The Last Man," words by the poet Campbell, and two anthems frequently used in our cathedrals—"Give peace in our time, O Lord," and "In my Father's house are many mansions." His remaining published works are not numerous, but display a cultivated and refined taste. Owing to failing health, Mr Callcott had long retired from active work in his profession. The funeral took place on Wednesday, the 9th inst., at 10 a.m., in Kensal Green Cemetery.

Bayreuth, 9th August (Correspondence).—At yesterday's performance (the seventh) of Parsifal every seat was filled. There were a great many foreigners, French, American, and English; Italy, also, supplying a strong contingent. Conspicuous among the celebrities present was Dr Helmholz, of Berlin. Wagner, who sat in his box by the side of August Wilhelmj, the Bayreuth violin-king, was called for at the end with "hurrahs" and "Hochs." Herr Levi, the conductor, returned thanks in his stead, saying that "the Master had been compelled by slight indisposition to leave the theatre." Before the last act, there was a supper, to which his Excellency, Count von Schleinitz, member of the Prussian Ministry, escorted Mdme Wagner, and Professor August Wilhelmj the Countess von Schleinitz. The weather is more favourable; yesterday, the evening sun illumined the pleasant landscape between the first and second acts as if by magic.

Every theatre in Milan is shut except the Dal Verme, transformed for the nonce into a circus.

who created the part of Lodoïska. Mdme Scio, of whom I shall speak further on with all the detail due to the talent of so admirable an artist, merely continued, though with much success, the part, which, as I have stated, was created by Mdme de Justal. At the time of the first production of Lodoïska, in 1791, Mdme Scio belonged to the company of the Théâtre Molière, and it was not till the following year that she was engaged and first appeared at Feydeau.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

The season is "all a-growing, all a-blowing," i.e., the number of visitors has increased by "returners home," who are weather-bound on account of the furious gale that is raging. There are plenty of French, but not enough English for the hotel keepers, who are never satisfied.

As regards the concerts, the third "grand" was given at the Casino on the 18th. Avec le concours de M. Talazac, 1 ténor de l'Opera Comique, Mdlle Velmi, from the Theatre Italien, in Paris, who charmed everyone with her brilliant execution of "Son vergin vezzosa" (I Puritani), the "Bijoux" air from Faust, and Arditi's "Il Bacio." There is, also, Mdlle Eugénie Bénard, a young pianist from London, whom I mentioned favourably in the columns of the Musical World some time ago, and who, evidently, has been studying very hard since then. Mdlle Bénard played Weber's "Concertstüke" and Michael Watson's fantasia on Il Trovatore, gaining great applause after each.

At the fourteenth matinée, held at the Etablissement, Mdlle Caroline Brun, "cantatrice des concerts Colonne," gave the grand air from Massenet's Hérodiade, "La ballade du roi du Thulé," and "La Coupe de Galathé" ("Verse encore"), which delighted the audience beyond measure. Enfin! it was a remarkable success.

At the theatre, M. Bérard has been giving La Songe d'un nuit d'été Hamlet, Faust, La Fille du Tambour Major, and Giroflé-Girofla. Les Huguenots, Robert le Diable, La Juive, Guillaume Tell, and Les Cloches de Corneville are "à l'étude." M. Ketten finished his successful engagement on Saturday as Faust, being well supported by M. Dégrave (Méphistophèle), M. Solve (Valentin), Mdlle Hasselmans (Marguerite), and Mdlle Francinis (Siebel).

The races began yesterday and are to be continued to-day. The regatta was not quite the success it was expected to be; while the fair finished on Sunday.

Mdlle Victoria de Bunsen is here for her health, which, you know, has been very bad for some time; but we trust that the change to breezy Boulogne will do her good, and that we may have the pleasure of hearing some of the sweet notes of the Swedish contralto before she leaves us.

Choral Meeting in Hamburg.—[August 9, Original Correspondence. Third German Singers' Festival.]—This week belongs to the Singers of Germany! For the first time, the old Hanse town beholds within its walls a national German Festival; neither the members of the rifle clubs, nor those of the Gymnastic Societies, nor musicians ever strayed hither before, but it seems that an extraordinary influx may be expected at the coming festival. The number of visitors increases with every train, and the crowds in the streets are as great as though it were already in full swing. The singers officially announced up to now amount to about 9,000, and the larger Vocal Associations to 49. In addition to these, the Vocal Section of the London "Turnerverein" have notified their intention of attending. The grand procession will take place on Saturday, the 12th August. It will form on the Steinthorplatz, near the Museum of Art and Trade, in two divisions and six columns, with fourteen bands. Starting at half-past two, it will reach the Festplatz about half-past five, wending its way through the Steinstrasse—the first street, by the bye, ever paved in Germany (1280)—Rathhausmarkt, by the Exchange, over the Neuerwall, Jungfernstieg, Gänsemarkt, past the Lessing Monument, Stadttheater, and Dammthor, to the Exhibition Building. The flag of the Association will be displayed from a carriage.—Several members from the German Baltic provinces of Russia, who intend taking part in the proceedings, have already reached Lübeck. The members of several Russo-German Societies come by way of Stettin. There will be only two concerts, the conductors being Professor Julius von Bernuth, of this town, and Herr Franz Schmidt, chorus-master of the Association, from Munich. The Festival is to be brought officially to an end on the evening of Sunday, the 13th, after an instrumental concert.

WARTEL.

Pierre François Wartel, the eminent professor of singing, died on Friday, the 12th inst., at his residence 30, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin, aged seventy-two. Born at Versailles, the 3rd April, 1806, Wartel was from 1823 to 1828, a pupil of Choron's. He then went to the Conservatory, where, in 1829, he carried off the first prize for singing. For fourteen or fifteen years, from 1831 to 1846, he sang tenor parts at the Opera. It was he who "created" the "Rataplan" in Les Huguenots, at a brilliant epoch when the Opera possessed such artists as Nourrit, Duprez, Falcon, Damoreau, and Dorus-Gras. But Wartel had other titles to consideration. It was he who popularised in France the melodies of Schubert. After singing in Germany, he returned and settled among us. He devoted himself to teaching, and the list of artists he formed on his system would be a long one. The two most illustrious are certainly Christine Nilsson and Trebelli, though we must not forget Hisson of the Opera. In 1860, the Stockholm Academy of Fine Arts created him one of its members; this was by way of thanking him for the excellent lessons he had given the Swedish Nightingale. Wartel leaves a son, Emile, who after singing successfully for some years at the Théâtre Lyrique, established a vocal school of his own.

The funeral service was celebrated on the 14th inst., at the Church of the Trinity, Paris. JULES PRÉVAL.

TO GALLERON OF GALWAY.

SIR,—The briefs from Somerset never came to hand. Their contents are, therefore, lost to our nephews! Woe is me!

They may, happily, however, during the lapse of years become petrified in Bath (bath-petrified). Dug up from the intestines of Mother Earth, or Erda, from whom, and the loins of Wotan (pace Wagner), sprang Siegmund and Sieglinde, Brünnhilde and her eight Walkyrian sisters. Then will come eagerly scanning Egyptologists who will interpret glyphically and mythically, until what time I commend thee to Isis and Osiris. At the actual period, Jamblichus in hand, I dose beneath the meridian Sun, on the outstretched shank of Ozymandias, athwart whose hospitable ribs I repose o' nights, making the yellow moon my confidant.

Thus "life may be compared to a stream" (C. L. K.), "or to a pond" (J. S.) You are wrong about Aliduke of the Straight Marches, and right about Sir Bleoberis de Ganis, although Sir Blamore de Ganis was reputed the hardier knight. Thine in sincerity,—PETIPACE OF WINCHELSEA.

POSTSCRIPTUM.—Holmes of Hallow (Hallow the Hole) will be the guest of Button of Birmingham, at the Queen's Hotel, during Festival week. He afterwards, in company with Button, proceeds to Hereford, where, at his accustomed hostelry, The Greyhound, he will be entertained by Giles of Gloucester, Appleford van Applebury of Hereford, and Sir Percy Perry of Worcester. Dame Guenever will be there, also Mr Thaddeus Egg, the big-endian, Egg the younger, the little-endian (self-styled "Lesser Egg,") and—or I am mistaken—King Bagdemagus.—P. of W.

Dolorous Tower, Aug. 25, (City of Lud).

MUNICH.—While Wagnerites are disputing whether Parsifal is adapted for every stage, the question is already decided by a royal order as far as regards our Theatre Royal. Unless anything unforseen should happen, Parsifal will be given on the 12th October. The painters are busy on the moving panorama of the first act.

WAIFS.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—On Thursday at Birmingham, the ballot for places at the festival was held. The applications for tickets for the Wednesday morning performance, when M. Gounod's oratorio will be produced, were nearly 200 in excess of the accommodation available. The actual number of places allotted, is 2,111, as compared with 760 on the corresponding day last festival. There is an appreciable increase also in the applications for places at the Wednesday evening concert. The ballot for the Thursday and Friday performances took place yesterday.

Diaz de Soria is at Cauterets.

Mad Geistinger will shortly visit San Francisco.

Dr Wüllner, of Dresden, lately celebrated his Silver Wedding.

Johann Strauss, with his orchestra, intends making a concert-tour in Italy.

Faccio will again officiate as conductor at the Scala, Milan. (Tanto meglio.—Dr Blitge.)

Charles Tardieu, the musical critic, has been created Knight of the Legion of Honour.

The King and Queen attended the Brussels Musical Festival, on the 20th and 21st inst.

The Musical Society of St Gregory of Belgium held a general meeting at Malines on the 7th inst.

Mrs Osgood is everywhere received with favour in America. Her voice and style are equally admired.

Léo Delibes has written incidental music for the revival of Le Roi s'amuse at the Théâtre-Français.

R. Marenco is commissioned by the Government of the St Marino Republic to write a National Hymn.

Angelo Neumann, with his Nibelungen company, will successively visit Breslau, Königsberg, Dantzic, and Hanover.

The Italian season at the Philharmonie, formerly the Skating Rink, Berlin, has opened with Verdi's Ballo in Maschera.

Insbrücker, of Weimar, is appointed professor of the harp in the Leipsic Conservatory, and will also play at the Gewandhaus.

The Salvator Rosa of Gomez has been given at Pernambuco.—Ferrari has commissioned Gomez to write an opera for the Teatro Colon, Buenos Ayres.

Mdlle Donadio, being indisposed, was unable to take part in the performances at Brescia in honour of Arnaldo, and Mad Bouschi-Chiatti was her substitute.

François Planté the pianist, in conjunction with Colonne's Orchestra, has been giving concerts at Aix-les-Bains. (Qu'il s'y plante définitivement.—Dr Blitge.)

Gustav Reichart, composer of Arndt's song, "Was ist des Deutschen Vaterland," celebrated on the 7th inst. his Golden Wedding. He is in his eighty-sixth year.

A Vermont man took a bean-pole and stirred up a skunk to see what the animal would do. He found out, and then went to a lonely place in the woods to decide what he should do himself.

A temporary theatre, lighted exclusively by 400 Edison lamps, has been erected at Munich, and will be open during the International Exhibition of Electricity next month.

The first performance of Cæsar Cui's opera, The Prisoner of the Caucasus, at St Petersburgh, is announced for November. The work will afterwards be given at Moscow and Tiflis.

Vianesi will be conductor during the Italian operatic season at Nice; principal ladies, Anna de Belocca and Fouquet. (Oh, Anna! Anna! wherefore art thou De Belocca?—Dr Blitge.)

It is said that the nightly expenses of the Nilsson Concert Company during the American tour will be 3,500 dollars. (C'est possible. Et quoi donc? Le monde tournera tout de même.—Dr Blitge.)

It is reported that Maurice Grau has died of yellow fever in Havannah, and that his prima donna, Paola Marié, succeeds him in the management of his French operatic company. (Don't believe it.—Dr Blitge.)

Mdlle Ugalde has been singing in Lecocq's last operetta, Le Jour et la Nuit, at the Théâtre des Galeries Saint-Hubert, Brussels. There is some talk of erecting in Brussels, near the Exchange, a theatre to be called the Elysium.

Joseph Dupont resigns the conductorship at the Monnaie, Brussels, and, at no distant date, proceeds to New York, where he has received an important appointment. (Simply as conductor of the Adelina Patti performances.—Dr Blitge.)

Five prizes consisting of diplomas and artistic bronze medals, to be competed for this year, have been offered by the French Association départementale des Compositeurs de Musique. The works for which prizes are offered are an orchestral overture; a composition for the organ, with pedal, not to take longer than six minutes; a fantasia for military band; a concert-waltz for piano, and a vocal piece, with pianoforte accompaniment, to given words. Only composers in the departments (the Seine excepted) will be allowed to compete.

"Holy Pictures" in Russia.—If the ecclesiastical architecture of Russia appears to a visitor as being the most remarkable of the sights that meet his eye in that assemblage of all that is odd and incongruous, the idols or pictures of saints with which some of them abound and all are supplied must strike an Englishman as certainly the most extraordinary objects which have yet presented themselves to his gaze. The joss-houses of China, the weird and wonderful temples with their idols in India, from Bombay to Delhi, hardly seem to the observer so strange as the holy pictures in the churches of Russia. In Asia we see the results of some very ancient systems of symbols in which the life has gone out, and left a dead form now surrounded with other attributes than it ever possessed when living. Thus we know that the many-armed idol of Brahma simply represented the affinity of his power, by no means pretending to be the portrait of a monster. For all this a little study prepares us; a little reflection helps us to trace the grand ideas of the old primæval faith in the grotesquerie of later Brahminism. But we are not prepared to understand the reduction of Christianity to a level below that of Brahminism. It is, however, instructive to watch the decline of the pure and simple faith of the early Christianity, until we come to the virtual polytheism of the orthodox church.—Builder.

"Harry Croft Hiller is both poet and musician, as shown by five songs, for which he has supplied both words and music. Prettiest of the group is a serenade for a tenor, 'Sweetest slumber now await thee,' which, if sung well, will make a great and favourable impression during the coming out-door season. 'Thy Dear Name' and 'In the Haven' are tender and touching songs, also for tenor voices; the latter is the better and more original of the two. More dashing and spirited are 'The Border Raider,' for a bass voice, and 'The Queen's Shilling,' for a baritone."—Graphic.

"Three songs by Harry Croft Hiller deserve praise, inasmuch as the composer has been successful in writing his own words rather prettily. We like best the serenade, 'Sweetest slumber now await thee.'"—Sunday Times.

FANTAISIE MARZIALE.

MORCEAU DE SALON,
FOR THE PIANOFORTE.
By
LILLIE ALBRECHT.
Price 4s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"'Fantaisie Marziale' is the title of Miss Lillie Albrecht's latest addition to her already numerous list of Morceaux de Salon for the pianoforte. This young lady writes for her instrument almost as well as she performs upon it, and her compositions are invariably characterised by elegance and brilliancy. The present piece is no exception to the rule, but manifests in some respects an advancement in mastery of device and effect that justifies us in encouraging Miss Albrecht to persevere until she can undertake even more weighty tasks. The 'Fantaisie Marziale' comes well within the reach of the ordinary player."—Sunday Times.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

August 26th.

This greatest of musical Festivals, properly so termed, begins its accustomed triennial celebration on the morning of Tuesday next. We say "greatest" advisedly; and with the proud conviction of our amateurs, that England is not the "unmusical country" which certain quidnuncs would fain have us believe, may amplify the phrase, to "greatest" at home or abroad—Germany and the Festivals of the Rhine taken into account. As such, indeed, has it been justly regarded ever since Mendelssohn brought out and conducted the memorable performance of his Elijah on the 26th of August, 1846, and as such, with equal right, esteemed from 1849, when the entire musical direction was invested in the hands of Mr (now Sir Michael) Costa, who has honorably maintained it until now, and whose despotic rule has been used exclusively for good. A detailed history of the rise and progress of the Birmingham Festival would at this time be superfluous. From a comparatively unimportant beginning, more than a century past, (1768), when the first Festival was held in aid of the General Hospital, the profits derived from which enabled the committee to hand over £299 to the fund, it has gradually risen, step by step, to the exceptionally high position it now occupies, benefitting Charity and Art in equal measures. Its contributions to the hospitals are now reckoned by thousands instead of hundreds; and scarcely a meeting is on record the programme of which does not contain some new works, sacred and secular, either written expressly for Birmingham, or—like the Lobgesang, and Pianoforte Concerto in D minor of Mendelssohn (the first conducted the second performed by the great composer himself)—previously unheard among us.

The prospectus of the coming celebration exhibits even a larger variety of attraction than that of 1879. The managing directors, as in honour bound, devote the morning of the first day to Mendelssohn's Elijah. This glorious work, the essence of modern oratorio in its dramatic significance, is unlikely to be superseded, notwithstanding the incessant denunciations of a certain school, whose sworn disciples would gladly put Liszt's Christus in the place of Handel's Messiah—which, going from the New Testament to the Old, would be equivalent to substituting the worship of Baal for that of Jehovah, the prophets of the grove for the ministers of the true religion. Meyerbeer once said of the zealots militant who, since his death, have congregated at the shrine of the Bayreuth Oracle, with Abbé Liszt as recognized chief—"These gentlemen would not only, if it was in their power, commit our works to the fire but our bodies also." Of course, the much-reviled composer of the Huguenots spoke in metaphor, roused by the fierce objurgations of Wagner* and Wagnerians against himself in particular and his Art-manifestations in general. Happily there is little danger for Elijah, which has been given on every occasion at Birmingham since the Festival of 1846, and most probably will be repeated, Festival after Festival, until the first and second Bayreuthiad, with all the attendant hubbub and vain boasting shall have passed into oblivion. A fine—perhaps, in the circumstances, unusually fine—execution of Elijah, with Costa as the animating spirit, may be looked for with undisturbed complacency. Sir Michael was always a staunch Mendelssohnian, as he has triumphantly proved over and over again. On the evening of Tuesday one of the leading promised novelties, in the shape of a secular cantata, entitled Graziella, from the pen of Sir Julius Benedict, will be produced. Graziella was originally intended for the Norwich Festival of last autumn, when, after having been conductor since 1845, Benedict handed over the bâton to Signor Randegger. On the other hand, not to be entirely dissociated from the city for which he had done so much in a musical way, Benedict pledged himself to furnish a new cantata for the occasion, but was prevented by severe and protracted indisposition from completing it in time. Such a treasure was not, however, to be lost to the world of art; and so the Managing Committee of Birmingham, much to their credit, applied for and obtained it for their Festival. Graziella alone will suffice to endow the first evening concert with a special value, and the performance will acquire additional interest from the fact that it is to be superintended by the veteran composer himself. This rule, in fact, applies generally to the new works, which, without exception, will be conducted by their respective composers, Sir Michael Costa limiting his inestimable aid to the known masterpieces and the personal supervision of the entire musical proceedings.

For Wednesday morning we are promised the great novelty of the Festival—M. Gounod's long contemplated oratorio, The Redemption. About this work, its scope and purport, much has already been printed in the columns of our London daily and weekly contemporaries, to say nothing of the Birmingham papers—so much, in short, as to absolve us, even did space permit, from a description in extenso. M. Gounod, nevertheless, who has compiled and edited his own text (the English translation of which, in prose and verse, is due to the Rev. J. Troutbeck) may be allowed to say a word for himself. His work, he tells us, "is a lyrical setting forth of the three great facts on which depends the existence of the Christian Church . . . the Passion and Death of the Saviour; His glorious life on earth, from the Resurrection to the Ascension; and the spread of Christianity through the medium of the Apostles." This trilogy, we are further advised, is preceded by an introduction, or "Prologue," treating of the Creation, the fall of our first parents, and the promise of a Redeemer. In another note M. Gounod informs us that he wrote the words in the winter of 1867-8, at Rome, where he composed two musical pieces only—the "March to Calvary," which opens Part I. of the Trilogy, and the commencement of the first division of the third part ("Pentecost"). Thus some twelve years of a by no means inactive or uneventful career have—with occasional interruptions dependent upon labours in another sphere of Art—been devoted to the consideration and gradual completion of this, M. Gounod's last important effort. Twelve years, however, will not have been unprofitably spent should results justify the high aspiration of the poet-composer. What are the intrinsic merits of The Redemption, what its chances of a success worthy the pen to which we owe Faust, Mireille (that singularly unappreciated opera), Romeo et Juliette, and so many productions of acknowledged distinction, remains for proof. M. Gounod himself is said to regard it as the work of his life, the work upon which he relies for the perpetuation of his name; and this alone should weigh materially in the balance. All we can add just now is, that in form and spirit it is quite original, differing in these essentials from any and every "oratorio," so called, with which we are acquainted. For the actual (we do not presume to say the final) test we must look to the performance next Tuesday in Birmingham Town Hall.

To the remaining advertised novelties a bare allusion must at present suffice. Foremost among them may be named a new secular cantata by Herr Niels Gade, "worthiest of worthy Danes," as he has been styled, whose merit, discovered by the always observant Mendelssohn in 1843, was soon generally recognized, and who has laboured earnestly since then to verify what Mendelssohn predicted—with what success it remains for connoisseurs to decide. The favourable reception awarded to Gade's sacred cantata, Zion, at the Festival of 1876, and to his Crusaders in 1879, justifies a hope that his Psyche, which is to engross the first part of Thursday evening's concert, may be entitled to an equal measure of praise. That the subject of this cantata is built upon the beautiful Greek myth of Psyche and Eros will be readily divined. Yet another important novelty is a sacred cantata entitled The Holy City, the composition of a talented local musician, who has drawn his materials, with the exception of two hymns and a verse from Milton ("List the Cherubin Host in Thousand Choirs"), entirely from Scripture, and to a certain extent from Revelations. The choice of this work has afforded more than ordinary satisfaction to the Birmingham people, by whom Mr Gaul is highly esteemed. Add to the foregoing a new orchestral symphony in G major by Mr Hubert Parry, so well beholden at the Crystal Palace, together with an orchestral serenade in the same key by Mr Villiers Stanford, no less highly rated by the lovers of good music at Cambridge, and it must be admitted that new compositions are rather the rule than the exception. That in other respects the programme should be made attractive depended exclusively upon Sir Michael Costa, who, as usual, has justified the confidence reposed in him. We have no room left for details, but may simply mention that while the imperishable Messiah holds the place of honour on Thursday morning, Beethoven's Mount of Olives, Mozart's incomparable G minor symphony, Mr. F. H. Cowen's graceful Suite de Ballet (The Language of Flowers), Cherubini's superb Mass in C major, No. 4, recommended, we understand, by that erudite musician and admirable critic, Mr. Henry Lincoln, and other good things of their kind too numerous to specify, are comprised in the general arrangements. With the same experienced chief in control, it need scarcely be added that a numerous orchestra, chosen from the most practised executants (M. Sainton leading violin) has been secured. About the magnificent chorus, inseparable from the Birmingham Festivals, it is unnecessary to say a word. The list of solo singers, including Mesdames Albani and Marie Roze, Misses E. Farnol and Anna Williams (sopranos), Mesdames Patey and Trebelli (contraltos), Messrs E. Lloyd, W. H. Cummings, and Joseph Maas (tenors), Messrs Santley, F. King, and Foli (basses), is as powerful and efficient as could be desired. Mr Stockley, according to custom, is chorus-master (an abler it would be difficult to find), and the veteran Mr Stimpson, organist. We should have stated that The Redemption is not only to be given on Wednesday morning, but a second time on Friday evening. From all credited accounts the Birmingham Festival of 1882 promises to be one of the most successful on record.—Graphic.

Birmingham, Sunday.

Three years ago, when the festival of that date was in progress here, it became my duty, and the duty of others discharging the same functions, to sound a note of warning and censure. The great musical solemnity of which we are all proud manifested symptoms of weakness and decay. There was obvious in its management a lack of enterprise and vigour, and, in other respects, a tendency to fall below the high standard applicable to an institution so exalted in character and claims. On all hands amateurs regretted this; protested against it; and asked, not whether a remedy would be applied at all, because Birmingham is a practical place, but when it would be applied and in how drastic a fashion it would operate. We were not kept long in suspense. Birmingham went to work after a mode characteristically thorough. It simply revolutionised the management of the festival, bowing out this and that "minister," and bringing new blood into the cabinet, pledged to vigorous action, and committed to salutary reforms. The full effect of the change we do not yet see, though the next few days will show it. But even now it is impossible to look at the programme of the Festival which begins on Tuesday next and not discern that another era in the history of the institution has opened. Six new works of importance surely present the fact in a light strong enough for the dimmest vision. After this the rest may be taken for granted, and word may go forth that the Birmingham Festival is itself again.

One of the novelties—M. Gounod's oratorio, Redemption—has already been noticed in our columns, and little of a preliminary nature remains to be said about it. The work was fully rehearsed yesterday afternoon under its famous composer's direction, with most satisfactory results; M. Gounod describing the execution as "marvellous," and the amateurs present applying terms hardly less complimentary to the music. How far justice was done in either case is a matter for future consideration; but there can be no doubt at all that the new oratorio is exciting an enormous amount of interest. This may be best shown by absolutely truthful figures. The number of places taken in advance for the Wednesday morning of the Festival week three years ago, including presidents' and vice-presidents' tickets, was 759; the number allotted for next Wednesday morning, when Redemption will be given, is 2,111. The oratorio is set down for Friday evening also, and not a disengaged place remains in the hall; while a considerable number of applications have perforce been declined. This is unprecedented in the history of the Birmingham or any other Festival, and not only shows the power of M. Gounod's name, but justifies the enterprise which purchased his new work at an unexampled outlay. May it not do something more, and demonstrate the continued partiality of the English public for oratorio? I question much whether an opera by M. Gounod would excite one-half of the interest now shown in his Redemption, armed with which he comes before our people, preferring the most effectual claim upon their good graces. As an instance, I may state that arrangements have already been made to produce the work in London, Bristol, Brighton, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, Wolverhampton, and, across the Atlantic, in Toronto. Taking the other novelties in the order of the programme, Sir Julius Benedict's cantata, Graziella, first claims attention. In this the veteran composer is associated with Mr Henry Hersee, and librettist and musician between them have produced what appears, on the short acquaintance as yet possible, a bright, interesting, and attractive piece. Graziella, as amateurs may remember, was originally intended for the Norwich Festival of last year, but could not be got ready in time. The loss of East Anglia will doubtless prove the gain of the Midlands; and in any case the presence of Sir Julius Benedict at Birmingham as the author of a new work thoroughly accords with the fitness of things. Graziella, announced for next Tuesday evening, will be followed, on Wednesday evening, by a sacred cantata, The Holy City, composed by Mr Gaul, a highly esteemed local musician, whose name is widely known as the composer of some excellent part-songs, anthems, &c. Mr Gaul's opportunity is a great one; that he may prove worthy of it must be desired by everybody who wishes well to English music. We cannot afford a single check along the happily advancing line of native art. An orchestral serenade in four movements, by Mr Villiers Stanford, is set down for performance with The Holy City. Of this work the best hopes are entertained, for reasons other than the fact that its composer has already achieved distinguished successes. Whenever rehearsed, the serenade makes friends among the many who still love music that is intelligible and pleasing as well as ambitious. On Thursday evening, Psyche, a cantata by Herr Niels Gade, will afford the well-known Danish composer another opportunity of winning English applause. The success of Herr Gade's Crusaders and Zion has not been forgotten here. His popularity is great, and public opinion prophesied a triumph for the new piece. On this point let figures speak. The number of places secured for the Thursday evening in 1879 was 799; the number taken for next Thursday evening is 1,453. Here we have an absolutely unerring test of the interest excited by Herr Gade's name and work. But this result was to be anticipated, since the protégé of Mendelssohn and Schumann holds no mean, unhonoured place in European art. He has fairly earned the right to speak anywhere, and to be heard with the attention which a master may claim. A symphony, in G major, by Mr Hubert Parry, figures in the same programme with Psyche. This composer scarcely needs an introduction to any English audience. His name at least is known as that of a musician of large views as to his individual calling in art. He writes ambitiously, and with boldness as well as persistence in the particular style he has chosen. It would, of course, be premature to discuss his new symphony. Enough, now, that it is a work of great dimensions and much difficulty, and that it could only have been composed at a proportionate expenditure of time and labour. Mr Parry is certainly not afraid of such criticism as that passed by the Emperor Joseph on one of Mozart's operas—"There are too many notes in it."

Turning to the works which are not novelties, the Messiah and Elijah are found in their accustomed places. Birmingham cannot yet afford to ignore those immortal masterpieces, and would not if it could. They are like pillars which give stability to the musical edifice, and they serve as a standard of judgment in sacred art. Elijah, as the child of Birmingham—a child of whom the parent is proud and fond—will always be safe here, even when the attraction of novelty, as in the present case, lessens somewhat the number of applications for seats. In 1879 1,958 places were allotted, whereas now only 1,243 are taken. But not an empty chair need be feared. The great army of half-guinea amateurs in waiting outside will enter and fill them all. Other selections, more or less known, are Brahms's Triumphlied, Cherubini's Fourth Mass, Beethoven's Mount of Olives, Mozart's Symphony in G minor, and the overtures to William Tell, Siege of Corinth, and Benvenuto Cellini. In addition, a number of vocal pieces intended for the display of individual skill rather than presented for their musical interest, diversify the evening programmes. Looking at the scheme as a whole it must be pronounced thoroughly good. I do not see in what respect improvement is possible.

The executive resources of the Festival are on the usual scale, and include a magnificent orchestra of 142 performers, with the veteran chef d'attaque, Sainton, at their head. Of this large number, 108 are "strings" unmatched in Europe for tone and ability. The Birmingham "quartet," so long renowned, is assuredly not going to forfeit its character on the present occasion, nor will the "wind" prove unworthy to bear it company, as the names of Messrs Svendsen, Barrett, Dubrucq, Horton, Lazarus, Snelling, Wotton, Haveron, Harper, Mann, Webster, Hughes, and Hawes amply guarantee. The chorus numbers 362, and is of splendid quality—beyond question the best that the able and indefatigable chorus-master, Mr Stockley, has had in hand for many years past. The voices are young and fresh, of excellent timbre, and perfectly trained to their work. As for the principal vocalists a mention of their names will suffice. They are Mdme Albani, Mdme Marie Roze, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Farnol, Mdme Patey, Mdme Trebelli, Mr E. Lloyd, Mr Cummings, Mr Maas, Mr Santley, Mr F. King, and Signor Foli. Mr Stimpson occupies his usual place at the organ, and last, yet very far indeed from least, Sir Michael Costa sits in the conductor's seat, as he has done at every Birmingham Festival for nearly forty years. I am told, and can well believe it, that Sir Michael's reception by his band and chorus has been enthusiastic in the extreme. Enthusiastic also is the greeting that awaits him at the hands of the public, because, mingled with admiration for his great abilities and respect for long service, will be thankfulness that health and vigour are so far restored as to enable him to undertake duties none other could discharge so well. I may add that the prospects of the Festival are everything its friends could wish. The number of seats already secured exceeds by 2,995 the total applied for at the corresponding date three years ago. This means progress in its most substantial form.

Tuesday.

"The French came at me in the old-fashioned way, and in the old-fashioned way I beat them off." Thus said Wellington when once describing the pounding match we call the Battle of Waterloo.

Digitized by Google

In the old-fashioned way began the festival this morning, as it has begun any time these thirty-six years, and as it will begin for generations to come. The weather was not entirely favourable. Rain fell heavily during the night, and threatened to encore itself in the morning. But this Festival, more than any other, is independent of the Meteorological Office. It might rain proverbial "cats and dogs" without emptying a seat in the Town Hall; especially when Elijah is the theme. Birmingham, as I have already said, takes pride in its relationship to the greatest sacred work of our century. Moreover, there can be no neglect of Mendelssohn's masterpiece without risking a charge of base ingratitude, and that is not at all in the way of the great Midland Town. Elijah is the grandest emblazonment on the Festival banner, and Elijah may almost be considered as the battle-cry of its champions. In my last letter I ventured upon a prophecy. I said that, although the applications for numbered (guinea) seats had fallen off in presence of such a novelty as Gounod's Redemption, the half-guinea public were ready to come in and fill the hall. My anticipation was not far wrong. Nearly every seat in the spacious building had its occupant this morning, and the old excitement, born of a time when Mendelssohn's work was less familiar than now, seemed to be reproduced. After all, the heart of our amateurs is sound on the question of good music. It refuses faith in the doctrine of bluster and incoherence, and opposes a steady resistance to those who would throw down its classic idols and place above the altar

> "A monster of such hideous mien,
> That to be hated needs but to be seen."

I rejoice to add that the performance of Elijah was worthy of its character and of the esteem in which it is held—worthy, too, of the old Birmingham reputation, not long ago for a moment imperilled. I can only compare it, taken altogether, to the performance of 1876, undeniably the best within recent memory.

The arrangements in and around the Town Hall were excellent, as usual. Everything moved like clockwork, and by the time Sir Michael Costa appeared on the platform the audience were in their places almost to a man. Nothing could have been better. It was the perfection of discipline all round, whether discipline imposed or self-imposed. In this matter the President, Lord Windsor, set a good example; upon which, let me here add, he improved by declining to use his prerogative as the sole fountain of honour in the shape of encores. Nothing was repeated, however much, according to the ordinary standard, it deserved the compliment. Let Lord Windsor go on as he has begun, and set a precedent of inestimable value. Sir Michael Costa's reception could not have been warmer. The audience cheered him with something like a personal expression of friendliness, but were outdone by the band and chorus, whose volleys of applause, as he turned to face them, rang through the hall again and again. Sir Michael's arrangement of "God save the Queen" opened the proceedings as usual, and in the customarily effective way. A more imposing ensemble heart could not desire; the perfect quality and balance of the orchestra being equalled by the quality and balance of a chorus which, as I have before said, is the best that Birmingham has produced for many a year. The sopranos sang their solo verse literally like one voice, and that the voice of an artist. Preliminaries over, Mr. Santley, as the almost unique English representative of Israel's great prophet, declaimed the opening recitative, and Elijah proceeded on its triumphant way. I am not going, number by number, through the great dramatic oratorio, but it is both just and necessary to point out the more remarkable successes of the performance, to which every one engaged more or less contributed. The band and chorus were superb, with hardly a moment's exception from first to last. They knew their theme, they loved it, and the result followed as of course. Amateurs will need no help in fixing upon the numbers which made the greatest effect. They have in mind the dramatic series of Baal choruses, the glorious "Thanks be to God," the tenderly beautiful "He watching over Israel," the splendidly descriptive "Behold, God the Lord passed by," and the majestic finale. The solos were taken, as to the first part, by Miss Anna Williams, Mdme Trebelli, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Santley; while in the second part Mdme Albani replaced the soprano, and Mdme Patey the contralto. Details of the work done by these artists are entirely needless; nevertheless, "honour to whom honour"—honour especially to Mr Santley, whose Prophet continues, as for years it has been, the most finished creation in oratorio. Our favourite baritone never invested the part with greater intellectual or emotional significance than was the case this morning, and, so far as concerned his share in the work, the "argument" of Elijah stood out like that which a noon-day sun illuminates. Mdme Albani, in grand voice, made her mark with "Hear ye, Israel;" Miss Anna Williams gave special effect to the music of the Shunammite woman; and Mdme Patey once more showed the range of her powers by declaiming the part of Jezebel like a great tragic actress, and singing "O rest in the Lord" like an angel. Mr Lloyd's excellence may be imagined. The two beautiful tenor airs in Elijah are never sung by him without creating an impression that they are his peculiar property. Let congratulation, finally, be offered to Sir Michael Costa, who conducted with surprising energy and watchfulness. He was in his old form, and what that means no musical reader requires to be told. So was the Festival inaugurated; and, as though to mark their appreciation, the audience, on retiring, contributed over a thousand pounds to the General Hospital, for which noble charity the Festival exists.

The chief work in the evening's programme was Sir Julius Benedict's dramatic cantata, Graziella, poem by Mr Henry Hersee, who has spared his critics the necessity of making any reference to Lamartine, and permitted them to judge the libretto as, in essential respects, an independent thing. I am told that Graziella was originally intended for stage representation, and can well believe the report, since Mr Hersee has resorted to devices which, if somewhat familiar in opera, are never ineffective. Almost of course, we have the convent bell, and a chorus of nuns with organ accompaniment; besides which, there is a love token to give decent excuse for an occasional ballad. But the dramatic structure of the poem favours the work as a cantata, imparts to it life and vigour, and secures a fuller measure of personal interest in aid of the interest which is artistic. Graziella is divided into three parts, with five dramatis personæ—to wit, Graziella, a fisher maiden (soprano); an Abbess (contralto); Renzo, a young fisherman (tenor); Alonzo, a young Venetian noble (baritone); and Gennaro, Graziella's father (bass). The action takes place at a fishing village in the Island of Procida, and one "set" serves for all three scenes. It shows "Cottage of Gennaro at back. Gable-end porch of Convent, R. Glimpse of the Sea, L." Upon this the curtain rises what time the villagers have gathered together after their day's labour. The work opens with a short andantino for orchestra, followed by an extended chorus, descriptive of the rest and peace of evening, and the joys of dance and song. Sir Julius naturally divides this into two parts, very different in style and character, but asserting with equal conclusiveness the veteran composer's complete mastery of his theme. Grace and vigour distinguish the first, "See, with slow majestic motion," and almost youthful vivacity the second, "Linger not, the red wine quaffing." In neither case is there any straining after effect, the structure of the music being simplicity itself. But a master can afford to be simple. A more remarkable feature, perhaps, is the unflagging animation of the long-drawn chorus, which very plainly declares that the natural force of Sir Julius Benedict has not abated. At the close of the exordium dramatic action begins with the approach of Graziella, whose "loveliness fair," as we learn from an incidental remark of the chorus, is worshipped by Renzo, "though doomed to despair." Graziella is the conventional, careless-hearted heroine of so many operas, and enters with a "La, la, la," of the approved type. At once the chorus come to business—not their own—demanding why she refuses the "heart of gold" that Renzo persists in offering. Graziella vouchsafes an answer. She has doubts concerning men, and prefers to be free; but it will not do, apparently, to say this in so many words. The time has come for a full statement, and the maiden makes it in "Lovers' vows with honey laden," a song modelled strictly upon the English opera type, and, if not of great musical interest, sufficiently expressive. This would appear to be followed by a dance, as a movement, tempo di tarantella, begins, but is interrupted at the tenth bar, by an agitated allegro, above which the voice of Graziella presently rises, exclaiming that her father's boat has struck upon the rocks, and demanding help. The chorus—although the main was "laughing" just now—prudently observe "None but a madman would endeavour, To launch a boat in such a sea," and thus excuse themselves. In despair Graziella turns to Renzo: "Thou hast often spoken of love for me; save my father, and I am thine." The young man is not surprised beyond caution. "Give me thy cross as true love's token." He receives the bauble and rushes off. The rescue follows, watched by all on the stage, though invisible to us; watched, moreover, by the nuns, for the convent bell begins to toll, and the pious women are heard chanting a "Miserere," to which the villagers respond, while Graziella keeps all informed as to the progress of Renzo's venture. At length the cry, "My father's saved," makes further prayer needless, and the incident ends with "three cheers for Renzo." The musical treatment of this dramatic scene is noticeable for sustained, yet somewhat tempered vigour. There is no tearing a passion to tatters on the one hand, nor any feeling of tameness on the other. True, the reply of the chorus when Graziella asks for help is measured in character, but the composer intends here, perhaps, to contrast the indifference of an uninterested spectator with the keen emotions of one who has much at stake. The "Miserere" scene may fairly be described as powerful. Its structure is somewhat elaborate, and the difficulties of its composition were assuredly not lessened by the introduction of the bell, which sounds the key-note twice in every bar. Sir Julius, however, is too good a musician to be in the slightest degree embarrassed by his own plans, and the ensemble claims rank among distinct successes. Her father rescued, Graziella is expressing joy and thankfulness, when Renzo and Gennaro enter, accompanied by Alonzo, disguised as a poor student. Graziella at once acquaints her father with the claim Renzo has upon her, thus leading up to an ensemble, in which—after approved operatic style—each person depicts his or her individual feeling against the background of a less lively emotion common to the chorus. Graziella is thankful, Renzo rapturous, Gennaro paternal, Alonzo love-sick, and the chorus sympathetic. The piece is solidly constructed, huge masses of vocal harmony filling each page from the entrance of the chorus, not unrelieved, however, by the lighter play of the orchestra, and the charm of true melodic phrases.

At the opening of the second scene, Alonzo informs us that he lingers at Procida, "held captive by the wondrous loveliness of matchless Graziella," and prays that she may yet be his. A song of course follows—one which will fulfil its intended purpose and be often heard apart from the cantata. There is nothing in the work more simple and tuneful than "When first this lonely shore I sought," or more certain of wide popularity. The song ended, Graziella enters, and Alonzo proceeds to urge his suit, first of all, with due appreciation of feminine weakness, declaring that he is not "a student of humble parentage," but "in truth the Count Lavagna." Here the librettist has a surprise in store. We expect Graziella to recall the vow that binds her to Renzo, but not to admit a moment later that her heart, if it were free, would be Alonzo's. This state of things is fairly sprung upon us, as upon Renzo himself, who happens to overhear what is said. Alonzo, about to go away despairing, stops to lead off a trio in which he pleads, "Think of me sometimes when the sun sinks in the western ocean"; Graziella on her part promises to breathe his name at that particular time of day; while poor Renzo, thrilling with "wild commotion," anticipates flight from the ruin of his hopes; all three presently looking forward to a better meeting in the "blissful realms above." This trio is one of the finest numbers the work contains, being admirably written, full of expression, and bearing on every page the stamp of truly artistic taste. At its close, Alonzo is about to depart when Renzo steps from his hiding-place to say, in the most obliging manner, that as he cannot have Graziella's heart he will not have her hand, preferring to seek death on the battle-field. In this spirit he formally releases the heroine from her vow, and, while the orchestra gives out the melody used when the cross was asked for, he generously observes, "As Alonzo's wife may'st thou glide smiling down the stream of life." Naturally the lovers are grateful, and go away happy, leaving Renzo to take the cross from his breast and be moved by it to song. "The shipwrecked heart" is a ballad intended to come out of the cantata, and will probably answer its purpose sufficiently well, though it does not invite particular observation here. Gennaro now enters, learns from Renzo what has happened, and grants his most disinterested prayer that the wedding of Graziella and Alonzo might take place. But the consent of the Count's mother must first be obtained, and she lives in Venice. The agreeable young fisherman, equal to anything, offers to accompany Gennaro thither before seeking death as aforesaid. This brings on a quartet for the principal characters, after which the scene closes with a sailors' chorus, "Up with the anchor." The quartet—"Sweet Graziella, while away"—will doubtless be popular, since it contains some of the composer's most agreeable and, at the same time, most artistic music. Very different in style, but equal in merit, is the sailor's chorus, with episodes for male and female voices separately, followed by a grand ensemble full of spirit and "go." This piece affords another example of the energy that characterizes so much of the cantata, and puts to shame many works by far younger men.

At the opening of the last scene Graziella is about to take the veil, and we gather that, the Count's mother having refused consent to the marriage, Alonzo has released his betrothed from her engagement. Introduced here is an orchestral theme which originally accompanied Alonzo's entreaty, "Think of me," in the trio of the second act. A revulsion of feeling now takes place in the maiden's breast. She despises Alonzo, but dwells fondly upon the memory of Renzo, who has perished on the battle-field, with her silver cross at his heart. The cross has been returned to her, and she invokes it as a "pure token of self-sacrificing love." Sir Julius has not made an elaborate scena of all this, though the temptation to do so was great, and precedent would have more than justified the step. The movements are short, but what they lack in dimension they make up in expressiveness and beauty, thus leaving no consciousness of shortcoming. In striking contrast is the music of the abbess, whose voice is now heard, calling Graziella to peace and rest. The Abbess's song, "Our lives are like the stormy ocean," is, in a musical sense, elegantly written, and capable of profound expression in the hands of a genuine artist. A duet of leave-taking between Gennaro and his daughter follows, but the somewhat flagging dramatic interest is more completely revived when Alonzo enters, declaring that all obstacles have been removed, and claiming his bride. For answer he hears "Too late," and that is nearly all. With well-nigh comic promptitude the lover subsides; a simple chorus of nuns, "We await thee, gentle maiden," points to Graziella's assured fate, and a finale, "Every earthly tie resigning," in which the four solo voices are combined with a full chorus, brings the work to an end. This peroration, the closing section of which repeats the theme of the nuns' chorus, is not the least effective part of the work. Its broad phrases and massive harmonies give dignity and emphasis precisely where those qualities are demanded.

A large, although by no means crowded audience attended the performance of Graziella, and gave upon the question of its merits a verdict which must have satisfied the composer. It would, however, be too much to say that the cantata is one of the best things his facile and elegant pen has given us. Sir Julius cannot write bad, or even indifferent music; against the notion of such a possibility his whole artistic life protests. But he is not always in the same vein, and parts of Graziella are scored with less than the master's usual taste, while others show him labouring with qualified success to rise above the region of ordinary ideas. At the same time it would be most unjust to make him entirely responsible. There is a measure in which a workman depends upon the materials supplied him, and, sooth to say, the story of Graziella is common-place in incident, and told in language which, while it might be good enough for an opera libretto, as those things go, scarcely comes up to the requirements of a cantata. Such imperfections as the work contains may, nevertheless, be overlooked out of consideration for its undoubted merits. The performance was directed by the composer, whose appearance in his place elicited applause all the more hearty for the congratulations it conveyed upon his restoration to health after a temporary illness. That Graziella received entire justice at the hands of its executants cannot be said. Several faults of a serious nature marred the effect, and there appeared to be some lack of familiarity with the music and the composer's requirements. On the other hand, excellence was not wanting, such excellence as no force of circumstances could withdraw from the principals, band, and chorus, engaged here. The solos were taken by Mdme Marie Roze (Graziella), Mdme Patey (Abbess), Mr Lloyd (Renzo), Mr King (Alonzo), and Mr Campion (Zennaro). In such hands they were safe, and the audience applauded one and all, demanding an encore for the "Shipwrecked Heart" (Mr Lloyd), and "Our lives are like the stormy ocean" (Mdme Patey). No less honourable, if less honoured, were Mr King's delivery of "When first this lonely shore I sought," and Mdme Roze's execution of "Lover's vows." At the close Sir Julius received hearty applause from every part of the hall. The second part of the programme contained a number of miscellaneous selections, conspicuous amongst which were Mr F. H. Cowen's Language of the Flowers, "Deeper and deeper still," capitally sung by Mr Maas, and warmly applauded, "Ocean, thou mighty monster" (Miss Anna Williams), and the overture to Benvenuto Cellini.—*D. LEIPSIC.—Stägemann has been the first to carry out Hans von Wolzogen's suggestion that not only Wagner's friends but the artists and others connected with the various theatres of Germany should co-operate in securing the repetition at stated intervals of the Bayreuth performances. The gist of the suggestion is the formation of a committee who shall call on all the artists to contribute to the necessary fund, and Herr Stägemann has headed the list with the cash receipts of a performance of Lohengrin at the Stadttheater on the 14th ult.

THE ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA.—A company has been organized under the above title, by Mr T. H. Friend, for the performance of opera in English in the chief musical centres of England. Among the artists already secured are Mesdames Rose Hersee, Philippine Siedle, Blanche Cole, Helen Armstrong, and O. Summers; Messrs F. C. Packard, W. Parkinson, Faulkner Leigh, Purdon, C. Lyall, James Sauvage, R. Temple, Gilbert King, E. Harrison, and Aynsley Cook. Conductors: Messrs Arthur Howell and Julian Edwards. Principal dancers: the sisters Annie and T. Elliott. A special arrangement is being made with Mr Joseph Maas for a series of performances. Mr Friend has acquired the sole right of performance of the Rattenfänger von Hameln, a work which has had an unprecedented success in Germany. The libretto has been rendered into English by Mr H. Hersee.

PROTAGORAS.

Good morrow, to your Majesty!
A brief repose I'm taking,
The Music of the Future gives One's nerves a fearful shaking.

HERMOGENES.

Allow me, ir, this hint to give
By way of pleasing duty:
The mind alone that feels its power
Can gauge its mystic beauty.

PROTAGORAS.

Can beauty be allied to noise
That splits the air asunder,
With discord loud between each crash
Of vile chromatic thunder?

HERMOGENES.

'Tis ignorance that prompts thy speech,
While prejudice doth blind thee;
If thou wouldst rise to heights sublime,
These dead-weights cast behind thee.

PROTAGORAS.

To heights sublime I love to soar,
Where all is cloudless beauty,
But when confined to chimney pots,
One gets a little sooty.

HERMOGENES.

For such a wretched state of mind
As shown by your invective,
Go learn the Trilogy by rote,
'Twill prove a good corrective.

PROTAGORAS.

Invert Parnassus like a cone,
I'd rather scale its summit
Than undertake the hopeless task
Of trying e'en to hum it.

HERMOGENES.

Within the pure domain of Art,
Where reigns our mighty Prophet,
The stern decree is signed and sealed
That sends you all to Tophet.

PROTAGORAS.

To Tophet! say you. Ah, your Muse
From thence has late ascended;
You swear 'tis false—unsheath your sword,
I'm ready to defend it.

HERMOGENES.

Fui Teufel! No—thou Philistine,
To England, pray, meander;
And cackle over Parsifal,
Like some poor silly gander.

PROTAGORAS.

Ha! Parsifal !—that little nut
Proved hardly worth the cracking;
Though "D. T." cracked it fairly well,
With Hanslick's timely backing.

HERMOGENES.

Ho! ho! he! he! you're all at sea;
Don't fancy such small thunder
Can exorcise the mighty power
From this, our latest wonder.

PROTAGORAS.

If so, perhaps you'll tell me why
You sit as judge and jury,
And try to bolster up your cause
With blatant sound and fury?

HERMOGENES.

The Music of the Future needs
No help like that you mention;
'Tis evident your friends should see
About your safe detention.

PROTAGORAS.

Of course I'm mad, and you are sane,
I'm blind, but you are gifted;
But tell me what's the residue
When Parsifal is sifted?

HERMOGENES.

Sift Parsifal ! Go, reach the stars
In all their radiant splendour,
There, sift the music of the spheres,
And Parsifal you'll render.

PROTAGORAS.

How's that for high! My modest chum,
Let's reach the stars together;
We then can count them one by one,
And string them on a tether.

HERMOGENES.

You ridicule. But come, your hand,
In this there's no deception,
Let Parsifal on English ground
Soon have a warm reception.

PROTAGORAS.

Aye, aye, ja wohl!—so very warm
That it may lose its flavour;
Those English have a way, you know,
Of treating such palāver.

HERMOGENES.

Poor England! let her now forsake
The strains akin to madness,
The Music of the Future comes
To flood her shores with gladness.

PROTAGORAS.

Avaunt! "Pure Fool"—to Kundry hence,
Thy Muse—its glare and glitter,
Compared with all the mighty Past
Is only sparrows' twitter.

A May-dream.

You came with swallows from the sea,
You came with poppies from the sun,
You came with many songs for me
—Your name was one.

Between the setting of the sun,
And the far stars so clear to see,
You came. But when the night was done
You went from me.

With neither sigh nor smile for me,
You went away when night was done,
Among the stars that fade and flee
Before the sun.

Parsifal, that feeble drama but thankful opera-libretto, furnishes proof of its right to the latter designation in the fact that it affords the composer as well as the singers, the scene-painter as well as the designer of the costumes and the machinist, abundant scope for showing their capability of accomplishing new and difficult tasks. And more brilliant than anywhere else must the result of their combined exertions be in the ideally constructed Theatre here, under the uninterrupted guidance of Richard Wagner himself, the first stage-manager in the world. This was shown by the first two performances, which took place on the 26th and 28th July, with a different cast each time. The place of honour among the artists belongs to Mdme Materna. It would do so, even were what she has done as Kundry of less importance than it really is, for no other name is so closely identified with the existence and prosperity of the Bayreuth Festival Performance as that of Amalie Materna, the first fair honorary burgess in the Wahnfried realm. Without her unexampled strength and devotion to her task as Brunhilde, the triple Cycle of the Nibelungen Tetralogy in 1876 would have been an impossibility. We expressed at the time, simultaneously with our admiration, our apprehension lest the popular favourite might perhaps pay for her success with the premature deterioration of her voice. Her Kundry has completely tranquillized us and for a long time to come. Not only has Mdme Materna lost nothing since the Bayreuth campaign of 1876, but she has gained something, something precious, something still beyond the reach even of the "Master" himself: Moderation. The consciousness of inexhaustible vocal powers easily leads artists of swelling strength and passionate temperament into exaggeration, and our operatic friends in Vienna know that, like others, Mdme Materna often emancipated herself too much both in her singing and acting. It has been only of late years that her Fidelio, Donna Anna, and Aïda impressed the public not merely by powerful fervour, but also by more dignified artistic reticence. A still more surprising proof of the command she has gained over herself was afforded by her Kundry, a part which absolutely challenges glaring exaggeration of its unnatural musical and dramatic contrasts. Mdme Materna did not allow herself to be led away; even in all the consciousness and pride of strength she never became ungovernable. Nay, it was in the soft, coaxing passages of her great scene with Parsifal that her voice sounded more especially beautiful. Her effective vocal performance was accompanied all through by the most careful working out of the histrionic details. Musically speaking, it is only in the second act that the part is exceptionally important and strains the artist's powers to exhaustion; in the first act, Kundry has little to sing, and in the third, nothing at all. All the more important is here, therefore, her dumb show, genuine bravura airs of mimetics and action, such as have never before been required from a singer. Not only did Mdme Materna surpass expectation by her singing in the second act, but by her silence in the third. No one will ever succeed in getting rid of what is contradictory, unnatural, and repulsive in Kundry; but Mdme Materna succeeds in elevating and rendering it highly effective. There is only one opinion as to the brilliant merit of her performance. After Mdme Materna, the next place belongs to Herr Reichmann as Amfortas. An entrancingly sonorous and sweet voice, a style full of feeling, and dignified acting, combined to bring about a perfect result. Thanks to Reichmann, the character of the sick and suffering King, who never braces himself up for dramatic effect till the end of the piece, becomes important and sympathetic. Again may Vienna congratulate itself on possessing such an artist. Herr Scaria is an admirable Gurnemanz, if only for his plain enunciation even of the smallest syllable, an inestimable quality where Wagnerianly garrulous old men are concerned. His trembling and tottering, as indicative of age, in the third act, however, do not strike us as exactly in accord with the dignity of the part: Gurnemanz ought to have grown very old, but not to have sunk down into second childhood. Herr Winkelmann, Parsifal, was very satisfactory in the first act, but, in the second, took unfortunately to shouting, and did not get out of it till the third. Herr Hill, the bass, from Schwerin, sang the magician, Klingsor, with a powerful voice and great stage self-possession; the mannered pronunciation of this singer, who frequently vocalizes incorrectly, for the sake of volume of tone, is something to which one may gradually grow accustomed. The small part of Titurel, which, however, has an important share in the plot, was in the experienced hands of Herr Kindermann. That ever-green veteran will, like a second Titurel, sing, and sing well, too, in the grave. At the second performance, Herren Reichmann, Hill, and Kindermann, retained their characters; but Kundry, Parsifal, and Gurnemanz, were cast differently. Mdlle Marie Brandt, as Kundry, was the clever actress and admirably trained singer, whom we learned to esteem so highly from the engagement she played in Vienna. Her long, thin figure, and a peculiar hollow sound in her voice, were extraordinarily well adapted to the wild and weird sorceress of the first act. The passages, also, where, rising through the ground, in the bluish light before Klingsor, she has to sing, shriek, laugh, and whimper, she gave most splendidly. In short, she was unsurpassably good in everything supernatural and ghost-like in the part. For the great love and seduction scene in the second act she possesses all the requisites of art, but not of nature. Even if the spectator were to leave out of consideration her personal appearance, which is not quite appropriate here, he would be constantly reminded of the insufficiency of her vocal means. At first, however, Mdlle Brandt pleased the house by her clear and delicate exposition of the narrative portion; but, on the other hand, it was only with the utmost effort that she could master the following great scene, where, in continuous high notes, the feelings are strained well nigh beyond endurance. Herr Gudehus was an excellent Parsifal, both in his singing and acting; his voice sounded fresher than Winkelmann's, but, like Winkelmann's, was disagreeably forced in the strong passages of the second act. We believe that more might be made of Parsifal, and both Winkelmann and Gudehus will one day see their way to it. Herr Siehr's Gurnemanz deserves unconditional praise. This admirable bass, whom our readers must remember with the liveliest satisfaction from a successful engagement he fulfilled in Vienna, raised the part, which is distinguished for its length rather than for being vocally thankful, by the power of his tremendous bass voice, sonorous even in its lowest notes, and by the warmth and genuine musical quality of his delivery. Simple and dignified in bearing, he avoided even in the third act falling out of the style of the "Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play" by a too realistic pourtrayal of feeble old age. What the solo singers did, combined with the equally admirable efforts of the chorus and orchestra to form an irreproachable whole. The Flower-Maidens' Chorus requires the voices to work together with unusual precision. It had been splendidly got up. The same applies to the choruses in the Hall of the Gralsburg, which were attended with serious difficulties on account of the number of boys' voices taking part in it, and of the distance separating the three groups of singers from each other. The orchestra from the Munich Opera valiantly maintained, under the Royal Capellmeister, Herr Levy, its high reputation. The lowering of the orchestra, one of Wagner's most beneficial reforms, again proved an excellent arrangement, inasmuch as the voices were never drowned. But the pernicious exaggeration of an expedient so correct in principle, exaggeration which not only very much lowered the orchestra, but absolutely covered it in with a tin roof, was felt on the present occasion as it was in 1876: a brilliant fortissimo, an exultant, crashing burst of music is impossible out of such a hole. Electrifying effects of this description were, it is true, far more seldom intended here than in the Nibelungen; Parsifal is scored with striking discretion. In the art of orchestration Wagner has not grown older; it has been developed in Parsifal into absolute magic, and, in every changing mood, conjures up the most wonderful effects of sound in endlessly varied gradations of light and shade.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

Wednesday.

The oratorio which M. Gounod calls "the work of my life," was produced this morning, under the personal direction of its famous composer, and in presence of an audience such as has not been drawn together since Elijah was first heard in the same place thirty-six years ago. I have already recorded the unexampled demand for tickets which both answered and justified the resolution of the committee to perform Redemption twice. A crowd equal in magnitude to that assembled in the Hall this morning awaits Friday night with impatience; and, were it possible to repeat the work again on Saturday, another crowd would assuredly be forthcoming. But the audience of this morning fairly constituted the tribunal to which M. Gounod has appealed. It was a representative audience in the best sense of the word; for to Birmingham the French composer's name and fame have drawn musicians from every part of the country, and even from the Continent and America. They are to be met with on all hands here, as though the occasion were a congress for the settlement of weighty matters in the art. M. Gounod should, and, probably, does, feel proud of this; proud and glad, because a very "special" jury indeed gave a verdict upon his oratorio. That verdict will probably stand. It came from an audience not likely to be swayed by impulse, and far from disposed to yield consciously to prejudice.

No very lively imagination is required to picture the scene in and around the Town Hall as throngs of eager amateurs hastened to their seats. Expectation was almost visible in the air, and certainly appeared "writ large" on every face. But amid the hurrying to and fro, and the unexampled anxiety to lose nothing of what was going forward, the festival machinery worked as smoothly as ever. Taught by long experience and business habits, the officials here have simply made their arrangements perfect; since no other could have stood this morning's test, and have comfortably seated 2,600 people before M. Gounod took his place on the conductor's stand. I do not see why, even with the performance of a new oratorio awaiting notice, this should not be mentioned with the emphatic approval due to success in a matter much more important than, at first sight, appears. M. Gounod's reception was very cordial on the part of the audience, and, on the part of the choir, even enthusiastic. Band and chorus have learned to appreciate the French composer's talent as a chef d'orchestre; and seem to have fallen completely under the spell of that almost magnetic attraction which he is known to exercise when conducting a performance of his own music. M. Gounod gravely acknowledged the honours paid him, and did his best to be calm. His nervousness, however, was not very difficult to see—still less difficult to understand on an occasion so novel and weighty. Even a veteran might be anxious concerning the first submission of an oratorio to the public of a Festival which ranks first in the land of oratorio. But the composer of Redemption had only to turn towards the serried mass of his interpreters in order to find encouragement. Such a band as that led by M. Sainton, and such a chorus as that which Mr Stockley has trained, to say nothing of artists like Mdme Albani, Mdme Marie Roze, Mdme Patey, Mr Lloyd, Mr Cummings, Mr King, Signor Foli, and Mr Santley—all of whom were engaged in the work—gave absolute promise that Redemption would not suffer from lack of executive resources. The promise began to be carried out as soon as the first notes of the oratorio fell upon the ear; an orchestral introduction abounding in massive chromatic harmonies revealing the rich tone and perfect balance of the instrumental force. Here, let me say, once for all, that the performance was not free from mishaps, either in the nature of pure accidents, since they did not occur at rehearsal, or caused by the very anxiety of those concerned to do their best. I decline entering into details about them, since that would be to direct censure towards quarters where, perhaps, it is not after all deserved. The principal reason is, however, that the slips were of little importance in themselves, and only became conspicuous, like a sun spot, because standing out against a bright background. These apart, the new oratorio had a magnificent interpretation, worthy of its merits and claims, worthy of the fame of Birmingham, and the repute of English art. In apportioning resultant credit, the largest share must undoubtedly be given to the band and chorus, whose work was, in its way, done more uniformly well than that of the solo artists. About this matter no question is possible. Hardly a hitch occurred in the steady correct progress of the orchestral and choral music, which had been thoroughly mastered before being played and sung con amore. As a natural result, the choruses were given with all the effect intended by the composer, and that, in certain cases, was indeed splendid. Mention should especially be made of the style in which the music of the "passers-by" and the priests was rendered during the scene of the Crucifixion. M. Gounod had carefully pointed out at rehearsal the need for an individual realization of the various scenes and the good results of his teaching were apparent here. The chorus did not merely sing certain notes, but sang them with a meaning such as gave tenfold musical significance, and all its dramatic propriety, to their utterance. The more triumphant choral numbers in the second part were an easier task, and some of them came out with astonishing effect, notably that in which the great truth of man's resurrection is proclaimed amid a blaze of celestial trumpets. Hardly less imposing was that wherein the priests are taunted with the failure of their schemes, but the climax came with M. Gounod's music to the Ascension chorus, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates," or, as the present English version runs, "Unfold, ye portals everlasting." Here, by the use of simple harmonies in great masses, and by the employment of every orchestral resource, the composer stirs and excites the dullest feeling. The ensemble was magnificent, and the audience, for once ignoring regulation, burst into long and loud applause. Turning to the solos, mention should be made of good work done by the two narrators, Mr Lloyd and Signor Foli, and by the artist (Mr Santley) who undertook the Divine words. Scope for merely vocal display these gentlemen had little or none, the narrators especially being almost confined to monotone or slow movement up and down a section of the chromatic scale. Moreover, they were required to avoid demonstrations and sing with a calmness no more than slightly tinged by feeling. Conditions like these are a severe test, but the artists upon whom they were imposed proved equal to the strain. Mr Lloyd should be especially mentioned, since to him fell the larger share of a difficult and not very gracious task. The solos for soprano and mezzo-soprano are of less consequence and far less difficulty. These came, of course, into safe hands; Madame Albani giving charming expression to an air which sets forth the blessings following from the Sacrifice of Calvary, while Madame Patey invested with absolute pathos a short but exquisite passage put into the mouth of the Virgin Mother. With these artists Madame Marie Roze was well associated in the music of the three Holy Women. Mention should also be made of the useful, if unobtrusive service rendered by Mr Cummings and Mr King in several important numbers. So exacting is every section of this oratorio that unusual credit belongs to all who help towards a successful performance. At the close of the work, M. Gounod remained for some time on the platform, acknowledging applause that broke out again and again, in recognition of work achieved and triumph gained. How far Redemption is entitled to a place among successful oratorios is a question I shall try to answer in my next letter.

Some statistics connected with this memorable Festival performance are worth giving. The number of secured seats taken was 2,196, for which £2,305 16s. was paid. Adding £475 8s. 2d.

collected at the doors for the General Hospital, the morning's receipts are found to be £2,781 4s. 2d.—an increase of £1,542 17s. 1d. upon those of the corresponding period in 1879.

The present festival is before all one of novelties, and the vibration of M. Gounod's last chord had not long ceased before the first notes of Dr Gaul's Holy City were heard, that work opening the evening programme. I have not now to speak of intense excitement and thronging multitudes. Nevertheless a large audience assembled to honour local talent in the person of Dr Gaul, and to hear with sympathetic interest a work having undoubted claims upon favourable regard. The scope of the new cantata is limited, because, as the composer himself states, "almost entirely reflective." It embraces, in the first place, the idea of the "New Jerusalem" as a continuing city, as an abode of gladness and song, and the prize of a higher life. In the next place, it sets forth the realization of desires and promises in the services of the heavenly Temple and the blessedness of those who take part in them. Not only is the scope of the work limited, but its objects are very definite, and their attainment is helped by the store of sublime Scriptural language at the composer's service. In this respect the theme favoured Dr Gaul, who has availed himself fully and judiciously of the advantages it afforded.

The scriptural texts have been chosen with much judgment, but Dr Gaul has not confined himself entirely to Biblical sources. Two well-known hymns—Bonar's "No shadows yonder" and Neile's "For thee, O dear, dear country"—enter into the book, as does also an extract from Milton's "Blest pair of Sirens," and a small part of the "Te Deum." As may be supposed, the sentiment of the whole work is deeply religious, and I may here add that its musical treatment is quite English in point of sober expression combined with depth of feeling. The cantata contains not a bar of flashy sentiment, not a single example of straining after effect for its own sake, and no evidence of the convulsive attempts to say something new which plunge so many modern composers into the depths of incoherence. Altogether, a good, sound musical work is this Holy City, and as such I am glad to salute it. The first part, entitled "Contemplation," contains some numbers distinctly worthy of notice, among these being the orchestral introduction with its principal theme, afterwards used again and again in connection with the heavenly "Sanctus." The whole movement is clearly written in a smooth, flowing style, and with full evidence of the musicianship that does not need to assert itself, in the form of eccentricity, over the setting of Bonar's hymn. I may pass to a tenor air, "My soul is athirst for God," wherein some of Dr Gaul's best characteristics appear—that is to say, a power of writing natural melody, and of treating it with genuine artistic taste. An unaccompanied trio for female voices is less distinguished because too obviously suggestive of other things with which it cannot compare, and a chorus (pastorale), "They that sow in tears" though as well and agreeably written as anything in the work, does not quite overcome the difficulties of six-eight rhythm when used in connection with words of deep religious feeling. An air for mezzo-soprano, "Eye hath not seen," was encored this evening, in compliment rather to its melodiousness than its expressive power. The honour was better deserved, perhaps, by the chorus, "Thine is the kingdom," with which the first part ends. Dr Gaul here proves that he knows how to write for imposing effect as well as for simple musicianship. The treatment is broad in style, but never a mere commonplace grouping of sonorous diatonic chords. In the second part, "Adoration," a solo, with choral Sanctus, "Thus saith the Lord," early arrests attention by giving evidence of a higher power than has previously appeared. The introduction from time to time of the "Sanctus," sung pianissimo as though by a distant choir, has an almost dramatic effect, while the solo, in its unvarying dignity and good taste, meets the exigencies of a trying subject. Following this is a double chorus, "Let the Heavens rejoice," in which Dr Gaul employs his two choirs with a skill quite sufficient to warrant him in the free use of that magnificent resource. It may not be exactly new, but I contend that his setting of the passage, "Let the sea make a noise," &c., belongs to the successes of massive choral-writing, and the entire chorus, with its fugal conclusion, "Let the Heavens rejoice," gives evidences of grand design and adequate musicianship. Among the remaining numbers may be noticed a contralto air, "Come, ye blessed," full of tender feeling; a melodious duet for soprano, "They shall hunger no more;" and a finale in which passages from the "Te Deum," sung in quartet, alternate beautifully with phrases in full chorus. Time, unhappily, does not serve to discuss this cantata according to its merits, but I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Dr Gaul. The performance, very well conducted by Mr Stockley, was most excellent, hardly a flaw reducing it below perfection. Miss Anna Williams, Mdme Trebelli, Mdme Patey, Mr Maas, and Mr King sang the solos almost uniformly well, and the chorus, capitally as it has worked in other things, excelled itself. Vociferous applause followed the close of the cantata, the composer acknowledging from his seat in the gallery. Dr Gaul should be heard of again. Concerning other features in the evening's programme I shall take an opportunity of speaking later on.—D. T.

Mrs Weldon, having secured a ticket for the performance of the Redemption on Wednesday, in due course demanded admission, but was refused, in consequence, it is reported, of the principal artists and members of the band engaged at the Festival having received circulars stating that she intended being present and making public some circumstances pertaining to herself and M. Gounod. She would not, it was said, be permitted to be present at any performance where M. Gounod conducted. Mrs Weldon afterwards applied at the police-court for a summons for assault, but the magistrate advised her to seek a remedy in a civil court.

A GENUINE LETTER FROM A GENUINE ARTIST.

Mdme Sarah Bernhardt explains in a letter why she did not fulfil her engagement at Blackpool Winter Gardens. She says:—"I was suffering very much when I went to the theatre from sore throat, which took away the greater part of my voice. I decided to play, though I had no knowledge of the room. I thought I was to play in a theatre, and not in a hall containing 15,000 persons, open to all winds. I gave proof of great courage in commencing the first act. All efforts did not carry my voice beyond the second seats. To continue would have been to mock the public, who paid to hear me. The managers told me to continue, notwithstanding that the people were unable to understand me, and they would be satisfied if they could only see me gesticulate. I am an artist, not an exhibition. If the managers had given the representation at the Prince of Wales's Theatre less money would have been made, but I should have played, being sure I should be heard and understood. The public would have been satisfied, and the honour of French artists saved.

ADELINA PATTI AT SWANSEA.

It has already been announced that Mad. Patti had most kindly volunteered to give a grand morning concert on behalf of the Swansea General Hospital. The mere announcement is sufficient to secure an almost unprecedented sale of tickets, and consequently one of the most crowded and fashionable audiences ever assembled in the Albert Hall. Those who wish to be present on the 14th of September will do well to secure their tickets, only a limited number remaining for disposal. Little is heard of Patti at home, though her slightest professional movement is recorded with all possible fulness of detail, and as though she were of the charmed circle of royalty. The interviewers (of the mansion) of celebrities have not yet thought of Patti, or, if they have thought of her, and essayed to enter the "castle," have found the door closed. Patti seeks retirement in Wales, and it was with difficulty she would consent the other day to be honoured by the address of her neighbours. Her style of living is quite French, the servants are French, and the furnishing and appointments of the residence show the same preference. The cook, the important personage of the establishment, is a genuine artist, inherited direct from the Duke de Morny. The grounds are magnificent; and one item of particular charm is a juvenile crystal palace. Here Patti passes entire days, for it is fitted up with all the conveniences of a residence, dinner being generally served here. Patti has spent £50,000 on this retreat from the world, and never repines over the outlay.—The Cambrian, Aug. 25.

GOUNOD IN WORCESTER.—On Friday afternoon (25th ult.) M. Gounod paid a visit to Worcester Cathedral, in company with his son, M. J. Gounod. He played for a considerable time first on the grand organ, and afterwards on that in the choir, expressing himself highly pleased with the tone of each. After spending a considerable time in the choir, crypt, &c., and visiting the Deanery, he went to the Exhibition, with the special object of seeing the pictures, returning immediately to Birmingham.—Berrow's Worcester Journal, August 26th.

PROVINCIAL.

INVERNESS.—Mr Kennedy, the world-known Scottish vocalist, and his family, gave last night the first of a series of three concerts in the Music Hall. The party consists of Mr Kennedy, Mr Robert Kennedy, Misses Helen, Marjory, and Maggie Kennedy. There need be no hesitation in saying that the concert was one of the very best that has been given in the Music Hall since Mr Kennedy was last here two years ago. The audience, who cheered his every appearance were happy to see that Mr Kennedy is still the best living singer of the auld Scotch sangs. He passed with as great ease as ever from the pathetic wail of "Oh! why left I my hame" to the quiet humour of "Come under my Plaidie" and the "Barrin' o' oor door," and to the mirth and boisterous fun of "The Laird o' Cockpen" and "Alister Macallister." All we need say of him is that on the present visit he more than fulfils the very high expectations that are always entertained regarding him. The appearance of the young ladies was all that the most critical audience could desire. Their singing is characterised by extreme simplicity. The exquisite taste with which Miss Marjory Kennedy warbled the ever charming "Wae's me for Prince Charlie" elicited the most cordial applause, and her rendering of "Jock o' Hazeldean" was no less creditable. The "Caller Herrin'" of Miss Helen Kennedy was admirable. Miss Maggie Kennedy makes her first public appearance on this tour. She was loudly cheered on being introduced by her father, and the hearty encore which followed her rendering of "We're a' noddin'" was well merited. Mr Robert Kennedy, already favourably known to an Inverness audience, received a hearty welcome. His singing of the "March of the Cameron Men" was loudly cheered, the audience insisting on a repetition of the last stanza. In other, and more difficult pieces, he appeared to great advantage. Altogether, the concert was a complete success.—Inverness Courier, Aug. 29.

BIRMINGHAM.—Messrs Harrison have announced a series of four subscription "popular concerts" to be given in the Town Hall, October 9, December 5, February 5, and March 6. For the first (to be conducted by Mr Sidney Naylor) they have secured the co-operation of Mdme Christine Nilsson, Mdme Antoinette Sterling, Mr Maybrick, &c., and for the second Mdme Albani, Mdme Patey, Mr Edward Lloyd, Signor Foli and Herr Joachim.

LIVERPOOL.—At the Bijou opera house, Bold Street, an opera company consisting of Mdme Sincio and Mdlle Taccani; Signors Ria, Susini, Campobello, &c., have been playing Rossini's Barbiere di Siviglia. The local press speak highly of Signor Campobello's Figaro and Madame Sinico's Rosina, duly complimenting the other singers, especially Signor Ria, whose "Ecco ridente," they say, was deservedly encored. In the "Lesson Scene" Madame Sinico gave "Home, Sweet Home," and on being called upon to repeat it, substituted "Robin Adair."

WORCESTER.—The members of the Amateur Vocal Union, with a few friends, spent the evening together on Tuesday, August 22nd. They enjoyed a walk by the riverside to the Ketch, where they sang some of their glees and part-songs in the gardens. They adjourned to the house for supper, after which Mr E. J. Spark, the honorary conductor, stated they had been unable to arrange one of their summer gatherings before, owing to the occurrence of the Exhibition and other causes. During last season they gave concerts at Worcester, Bromyard, and Kempsey. On the proposition of Mr J. E. Burgess, the health of Mr Spark was heartily drunk. Several more glees were then sung, and the party had a pleasant walk home.

Aida will be performed this autumn at the Teatro Pagliano, Florence.

SPOHR's statue in the Opernplatz, Cassel, will be solemnly unveiled on the 22nd October, the anniversary of his death.

The seating capacity of the Metropolitan Opera House, now erecting in New York, will be 3,000.

The Italian papers mention as something remarkable the fact that all the artists, operatic and Terpsichorean, engaged for the approaching season at the Teatro Apollo, Rome, are Italians.

B. POLLINI'S TWENTY-FIFTH PROFESSIONAL ANNIVERSARY.—On the 11th December, 1857, Bellini's Puritani was performed at the Stadttheater, Cologne, the bills announcing the part of "Sir Richard Forth by Herr Pohl—a pupil of Herr Koch's—his first appearance on any stage." The twenty-fifth anniversary of this event will be duly celebrated on the 11th December next by the company of the Stadttheater and the public generally at Hamburgh, where Herr Pohl, now better known as Herr Pollini, is exceedingly popular.

BAYREUTH.

Mdlle Daniela von Bülow, daughter of Hans von Bülow and Kosima von Bülow (now Mdme Richard Wagner), has married Count Gravina.—Franz Liszt has addressed the following letter to the Baron von Wolzogen, editor of the Bayreuther Blätter:—

"MY DEAR BARON,—During and after the first performance of Parsifal, every one felt that he could say nothing of this miracle of a work (œuvre-miracle). Yes! it renders those who hear it dumb, and its sacred pendulum moves from the Sublime to the More Sublime.—Yours most truly, FRANZ LISZT."

In which case, if there be truth in the old and oft-quoted apophthegm, "There is but one step, &c.," the "Sacred Pendulum" must be parlously near the Ridiculous.—P.

A NEW POTENTATE.

(From the "Frankfürter Journal.")

During the Festival Performances at Bayreuth a "List of Visitors" was published every day. Personages of Royal or Princely rank enjoyed the honour of the best position and the largest type. There was nothing remarkable about this, the same plan being generally adopted all over Germany. But there was one circumstance of a somewhat more unusual character. Among the names of reigning sovereigns and their august relatives figured "The Violin-King, August Wilhelmj." The good Bayreuthers appear, as true inhabitants of the "Town of pure Fools," to have taken rather too literally the celebrated artist's well-known epitheton ornans.

VIENNA.

(Correspondence.)

During the present season at the Imperial Operahouse, the programme will include, as novelties, operas by Wagner, Grammann, Erkell, Dworzak, Delibes, and Verdi. In the course of the present month Verdi's Traviata and Delibes' Le Roi l'a dit will be given, with Bianca Bianchi as the heroine in each. On the 4th October, the Emperor's saint's day, a new ballet, Melusine (Doppler's music) with Adam's Le Chalet; and on the 18th November, the eve of the Empress's saint's day, Verdi's Simon Boccanegra will be performed. The military ballet, Carlo, der Pionnier, will follow in the early part of December. During the Carnival, Dworzak's opera, Der Bauer als Schelm, and a one-act ballet, with music by F. H. Cowen, is to be produced. Then will come, in March, Das Andreas-Fest, by Grammann; and towards the end of April a revival of the ballet, Karneval-Abendteuer in Paris, with new costumes and various new dances. About the same period Franz Erkel's Ladislaus Hunyadi, also, will be produced, with Marie Wilt and Herr Broulik as representatives of the leading characters. In May will come the first representation of Tristan und Isolde, with Niemann and Kupfer as hero and heroine. There is, also, a vague prospect of Parsifal. True, Wagner has declared that his last opera shall only be performed at Bayreuth, but he made an equally solemn declaration with regard to the Nibelungen Tetralogy, and he is not altogether indifferent to author's fees. An interesting revival will be that of Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris, with Pauline Lucca as Iphigenia. The attendance of the public since the commencement of the season has been unusually good. Boito's Mephistofele has proved especially attractive.* Mdme Krauss, of the Paris Grand Opera, was present at the first performance. In her box were Albert Wolff, one of the contributors to the Paris Figaro, and Count d'Osmont, the well-known musical amateur.—The committee have not yet succeeded in finding a conductor for the Philharmonic Concerts. Hans Richter still refuses to reconsider his determination of resigning, and Jahn declines accepting the post on the plea that he might seem to be ousting Hans Richter. Meanwhile, he acts as provisional conductor two or three times a week.

BERLIN.—The whilom "Bilse Orchestra," who have been playing all the summer at the Flora-Etablissement, Charlottenburg, were to start yesterday, the 1st inst., on a concert tour. They begin their concerts at the Philharmonie here in October.

A MUSICAL PILGRIMAGE.

Munster, August 16.

I have already described my visit to Weber's grave in the Catholic cemetery at Dresden, and now there remains to speak of other such memorials scattered about this land of musical giants. The wandering devotee in Germany has no lack of shrines. Nearly every city calls upon him for a tribute of admiration to departed yet still existing greatness, since it may be said of masters in art that though dead they live. Dresden is full of Weberian reminiscences, and does not depend for association with the composer of Der Freischütz merely upon the custody of his remains. This is fortunate for the Saxon capital, because some circumstances connected with the master's burial-place are not quite pleasant to contemplate. The whole neighbourhood of the cemetery is subject to floods, and I am told that the vaults are sometimes filled with water, so as to float the coffins. Weber's grave being in a part of the enclosure most liable to inundation, suffers much from this cause. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the composer's representatives will not be slow to give his bones a better resting-place in the new "God's acre" now preparing. Dresdeners, at any rate, should be reminded of this duty whenever they cross the Theater Platz and see Weber's bronze presentment standing on its pedestal, turning an eager face towards the splendid operahouse which has succeeded the edifice he served so well. Here, surely, is a statue that does not bring ridicule upon modern art. Felicitous in treatment as a whole, the figure is happiest as a portrait. Those, who are acquainted with the best and most authentic engravings of the master's face cannot but recognize this. The clear-cut features, mild yet elevated expression, and somewhat melancholy look are all reproduced in Rietschel's work, which, therefore, is not only worthy of its subject but deserving its position on a truly Royal site. An Englishman somehow feels humiliated when looking at this memorial of a great musician. It is not so much that statues in his own country are generally abominations from which the dead might pray to be saved, as that the idea of like honour to a "mere musician" would scarcely enter the public mind. There was once in Vauxhall Gardens a statue of Handel, chiselled by Roubilliac, and made familiar by Bartalozzi, who engraved it as a frontispiece to Arnold's edition of the master's works. But in time that effigy of the great Saxon disappeared from the transpontine pleasure-ground, then turned up promiscuously, so to speak, at a dealer's, was bought by the late Sacred Harmonic Society, and now adorns the shop of an eminent publishing firm. Once, too, a statue of Mendelssohn had a conspicuous place in the Crystal Palace Gardens, and may be somewhere about now, but does not occupy the site on which, with a certain amount of demonstration, it was years ago unveiled. We are not happy with the great composers. We push them aside as lumber or are ready to sell them for what they will fetch, while at Dresden Weber stands near the King's Palace, with the names of his operas shining in gilded splendour, actually as though they were records of battle and slaughter. Another spot glorified by the same genius is but a little way off. The musical visitor to Dresden inevitably journeys through the delightful country along the Elbe bank and halts at Hosterwitz, a place for ever memorable as that wherein Weber wrote his Freischütz and Oberon. No one can look upon this quiet retreat—quieter then than now—without recalling the hard struggle of which it was the scene when the composer, with the shadow of death beginning to fall upon him, worked at his last opera more for the sake of wife and children than from personal interest in his own future, which he knew to be brief. Reminiscences of this kind best consecrate the scenes that bring us close to great men. They throw over them the halo of whatever is heroic in our common nature.

At Leipsic, John Sebastian Bach, dead long years ago, and separated from us by generations of active and brilliant workers in the field of music, still continue to dominate the place. That mighty memory will not be shoved from its pedestal, but towers above all others, even as soars the roof of St Thomas's Church above the buildings that crowd around. Not far from the church and the school in which the master laboured so long runs the ring of trees and verdure that has supplanted the old fortifications, and there, almost under the shadow of the sacred building, stands a Bach monument as yet barely completed. It is an unpretending thing, notable only for a good bust, in high relief, of the ancient Cantor. But, as a matter of fact, no memorial of John Sebastian was wanted on that particular spot. It might be said of him there as the tablet on the organ gallery of St Paul's Cathedral used to say of Christopher Wren, "Si monumentum queris, circumspice," for all the neighbourhood is eloquent of the great musician. Time and change have dealt lightly with St Thomas's Church and its surroundings—so lightly that were "old Bach," as Frederick the Great called him, to return to earth he would, perhaps, note but slight alterations. One side of the church appears to have been "restored," but the other remains untouched, the sacristan's little house nestling against the venerable wall as it has done for centuries. There, too, is the world-known Thomas School, filled with the children of those whom Bach taught, and on one day of the week the youngsters go into the sacred building hard by and sing Bach's music, as their fathers did before them. These things bring the visitor very near the old master, and help to realize in some measure a personality dimmed not only by lapse of time, but by the very splendour of his character and works. Few of us, perhaps, try to see Sebastian Bach. We talk of his music and connect it with a name rather than with a very sturdy personality who lived a quiet, plodding life in the Leipsic of a century and a half ago, numbered his children by the score and toiled for them like a slave. The fact is, we of the present generation could hardly understand Sebastian Bach if we knew him ever so well. Our composers are a very different race, courting the fierce light of public notice and living on its radiance. They run up and down in the world with their productions, or summon all people by beat of drum to come to them, while the cackling that goes on over a successful "lay" would shame a poultry-yard. I am not finding fault with this. Times change, and men with them. The point to be observed is that we cannot focus, with our nineteenth-century eyes, the untiring, silent, and unrewarded labourer to whom we owe the Matthew Passion and the Well tempered-Clavier. It is not a question of how Bach wrote so much as why, and the only possible answer, "Because he obeyed the promptings of an insatiable genius," leaves us very nearly where it found us. Certainly the master had little to distract his thoughts. Compared with his contemporary, Handel, whose voice was never silent in the melée of the world, Bach led the life of a recluse, and found relief in composing from the monotony of limited, unvarying duty. Perhaps Leipsic saw too much of him. What if he had gone about amongst men, had breathed the air of the country whence came the "pretty tunes" he and his son Friedemann used to travel miles to hear, and had learned to graft Italian grace and beauty upon the sturdy stem of German intellectuality? But such speculation is vain, and Bach remains for all time a typical representative of Teutonic art—the art which since his day reached its climax by invoking the spirit of Italian melody, and now bids fair to sink by exaggerating all that was crudest in its original form.

The wanderer about Leipsic may, not very far from the Stadttheater, light upon a street called König's Strasse. It is an eminently respectable thoroughfare, chiefly devoted to private houses of a superior class. In London it would possibly be called "quiet," and given over, as a legitimate prey, to German bands and Italian organ-grinders. Being in Leipsic it is really quiet, and offers nothing to disturb the peaceful current of a musical pilgrim's thoughts. But what does the musical pilgrim in the König's Strasse? He goes there to look at the house No. 20, on which an inscription tells that within its walls Mendelssohn lived from 1835 till 1841, when he left for Berlin, and from 1846 till his death, the following year. The "commodious family residence," as it would be called in a London agent's catalogue, is a corner house, having its entrance in a side street, but presents nothing save the inscription to distinguish it from many others its neighbours. No doubt a very comfortable middle-class dwelling of an ordinary type is here, but one glorified by the beautiful life which was lived in it, and by the great and graceful genius with which it will ever be associated. I do not know whether Germany continues to value Felix Mendelssohn as he deserves. The current of taste and opinion may have set against him in his native land, as I am sometimes told it has, and if so, so much the worse both for taste and opinion. But however this may be, there is one country upon which his hold is unshakeable—the country that so spontaneously recognized him as an apostle of the beautiful and good in art, that "heard him gladly," that commanded his affection, and that cherishes his memory as well as his works. From England there will always come visitors to the König's Strasse, regarding with strong emotion the house where, in the fulness of his powers and the splendour of his fame, dwelt the composer of Elijah. The disciples of the "Future" sneer at all this, of course. Mendelssohn, to them is a weak babbler—a purveyor of "milk for babes." So be it. No doubt the Philistines sneered at the Jewish ark when they carried it to Dagon's Temple as a spoil. But next morning their ugly idol lay prostrate and broken.

Going north-west from Leipsic not many miles, the musical wanderer comes upon another place full of interest to him, and to many who are not musical, for Halle is a great railway centre, with a strong flavour of nineteenth-century progress. 200 years ago it must have been rather sleepy—and was so sleepy, in point of fact, that the good folks became conscious of something amiss, woke up, shook themselves, and founded a university to attract lively young blood. A resident medical practitioner named Händel rejoiced at this, perhaps. It gave him a prospect of broken heads, slashed faces, more fees, and the wherewithal to satisfy several youthful appetites, of which that belonging to his son, George Frederick, could bear a good deal before crying "Hold, enough." A statue to George Frederick now stands in the market place, and very noble and dignified the presentment of the Halle doctor's boy looks. All-knowing Bädeker informs me that it was erected by subscriptions raised in Germany and England. He is probably right, and if not he ought to be, for never had those countries better reason to combine than in this case. If Germany produced Händel, England nourished him—I don't forget that she was rather a dry nurse for some time. If Germany honours him it is for English achievements, and if the one was the land of his birth the other became that of his adoption. "George Frederick Händel, Esquire"—so he lived the greater part of his life, so he died, and so he was buried. Wherefore his effigy stands in Halle market-place wearing an English Court dress. Why not? He was a sturdy person, doubtless, and far from supple-jointed before rank and riches; at any rate the London nobility thought so when he fought them long and well. But Händel knew, for all that, how to play the courtier, Did ever offended King receive such an exquisite peace-offering as the "Water Music," or one so delicately rendered? Who celebrated the battle of Dettingen, whereat, as Mr Thackeray pleasantly tells, dapper little George II. showed that he had some spirit in him? Who created an imperishable memorial of the Peace of Utrecht, and was the undisputed musical laureate of coronations and royal funerals? Handel in an English court dress by all means, especially as it reminds German spectators of the fact that England's claim to him is stronger than any arising from the accident of birth. At Hamburg one lights again upon Handelian associations, for there the master began the battle of life in earnest, and flashed the sword he was destined to wield like a brave and indomitable champion throughout his career. It is more to the purpose, however, that the Town Library contains a memorial the like of which cannot be found in the world outside Buckingham Palace, where are the great composer's priceless autographs. I refer to 131 volumes, containing seventy-seven distinct works, in the handwriting of Handel's amanuensis, J. C. Smith, and enriched with many notes and emendations from the master's own pen. It is said that at the composer's death, these treasures passed into Smith's family, but what became of them between then and 1856 does not seem clear. In the year just named, however, they were for sale at the shop of a Bristol dealer, and the late Mr Bowley, treasurer of the Sacred Harmonic Society, despatched a messenger at once to secure them. Unhappily, a foreigner was first in the field, M. Victor Schoelcher, the master's biographer, snapped them up; from his hands they passed, in 1868, into those of Dr Chrysander, another and a better biographer; and in 1875 they were placed in the Hamburg Library. So did England lose for ever a prize she should have jealously kept. It is unaccountable that the very existence of these volumes seems to have been forgotten till their description appeared in the dealer's catalogue. However, crying after spilt milk avails nothing, and English amateurs must find what comfort they can in the fact that the town where Handel began his labours is not an inappropriate place for such a sample of the fruit they bore.—D. T.

WAGNER'S *PARSIFAL.

"In the Zauberburg we become acquainted with Klingsor, respecting whom our curiosity has been greatly excited during the first act. He does not quite come up to our expectations. In fact, he is a magician of the common bad old sort. You can see at once by his red and black feathers what sort of a bird he is. Long before we catch a glimpse of Parsifal, he has espied that hero in a magic-mirror and lured him on with the intention of playing him a nasty trick. To this end he employs the means utilised by the Erl-King for a similar purpose—handsome girls are to disturb the inexperienced youth's moral equilibrium. For the success of this depravatory undertaking, Klingsor reckons, in particular, upon the most dangerous of his sirens, Kundry, whom he conjures up in order to impart his formal instructions to her—no longer the breathless Kundry, who gasped past us in the first act, that old, ugly, slovenly slut, with bristly elf-locks and a complexion à la Azucena; but a shadowy, phosphorescent apparition in blue glistening robes, so indistinctly seen that it may, without difficulty, be taken for a superhumanly lovely woman. . . . As Parsifal has approached the magic castle, he has been encountered by several armed men, whose social position is not indicated in the libretto, but whom we may assume to be demoralised Grail-Knights, who prefer female society in an odorous garden to staying with Amfortas in his sick room. Parsifal soon settles these eccentric persons, whereupon Klingsor and his tower sink into the earth, and the magic garden takes their place. From all quarters 'flower-maidens' rush in, crying and complaining of the rough handling their male friends have been subjected to by Parsifal, whom they abuse in uncommonly strong language for 'thrashing their playfellows.' 'Who,' they ask with diverting frankness, 'will play with us now?' In his quality of 'pure fool,' Parsifal accepts the word 'play' in its purely foolish signification, and answers quite innocently, 'That will I, and gladly!' The ladies, although they have been vituperating him up hill and down dale, no sooner hear that the good-looking young fellow is ready to 'play' with them than they begin to quarrel over his possession—which is just like the sex. Parsifal, however, resists all the temptations they subsequently offer him to 'play;' indeed, when they become rather pressing, he is extremely rude to them. Suddenly, and from behind a hedge, a voice exclaims, 'Parsifal.' It is that of Kundry who reminds the damsels that their 'playfellows' are waiting to have their injuries attended to, and to be nursed. They take the hint and depart, leaving Kundry alone with Parsifal. Her love is of a far more calculating and insidious character than that of the simple-souled flower-girls. In order to reach Parsifal's heart she selects the well-known roundabout road of consolation. She tells him, in moving accents, how his mother died, and when the poor lad sinks to her feet in an agony of grief, draws him gently towards her and gives him 'the first kiss of love as the last greeting of a mother's blessing.' Wagner's stage instructions prescribe 'a long kiss.' And a very long kiss it is! Whilst it is going on, Parsifal tastes the whole sweetness, and bitterness too, of sensuality. He experiences desire and pain simultaneously; scales fall from his eyes; all at once he knows what the wounded king, whose sufferings he had contemplated without appreciating them, must be going through; pity stirs in his breast, awakening his intelligence, and he shouts wildly, 'Amfortas! The wound, the wound! It burns within my heart!'"

* * * * * *

"Having attained the apogee of his dramatic action, Wagner weakens its effects by tedious prosiness. It is, I know, useless to complain of this, because he is immutably certain that whatever he does is right. He will go on in the old, old tiresome way, whatever one may say. Kundry and Parsifal, after they have settled the really important part of their business, persist in conversing exhaustively about this and that, like acquaintances who have risen from their seats to take leave of one another, hat in hand, but cannot find the door. Wagner's heroes always resemble parliamentary orators—once in possession of the House they never stop spouting until their whole stock of ideas is exhausted. Meanwhile, what are the others to do, who have to listen? Parsifal has no time to lose. He ought to hasten to the suffering monarch. He has found out what Pity means. He is the Chosen One. Nevertheless, his composer condemns him to play the part of a patient listener, in which rôle he is most assuredly not calculated to develop enthusiasm in the audience. However, he succeeds in withstanding Kundry. In vain Klingsor hurls the sacred spear at the Pure Fool; it hovers over his head; he catches it in the air, describes the sign of the Cross with its point, and Klingsor's magnificence collapses into dust and ashes, whereupon Parsifal goes off with the spear to look for the invalid King."

* * * * * *

"The third act of Parsifal has given rise to desperate conflicts of opinion. Some are enraptured with it, others are disgusted. 'A Revelation!' exclaim the former ecstatically; 'A blasphemous parody,' growl the latter . . . . Enter Gurnemanz, aged and decrepit, from a hut. He has heard a dismal groaning proceeding from a thicket hard by, and there, sure enough, he finds Kundry in a condition of death-like catalepsy. With great difficulty he succeeds in rousing this remarkable woman, who has lost all her demoniac beauty and is once more as revoltingly ugly as in the first act . . . . 'Who nears now the holy spring?' enquires Gurnemanz, looking out towards the woods. Gurnemanz does not know; but we do, on the spot. The orchestra lets us into the secret, by sounding Parsifal's leitmotiv on a French horn; we thus become aware that Parsifal is due. The leitmotiv system, therefore, obviously does not contribute to the heightening of dramatic interest; it makes the music rend asunder the veil of which the poem has not resolved to lift a corner.

"Parsifal is no longer the hearty lad of the second act, but seems to be as dark, stern, hard, and uncomfortable as the black armour in which he is clad. Being informed by Gurnemanz that he is on holy ground, and that it is Good Friday, he puts off his harness, whereupon the old gentleman recognizes him as the person he turned out of doors at the Grail-Castle many long years ago. Straightway he tells him (at great length) so gruesome a story of the privations endured by the fraternity since that time that Parsifal faints away. Then come tableaux vivans of events recorded in Sacred History. Kundry washes his feet, dries them with her hair, and anoints them; Gurnemanz sprinkles holy water on his head. Parsifal, now attired in a long white robe reaching to his ankles, and "made up" with luxuriant waving hair, parted in the middle, and a full fair beard, offers a faithful impersonation of the Redeemer, as usually represented to us by the pictorial art. Many people consider this presentment revolting. The modern stage is essentially profane, and now that plays have passed out of ecclesiastical hands into secular ones, offers a striking contrast to its mother the Church. Incidents and persons appertaining to the House of God should not be exhibited on the theatrical boards. Even the Berlin Chief of Police is of this opinion, for he has lately prohibited the display of Biblical figures in the wax-work shows. . . . . ."

A NEW TEMPLE.

"Not erected by Solomon."—Old Play

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—One of the greatest achievements and crowning glories of this century will be the rearing for the people of this great country, of their gigantic national Temple of Knowledge—I refer to the Ministry of Public Instruction, Public Opinion and of National Education roughly sketched in a pamphlet by the writer five years since, embracing under one roof all the great national departments of (with material) knowledge, whether in literature, science, or art. To rear such a vast national edifice must necessarily be the labour of years, and it surely cannot be premature to direct public attention to such an important national work, or why even designs, plans, specifications, and estimates of our great architects, builders, engineers and others, should not be in course of preparation and discussion. Space, unfortunately, will only allow me to allude to the nation's vast National Education Department of the Fine Arts, as the nation's vast National Studio of Painting, with ample space for say one hundred separate national easels', endowed by the state at salaries of £1,000 a year for both sexes, placed by the state for the use of distinguished English (and foreign) painters, permanently engaged and assiduously at work, painting to the glory of the English and even of other nations, and similarly of one hundred separate national easels' endowed by the state at salaries of £100 or more a year, placed by the state for the use of students chosen from the people reserved for those only who exhibit a genius for the art, and so with the nation's National Studio of Sculpture, and with that vast National Education Department, the nation's National Academy of Music, the sole tuition of every musical instrument being separately endowed by the state, placed by the state for the use of students chosen from the people, one student to each instrument, &c., &c.—I am sir, your obedient servant,

AUGUSTUS J. HARVEY.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs, giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

"Miss Lillie Albrecht, the clever young pianist, has just published a new piece, which we venture to predict will earn well-deserved popularity, and add to the fame of Miss Albrecht as a rising and meritorious composer. The piece is entitled 'Fantaisie Marziale,' morceau de salon."—Life.

"'Fantaisie Marziale' is a brilliant pianoforte piece by Lillie Albrecht, the accomplished young pianist, who knows how to write effectively for, as well as to play well on, the instrument. The principal theme is spirited and is well contrasted by an episode or trio, of a more cantabile character."—The Illustrated London News.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 879 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

Thursday.

In that most interesting book "The Mendelssohn Family," reference is made by one of the great composer's sisters to a young French student named Gounod, whom she met during a stay in Rome. He is said to have strong religious tendencies, nourished by a sentimental nature such as might eventually lead him into the Church. M. Gounod did not go so far, but his early disposition has more or less tinged the whole of his artistic life. Although he will chiefly be remembered as the composer of Faust, he is never so happy as when writing sacred music. The great subjects connected with religious doctrine and ritual appear to touch him deeply, exciting his emotions most of all, and leading him to illustrate them from a picturesque and sensuous point of view. A musician may approach such themes on two sides. He may, like Sebastian Bach, regard them in a purely spiritual aspect, and offer the homage of intellectual reverence as expressed in the language of abstract art. Or he may look at them in their more human relationships, recognizing so many tableaux that make appeal in a form less spiritual than sensuous. To this second course M. Gounod is limited by the emotionalism of his nature. He deals necessarily with the sentiment of religious things, and we take it quite as a matter of course that his thoughts turned, twelve years ago, to the story of the humiliation, anguish, and triumph of the Saviour of the world, not so much to proclaim their higher significance, though that he could not altogether ignore, as to indulge a kind of luxurious sympathy. Here we have a key to the artistic meaning of M. Gounod's Redemption. The new oratorio is not primarily a display of musical thought and speech. Were it this, the work would bear a different aspect, arising out of consideration for purely musical effects, and, I may add, for prevailing tastes. It represents much more fully the contemplation of sacred things by a keenly susceptible artistic nature, which, absorbed in them, and ignoring all other considerations, expresses its feeling with less regard for manner of utterance and effect upon others than for complete fidelity to the situation. The loftiness of this must be allowed. It is, at any rate, higher than the spirit which treats a sacred theme as a means to an end, and makes musical capital out of divine things. At the same time risk is involved when the composer's work has to go forth into a world certain to look at it first as a production of art, and only in the second place, if at all, as an offspring of religious sentiment. The conscientious critic, however, regards M. Gounod's new oratorio from its author's own point of view. By so doing he avoids mistakes, and sees plainly the reason of things otherwise difficult to comprehend.

The work is divided into three parts, with a prologue setting forth the creation of man, and his temptation and fall; together with the necessity for, and promise of, a Redeemer. As all this ground is covered in a few lines, the interest of the prologue gathers around its musical treatment, the more because it indicates the structure of the entire oratorio. For the reason just stated, M. Gounod's orchestral introduction has a significance not otherwise belonging to it. The effect of the movement, an adagio, is chiefly that of chords applied to the chromatic scale, resting upon a pedal point. Two leading features are indicated here—first, the composer's trust in harmonic progressions rather than melodic themes; and, second, his resolution to employ the scale which, with manifest disadvantages in other ways, offers the greatest scope for striking harmonic effects. The text—M. Gounod's own, by the way—is divided between two narrators, tenor and bass, and is treated in a manner consistently followed throughout the oratorio. Both voices, sometimes in alternation, sometimes together, in thirds or octaves, declaim a kind of quasi-recitative, accompanied à tempo by the orchestra. So far, simultaneous use of the voices excepted, M. Gounod adopts the form which has superseded recitative proper and come into general use. But other features in his setting of the narrative arise from his own initiative. He appears to have debated with himself in what way the Divine story should be told—whether with dramatic energy and picturesque descriptiveness, or in the calm, passionless style of the Evangelical record. His choice fell upon the second method, and taking the character of the vocal part in connection with the mode of delivery yesterday adopted, we see that M. Gounod thought it safer—he may have considered it more reverent also—to make the narrator a simple mouthpiece, leaving the orchestra to give the necessary colour, warmth, and life. Hence, he confines the voices to monotone or slow movement up and down a section of the chromatic scale. Quite in keeping with this severe musical reticence is the nature of the accompaniments. At exciting moments the orchestra becomes vigorous and even descriptive, while on rare occasions a melody streams forth; but, as a rule, trust is placed in harmonic combinations and instrumental colouring. All this the Prologue illustrates, and something more. It shows that M. Gounod is not to be tempted by the cheap device of "representative themes" into an exaggerated use of them. The oratorio contains but one "typical melody," and that is associated with the person and work of the Redeemer, being first heard when the Almighty purpose to save mankind stands revealed. A theme more characteristic of the composer could hardly have come from his pen—in other words, it is large, expressive, and symmetrical, not a mere fragment intended for ingenious dovetailing. Let me further point out, with reference to the Prologue, that it contains no commentary upon the text, either in chorale form or any other. This, too, is worthy of observation, because indicating a special point of difference between the form of Redemption and that of ordinary oratorio. M. Gounod resorts very rarely to didactic observations, thinking, perhaps, that the story, as he sets it forth, conveys its own moral. With these needful remarks upon methods confronting us at the outset of the work, I may pass on to say that the accompaniment to the text of the Prologue is remarkably bold and free in its sequential harmonies, and characteristically rich in colouring. From out of this indefinite mass of sounds the "typical melody" springs with grateful relief, seeming to bring with it light and beauty. The prologue finishes with a chorale, "The earth is My possession," preceded and followed by the tuneful Redemption theme, itself containing nothing but plain diatonic harmonies. A better ending could not be.

The first part opens with the condemnation of Christ, and carries on the course of events to the completion of the sacrifice on Mount Calvary. At the outset an element of interest arises. Jesus speaks, through the medium of a special (baritone) voice, after the manner adopted by Bach in his Passion; and here I may say, once for all, that the music set to the Divine words is singularly happy, being full of tenderness and sweetness, combined with dignity. It may seem unfortunate that the first utterance of the Lord, "If My deeds have been evil," corresponds exactly with a passage in the death-scene of Valentine (Faust), but the music is impressive and appropriate, while, if any one has a right to quote M. Gounod, he surely must be M. Gounod himself. The march to Calvary receives elaborate treatment, in a form likely to awake discussion. Its principal feature is a lengthy orchestral movement, moderato maestoso, representing the brutality of the Pagan force, and containing not only passages which are fierce and strong, but others that are light almost to flippancy. It is, of course, open to question whether, in contemplating Jesus being led to death, we are more struck by the savageness of his persecutors than by the deep solemnity and pathos of the scene. M. Gounod's reason is clear enough, however, when he associates with the orchestral movement a hymn, "Vexilla Regis prodeunt," from the Catholic liturgy; this, supposed to be sung by the "daughters of Jerusalem," representing Christian compassion. The contrast is obvious and great, whatever may be thought of its value as compared with the effect of keeping the central Figure always in view. When M. Gounod at length turns to the Sufferer, the music becomes pathetic in the highest degree. Nothing could more powerfully illustrate the short but pregnant dialogue between the women and Jesus. It is the very utterance of grief and tenderness, touching the heart, and making almost painful the fierce strains of the resumed march, tempered though they be by the hymn sung in choral unison. The Crucifixion scene presents much worthy of serious regard, apart from elaborate orchestral treatment of the narrative. Here, for example, the chorus begins its work in earnest, and as an actor rather than a spectator. It represents the "passers-by" in a powerful number, "Ha! Thou that dost declare," and the priests in an outburst of mockery and spite, "Can He not save Himself?" These episodes are but brief, for the composer, not seeking after musical effect per se, declines to check the steady flow of events till Jesus, accompanied by the "typical melody" in its full loveliness, has uttered the memorable prayer for His enemies. Here a chorus distinguished by harmonies of the most poignant nature embodies the Divine reproaches, "O my vineyard, come tell me why thy grapes are bitter." And here M. Gounod proves more than equal to the demands upon him; rising from subdued feeling to the highest pitch of agony, then suddenly falling to the lowest depth of pathos. Mark the chorus as a magnificent example of intense musical expression, such as may be expected from the composer when all his sympathies are aroused and the depths of his nature moved. Observe, further, the quartet and chorus, which point to the Virgin Mother, "Beside the Cross remaining;" the melancholy beauty of M. Gounod's theme and the sombre colouring of his orchestration. Observe, most of all, the Virgin's solo, "While my watch I am keeping," with its appropriate use of the Stabat Mater chant in accompaniment. Here M. Gounod again touches the heart by quiet, unforced pathos. A chorale, "Lord Jesus, Thou to all bringest light and salvation" ends the episode of the two thieves, and may be mentioned, not for its musical importance so much as for being a commentary of the kind which M. Gounod to so large an extent ignores. An orchestral movement (quasi adagio) depicting the Darkness would, perhaps, more vividly suggest the groping about of persons who cannot see, and has little to recommend it. Not so the music to the final words and death of Jesus. Here the composer is again master of his theme and of our emotions. Tone-painting could hardly be more clear and powerful. After this the first part soon ends, doing so with another reflective chorale, distinguished by greater range and variety of expression than usually belongs to that form of sacred music.

The second part opens with a "prophetic chorus," remarkable for the device of a trumpet passage which reiterates continually the tonic and dominant of the key, the instruments answering each other from opposite points of the orchestra. This is, of course, by way of prologue to the narrative of the Resurrection and Ascension, the musical setting of which so closely resembles that in the first part as to make additional comment unnecessary. Features of special interest soon present themselves, among them a pastoral theme for strings, on a double pedal, intended to represent the progress of the Holy Women to the Sepulchre; though in what its propriety lies is not at all clear. This theme re-enters whenever the Women are spoken of as moving from place to place. M. Gounod is at his best in the scene with the Angel at the Tomb, but thenceforward till the Ascension takes place he exercises diminished power, partly for the reason that his method of treating the narrative begins to lose the charm of novelty. A powerful chorus, "Now behold ye the guard," re-awakens keen attention by the strength and majesty of its harmonies and the glow of its colour. To this, however, M. Gounod has accustomed us, and we hail more gladly a soprano air, "For thy love as a father," with which beautiful choral passages are combined. The composer's success here suggests that after all the good old way is the best. A few more airs equal in merit would add immensely to the musical charm of the work, and need not at all detract from its religious significance. But whatever defects appear in this part are forgotten—I had nearly said redeemed—by the splendid triumphal chorus, "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," which brings it to an end. M. Gounod has resorted, in this instance, to rather sensational means. He would have a celestial choir, with harps and trumpets, raised above the general level, in order to put "from on high" the question "Who is the King of Glory?" This could not well be carried out yesterday, but a certain approximate effect was produced, and justified the means employed. In any case, the point becomes insignificant when compared with the grandeur of the chorus as a whole. Nothing could be more simple than its structure. But if the means are obvious it is also clear that they are used with consummate knowledge and skill.

In the third part are comprised the events of Pentecost, and these bring us into a brighter atmosphere. Melody now predominates, as in the opening chorus, "Lovely appear"—a piece which will find its way, as a church anthem, all over the land, doing so none the less readily because a beautiful soprano solo enters into its structure. Another orchestral movement, "The Apostles in Prayer," does nothing to atone for the shortcomings of its fellows, but the work ends happily with an elaborate number called "Hymn of the Apostles." Here several distinct movements present themselves—first an extended theme sung in unison by tenors and basses, and repeated in full chorus; second, a quartet, "By Faith Salvation comes;" third, a setting of the Beatitudes marked by varied beauty and fitness; and fourth, a fugual episode, which, as the theme is not marked out, would have been better avoided. Finally, a mighty series of M. Gounod's favourite harmonic progressions closes the oratorio with all imaginable splendour.

The question as to the precise status of M. Gounod's oratorio is one demanding some consideration before an answer can be given. No doubt the obvious beauties of the work are many. With hardly an exception the choral numbers produce an effect not to be denied. They are clear in structure, definite in expression, and musically interesting and attractive. The few airs and lyrical solo passages are in their way, no less charming, so that the first positive conclusion drawn amounts to this—whenever M. Gounod keeps to the old lines of oratorio his success is indisputable. There remains the great peculiarity of the work, namely, its treatment of the narrative. Here opinions are sure to differ widely, and, in any case, some time must elapse before a feature so new in oratorio commands general approval. That time will, however, be hastened in proportion, as M. Gounod's object and spirit are recognized. His musical narrative is a musical meditation, throughout which the devout mind enters completely into the emotions of the text, and makes them personal to itself, for a higher object than that of mere effect. To understand this and sympathise with it is, as I remarked at the outset, to remove a lot of difficulties. At first, however, the public will judge, not from the right point of view, but by comparison with standards which M. Gounod has not considered, and their verdict consequently may be one of somewhat hesitating approval. Happily there is enough of obvious beauty and grandeur in Redemption for the holding of its ground, and, under such circumstances, absolute triumph is generally a question of time. Believing M. Gounod's oratorio to be a noble and exalted thing, I trust that the time may be short.

This morning Handel's Messiah was performed, under the usual Festival conditions of a full house and universal sympathy. The number of seats engaged for this immortal masterpiece was 1,828, and the receipts amounted to £2,391 2s. 2d., including no less than £673 given specially for the General Hospital. Handel's work has from the beginning of its illustrious career been identified with the cause of charity, and the tradition seems very unlikely to be lost. Details of its performance as conducted by Sir Michael Costa are, of course, unnecessary. It goes without saying that all concerned did well, but it may perhaps be stated that the whole of the tenor airs were sung by Mr Maas, those for bass being taken by Signor Foli. The other parts were divided according to custom, the soprano solos between Mdme Albani and Miss Anna Williams, the contralto between Mdme Patey and Mdme Trebelli. The whole of these artists sustained their high reputation.

The audience this evening was even larger than that of the morning, 2,233 persons being present, and the receipts amounting to £1,461 5s., making the grand total for the day £3,852 7s. 2d., as against £3,405 4s. 2d. on the corresponding day in 1879. Herr Gade's new cantata, Psyche, constituted the chief attraction, and was splendidly performed under the guidance of the gifted composer, who is immensely popular here, and was received with enthusiasm. I must reserve my notice of the work, and only record at present its absolute success. The first two or three numbers passed without particular notice, but the audience soon felt the beauty and grace of the music, and thenceforward applause was the order of the evening. Two numbers were encored, while at the close a perfect tempest of cheering bespoke the general pleasure and admiration. This was no more than justice. Psyche is a masterly and charming work, equal to anything the Danish master has given us. The solos were taken by Mdme Marie Roze (Psyche), Mdme Trebelli (Proserpine), and Mr Santley (Eros); Miss Eleanor Farnol and Mr Lloyd assisting in the concerted numbers. All these artists were in their best form, and gave well-nigh unmingled satisfaction. As for the band and chorus, they played and sang superbly. Other features in the programme were Mr Parry's new Symphony, a masterly composition; a new song, "The Golden Thread," composed by M. Gounod, and sung by Mdme Patey; and the march written by the French master for the Duke of Albany's wedding. In a subsequent letter I shall gather up these new things into a bouquet, and deal with them as they deserve. The familiar selections included, "Waft, ye Zephyrs" (Euryanthe), beautifully sung by Mr Maas, the overture to William Tell, and Donizetti's air, "O Lisbona," in which Mr King made his mark.

Friday.

The last day of the Festival opened badly as regards weather, but with little or no effect upon the attendance, however much appearances suffered. That appearances suffered a good deal cannot be denied, since a steady drizzle from a leaden sky is no more beautiful and inspiring in Birmingham than anywhere else. This morning it took all the festiveness out of the scene, and put in its place a pervading sense of dampness and discomfort. However, the Town Hall soon filled, and when, as gloom increased, the pretty clusters of Swan's incandescent lamps gave out their pure and beautiful light, there was a very satisfactory feeling that art had so far atoned for the shortcomings of nature. A varied and liberal selection made up the first programme of the day, and represented the classical masters, whom, on these occasions, it is always a duty and a delight to honour. Mozart contributed to it; so did Beethoven and Cherubini, and so did the still living composer (Brahms) who carries on in our time, with fidelity to their principles, yet with liberal tastes, the work those illustrious men promoted. Mozart was represented by his Symphony in G minor—smallest, but not least beautiful, of the immortal triad which his fertile genius produced in a few weeks of 1788—the most memorable year of his life. A better choice could not have been made for the purpose of displaying the admirable ability of Sir Michael Costa's orchestra—that of the strings especially. With regard to the "wind," it may be worth recording that, as the symphony was performed with the clarionet parts as printed in the new German edition of the score, it presented some added attraction, enhanced by the unfailing skill and taste of Mr Lazarus. But the execution of the work generally could not have been better. It was delicate, yet firm and strong; hardly ever short of perfect precision, and often most beautifully phrased. Under such circumstances Mozart's music could make no other than a deep impression. The audience listened keenly to every movement, and seemed quite willing to hear the whole again. Indeed, the finale had to be repeated, so lively was the sense of pleasure it conferred. In thus appreciating Mozart the Birmingham public did themselves honour. They, at any rate, are not ready, with some of our public instructors, to describe that mighty master as "infantine." Following the Symphony in G minor came the "Song of Triumph," composed by Johannes Brahms in honour of his country's victories, and dedicated to the German Emperor. This work has been heard in London on one or two occasions and in a few of our provincial towns; but its very exacting character is a formidable obstacle in the way of general familiarity. At a Birmingham Festival, however, difficulties count for little or nothing, and the "Triumphlied" was never in danger of rejection here by reason of the great demand it makes upon executive ability. The peculiar feature of the composition lies in its being written for a double choir, often in an elaborately contrapuntal fashion, and with an almost continuous strain upon voice as well as upon skill and care. So fatiguing was the music found this morning that the performers were given their interval of rest immediately after it, instead of after Cherubini's Mass in C, as arranged. They well deserved the consideration, for they had been absolutely unsparing of themselves, and had not once made a mistake in threading the maze of their way through the work. Brahms is a new name at these Festivals, but the music of his "Triumphlied" must have struck the audience as having a familiar flavour of much older masters. The impression was undoubtedly correct, because Brahms composed his work in the sturdy and intellectual spirit which finds musical expression through the writings of Bach and Handel. There is nothing of sickly-sentimentalism here. An "æsthete" would probably turn away from it shuddering, and call for something languishing to do away with the effect of the shock. To a large extent, therefore, the music is out of harmony with an age that loves "prettinesses" on the one hand, and, on the other, the blood-curdling horrors. This goes to say that the "Triumphlied" is robust and healthy—good, sound, honest music such as the old German masters were wont to write at a time when there was bracing air about. The work, however, is not a mere reproduction. To Brahms belongs the credit of legitimately developing the artistic principles which guided his great predecessors, and here he combines the vigorous counterpoint of Bach and modern graces of orchestration, as far as the two things can be allied, without incongruous effects. This adds immensely to the interest of the work, above all in the eyes of those who contend that the old forms are capable of indefinite expansion and infinite variety. I must congratulate the Festival Committee upon their choice of the "Triumphlied," and Sir Michael Costa upon the splendid manner of its performance. On another occasion, perhaps, Brahms will contribute something still more important, specially written. I should add that the incidental solo was sung very well indeed by Mr King.

Cherubini's Mass, in G (No. 4) opened the second part of the programme, and conferred upon it no mean attraction. This beautiful example of the Florentine master has been very rarely heard in England, for reasons as difficult to understand as those which keep some of his noble operas off our stage. Just now, however, there are signs of a run upon Cherubini's masses, thanks to the interest and admiration excited by his "D minor" when it was produced in London and at the Worcester Festival last year. The Mass in G no more compares with its greater sister in beauty and grandeur than in size, but it is a masterpiece all the same, and one not to be heard without recognition of the genius that can produce great results with comparatively simple means. A work less elaborate in structure so learned a musician as Cherubini could hardly have written. In modulation it is as reticent in polyphony, the composer seeking his effects for the most part in his melodic phrases and natural unforced harmonies combined with orchestral devices which, like the prolonged inverted pedal in "Qui tollis," show the hand of a genuine master. A review in detail of this work, if given now, would only anticipate what will inevitably be attempted very soon, under circumstances more favourable to well-considered opinion. Enough that the mass was, to-day, a success beyond dispute. Its expressive themes, thorough musicianship, and deep religious feeling commanded approval on all hands. Of the performance it is scarcely possible to speak in exaggerated terms. The choral performance was surprisingly good, considering the strain put upon the voices in executing very different music just before. On this point the able chorus master, Mr Stockley, had reason to be anxious, but his splendid force carried the work through against all difficulties, and left room for hardly a word of criticism. In point of fact these Birmingham singers appear quite as fresh and trustworthy now as they were at the beginning of the week, and the Midland capital has reason to be proud of them. With such artistes as Mdme Albani, Miss Williams, Mdme Patey, Mdme Trebelli; Mr Maas, Mr Cummings, Mr F. King, and Signor Foli, all of whom were required for the comprehensive plan of the work, it may be imagined that the solos were admirably given. Cherubini wrote for voices like a true Italian, influenced though he was by the German school, and vocalists find all their sympathies enlisted when his music comes to hand. Where all do well it may seem invidious to make special mention of one, but the risk must be incurred here in favour of Mdme Albani, whose artistic taste and natural fervour gave uncommon distinction to the principal soprano part. Let much also be laid to the credit of Sir Michael Costa for conducting the performance not only with skill, but with evident zeal on behalf of his illustrious countryman. Beethoven's Mount of Olives brought the long concert to an end. With regard to this work the pen of criticism may rest, every requirement being answered by a few words in praise of a performance which had some notably meritorious features. Among these were the singing of Miss Anna Williams, who has done well all the week, materially advancing her artistic rank, and the excellent delivery by Mr Maas, of the tenor solos, that demand no common powers. As may be supposed, the chorus and orchestra made their mark in "We here shall surely find him," and the magnificent "Hallelujah." The receipts of the morning were in excess of those to the credit of the corresponding period three years ago.

This evening the festival closed with a second performance of M. Gounod's Redemption, the distinguished composer again conducting, and the soloists who appeared before again taking part. As I intimated would be the case in a previous letter, there was an overwhelming attendance, the vast hall being crammed to its utmost capacity. No work of modern time has excited greater interest than the new oratorio. I am told, indeed, that telegrams have poured in all day inquiring whether seats could possibly be obtained for its hearing. In each case, of course, a negative answer was returned. Bristol is likely to rejoice thereat, since Redemption will next be given at the Festival which the Western city is preparing. The performance to-night was much better than that of Wednesday, when nervousness and over-anxiety brought about faults. All engaged seemed at their ease, and the result probably satisfied even M. Gounod's exigent taste; if not, the composer must be hard indeed to please. As regards the effect of a second hearing, I am able to say with confidence that it encouraged those who expect a great future for the work. It is more than ever obvious that the choral numbers are masterpieces in their several degrees, and that the few lyrical solos have a charm beyond common. But the main question lies in M. Gounod's peculiar treatment of the narrative. Does this grow upon the mind and more powerfully appeal to the heart with riper acquaintance? I venture to believe that it does, and that when English audiences are accustomed to the composer's method the profound emotionalism and reverent expression of his music will enlist their sympathies. We are sometimes told that religious faith is dying out. That may be, but religious sentiment exists, and will continue as long as human nature remains unchanged. To that great power in England M. Gounod has appealed through the medium of his latest work, and I shall be much surprised if he appeals in vain.—D. T.

GOUNOD'S REDEMPTION.

We gather the undercooming from last week's issue of Le Ménestrel;—

A peine la nouvelle du grand succès de la Rédemption arrivait-elle de Birmingham à Paris que M. Carvalho télégraphiait à Charles Gounod pour solliciter l'honneur de faire entendre, salle Favart, l'oratorio du célèbre maître français. Mais voici qu'un autre télégramme lui était adressé du Grand Opéra et dans les termes suivants :—

Angleterre. Birmingham Town Hall. Charles Gounod.

"Journaux annoncent avez promis Rédemption à Opéra-Comique; vous rapelle vos promesses pour l'Opéra dont la première remonte à 1880, au temps des études du Tribut de Zamora; ne puis croire à un oubli.—Prière répondre, votre affectionné,

"VAUCORBEIL."

Que va faire—adds Le Ménestrel—l'auteur de Gallia?

[Il fera très bien. Du reste—in the eloquent language of our own Ménestrel—"L'auteur de 'Joseph' va avoir sa statue à Givet." Que M. Gounod, qui raffolle de "Joseph," se console!—Dr Bluge.]

The art of modern machinery and scene-painting was exhibited in Parsifal to even greater advantage than in the Nibelungen. Much has been learnt, even at Bayreuth. The Hall of the Gralsburg, painted in the Moorish style (the style of the Cathedral at Burgos), is imposingly beautiful; the Forest, too, in the first act, and the Flowery Mead in the third, are most effective pictures. But Klingsor's Magic Garden is too grotesque with its glaring red and clumsy floral colossuses. I expected, also, that the costumes of the Flower-Girls would have been more dressy. The naked feet were the only original thing about them. Prettier and better devised fleurs animées are seen in every successful ballet. Wagner did not want probably to remind us of anything of the nature of a ballet—however that may be, the scene itself reminds us of one. The mechanical effects (the moving panorama, the disappearance of the scene through the stage, the flying swan, &c.) went without a hitch, and proclaimed the merit of young Brandt, who will probably soon have come up to his celebrated father. If to all these excellences of the Bayreuth performance we add the presence of Wagner, who, as its vivifying soul from the very beginning, was for the public an object of the profoundest respect, the reader will understand the great success of the first two Parsifal evenings. In the theatre itself the audience, it is true, did not, at Wagner's wish, indulge in any marks of approbation; "in the interest of the art-work" a death-like silence, which was almost oppressive, reigned around. But the opinions I heard between the acts and after the performance were —apart from the complaints concerning instances of too great length and monotonous extension—preponderatingly favourable.

The question whether Parsifal will really be withheld from all other theatres and be limited to an occasional (but eventually highly doubtful) resuscitation in Bayreuth, naturally forces itself on every lip. As we know, Wagner in a public letter from Palermo (April, 1882), emphatically dwelt on the "thoroughly exceptional character of this work," and claims to have rendered impossible any performance of it elsewhere than at Bayreuth, by the mere fact that "with this poem he has entered a sphere which should justly remain closed against our operahouses." Despite of this, we most decidedly cannot see the "impossibility." We ourselves in our notice directed attention to what was startling and unbecoming in the church scenes of Parsifal. But when and where did the Unbecoming ever constitute a barrier to the performance of Wagnerian operas? I consider the libidinous love scene between the brother and sister, Siegmund and Sieglinde, when they espouse each other in Die Walküre, a thousand times more repulsive than the religious pictures in Parsifal, which, though offensive to strict Christians, are not revolting to human feeling as in the above scene, branded with Schopenhauer's "Infamous!" I must here remark, too, that the church scenes in Parsifal were far from producing in the actual performance the repellent effect which I and others imagined, from a perusal of the book, that they would produce They are religious occurrences which are presented to us, yet, despite all their earnest solemnity, they are not in the style of the church, but of the operahouse. Parsifal is an opera, notwithstanding its being called a Stage-Festival-Play, or a Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play. It cannot even be termed a "spiritual"† opera, as the epithet is employed by Anton Rubinstein, for in such a work the voluptuously-mundane second act of Parsifal would simply be impossible. To see in this second act how the grand old theatrical devil jumps out of the pious habit of the monk is something too delicious.

Why should not Wagner's Parsifal be given in any theatre? Is not the Bayreuth Festival-Play-House, for which Wagner wrote it, a theatre? Is that edifice a church or a concert-room? It is a theatre where, like any other opera, Parsifal, got up with all imaginable operatic splendour, is played by stage-singers, and, moreover, before a continually changing, paying public? Why should a performance of Parsifal shock religious feeling everywhere except in Bayreuth? Of Wagner's serious intention to prohibit the performance of Parsifal in Europe we do not for a moment doubt; he may have material grounds for reserving the work for Bayreuth. But, on internal grounds, taken from the work itself, we cannot comprehend the moral impossibility of performing Parsifal in other theatres. We should sincerely deplore the prohibition. As it would have been a pity on account of the enormous cost and trouble which were expended on the Nibelungenring, and which were also to be incurred "only for Bayreuth," so it would be a pity, and even a greater pity in the case of Parsifal. This is more easily performed than the Tetralogy, closer, and more effective; the music (with the sole exception of the Kundry scenes) is simpler, quieter, and nobler. Assuming certain inevitable cuts were made, Parsifal would probably prove more valuable and more successful at theatres than the other work. For a quarter of a century, Germany has been miserably poor in new operas with any vitality, and seems every year to grow poorer still—so that one need not be a "Wagnerite" to sincerely deplore the threatened loss of Parsifal. We know very well that Wagner is the greatest living operatic composer, and, in Germany, the only one of whom there can be, in a historical sense, any serious question. Since Weber and Meyerbeer, he is the only German composer without whom we cannot picture the history of dramatic music. We might picture it even without Mendelssohn and Schumann, to say nothing of Rubinstein and others more modern, without being sensible of any gap. Between this avowal and the nauseous idolatry of which Wagner is the object, and which he patronizingly encourages, there is, however, an immeasurable chasm.

According to what is said here openly or only in a whisper, a repetition of Parsifal next year appears anything but certain. What then? Even were the theatres forbidden to perform Parsifal during Wagner's lifetime—what then? If once Wagner's individuality, the magnetic eye and the strong hand, which attracts all, artists and public, to little Bayreuth, and keeps them there, is once missed, no one—of a certainty no one—will be able to do such a thing again. It is easy to foresee that with Wagner the Bayreuth Festival Performances will become extinct, but, assuredly, not so Parsifal. The large theatres will give this interesting and pious opera without many religious scruples, and the public of Vienna, Munich, and Berlin, will, like the public here, look at and listen to it without for a moment thinking they are in a church. Mankind will continue to be pleased with the Nibelungen and Parsifal till one fine day they grow tired of allowing themselves to be rocked about by merely "endless" melody, and led by stereotype leading-motives. Then there will probably appear for opera a new "pure fool," that is: a naif composer of genius and natural strength, perhaps a kind of Mozart, who will become master over the "Master," and, for a change, once more rule mankind musically after they have been so long governed dramatically.

THE MIDGETS.—These miniature people have returned to their old quarters at Piccadilly Hall, where they are now to be found holding daily receptions at stated intervals. General Mite and Miss Millie Edwards are admittedly the smallest of the small, and put the famous General Tom Thumb, on the question of inches, incontestably in the shade. General Mite, since we last saw him, if he has added nothing to his weight has certainly waxed in vivacity, and indicates in his delineations of the "Broadway Swell" and the other street notabilia of New York, a sense of dramatic humour which denotes an intelligence far beyond his measurement. Miss Millie Edwards, too, is an equally remarkable specimen of abridged humanity, and plays her little part with preposessing grace and espièglerie. The spectators, however, are chiefly concerned in the dimensions of this singularly diminutive couple, and when they descend from the platform, and promenade arm in arm on the floor among the visitors, it is only then that we feel the full certainty of the fact that it is quite possible for Gulliver to be again confronted with Lilliput.—H.

LEIPSIC.—Mozart's Don Juan is to be performed at the Stadttheater, with alterations both in the scenic arrangement and the original libretto, in accordance with the new version by Grandaur and von Wolzogen. As regards the music, the duet between Leporello and Zerline after the sextet will be restored, and the second finale given in its original form.—With the approval of the King of Saxony, the University has conferred the title of "Professor" on Dr. Hermann Langer, director of the St Paul Vocal Association, on the occasion of its sixtieth anniversary.

GOUNOD'S REDEMPTION.

The new and long-expected oratorio, from the pen of the French composer most in vogue at the actual period, was heard with sustained attention and interest from beginning to end. About the plan and character of this remarkable composition our readers have been amply informed. We may add, however, that the form is not merely novel, but thoroughly justified by a success as unquestionable as was the fair reward of a work so earnestly contemplated and laboriously developed. M. Gounod has altogether eschewed the traditional groove, emancipating himself boldly, as Wagner has done—and, it must be admitted, with a voice more purely and continuously melodious—from all previous so-called restrictions. He has succeeded in proportion, and we are greatly mistaken if, for a considerable period at least, The Redemption is not destined to become, in a "popular" sense, the new oratorio of our time. It possesses all the qualities requisite to invite and flatter a growing prevalent taste which accepts new dispositions of things artistic, no matter in what form presented; but, happily, the admired French musician, who has carved out for himself a niche in the hearts of our countrymen, and more especially of our countrywomen, presents these in a manner so seductive as to be little short of irresistible. For the religiously inclined the way in which he has treated the theme of The Redemption will offer peculiar fascination. M. Gounod has treated the theme in an entirely independent manner. Even in his illustration of Chaos, which opens the prologue to his "Trilogy" (in itself treating of Calvary, the Resurrection, Ascension, and Pentecost—which, with equal propriety, may be regarded as an epilogue), he has judiciously avoided all traceable reference to Haydn's conception of the same theme; while in the description of darkness, which he leaves the orchestra to illustrate with chromatic perseverance, be has steered clear of the famous passage in Handel's Israel no less judiciously, where the miracles preceding the Exodus are set forth. In short, M. Gounod, in the plan and development of his oratorio, speaks for himself; and this, enhanced by the abundant melody and rich harmonic treatment that distinguish it from end to end, invests the whole composition with a sustained tone of originality, telling its own tale in a way not easy to misconstrue. More than this we are not inclined to say after a single hearing; but less would have been unjust towards a production the merits of which are self-evident. We may add, however, that Gounod, after the Wagner fashion, has a Leit-motive, "typical of the Redeemer, God and Man," which occurs at frequent intervals, and once heard will be difficult to banish from the memory. That the performance generally was more than satisfactory to the composer he himself has candidly admitted, and we may say with deference that had it been otherwise he must indeed be difficult to please. There was no applause during the performance, but at the conclusion a most cordial recognition of the pleasure it had given came from an audience that filled the vast hall to its extremities.—Graphic.

BALFE.

(From the "Birmingham Daily Mail.")

Balfe's admirers can in very truth appropriate the epitaph over the resting-place of another of our "illustrious dead"—"If you want his monument look around." Of all musicians his name, in very truth and deed, is a "household word." When the higher development "cultus" has faded into nothingness, and the craze after Leitmotiven is a thing of the past, Balfe's name will still live. The reason is not far to seek. His music, although in no single instance unscientific, appeals directly to the heart, and, inasmuch as of all hearts music is the most human, Balfe's writing from this, its strong point, must stand immovable. Look where you will, open any single page of his operas at random, and you will instantly find more real melody than exists from title-page to finale in many works of a day which, disdaining the true essence of music, seeks to set forth abstruse problems which may, perhaps, astoniah the head, but never touch the heart. However, Balfe's footprints are still plainly discernible. No permanent record exists to show the appreciation of the pen whose "ripple of melody" runs evenly in all his pieces. Mr W. A. Barrett, the able and accomplished critic of the Morning Post, whose labours in this case are pre-eminently "labours of love," some months ago made a movement in this matter, and was successful in inducing the Dean and Chapter of Westminster Abbey, than which a more fitting place does not exist, to sanction the erection of a medallion at a spot in the national burial-place where the musician's name will be in kindred company. Mr Barrett, having searched through the MS. of Balfe, found three sacred movements—a "Gratias agimus" in B flat, a "Sanctus" in B flat minor, and an "Agnus Dei" in F major, and these he will edit with a view of having them incorporated in the service at which the unveiling of the medallion is to be celebrated. Dr Bridge, organist of the Abbey, has given ready help to his brother musician, and on the 20th of October a representative gathering will, doubtless, show Mr Barrett that his labour has not been in vain. It may be as well to mention that, opportunely with this event, will be issued an essay by the same writer, who has been so indefatigable in the matter, entitled Balfe: His Life and Work, and, by means of the long and exhaustive research of Mr Barrett, we shall be made familiar with much of Balfe that at present is a sealed book. This will be shortly issued by Messrs Remington.

TO SIR KAY HEDIUS.

Dear Sir Kay,—Heed not, I prythee, the white-necked, white-armed, white-fingered Isonde les Blanches Mains, who "wend there had been nothing but clipping, &c.," for if thou pratest more of her thou wilt be dubbed Kay Tedius; and that mighty Earl which hight Grip will be at thy flanks and lay waste thy lands, as he did the lands of King Howell (Hoel?) of Little Britain. Therefore abstain, and know that King Bagdemagus is at Brummagem, where the Redemption hath half-and-half bereaved him of divers sore inconsistencies and manifest improbabilities, and that he holdeth court-plenary at Hereford on the Wye from this day—Saturday. A sumptuous banquet will be spread at Castle Greyhound, the Seneschal whereof is Sir Cotton, a good knight of his hands, which scours the Marches in chariots drawn of griffins, and halteth at all good hostels and fair castles well walled and ditched. He expecteth, among other good knights, Sir Sagramore, Sir Dodinas, Sir Egg of the Out isles, Sir Ry'n who purfelled his mantle with kings' beards, and Sir Avunculus of the Ribbed Boulders. The banquet will be entabled on the eleventh day, that is to say Monday, of this moneth of September, and he warneth all to be punctually at the stroke, of which his watch (a good watch of its hands) will forewarn him that he be forearmed. On the following days, Tuesday unto Friday, the Lady Lisle, of Avelion, holdeth great jousts, where many minstrels will assemble and many good knights contest the guerdon, which is a jer-falcon, a brachet, a golden pinnace, and a trenchant glaive, like to Excalibur, which signifies cut-steel. Sir Dinadan, the force bourder, cannot be present, being engaged, with one hundred and ten knights, in searching Sir Urre's wound, that may not be healed or closed except by the best knight of the world, and that is Sir Lancelot, who of his spear and courtesy is peerless. Sir Dinadan, peraunter, may send a lay to be sung and harped by Sir Phasey, a good knight and a passing japer. Sir Carrodus (brother to Sir Turquine, of the Dolorous Tower) will also be at the jousts. Fail not, or it will anger many moe than thou deemest of.

Thine in hauberke, swerde and gyves and saddle-bow,

Petipace of Winchelsea.

Forest Perilous.

P.S.—Nimue of the Lake vouchsafeth greetings. Ware Nimue. Nimue is a great matter. Some knights she loatheth, others she loveth. I saw but now Sir Breuse saunce Pitie, hoving under an oak, all armed save the head. On beholding me he fled, and being well horsed escaped to a medow and came to a water, which he crossed incontinent, man and horse.

Colorado Springs.—Mrs Rive-King, one of the accomplished American pianists, gave a "recital" in the Operahouse on Thursday evening, August 18. She played Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata, Chopin's Rondo in E flat, an arrangement from an aria by Strauss, and one of Liszt's "Rhapsodies Hongroises. "Mrs Rive-King," says the Daily Republic, "makes the piano sing. Beneath her touch the instrument becomes endowed with some of the qualities that are specially characteristic of the human voice." The singers were Miss Simms, and Mr Finlay Finlayson, about whom the same journal says: "Miss Simms has a bright, fresh soprano voice, sings with intelligence and readily secures the sympathies of her audience. Mr. Finlayson, though suffering from hoarseness, gave evidence that he is a refined and cultivated vocalist and a thorough musician. Mr Passmore accompanied the singers admirably."

Song.

You came from the sea with the swallows, when all was lovely in May,
The month when the evening follows so slowly the long, sweet day;
You came from the sun with the flowers that breathe a dream of desire,
And glow in the noontide hours until their hearts are on fire.
You came with the songs of the season, wailed and wafted along—
You were their beautiful reason, ah! your name was a song.
There were those poppies between us, there were those cornflowers too;
You were my white Queen Venus, born of the quivering blue,
Born, new born of an ocean, far from the wistful shore,
Come with a moment's emotion, gone to return no more!

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SAGRAMORE.—"That last lyric" was so good that in it went; and, owing to wrongly-directed hypermanumissions, the request to Sir Petipace to smother it, came too late. This, much to the satisfaction of Sir Petipace himself, and every admirer of the poet, with the single exception of Sir Mador de la Porte. Sir Mador accused Queen Guenever of poisoning apples to the detriment of Sir Gawaine, who had a custom, that he ate of apples voraciously. Sir Gawaine, un-appl'y inclined at that feast, partook not of the fruit; but Sir Phelot, nigh cousin to Mador de la Porte, an hardy knight and adventurous, ate an apple, whereof he brast. Eftsoons Sir Mador arraigned Guenever of high treason; but there came a champion, which hight Lancelot du Lac, who overthrew Mador, caused him to weld himself as recreant, and saved the Queen from being shamefully brent—whereof King Arthur was glad.

To SIR PETIPACE.—Thanks. "Jack's Fancies" will be re-scanned, and will, peraunter, appear next week.—WETSTAR.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1882.

MRS SANTLEY.

Mrs Santley, wife of our eminent barytone, Mr Charles Santley, died on Friday, Sept. 1, after a long and painful illness, which she bore with exemplary fortitude. She commenced a very promising career as a soprano singer under her own name, Miss Kemble, but never appeared in public after her marriage. She was buried on Monday last at Kensal Green. The chief mourners were Mr C. Santley and his son, Mr M. Santley, Mr Santley (senior), Mr W. Santley, Dr Matthews, and Mr C. Lyall. Amongst the various friends of the deceased present were Canon Duckworth, Messrs Pittman and Aynsley Cooke, Mrs Lyall, the Misses Lyall, Miss Sherrington, Mrs and Miss Jarvis, &c., and many old servants of the family. The Rev Charles Donne, Rector of Faversham and brother-in-law of the deceased, officiated as clergyman on the occasion.

Requiescat in pace!

MEININGEN.—Mdme F. Ritter, a niece of Wagner's, will open, on the 1st prox., a dramatic school. The students will have free admission to the rehearsals and performances at the Ducal Theatre, and the most advanced will be cast for small parts. During the holidays of the company the theatre will be at the service of Mdme Ritter's pupils.

"ELIJAH" AT BIRMINGHAM.

What was stated last week with reference to the Birmingham Festival of 1882 has, up to the moment at which I write, been verified to the letter. The performance of Elijah was grand beyond expectation. Sir Michael Costa seemed bent upon showing the renowned Frenchman to whom we are indebted for the most ambitious novelty included in the programme what he and his "merry men" of the orchestra, backed by a splendid chorus following with equal zeal and decision the indications of his masterly and emphatic beat, could do, without a rehearsal, for the greatest oratorio of the century, which had not M. Gounod, through a slight attack of bronchitis, been prevented from hearing, might to a certain extent have convinced our distinguished visitor that the English, instead of being un-musical, are an eminently musical people. I venture to say that nowhere out of England could such a feat have been accomplished. Enthusiasm seemed to pervade all ranks—chorus, orchestra, and solo vocalists being equally roused to more than ordinary efforts by the example of their honoured chief. To enter into details would unnecessarily encroach upon your limited space. The names of the leading singers have already been published, and it must suffice to add that the whole of the Prophet's music was allotted to Mr Santley, who never more convincingly proved himself the Elijah of Elijahs; that Mr Edward Lloyd gave the chief tenor music, comprising the two incomparable solo airs, with even more than his accustomed fervour; that Mme Albani, leading soprano in the second division of the oratorio, gave the impressive admonition, "Hear ye, Israel," with its stimulating climax, "Be not afraid," in such a manner as to leave criticism dumb; that Miss Anna Williams, in the soprano music of Part I., showed both feeling and intelligence; and that the contralto music being shared between Mmes Trebelli and Patey, the former in the opening section, the latter in the sequel, could hardly have been in more thoroughly careful and efficient keeping. In fact, a more generally effective interpretation has seldom been recognized, and "Thanks be to God," the glorious peroration to the first part, may once more have been fairly translated by the Birmingham people as a hymn of gratitude for the lucky chance that gave them so magnificent a contribution to their ample repertory of high-class Biblical music, after the long-protracted "drought" which, with rare intermissions, had oppressed them in the interval elapsing between St Paul and Elijah. The performance was by no means less enjoyable because of the restriction imposed upon audible expressions of approval, and the prohibition (tacitly understood and willingly obeyed) of encores. This rule should be implicitly adhered to, and was adhered to to-day, when the Redemption of M. Gounod (who may never meet with such an opportunity of hearing the masterpiece of Mendelssohn as it should be heard to be fully appreciated) was wisely submitted to the same conditions.—Graphic Correspondence.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

Saturday.

With such quickness did novelty follow novelty at this Festival that it was impossible for me to keep pace with the current, and at the same time to notice every work according to the measure of its claims. In this final letter I purpose making good past omissions before stating the general results of the week's labours, and therefrom drawing certain conclusions.

Herr Gade's cantata, Psyche, demands attention before all, on account of its importance in the scheme of the Festival, and the immense favour with which it was received. The Danish composer has been very fortunate during the past week, holding his own even against M. Gounod, and producing a work which met with a reception more unanimously favourable than that accorded to Redemption. The reason is that Psyche propounded no riddles, and never, even for a moment, spoke in an unknown tongue. Its music, from first to last, was intelligible, and charged with the grace and beauty of the school that, having had Herr Gade as a pupil, now claims him as a professor. The poem also made a strong appeal to sympathy, even in its English dress. Lobedanz has handled well the beautiful Greek myth, telling the story in all its simplicity, and doing so in language of considerable fitness and charm. Its outline must be familiar to even casual readers of mythology, but for the sake of completeness, I may as well give it here.

Psyche, a maiden as pure as she is lovely, has refused to sacrifice on the altar of Venus, and been condemned by the goddess to remain upon a lonely height till a demon claims her as his bride. A zephyr and some evil genii bear her thence in the darkness, under cover of which the god Eros woos her. She accepts his love and promises, at his solemn request, never to ask his name. Eros having left Psyche for a while, her fears return, and, in a moment of despair, she demands to know who her husband is. Eros then appears but is unable to guard the maiden from the penalty of her indiscretion, and soon Psyche passes into Hades. There, stricken with remorse, she pleads with Proserpine for leave to return to earth and obtain pardon. Her entreaties finally prevail, but Proserpine warns her that the moment her foot touches earth, she will descend to Tartarus. Undismayed by this Psyche joyfully departs. Meanwhile Eros has appealed unto Zeus against the fate of his beloved, and supports Psyche in the upper air till the wings shall have grown with which she is destined to ascend to heaven. The cantata ends as the mortal, of earth no longer, is received into the abode of immortality.

Among the many versions and diversified incidents of this myth, Herr Lobedanz has certainly made a good choice. An atmosphere of poetry surrounds the whole story as he tells it, and not of poetry alone, for the tone of the work is elevated and pure in an uncommon degree. The setting it to music must have been a grateful task for the Danish master who found the subject harmonize with a taste and style that are graceful and elegant rather than heroic and commanding. In dealing with it he did not strive to get out of himself and run away from his traditions, as is frequently the case with composers now-a-days. On the contrary, the music shows Herr Gade in the light of an artist distinctly faithful to the school of his predilection. Of new-fangled ideas and modes of treatment hardly a trace can be found. From beginning to end we are conscious of that happy union of the classic and the romantic which Mendelssohn and Schumann, each in his degree and manner, so conspicuously illustrate. It will at once be assumed that Psyche is not touched by the Leit-motive craze. The work actually contains but one recurring passage, and that accompanies the words in which Venus pronounces the doom of Psyche. Each musical number, therefore, is as such an independent thing, though certain features are more or less common to all. There is, for example, a steady recognition of the fact that a work of art should be a thing of beauty. Herr Gade will have nothing to do with the precious modern dogma of the divinity of ugliness. To that frightful idol, which fanatics worship as some African tribes worship the devil, the Danish composer refuses homage; and so it happens that even when he has to paint the lugubrious or the terrible, he touches the sense of artistic beauty while sufficiently exciting the imagination. It will always be difficult to do this well, and because it is difficult, so many composers take the easy course of being merely horrible. Deducible from my remarks is the fact that Herr Gade trusts largely to the power of vocal melody, without neglecting the tunefulness of his orchestra. We do not get in Psyche declamation and little else, the voice being recognized as the most exquisite instrument music possesses, and written for accordingly. Furthermore, the Danish master's harmonies are never forced and unnatural. He does not write like a man who gropes about the keyboard of a pianoforte for disconnected chromatic chords, and when he has given the ear a succession of shocks flatters himself upon having achieved a musical purpose. In Psyche all is symmetry and ordered progression. This may excite the contempt of persons who detest symmetry, and prefer a tumultuous, head-over-heels going on. What matters it? We do not think of altering the Decalogue because a proportion of men and women find its clauses embarrassing and distasteful.

To these general remarks a word upon the more conspicuous numbers in Psyche may properly be added. The prologue, setting forth the doom of the maiden by Venus, and given wholly to the chorus, is one of Herr Gade's best efforts, varied yet always interesting. It opens the work with a command for attention impossible to refuse. A charming trio, "Psyche, hear thou what we have to teach thee," for soprano, contralto, and tenor (Zephyr and two Genii) sustains the attraction, which presently rises higher in a duet for Psyche and Eros. The composer draws upon all his resources here, with a result deserving to rank high among dramatic effusions. Strong expression and great musical interest are most happily combined. A six-voice chorus, "There comes with waving dusky robes," impressive if not elaborate, brings Part I. to an end. The second part opens with a delicious orchestral scherzo, such as would have called forth a radiant smile from the composer's early friend and patron, Mendelssohn, to whom the secret of a good scherzo was not altogether unknown. With this a trio and chorus are interwoven in masterly style. Strong dramatic interest characterizes the whole scene in which Psyche demands her husband's name, while there is absolute pathos in the duet between Psyche and her husband, "With meekness godlike noble Eros." The part ends, after the god has declared his appeal to Zeus, with a chorus, "Thou art mighty," worthy to rank among grand examples of its kind. The whole of the music in Hades is powerful and suggestive, while neither overdrawn nor overcoloured; and much in the final part deserves hearty praise, especially the air sung by Eros, "Still rests the morning twilight"; the duet, "Spread out thy pinions"; and the chorus and solos, "We greet thee well." I have left much unnoticed, but for this let the remark suffice, that Psyche contains hardly a dull, and not one ill-written bar. I cordially endorse the enthusiastic verdict of the Birmingham audience, for, though Herr Gade's cantata does not achieve the oft-times questionable feat of marking "a new departure," it is a thing of beauty that should live long to be a joy.

The orchestral Serenade in G by Mr Villiers Stanford, performed on Wednesday evening, is a work in six, or rather five movements, of which the first and last are the most important, because most fully developed on the symphonic plan. Mr Stanford has for some time held high rank among our rising composers, but more especially since his opera, The Veiled Prophet, obtained a hearing in Germany. The serenade will strengthen his position, since it is a work of which English art has reason to be proud. Its various movements are well contrasted; the orchestra is ably handled, and the themes are without exception above common-place. Moreover, the work abounds in fancy, while respecting the rules of symmetry. It is a legitimate composition, constructed, that is to say, upon classic lines with classic taste, while animated by modern spirit. Its success here was never in doubt, and its position as an able orchestral work will very soon be attained—the sooner because some of the movements, while musical from first to last, are characterized by much that appeals to the popular ear. Mr Parry's Symphony in G, while more ambitious than the serenade of the Cambridge composer, deserves to rank with it as a capital proof that English music has arrived at a Renaissance period. On some former occasions I have had to say hard things of Mr Parry's works, protesting against them as strongly marked by the pretentious crudeness and incoherence distinctive of a certain school which masks its feebleness under a pretence of progress. The symphony belongs to a different category, and distinctly encourages an idea that Mr Parry, having sown his "wild oats," has returned to ways of pleasantness and paths of peace. Not that the work is other than absolutely modern in spirit. It belongs to our own time, but has all the same intimate relations with the past—relations in point of form, and characterization of the various movements, as well as in respect of details. The first allegro exemplifies this strongly, and is, on general grounds, a capital movement, full of spirit and charm. The andante struck me, on first hearing, as less satisfactory, some portions being overworked, and consequently obscured. Against the leading theme and its treatment, however, nothing can be said. The scherzo, with its two trios, is full of fancy and beauty. This alone would serve to distinguish the composition, so admirably contrasted are the effects, which never degenerate into eccentricity. In keeping with all that goes before is the finale—a movement as remarkable for taste as musicianship. The symphony was at first intended for production at the Richter Concerts last season. Mr Parry, in view of another series of those performances, may write a second work certain of an interested and sympathetic audience. M. Gounod's new song, "The Golden Thread," composed for and sung by Mdme Patey, with orchestral accompaniment, is a setting of some sentimental verses, modelled upon Miss Proctor's "Message." It contains striking and effective passages, and is marked by intense expression, heightened by rich orchestral colour. The opening verse closely resembles in treatment M. Gounod's characteristic dealing with the Redemption narrative; but, later, the music becomes more melodious and pleasing. Concerning M. Gounod's Wedding March for orchestra, dedicated to the Duke of Albany, not much need be said. It is a pleasant little composition, of no special importance, but agreeable withal.

There now remains for me to record the financial as well as artistic success of the Festival. The largest receipts were those of Thursday (Messiah and Psyche), when £3,852 7s. 3d. was taken; next came Wednesday (Redemption and Holy City), £3,476 5s. 2d.; next, Friday (Mass in C, Mount of Olives, &c., and Redemption),

Digitized by Google

£3,528 0s. 1d.; and, next, Tuesday (Elijah and Graziella), £2,943 1s. 3d. These sums, with certain additions, make up a grand total of £15,011 3s. 8d.; or £3,306 12s. 8d. in excess of the amount received three years ago. The largest attendance (2,381) was secured by Gounod's Redemption on Friday evening, after which came Psyche (2,233), first performance of Redemption (2,196), Messiah (1,828), Elijah (1,632), Mass in C, Mount of Olives, &c. (1,513), Holy City (1,112), and Graziella (612). In all, 18,507 persons attended the performances, this number being an advance of 7,322 upon the figures of 1879. So has the public voice justified the counsel given to the committee three years ago. Lost ground has been retrieved, artistic reputation regained, and confidence in the future revived by the simple and obvious course of acting up to artistic responsibilities, and presenting the best possible thing in the best possible manner. The lesson both of decadence and restoration will not be lost, and on the principle that the burnt child dreads the fire, we may consider the Birmingham Festival safe.

I cannot conclude this letter without acknowledging much kind assistance in the discharge of duties more than usually onerous. My thanks are especially due to Mr R. H. Milward, chairman of the Strangers' Committee; to Mr. Jaffray, chairman of the General Committee; and to Mr G. H. Johnstone, whose energetic labours during the week best illustrated the value of the "new blood" which has given to the Festival a new life.—D. T.

* * * * * * *

After graphically describing the closing scene of the opera in the Grail-Castle, where Parsifal heals Amfortas' wound with a touch of the sacred spear, Lindau passes in review the more striking characteristics of the "Stage-Consecrational-Festal-play." I deeply regret that the space allotted to me in The Theatre will only allow me to reproduce a few of his pregnant remarks. "Hatred of melody," he writes, "has taken deeper root than ever in Wagner's nature. Compared with Parsifal the Nibelungen teemed with melodic phrases—passages which we might almost incline to designate as songs, ballads, airs. . . . . What Wagner's heroes have to sing in Parsifal is the negation of whatever pleases the ear—of all that our convictions (grounded on the music of composers who produced a good many tolerable works before the time of the Bayreuth Prophet) have accustomed us to describe as sweet-sounding. In this respect Kundry and Amfortas are dreadful people. At every third bar of their parts one asks one's self: 'Can this really be so?' Yes, it is so; but one feels that it might just as well, or ill, be something else. What is wrong might often be right, because what is right so often sounds wrong. . . . . In minting dramatic coins out of epic metal, Wagner has changed the characters of Eschenbach's poem, greatly to their disadvantage—none more disagreeably than that of Parsifal himself, no longer the delightful simpleton sketched in Wolfram's verse, nor even the incorporation of juvenile heroic force, like Siegfried—who catches a bear before breakfast, and slays a dragon to give him an appetite for dinner. Parsifal makes his first appearance on the stage prepossessingly enough, and courts our acquaintance as a promising youth enough. He has just shot a swan which had not done him any harm; but that would hardly be regarded as a regrettable occurrence at a time when anybody could shoot without a licence. Let us call it a piece of stupid, boyish mischief, but for goodness sake, not a crime! When Parsifal allows himself to be moved to an agony of repentance by old Gurnemanz's long, tiresome preachment, our confidence in his liveliness of disposition sensibly diminishes. Thus a whimpering mammy-child would behave, not a tight lad just escaped from his mother's apron-strings in order to assuage his insatiable thirst for action. Parsifal, however, adheres to this crushed and justly-bullied attitude until the end of the play. No bright, luminous, fiery spark, he, but a heap of grey, mourning ashes. Only once again and for a few moments, when he catches sight of the flower-girls, does he recover his youthful amiability. Subsequently he relapses into gruesome whining, and throughout the third act is a dull misanthropical zealot. Probably his external appearance contributes greatly to the depressing effect he exercises upon the audience—firstly his black cap-à-pie armour, which imparts to him an undesirable resemblance to an iron stove, and, secondly, his Biblical get-up, intended to remind us of the sublime Nazarene's affecting figure."

* * * * * *

"Quite a surprising personage is Kundry, the Accursed, who laughs at the Crucified Lord, has seduced Amfortas, would like to do him a good turn later on, but does not dare because wicked Klingsor has her in his power. With this messenger of the Grail Wagner has mixed up some elements of Herodias, the "Ever-Hideously-Laughing One." In her normal condition, Kundry, can only give utterance to a fragmentary word or two, which she accompanies with ghastly groans and hideous cachinnations. Only in the second act is her tongue loosened, so that she may wheedle Parsifal. In the third she is condemned to total silence. Kundry is eccentric—but more so in design than execution. At first she excites our interest—presently we find that we don't know what to make of her. The old Grail-King, Titurel, only lets us hear his voice once, in warning to his son, and then gets himself promptly buried. But I like this old fellow a vast deal better than I do Amfortas, who is never out of pain for a moment, and who wails, whines, and whimpers from his first bar to his last. One would like to shout at him: 'Do leave off expatiating upon your afflictions, and let us talk, just for a change, about something more entertaining than your honoured wound!' He is intended to suggest pity. I fail to rise to the naïveté of feeling that might enable me to regard this royal groaner as a tragical personage. To me he appears an utter, inveterate bore. Wagner has really no luck with his kings. Perhaps he is too incurable a republican to succeed with them. Marke, Gunther, and Amfortas make up a Royal trio of truly sovereign tiresomeness. Klingsor, again, has been but scurvily treated by Wagner. As an individual he is far too insignificant for the quantity of first-class conjuring he performs. One is justified in expecting more from a man capable of such magnificent hanky-panky as his landscape-garden trick."

"Old Gurnemanz is the most human and bearable character of the lot—the only personage of the poem who has a sensible word to say for himself, the one healthy creature in the play. All the others are crippled or sickly, some through bodily, some through mental infirmities—Titurel through old age, Amfortas by his wounds, Kundry and Klingsor by magic spells, Parsifal by his inborn ineptitude. In this libretto Richard Wagner, the most German of German poets, congenially shakes hands with Victor Hugo, the Frenchest of Frenchmen. Hugo creates Han of Iceland, Quasimodo, Triboulet, Gwynstaine—monstrosities in caves and steeples—a hunchback in motley—an artificially produced caricature of humanity. Wagner peoples the world of his artistic fancy with unnaturally diminutive dwarfs, unnaturally colossal giants, magicians, and persons bewitched."

"My opinions respecting the 'invisible orchestra' are unchanged. Its advantages are indisputable; it spreads a mysterious veil over the whole body of sound, hiding its angularities, toning its entirety down to a uniform subdued hue, poetically effective in the more solemn episodes, the proper nuance of which is twilight-grey. But, every now and then at least, there should be dawn in the orchestra! The sun should shine there bright and burning! This cannot be in the 'invisible orchestra,' which is quite forlorn of daylight and brilliancy. After its monotonous buzzing and humming, one longs for something startling—say the blare of a trumpet, as you hear a trumpet sound when you can see it. The 'unseen' is too mellow, too conciliatory; it lacks harshness of expression at passionate moments; it never cries out aloud, but only moans. . . . According to Uhland, the world waxes more beautiful from day to day; Wagner, however, in the latest of his published writings, pronounces it to have horribly deteriorated, and confesses that he would have no objection to see our whole contemptible vile culture trodden under foot and annihilated. Not unnaturally, when he opens his mouth, sensitive souls begin to feel rather uncomfortable; for nobody knows what may come next!"

WM. BEATTY-KINGSTON.

LADY FRANCES H. CECIL'S "PARADISE FOUND."—"It is a pity," says Heine somewhere, "that our great public knows so little about poetry; almost as little, in fact, as our poets." One is reminded of this strange dictum on the part of the "wittiest of poets, the most poetical of wits," by an avowal from Lady Frances H. Cecil in the preface to the "Paradise Found"—an avowal frankly made, which one or two malicious critics have had the bad taste to turn against her. It was not until Lady Frances had nearly finished her little work that she chanced to hear of Milton's having treated the same theme under a similar title. It matters nothing what an author has read, provided he can give the world something worth reading; and this is just what Lady Frances has done. Her "Paradise Found" is far indeed from being a result of the study of other poets. It abounds in passages of meditation and aspiration which are perfectly spontaneous, and must be accepted as the direct expression of Lady Frances' own thoughts and feelings. "Paradise Found" is followed by a number of small poems, some of which are not only musical in themselves, but musical also in the sense of suggesting and inviting musical setting.—S. S.

PROVINCIAL.

BIRMINGHAM.—Mr Stephen S. Stratton has issued the prospectus of his fourth season of "Popular Chamber Concerts." The dates fixed on are Monday evenings, September 25, October 30, and December 4, of the present year; January 29, February 26, and March 26, for 1883. The subscription for the series is 10s. and 5s., and for single concerts the admission is 2s. and 1s. The programmes will be compiled mainly from the standard works of the great masters. Some novelties will be introduced, including the octet for strings by the Norwegian composer, Johann S. Svensden. Native art will be represented by a MS. composition by F. E. Bache; a quintet by Onslow; a trio for pianoforte and strings by the late John Henry Griesbach; a work by the late Charles Lucas (Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, and for many years principal violoncellist at our musical festivals); a new quartet for strings by Ebenezer Prout; and the repetition of Mr Stanford's quartet in F.

RYE.—The Rye "gentlemen amateurs" lately organized an evening entertainment at the Cinque Ports Hotel. The room was filled, and the audience were the élite of the neighbourhood. Mr William Dawes presided, and after a few introductory remarks the pianoforte solo, "Fête Champêtre" (Tito Mattei), was executed by Miss Harston, whose brilliant performance was loudly applauded. "The three jolly sailor boys" (Marzials') having been sung by Mr Ernest Vidler, Miss Harston gave with heartfelt expression, "She wandered down the mountain side!" The next song was "Good Company," by Mr T. G. Sharpe, and then Mr William Dawes recited Tennyson's "Lady Godiva," which was listened to with rapt attention, only broken at the conclusion by marks of approbation from the audience. Miss Harston followed with Molloy's "My love has gone a-sailing," which she rendered so effectively that an encore was insisted on, but without effect, the fair vocalist substituting "What is love?" to which, however, was accorded an equally hearty reception. "The arrow and the song" (Balfe) having been next sung by Mr French, Mr Ernest Vidler followed with Adams' "Midshipmite," and Mr Walter Dawes with a humorous reading, "Summer Gardening." The musical part of the entertainment concluded with the "Sol-fa duet," admirably sung by Miss Harston and Mr T. G. Sharpe.

SHEFFIELD.—The Royal English Opera Company, which has been playing for some time in London, commenced its provincial tour at the Sheffield Theatre on Monday night, when not only the lower-priced seats, but the boxes were well filled. The company is a very strong and capable one, and the casts are almost entirely made up with the familiar names of operatic vocalists who have frequently appeared here. Amongst these are Mdme Blanche Cole, Mdme Rose Hersee, Mr Aynsley Cooke, Mr Charles Lyall, and Mr Frederick Packard—indeed, it is difficult, almost, to believe that Carl Rosa is not directing the orchestra, and that it is not his company, endeavouring to gain additional laurels under another name. Such, however, is not the case. The company is a comparatively new one; but with such names and good management it is sure to obtain considerable celebrity on tour. The opera chosen on Monday night was Gounod's Faust, and it was given with very great success. Mdme Blanche Cole, who appeared as Marguerite, was in excellent voice, and her singing and acting, especially in the Jewel Scene, were highly commendable. Miss Ellen Armstrong, as Siebel, acted with much grace, and her sweet singing created a very favourable impression. Mr Richard Temple needs no praise. Perhaps his personation of Mephistopheles was scarcely so humorous as Mr Celli's; still it was a very clever, sardonic performance, by no means belieing the character of Lucifer. Mr Aynsley Cooke, who was announced in the programme to take the rôle of Valentine, was unable to appear, but the part was creditably represented by Mr James Sauvage. Faust was admirably personated by Mr Frederick C. Packard, who delineated the old student and gay, eager lover with equal talent. The dresses were rich, and the orchestra fully up to its work—indeed the début of the company was exceedingly gratifying.—Sheffield Independent.

SOUTHSEA.—Miss Alice Roselli has been fulfilling a week's engagement at the Pavilion on the new pier. Her first appearance was made last Saturday, and she was at once taken into popular favour. Her success was confirmed on Monday, when she sang Signor Tito Mattei's "Non torno," Meyerbeer's "Robert, toi que j'aime," Signor Pinsuti's "Heaven and Earth," and Milton Welling's "Dreaming," three out of which (the first, third and fourth) were encored. I shall be surprised if Miss Roselli's success does not lead to her re-engagement at this establishment, and, moreover, attract the attention of the managers of musical entertainments at other seaside resorts.—L. S.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The Michaelmas term will commence on Monday, Sept. 18, and terminate on Saturday, Dec. 16.

CONCERTS.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.—On Wednesday Miss Ella Lemmens, the daughter of that deservedly popular and highly accomplished vocalist, Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington, made her first appearance. The able rendering by the youthful débutante of Rode's "Air with variations" proved her to be in complete command of a powerful voice, most carefully trained, and a very cordial reception was soon followed by well-merited plaudits attesting the great pleasure Miss Ella Lemmens had afforded the audience, who, it may be added, prolonged their applause, till Mr Crowe led the young songstress back to comply with the spontaneous wish for a repetition of the air. Later in the evening Miss Ella Lemmens had the opportunity of further delighting her auditors with Wallace's song from The Amber Witch, beginning, "My long hair is braided with mountain daisies gay."—D. T.

ROYAL AQUARIUM.—On Wednesday morning Captain Hobson introduced a Javanese band of eighteen performers who played on different musical instruments, stringed and percussion, manufactured in their country (the Island of Java). The entertainment the performers give is entirely a musical one, with occasional dances by four young women. These illustrate the true Oriental dance of rhythmic movements (commonly known as the Nautch), with the occasional use of the voice. The party have come direct from Djoojokarta, vid Batavia, and it is believed that this is the first time a number of performers sufficient to constitute an orchestra, or Gamelan, has left the country together. They are dressed in silk and cotton materials of native production, which of themselves will interest those who give attention to æsthetic dress. Ethnologists, Musicians, and Art Connoisseurs will find this visit of Javanese affords an unusually favourable opportunity for study.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

Of course the musical season is going on "furiously," and M. Bérard has provided us with plenty of popular operas—to wit, Les Huguenots, Robert le Diable, La fille de Mdme Angot, La Juive, and last—not least—Giroflé-Giroflà. I say "not least," because it was put upon the boards in better style than the others. La Muette de Portici was given last night, with M. C. Robert as Masaniello—but he left much to be desired. Mdlle Hasselmans is always the same—a charming singer, and an accomplished actress. Guillaume Tell and Les Cloches de Corneville will be given next week.—The concerts continue at the Etablissement. Whether it be the fault of the conductor, or the unwillingness of the orchestra to follow his "beat," I cannot say, but "light and shade," as well as time, are almost ignored. (M. Etesse, the conductor, not being a Boulonnais, may account for it.)—We are having a very bad season, and not many English visitors are here to make the fortunes of the hotel proprietors.

THE SPRING IS COMING WITH THE FLOWERS.*

A SONG.

The Spring is coming with her flowers,
To bid the heaven and earth be gay;
To breathe a pledge of happier hours,
And chase all gloomy thoughts away.
The young birds hear her welcome voice,
And mid the budding trees rejoice;
I join them in their song of gladness,
And feel the happiness I see;
Yet I have known no thought of sadness
Since I knew thee!

Mine are the prouder hopes of life,
The hopes that cannot dread decay
That sees no evil, fears no strife,
To meet and grapple on the way;
The thoughts that thrill, the joys that bless—
That language never can express—
All—all are mine—my bosom's treasure—
Hopes, joys, and thoughts—the happy three—
My life hath been a life of pleasure
Since I knew thee!

For all these gifts what can I find—
What offering wilt thou keep?
A changeless faith—a constant mind—
Devotion pure and deep—
Unwearing thoughts of thee and thine?
These, my soul's idol, shall be thine;
My heart I give not—that alone
My offering cannot be—
For ah! it never was my own
Since I knew thee!

CHERUBINI.

This first great success achieved in France was well calculated to delight and encourage Cherubini. Yet two years elapsed before he undertook another work, and his Catalogue at this period mentions scarcely anything save various vocal pieces, some of which were written for the Italian operas, Il Burbero di buon core, Le Vendemmie, La Pazza d'amore, La Cosa rara, La Locandiera, &c., performed at the Théâtre Feydeau. It is true that political events, which were advancing to a crisis, stopped his fecundity even in this way, and induced him to quit Paris, at least for a short time. The day of the 10th August, 1792, which caused all the theatres to close temporarily, so alarmed all the Italian singers that, availing themselves of a special clause in their engagements, they insisted on being set free and left France as quickly as they could.* This completely broke up the artistic body at the Théâtre Feydeau, the company of French actors having been dissolved a few months previously as a measure of economy. But this was not all; the management itself was soon afterwards disorganized. Léonard, who had taken an active part in the Varennes episode, was obliged to flee so as to escape the dangers which threatened him, while Viotti, who had become suspected, on account of his former relations with the Queen and Court, deemed it expedient to withdraw also, and seek refuge at least provisionally in England; even Martini had to conceal himself from all eyes. The French singers, abandoned by everyone and reduced to their own resources, formed themselves into a commonwealth, like their colleagues at the Salle Favart, and remained alone at Feydeau. As for Cherubini, finding that for the moment he was not required, he profited by his forced leisure to go and take a little rest at a country house which his friend Louis, the famous architect of the Grand-Théâtre, Bordeaux, and of the Odéon, possessed at La Chartreuse de Gaillon, near Rouen. He felt all the more comfortable there, because Mad. Louis, a charming and most graceful lady, was a distinguished musician, who once brought out at the Théâtre Favart, in 1776, a little comic opera, entitled Fleur d'Epine; because, also, he was in the society of two other friends, M. Ethis and his wife; and because the latter combined with a very pleasing voice real talent as a singer.

Cherubini spent at La Chartreuse the end of 1792 and nearly the whole of 1793. He had not been there long when he heard of the death of his father, who had just passed away in Florence, on the 10th September, 1792, aged 72. The blow was a severe one for him, as the reader will easily believe, and we see in consequence that all that remained of this year, 1792, glided by without his writing the least thing. It was not till the next year that he again applied himself to work, and the following is what is mentioned in his Catalogue under this date:—"'La Libertà' and 'La Palinodie à Nice,' canzoni by Metastasio, set to music for two voices, at La Chartreuse de Gaillon, near Rouen, for Mdme Ethis; two trios, with violin and pianoforte accompaniment, composed at La Chartreuse aforesaid, for the saint's day of M. Louis, architect; 'Berenice, che fai?' recit. and air, composed for Mdme Ethis, at La Chartreuse; 'L'Exil,' romance, composed at La Chartreuse for the same lady; Koukouryi, unpublished three-act opera, not completed; the overture and a portion of the finale are wanting." The notice dictated to de Beauchesne contains the following additional piece of information:—"Cherubini spent nearly the whole of this year (1793) at La Chartreuse de Gaillon, where he began and set to music the opera of Elisa ou le Mont Saint-Bernard, in two acts, by Révéroni Saint-Cyr."

We now come to an important event in Cherubini's life, that of his marriage. He knew in Paris an artist named Tourette, one of the musicians attached to the Chapel Royal, and, from the Year VI. to the Year XII., professor of solfeggio at the Conservatory. This Tourette, a skilful musician doubtless — but pretty well unknown for all that, seeing that I have been unable to find out anything about him—had a daughter, Mdlle Anne-Cécile Tourette, an amiable young person, very pretty, we are told, and of very superior intellect. Cherubini had been smitten with her, and, as early as 1792, had written and dedicated to her a romance entitled: "L'Amitié." On his return to Paris, he renewed his relations with the family, succeeded in rendering himself agreeable to the young lady, demanded her hand, obtained it, and married her in August, 1794, as he himself informs us with his usual precision:† "I was married in Paris, on the 12th April, 1794, at 7 o'clock in the evening, at the Commune, to Mdlle Anne-Cécile Tourette." The union was as happy as could possibly be desired. Cherubini and his wife, who loved each other tenderly, lived together for forty-eight years in the most perfect harmony, and, when the great man died in 1842, not a cloud had ever obscured their constant accord—nothing had been able to alter their mutual affection.

It was in the same year, 1794, and only a few weeks after his marriage, that Cherubini was called on to join the musicians of the National Guard, a fact which had more influence on his subsequent career than might be supposed. He refers to it in these terms:—

"1794. I was named a member of the musical corps of the National Guard, from which corps the Conservatory of Music sprang. My nomination was dated the 1st Messidor, Year II. of the Republic."‡

And d'Ortigue, in the article he devoted to Cherubini in the Encyclopédie du XIXe Siècle, makes this remark:

"On the 1st Messidor, Year II., Cherubini was appointed a member of the musical corps of the National Guard; the triangle part was assigned him. We mention the fact because this musical corps served to form the Conservatory. The triangle-player became one of the inspectors of the institution."

After being one of the inspectors and then one of the professors, Cherubini subsequently became the director, and made the Conservatory the first school of music in Europe and the entire universe.§

The charming and always popular Ada Cavendish has just completed a successful engagement at the Theatre Royal, Birmingham, during which she has played, with unvarying applause, Juliet, Beatrice (Much Ado About Nothing), the heroine of The Lady of Lyons, and Lady Gay Spanker, in Dion Boucicault's ever fresh and welcome London Assurance.

The Philharmonic Theatre, Islington, has been burnt. The stage and the seats were destroyed and the roof fell in. The fire was fortunately confined to the interior of the premises. The frontage of the structure, the property and dressing rooms, the billiard saloon, and the refreshment bars remain intact; and, viewed from the outside, there is no indication of the disaster within. The building is said to be insured.

ST PETERSBURGH.—Among the operas promised at the Imperial Italian Theatre is Mignon, the heroine to be alternately represented by Mdlle Ferni and Mdme Sembrich, the former singing the Galli-Marié, the latter the Christine Nilsson version.

MUNICH.—The programme at the Theatre Royal for this season will include as novelties—Die Wikinger, by Ivar Hallström; Der betrogene Kadi, by Gluck; and Alfonso und Estrella, by Schubert. Among the revivals will be Marschner's Templer und Jüdin, Spohr's Jessonda, Spontini's Vestalin, Schumann's Genoveva, Adam's Brasseur de Preston, Halévy's Eclair and Mousquetaires de la Reine, Verdi's Ernani, Rheinberger's Thürmer's Töchterlein, Mendelssohn's Heimkehr aus der Fremde and Walpurgisnacht.

§ This, in my opinion, is the place for a note of interrogation. At what epoch was Cherubini naturalized a Frenchman? He was so assuredly in 1800, for, in his Dictionnaire néologique des hommes et des choses, of which the only three volumes published appeared in the Year VIII., Cousin Jacques expressed himself thus in the article he devoted to the artist whom so many works had already rendered illustrious:—"Cherubini, born at Florence, naturalized a Frenchman, one of the Inspectors of the Conservatory of Music, is undeniably one of our most learned, most ingenious, and most pleasing composers." Cherubini was, therefore, naturalized when Cousin Jacques wrote these lines. But how long had he been so? This is something it has been impossible for me to discover. I am inclined, however, to believe that he was already naturalized in 1794, when he was admitted into the musical corps of the National Guard; for it strikes me that, at a time of universal war, a foreigner would not have been admitted into a body almost military and essentially national. In all probability it was at the epoch of his marriage that Cherubini sent in his request to become a member of the great French family.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

It may be said that the story of Fidelio falls naturally into two divisions; as, in the life of every human creature, there is that which appears to the outer world and that which appears to the inner self. These two divisions of the story of Fidelio coincide with the two acts into which the drama is divided, and the two distinct parts of the music, each of which gathers up to its own climax or finale.

The act which we have already gone through constitutes the outside world of the story, including the domestic life of the gaoler and his daughter and her lovers, the governor and his soldiers, and the prisoners; and all the time it has been gradually dawning upon us who are in the audience, that there is a grievous trouble in the background. The overture prepared us for it, the prison walls kept up the feeling, the constant anxiety of Fidelio, and the discovery, by the audience, that she is not the lad whom her companions deem her, but a wife seeking to release her imprisoned husband; the rage of Pizarro against the prisoner Florestan, who is in his power, and the miserable plan that he makes for his destruction—all these things serve to point out in what direction the mystery lies, and to pile up the interest of the story as it appears to the audience.

Now, in this second act, we plunge at once into the inside world—we start, as it were, a fresh story. Not Fidelio, but Florestan is the centre of this new interest; and, as we follow up his course, we find the connection between the two stories and how the two rivulets join and make one large river of interest, how Florestan himself is the inner-self of the story, the origin, the motive power which moves the whole action of the story.

In England, the overture Leonora, No. 3, which we have described at the beginning, is frequently played between the two acts. This, though justifiable by the agreement of the spirit of the overture with that of the beginning of Act II., is not in accordance with the design as left by Beethoven.

The act opens within the dungeon where Florestan is—alone and in chains. An introductory symphony, which is in fantasia form, helps to make us feel the silence and the gloom; and in that stillness Florestan utters his thoughts, which are set as a scena and aria. His first words are in somewhat broken sentences, and express his feeling of the gloom and terrible stillness of this deserted place where nothing lives but himself. "O heavy trial," he cries; yet, God's will is just, and he will not murmur, for the measure of suffering is in His hands. These words, often changing in their expression, are set in accompanied recitative. Some of the interludes are quoted from the introductory symphony, and point out, by their union with these words, what was their intended meaning in that; for instance:

Ex. 206.

and—

Ex. 207.

After the recitative, the words of Florestan become calmer and more settled in expression, and the music becomes more continuous and in rhythmic form. There are several changes of idea in the words which accord easily with a rondo form of key. He bewails the joy that has vanished from his life while still in its spring-time (Ex. 180). This, the principal idea of the rondo, is the thought which Beethoven seems to have had in his mind more than any other in the composition of the opera, a fact which confirms the impression that Florestan is the motive power of the whole drama; it is retained in each of the three overtures called Leonora, and it is also in a MS. sketch in existence, which was evidently intended for an introduction to the overture in E, called Fidelio. Next, Florestan tells how in past days he boldly spoke the truth, and that chains are the reward that he willingly bears. This is the episode in changing keys. Still he has the sweet consolation that he has done his duty; and this thought brings back the original key, though with a fresh musical idea. All these three ideas are in the same quiet manner, and comprise the slow part of the aria. Now Florestan's thoughts change; he is still calm, but an ecstacy fills his weak, starved frame. He fancies a balmy air breathing over him, a light streaming into this his grave, and thinks he sees an angel like Leonora his wife coming close to him and leading him away to freedom in the heavenly kingdom. This thought rests in his mind and he dwells on it, and so the music belonging to it is also continuous and with repetition of idea. It is in the form of a rondo as to its keys, but it is so quick and so short that the feeling of the main key, F, scarcely leaves us, and the new keys are more like transient digressions within the one key—like magnified chords of the key rather than actual changes from the key. In the accompaniment of this movement one hautboy is the only wind instrument, and it takes a continuous and prominent part that is scarcely second even to that of the voice.

Ex. 208.

A-round me,

May it not be that Beethoven intended by this to express the nearness of Leonora—the presence which, while he knew not that she was there, came to him like a waking dream in his long night? In such a way does the rosy hue in the west speak to those who are living under the shadow of great mountains, and tell them that the sun is rising and will soon drive away the darkness and the cold; and presently the light comes streaming down the side of the mountain and floods all around with light—even the mountain, which before was like a weight of trouble, is now buoyant with sunshine.

"In front the sun climbs slow, how slowly,
But westward, look, the land is bright!"—CLOUGH.

WAIFS.

Messrs Gye and Harris have, we understand, mutually agreed that Covent Garden shall not be let for pantomime this Christmas, and that Drury Lane shall not be sublet for Italian opera next summer. Thus, so far as the large West-end houses are concerned, pantomime will be confined to Drury Lane, while Mr Gye will reign supreme in Italian opera at Covent Garden.—Daily News. (Bravo Gye!—bravo Harris! Italian opera is not dead after all.—DR BLIDGE.)

Albert Vinzentini has left Paris for St Petersburgh.

Luigi Mancinelli is at Arezzo. (Per Hercle!—DR BLIDGE.)

Mr A. O'Leary and family have returned to town from Windermere.

The Municipality of Palermo have voted the Town Theatre 50,000 francs for next season.

C. F. Chickering started from New York for England on the 26th ult. (Hoch!—DR. BLIDGE.)

Victorin Joncières has returned to Paris from the Pyrenees. (This surpasses belief.—DR BLIDGE.)

F. Nicolao is organizing Popular Concerts in Palermo. (This is scarcely credible.—DR BLIDGE.)

Mr Henry Parry has returned from his tour in Scotland, and has joined his family at Eastbourne.

Lecocq has composed the music of a new comic opera, Le Cœur et la Main, book by Nuitter and Beaumont.

Gailhard, the bass, is at Biarritz. ("Not by no means" says Gailhard, see Le Ménestrel.—DR BLIDGE.)

Adele Dorn, sister of Professor Heinrich Dorn, and well-known in musical circles, died recently at Berlin.

Hermann Götz's Widerspenstigen Zähmung (Taming of the Shrew) is to be produced at Dresden and Würzburg.

The Order of the Italian Crown has been conferred on Massart, professor of the violin in the Paris Conservatory.

Mr Finlay Finlayson has left New York for Colorado Springs, which he intends to make his permanent residence.

Before proceeding to the Russian capital, Mad. Sembrich visits Madrid, where she will sing in Mignon and Hamlet.

Battistini, the Barytone, is engaged for the coming Italian season at the Teatro Real, Madrid. (Query, Battistini?—DR BLIDGE.)

According to the local papers, Miss Emma Thursby ("the divine") is expected in America about the middle of this month.

The buffo opera, Der Graf von Gleichen, by the younger Hellmesberger, has been performed at the Centralhallen-Theater, Hamburgh.

Letters from Bayreuth state that Parsifal, Tristan, Tannhäuser, and, not improbably, Lohengrin, will be given at Wagner's Theatre next July.

By a majority of votes, the proprietors have passed a resolution to close the theatre of the Liceo at Barcelona.—(Hopeless fatuates!—Dr Blitge.)

Dr Franz Krückl, the Hamburg baritone, is engaged for Angelo Neumann's Wagner tour. (Off with his head!—so much for Krückl.—Dr Blitge.)

Joseffy, the flashful Austrian pianist, lately completed a first Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Key, C major. (A good beginning.—Dr. Blitge.)

Professor Haupt, director of the Royal Institute for Church Music at Berlin, celebrated on his 72nd birthday his fiftieth official anniversary as an organist.

C. Pinsuti, ("Ciro il Grande") was recently in Milan for a short time.—(This accounts for his not being at Birmingham for the Redemption.—Dr Blitge.)

London Academy of Music.—The autumn term of Dr. Wylde's Institution commences in London on Monday, Sept. 25, and in Brighton on Saturday, Sept. 23.

Baron Gaetano Crescimanno's Maria Tiepolo, first produced in 1877, at the Teatro Argentina, Rome, has been performed with success at the Teatro Real, Malta.

A new opera, Manfredi di Sveva, by Giribaldi, was produced a short time since at the Teatro Solis, Montevideo.—(Connu—connu—connu! Pendu—pendu—pendu!—Dr Blitge.)

Ch. M. Widor, at some distance from Lyons is engaged upon a three-act score for the Opéra-Comique. (Ch. M. Widower, at some distance from Lyons is similarly employed.—Dr Blitge.)

At her urgent wish, Mdme Basta has been freed from her engagement at the Theatre Royal, Dresden. (Basta! basta!—Who's Mdme Basta that she should urgently wish anything?—Dr Blitge.)

After many years' silence in Germany, De Vroye, the flautist, has been playing at Baden. (The ruined Castle in the o'er-shadowing woods has, with the aid of winds, emitted sounds congenial.—Dr Blitge.)

Mdlles Mayrs and Nowak, sopranos, and Mdlle Friede, contralto, pupils of Mdme Marchisio, have been engaged by Galletti, and make their first appearance in Florence. (Mdme Marchisio has many too many pupils by many.—Dr Blitge.)

Sister Agnes, the nun, whom Parepa-Rosa pronounced the grandest singer she ever heard, and to whom Maurice Strakosch offered 50,000 dollars for a six months' season, died not long since near Baltimore, U.S.—(500,000 was the sum.—Dr Blitge.)

Having resolved to erect a new theatre, the Municipality of Cracow despatched qualified persons to examine the leading houses in Italy, and send in a report. The result is, that the Theatre in Cracow will be built on the model of the Teatro Costanzi, Rome.

Mr William Dorrell, who has been making a tour through Norfolk and Suffolk, has returned to town. He purposes, we believe, spending the remainder of his vacation in exploring the Thames and its tributaries from mouth to source, "paddling his own canoe."

The Ducal Theatre at Dessau, no longer ruled by an amateur "Intendant," will be placed under the control of a professional director. (The change is unspeakably for the better, amateur dabblers, aristocratic or plebeian, being the curse of all art.—Dr Blitge.)

On Thursday evening, shortly before nine p.m., a fire occurred on the premises of Messrs Eaves & Sons, pianoforte manufacturers, Euston Road, which were entirely destroyed. The cause is at present unknown. The premises, we believe, are partially insured.

The Warrington Musical Scholarship (value £45) is to be competed for by blind boys on October 3, at the Blind College, Worcester. The examination will be in ordinary English, Bible history, the elements of the Christian religion, the rudiments of Latin or French, and Music.

Falchi has been commissioned to write the Requiem, to be executed by the Philharmonic Society in the Pantheon, Rome, on the 9th January, in memory of Victor Emmanuel. (Oh Falchi, Falchi! wherefore art thou Falchi? Thou has nor hawk nor faulchion. Beware, my Falchi, lest thou tread on Verdi's shins!—Dr Blitge.)

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

FESTIVAL OF THE THREE CHOIRS.

Hereford, Tuesday.

The Festival opened this morning under most favourable circumstances, of which glorious weather was not the least auspicious. Hereford differs from Birmingham in being, to a large extent, dependent upon meteorological conditions. Its audience gathers from all the region round about instead of massing for the week in a great town; and days of rain are, therefore, days of ruin. The Festival prospers most when the sun shines as it did this morning, and as it is shining now upon the pleasant country. Hearty are the consequent congratulations, especially as the cathedral city stands decked in brave attire, which a downpour would make most miserable. Time and again, for years past, I have urged the three associated towns to put themselves thoroughly en fête on these occasions. It is not enough to hang out a few flags. As much would be done in honour of a cattle show; but no more has been attempted till now. Hereford leads the way of reform, as becomes a place which, if small in dimensions, is great in spirit. I do not forget how firmly the city on the Wye stood up for the Festival when its very existence was threatened by zeal without discretion; nor can I fail to bear in mind that it was the first to give evening performances in the cathedral, and to recognize the fact that Beethoven's symphonies are not necessarily "profane." Again I have to say "Well done Hereford!" for the streets are now made bright by something better than bunting. Triumphal arches span them with inscriptions of welcome, and mottoes in honour of art and artists; Venetian masts, gay with banneroles, line the pavements, and many houses are decorated with taste and effect. The Festivals may be retrograding, as some people, who know nothing at all about them, tell us, but these things are no indication of backwardness. On the contrary, they manifest a spirit of progress worthy of recognition and applause, and certain to be appreciated by everybody who knows how much good is done by a week of music like the present. The Hereford Festival has no reason to be ashamed of itself in any particular. A "London amateur," it is true, may not be drawn by it over the hundred and forty miles of intervening space; but before the London amateur complains he should be certain that the Festival is intended for him, and that he is at all necessary to it.

A full choral service took place this morning, in accordance with ancient precedent, but without the co-operation of band and chorus as at Worcester last year. The absence of these important accessories was a disadvantage which the authorities might well take into consideration in view of future festivals. Something may, perhaps, be said on the other side; yet the balance is in favour of a custom which began with the life of the institution and was only suspended when the musical performances came to be regarded as no better than concerts. Nothing would be lost, at any rate, by spreading the interest of the occasion over as wide a space as possible, and by giving to those who cannot afford the purchase of tickets a direct concern in its welfare. The success of the grand services at Worcester last year was most marked. Setting aside all other considerations, those solemnities secured the goodwill of an entire population for an artistic event which otherwise would have appealed to no more than a section. It must not be supposed, however, that musical value was entirely wanting to the opening act of worship as conducted here. Members of the three choirs of Hereford, Worcester, and Gloucester took part in it; Mr C. H. Lloyd presided very ably at the organ, and Dr Walmisley's excellent anthem, "The Lord shall comfort Zion," was given with considerable effect, in addition to the late Dr Wesley's Te Deum and "Jubilate" in E. The festival sermon was preached by the Rev Sir G. H. Cornewall, Bart., from the text, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another"—words admirably suited to an occasion on which the claims of charity were paramount. A more practical discourse could not have been desired, nor could the fact have been more clearly set forth that the Western Festival is, as at present constituted, a means to an end; in other words, a consecration of music to the noble duty of consoling the "widow and fatherless in their affliction."

Mendelssohn's Elijah followed the service after an interval, and served once more to fill the cathedral with interested listeners. There was not the smallest sign that the great dramatic oratorio is losing its popularity and becoming less efficacious for the purpose it has here served so long. Every appearance spoke to the contrary—the animated streets, the steady influx of visitors by road and rail, the full cathedral, and the lively interest which attended the music from first to last. In view of all this a proposal to remove Elijah from the programme in favour of any "epoch-making" work you please, would have seemed, what, indeed, it would have been, a sheer absurdity. Figures alone will serve as proof. The average attendance at Elijah in 1870-73-76 was 1,132; in 1879 the number present reached 1,351; and to-day 1,394. In face of such a result he must be a bold man who advises the committee to throw over the trustworthy oratorio for a risky novelty. On my own part, I rejoice at the continued favour shown to Elijah. While that work and the Messiah remain dear, the English heart may be regarded as musically sound and healthy.

The oratorio was preceded by a short form of prayer, as is now the wholesome and reverent rule; the Bishop of Hereford giving the Benediction at its close. Concerning the performance I need not speak at length, especially as the principal artists were, with only one exception, those who sang in Elijah at Birmingham. Mdme Albani and Miss Anna Williams divided the soprano solos; Mdme Patey and Miss Hilda Wilson shared those for contralto; Mr Lloyd took the tenor airs; and Mr Santley impersonated the Hebrew prophet in his own matchless way, singing with a fervour and spirit worthy of his fame. All did well, and even better than usual, stimulated, perhaps, by their impressive surroundings, and moved to sing, as the audience were moved to hear, in a thoroughly religious spirit. The concerted numbers gained by the co-operation of Miss Marian Fenna, Miss Parratt, Messrs Frederiks, Boyle, Stanley Smith, and F. King; Mr Done presided at the organ, and Mr Langdon Colborne conducted with as much discretion and success, perhaps, as it was reasonable to look for in view of his inexperience. That the chorus distinguished itself will be taken for granted. A body of voices so excellent, engaged upon a work so familiar, could do no other. The amount collected at the doors was £283 1s. 1d.

The concert given in the Shire Hall this evening did not attract a large audience, for the reason, perhaps, that its programme contained a novelty by an English composer. Theirs was the loss who stayed away, since the music of Collins's Ode to the Passions, by Mrs Meadows White (Alice Mary Smith), is very well written. and both true and forcible in its expression. A more inviting theme could hardly have been lighted on than this, which extends over the whole range of feeling, under conditions, however, which remove it in an appreciable degree from that treated by Handel when he set Dryden's "Cecilian Ode." I shall return to the cantata for the sake of its musical significance, but may now indicate its scope and method. The work is introduced by a short orchestral movement, allegro, leading without break to a chorus, "When Music, Heavenly Maid," in which the passions of Fear, Anger, and Despair are illustrated after a varied manner with incidental solos and characteristic choral episodes. Hope next gives occasion for a soprano air, "But though of Hope with eyes so fair;" a baritone solo, "And longer had she sung," subsequently expressing Revenge and Pity. Jealousy is treated in a chorus, "Thy numbers, Jealousy, to nought were fixed;" and Melancholy in a trio for female voices, "With eyes upraised, as one inspired." Cheerfulness follows in a chorus, "Oh, how altered its sprightlier tone;" after which comes Joy in a tenor solo, "Last came Joy's ecstatic trial." Love and Mirth follow in a duet, "Love framed with Mirth," for soprano and tenor, and then we reach the finale, "Oh, Music, sphere-descended maid." From this mere outline of the form of the work it must be obvious that Mrs Meadows White set herself no easy task. Regarding its discharge, she has no reason whatever to be ashamed. The music may not claim the homage due to originality. The fact, perhaps, is all in its favour, seeing what form originality generally takes. But, however this may be, each number is interesting, by reason of artistic treatment, and a very marked approach towards the expression demanded. On this matter something must be left for future discussion. Enough now that the new work made a lively effect, was well received, and so much applauded at its close that the composer had to acknowledge the compliment from the orchestra. Beethoven's overture to Egmont and a number of miscellaneous selections, including the prelude to Les deux Journées, made up the remainder of the programme.

Wednesday.

It may be that Dr. Hans von Bülow scorns the character of a representative man, and it is, perhaps, fortunate that on some matters few people agree with him. Still there is a possibility that he expresses more than his own opinion when pouring contempt upon the claims of woman to have even a capacity for musical eminence. The better part of humanity cannot be denied distinction in executive branches of the art, nor will the doctor's diatribes make anybody think less of his favourite aversion—the "petticoat pianist." It is true, however, that the whole power of feminine ambition has not produced an eminent composer. The reason for this would be an interesting, and, no doubt, difficult enquiry, but my present business is rather to prove the rule by an exception than to investigate causes. An exception to the rule of woman's non-productivity in the higher labours of musical art is undoubtedly supplied by Mrs Meadows White's Ode to the Passions, which I briefly noticed yesterday. The work, however, has about it nothing that can be called distinctly feminine, and, therefore, is not "epoch-making." For distinctively feminine music of a high order we have still to wait, with plenty of time to speculate upon the character it will bear and the influence it will wield when, if ever, it comes. Doing this we can easily imagine the opening up of a new world by the female composer who, with all the fine instincts and acute sensibility of her sex, writes music as a woman, and not as a more or less feeble imitator of men. Mrs Meadows White may accomplish the feat and immortalize her name; but her Ode to the Passions is simply a striking reproduction of masculine art. The woman does not appear in it. Firmness, vigour, and strength mark the treatment of conceptions which are massive rather than graceful and elegant. This arises, no doubt, from the character of a subject that demands the muscular grip of a Handel, who, by the way, illustrated it—we all know how—in his Alexander's Feast. The degree of Mrs White's success in meeting the requirements of a theme so virile is decidedly surprising. She shrinks from none of its varied aspects, and in no case can it be said that she is beaten by them to the point of utter failure. The interested inquirer will naturally test this by reference to her treatment of the stronger passions, only to find that the composer is here most satisfactory. Mrs White's setting of the lines "First, Fear, his hand its skill to try," produces quite a Handelian effect with its vigorous counterpoint and massive ensemble passages. A tenor solo, "Anger rushed, his eyes on fire," is scarcely less forcible in propriety and suggestiveness, while the broadly harmonized phrases descriptive of "Wan Despair" give another proof that the composer has well studied the great Saxon master. Admirable, too, is the bass solo contrasting Revenge and Pity. The Revenge portion of this number employs only simple means, but they are used with a directness of purpose and a fulness of effect which many a masculine composer might envy and wisely imitate. Taking the foregoing examples, together with the final chorus, "O Music, sphere-descended maid," there is no difficulty in perceiving that Mrs Meadows White did not over-estimate her ability to deal with exacting subjects. In treating the gentler emotions she is often happy, especially so in the chorus entitled "Cheerfulness"—a capital number, full of healthy life and marked by a bright open-air effect entirely appropriate. Mention should also be made of a trio for female voices, with chorus, illustrative of Melancholy. Passages in this are noteworthy for excellent part-writing, while the ensemble, though unpretending, is quite effective. From what has been said, an inference that the spirit of Handel pervades the work assuredly suggests itself. It does so with justice, but the Handelianism of Mrs White's music is not due to imitation. It arises in part, perhaps, from an unconscious recognition of the great Saxon's dealing with a similar theme, and, in other part, from a conscious necessity of illustrating the theme in that broad and simple, yet graphic style of which Handel was so consummate a master. In so far as the work combines therewith the graces of modern art, it is only another proof that the principles regulating classic music are capable of adaptation to the conditions imposed by constantly augmenting resources and always developing taste. To sum up, I welcome Mrs Meadows White's Ode to the Passions as the production of undeniable talent, and a worthy addition to the musical things which, being English, give Englishmen cause for pride. The performance, if by no means perfect, was fairly good, much of its merit arising from the efficient singing of Miss Anna Williams and Mr King—excellent artists both, and always to be trusted. Miss Marian Fenna, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr F. Boyle were likewise contributory to the success of the work, as were, in a special sense, the admirable choralists now engaged here.

Said a gentleman engaged in the management of the Festival to me yesterday: "The Messiah and Elijah take care of our first and fourth days. It is the second and third which give us anxiety." Circumstances, I am glad to state, have favoured the second day. There was again a bright and beautiful morning, just such as might tempt the country-side into a state of sympathy with a festival of any kind. And there was a programme made up of things old and new in almost embarrassing quantity, so that amateurs who did not greatly care for Handel's Judas Maccabæus could delight themselves with Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, or, mayhap, Goetz's setting of Psalm cxxxvii., or, if of archaic tastes, Bach's Magnificat. Never, I should say, was a selection more eclectic, and never did managers make a wider throw of the Festival net in eager desire to catch all sorts of fish. The result was not one of overwhelming satisfaction, inasmuch as the audience—or congregation, if the term be thought more suitable—fell short of the number reached on the previous day, when Mendelssohn's masterpiece was given. This, however, had been anticipated, and no feeling of disappointment supervened. The Bishop of Hereford and the clergy of the Cathedral were again present to conduct the devotional part of the proceedings, after which Judas Maccabæus, or, rather a copious selection from that warlike oratorio, commanded such unremitting attention as Handel always claims when at his best. Comment upon music so familiar would be entirely superfluous, and it is not requisite to notice the performance in much more than general terms. This will fully appear when I state that the principal airs were sung by Mdme Albani, Mdme Patey, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Santley, with whom were associated in a less important capacity, Miss Marian Fenna, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr Fredericks, and Mr F. King. How well these artists are able to answer for their share in any work of Handel's is as fully understood as the capacity of an English Festival band and chorus to do the illustrious master all needful justice.

Beethoven's Symphony in B flat, which opened the second part, was heard with lively interest by many, and with keen curiosity by some who may have been struck with the novelty of such music in such a place. The great composer's No. 5 (C minor) appeared in the Hereford programme, years ago, thanks to the initiative taken by the late Mr Townshend Smith, of whom I may fitly say here and now, that "being dead he yet speaketh." But the "C minor" is more distinctly fitted for religious associations than the rest of the nine, owing to its sustained dignity and impressiveness. I recognize, therefore, in the choice of its immediate predecessor a further step towards full recognition of the truth that a great example of abstract music should not be deemed unsuited to the most solemn of uses because, in play of fancy and mode of expression, it has what are termed "secular" characteristics. There is really much difficulty in determining, with reference to a serious symphonic work, what is sacred and what is secular; but here the general rule may serve which lays down that no music can be unfitted for church use when it elevates the mind and leads to an appreciation of the exalted in an art closely connected with religion as its handmaid and helper. No one, I venture to say, was the worse for hearing Beethoven's often playful Symphony in the Cathedral this morning, or, under the influence of the beautiful work and its appropriate surroundings, was made uncomfortable by a sense of the incongruous. Absence of objection will naturally confirm the Festival managers in their present course, and lead, perhaps, to the fullest admission that nothing inspired by Him from whom come all great gifts can be "common or unclean." The performance of the Symphony, conducted as it was by a musician not familiar with the task, left somewhat to desire. But it was good enough for the enjoyment of those who new the work well, and for a lively impression upon those to whom it was a less intimate acquaintance. Goetz's Psalm, "By the waters of Babylon," followed, and went, it is to be feared, over the heads of many present who for the first time were challenged by the lamented composer's severely subjective style, and unfaltering adherence to the principle which requires that a musical poet shall speak to his theme and nothing else. We who know this dead master as he deserves to be known cannot feel admiration enough for the force of his thoughts and the propriety of their expression, but such sympathy is not aroused all at once. It grows as familiarity increases, and as the composer's distinctive idiom frees itself from a sensation of strangeness. Nevertheless, even at this, the first appearance of Goetz before a Western festival public, a perception of the fact that he had something to say and the right to say it could not be avoided. It came, if not with the severely contrapuntal opening chorus, with the impressive scene wherein the people of Israel ask, "How shall we sing the Lord's song in a land of strangers?" with the beautiful air and chorus, "If I think not on thee, O Jerusalem," and—most of all, perhaps—with the passionate entreaty, "Lord, remember the children of Edom." All these pleaded powerfully for the composer and his work, which in its entirety did such honour to the Festival programme as only a masterpiece can render.

Goetz's music, never easy, is in this case of more than usual difficulty, and the audience were now and then reminded of the fact as the performance went on. There was, however, not much of a serious nature to occasion complaint. The solos were given with correctness and just expression by Miss Anna Williams, while the concerted pieces, if not rendered with entirely adequate effect, owing to the unfamiliar character of the music, enabled both band and chorus to display the exceptional qualities which have overcome yet more serious obstacles in the course of the week. The psalm finished, all concerned would gladly have taken a rest, but the enormous programme was not exhausted. Bach's Magnificat remained to be encountered by flagging energies and diminished force, albeit the work makes demands of a very serious character on both. Rising to the occasion, Mr Colborne's admirable choralists did justice to themselves and their theme, while the solos have rarely, I imagine, enjoyed the services of better artists, Miss Williams, Mdme Patey, Mr Boyle, and Mr Santley—to say nothing of Miss Hilda Wilson and Mr Fredericks—being all engaged upon them. If the Magnificat made less than its usual effect under these conditions, the result was due to the fatigue of performers and audience. It is clearly a mistake to draw up such long programmes. They defeat their own object, and produce lassitude where the design is to excite conscious interest and pleasure. In music as in most other things "enough is as good as a feast." The number of persons present in the Cathedral was 1,154, being one less than the average of the years 1870, 1873, and 1876, but 451 more than the attendance on the corresponding morning in 1879. The collection amounted to £100 14s. 1d. Mendelssohn's St Paul was performed in the cathedral this evening, Hereford continuing the example she first set of devoting to oratorios a part at least of the time once wholly given to secular music. The innovation was well received when made, but its novelty has worn off, and there is no longer a marked desire to enjoy the peculiar effect produced by noble sacred strains under the impressive conditions of a night service. Though the attendance this evening was somewhat scanty, on the other hand the performance was in many respects admirable. Mendelssohn's noble work, which not a few connoisseurs regard at least the equal of Elijah, seemed to enlist the sympathies of all its exponents and to make a profound impression upon all its hearers. In this there is nothing wonderful. From beginning to end the music of St Paul flies high with steady wing. It belongs in an eminent degree to sacred classics, and is as spiritual as its theme, in the sense that nothing low and unworthy enters into it. The rightful place of the work therefore is where the Hereford public found it to-night, and nowhere else does it seem so much at home. Among the great successes of the performance was the delivery by Miss Anna Williams of "Jerusalem, thou that killest;" by Mdme Patey of "But the Lord is mindful;" and by Mr Santley of "Oh God, have mercy," which our eminent baritone sang with remarkable fervour. The tenor airs were entrusted to Mr Boyle, whose style, however, is scarcely that of oratorio. It cannot be needful to add that the numerous chorales and choruses derived all possible advantage from the happy fact of their familiarity.—D. T.

A REMINDER.

Festival-giving is expensive work, and there is no difference in that respect between the meetings in the quiet Western Cathedral cities and elsewhere. But Hereford, appealing to a narrower—a more local—interest than Birmingham or Bristol, can afford to dispense with those special attractions which are a sine quâ non in the hardware capital. In a word, Hereford can do without novelties, so long as the patrons of the Festival get the worth of their money in the works of great masters, interpreted by brilliant executants.

MOLIQUE'S "ABRAHAM."

I cannot but think, however, that a very back-handed compliment is paid to the memory of Molique by the substitution of a selection from his Abraham for the entire work. People are apt to forget successes even when they are scored by really clever musicians at important provincial Festivals, and there are probably only a retentive few who remember that when Abraham was brought out at Norwich in 1860—the year of Benedict's Undine—it was hailed by intelligent critics as the greatest oratorio which had been heard since Elijah. Yet it apparently dropped out of notice as soon as the world of music had ceased to talk about its first performance, until it occurred to the Hereford organist and conductor, Mr Langdon Colborne, to rescue it from its undeserved neglect. One would think, however, that if it were worth doing at all it were worth doing completely, and not in shreds.

"ODE TO THE PASSIONS."

The principal feature of the Evening Concert in the Shire Hall was Mrs Meadows White's Ode to the Passions, which stands forth, in fact, as the sole novelty of the Festival, the only work which the meeting has called into existence. Mrs White, who is better known to the musical world under her maiden name of Alice Mary Smith, is an English musician who is content to follow the English school as designed and perfected by Handel, rather than cast in her lot with the German, whose distaste for melody is traceable to their incapacity to invent it, and whose dislike of form is attributable to their deficiency in the sense of proportion and symmetry. Mrs White's work is honest, straightforward, and legitimate in every acceptation of the term; she aims at producing no sensational effects, but achieves that which is infinitely better—a work which will grow upon the auditor and student alike as a pleasing and highly-finished art-product. William Collins, the author of The Passions, was one of the eighteenth century poets of the highest promise, but this promise hardly ripened into fulfilment. His Ode to the Passions, however, was in his day esteemed the finest—or one of the finest—odes in the language, was a great favourite with Garrick as a recitation, and was set to music in 1774 by Dr Benjamin Cooke, of Westminster Abbey. The present musical illustration is comprised in ten numbers, the score including parts of two sopranos, contralto, tenor, and bass, soli, with chorus and full orchestra. A short introduction leads to the second number. "Fear, Anger, Despair," apportioned for tenor solo with chorus—a charmingly simple, yet tuneful movement, "When Music, Heavenly Maid, was young," for chorus, ushering in the more dramatic points. "First Fear, his hand its skill to try," is treated in fugal fashion, the tenor soloist entering at the description of Anger, and the chorus re-entering with a sustained, dolorous theme when Despair is mentioned. Mrs White's handling of this episode is not wholly free from the influence of Handel, but her writing is graphic and suggestive. A long and spirited coda in the tonic minor of the initial signature (F), brightly coloured in the orchestra, and introducing the cymbals with no sparing hand, brings this ingenious and skilfully wrought number to a close. The pleasures of "Hope" are described in a soprano air (No 3) cast in a somewhat conventional mould, and partaking of a pastoral character; "Revenge and Pity" is allotted to the bass soloist (No. 4); and this is followed by a chorus, "Jealousy," which for sustained power and interest may compare favourably with the rest of the Ode. It is rather cruel of the composer to write the soprano part up to B flat, and not many choirs could be counted upon to reach it clearly; fortunately, however, implicit reliance could be placed in this year's Festival Chorus. "Melancholy" (No. 6) is set as a trio for two sopranos and alto, with chorus; "Cheerfulness" (No. 7) is arranged as a chorus—some clever points of imitation occurring here in the vocal part-writing; while the "hunting music" is capitally devised and carried out; the tenor deals with the theme of "Joy" (No. 8) in a brisk and characteristic air, after which "Love" and "Mirth" occur as a duet for tenor and soprano (No. 9), the whole concluding with a chorus addressed to "Music."

From first to last the Ode to the Passions is replete with interest, and although the work does not soar to dizzy heights, it is unquestionably an excellent specimen of unobtrusive legitimate workmanship. The performance was really good, but it has been the misfortune of few composers to have a new work of importance placed for the first time before such a dolorous, apathetic audience, as that which did not nearly fill the Shire hall to-night. A heavy melancholy seemed to have settled on all present, and from this they could not emerge sufficiently to applaud the new cantata according to its deserts. True, one or two numbers were received with some faint indications of approval, and at the close sufficient enthusiasm was summoned up to call Mrs Meadows White to the platform, but the gathering was the reverse of joyous. I shall therefore content myself with recording my own opinion of the artistic value of the Ode to the Passions, which I am inclined to rate very highly indeed, and with expressing the hope that the clever composer may speedily find the opportunity to bring her latest effort before the notice of an appreciative audience. The solo parts were filled with taste and judgment by Miss Anna Williams, Miss Marian Fenna, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr Frank Boyle, and Mr F. King. Mr Langdon Colborne conducted.—Standard, Sept. 14.

BARCELONA.—An operatic company, among whom a young lady named Rosa Caligaris especially distinguished herself, have been giving a series of performances at the Buen Retiro. They opened with Ernani. A new zarzuela, Amor y Gloria, music by Señor Nieto, has not been very successful at the Teatro Español.

KLAGENFURTH.—For a considerable time Mdlle Tini, the daughter of an innkeeper here, has created a great sensation among the concert-goers of the town by her splendid contralto. Herr Felix Mottl happened to hear it and, though she has never been on the stage, immediately engaged her for the Grand-Ducal Theatre, Carlsruhe, where he is conductor.

A LIVERPUDLIAN VIEW OF THE "NIBELUNGEN."

(Rough Notes from an Amateur's Diary.)

To write fitly about Wagner's "advanced" musical dramas is a difficult task. Were everything done to perfection, the scenery and effects well managed, the dresses out of the commonplace, the orchestra well balanced, and the ideal performance attained, I don't think such "new departure" could give anything like the same amount of pleasure to the "general," or even the "particular," that the much-abused old opera, however hackneyed, has given and still gives. Of course, there are enthusiasts who find no tedium in four hours of uninterrupted "accompanied recitative," who take declamatory howls and shrieks for singing, who consider the incoherent and almost incomprehensible dialogue as dramatic. No doubt in art, almost more than in any sphere, there will always be people of peculiar tastes, whose dicta affect a small circle of "sheep" who can't think for themselves; but that such will ever obtain a wide popularity, to say nothing of prolonged life, for these uncompromising musical mysteries is very doubtful. It is possible that in Germany, where time is not of so much commercial and social importance as with us, there may be a public that will go four nights running to listen to something queer that each night is spun into four or five hours; but that in England there will be much repetition of the Nibelungen Trilogy I take to be very improbable. The story, or series of stories, has no very special interest for anyone out of Germany or hunters-up of old myths: few people I imagine are greatly concerned about the doings of these clumsy and unheroic "gods;" and for myself, I frankly confess it to be a work of considerable trouble to arrange the whole into an intelligible story, and even then, it is not one that gains upon my sympathies. All the dramatis personæ, from "gods to little fishes," act from mere animal impulse, and there is no real "noble emotion" in any, with, perhaps, the exception of Brünnhilde, and even she shows but scant intelligence in anything she does. To add to the confusion, the English version is presented in such an un-English and inverted style, with words used in quite a different sense from their ordinary meaning, that the following of the libretto becomes a task, and almost repellant at every sentence. I open the book at random, and find the following words:—"Fold me, you maidens, in fathomless fence!"—and again, in the next page (151)—"The shape of a worm wears he for shelter, and in a hole has heed of Alberich's hoop!" Of course, by taking thought, the meaning of the writer is discovered, but it is like the reading of a riddle, and not conducive to an easy following of the music or the understanding of the Leitmotive. For the success of Wagner's intentions, the meaning of the words could not be too obvious. Yet, at any rate in the English version, the text has been rendered vexatiously and needlessly obscure. Then, for the due presentment of the difficult situations and effects, and where the most elaborately contrived scenery would be severely taxed to give adequate expression to the poetical conceptions of the composer, the scenery at Her Majesty's was of the most ordinary kind; in fact, it did not approach anything usually witnessed in our pantomimes, and if it be indeed the very scenery provided for the spectacle at Bayreuth, it was to me a surprise and a disappointment. The only novelty that could be considered to be of any value was the steam effect as representing clouds, from behind which the "gods" made supernatural appearances and disappearances; but these were hardly more vraisemblable than the old gauze mediums; and the steam, of course, followed laws of its nature, and did not cover in all cases what it was intended to conceal; its appearance, moreover, was attended by a very harsh, hissing noise, that was very unideal. The dresses and appointments I thought poor and garish; indeed, remembering what I have seen in Germany for ordinary operas and pieces, they must be pronounced inferior, and certainly not deserving of the extraordinary praise some critics have bestowed upon them. After this preamble only can I enter on a consideration of these musical dramas, and first as to the prologue. On entering the theatre, my attention was at once drawn to a very ugly drop-curtain, of dingy colours and stripes, with a heavy and inartistic border, which replaced the ordinary far prettier drop-scene. It certainly did not awaken expectation, and I was not at all sorry when it divided and revealed something that looked like a large aquarium. The idea of water was well conveyed, and when the mists dispersed and the water-nymphs floated into view, I was reminded of something I had seen in pantomimes of yore, and of a well-remembered tableau in Babil and Bijou, which, however, was much better. The gliding of the nymphs through the waters was very well managed, and if they had had anything melodious to sing the effect might have been pleasing; but the snatches of melody, such as they are, were confined to the orchestra, and the sirens had merely a series of ejaculations and nonsense verses of which the import may be gathered from the author's lingo—"Weia! Waga! Woge, du Welle, walle zur Wiege, Wagalaweia!" which is not German, as ignorant Englishers might imagine it, but a tongue akin to that spoken by Dean Swift's Houynhyms, and only to be understood by the true Wagnerite. The music of this scene may be allowed to be truly descriptive of the language, and just as intelligible. It is supposed to illustrate a flirtation between Alberich, a wicked gnome, and the flighty Rhine daughters, which ends in the stealing of the Rhinegold from the careless guardianship of the nymphs. This constitutes the first part of the prologue, which, meagre enough in incident, is spun out to inordinate length; to extreme vagueness must be added incessant changes of key; tonality is flung to the winds, and though the hearer may not be absolutely repelled by what he is hearing, it is utterly impossible that he can carry away any more definite idea of the music than he would after listening to the night-winds. However, we are told by the guide-book provided, that throughout the action are to be heard numerous descriptive musical phrases (Leitmotive) illustrative of the subject. Thus we have "the Rhine daughters' motive"—the "motive of bondage," also "the motive of menace," of "flight of the Rhinegold," and others too numerous to mention. These phrases may be described generally as about two bars long—sometimes, but not often, running to four—and do not seem to me as distinctive as they should be, considering the part they have to play and the importance attached to them by the composer, as on the right appreciation of them, no less than their right employment, hangs the success of the composer's theories, and partly of his claims as an original thinker. They are generally constructed on the intervals of the common chord, and their difference is more a matter of rhythm than of fresh musical idea. This renders them a difficult matter to follow through a long work, and as a matter of fact they are only discoverable by previous study, and to unskilled musicians must pass almost, if not altogether, unnoted. To the uninitiated this may matter little—it is only more or less noise—but to those who would appreciate the composer's work and desire to understand him, these Leitmotiven are an unmitigated nuisance, a weariness of the flesh, and the following of them is productive of headache and suggestive of insanity. To show how they are used and what the following of them means, I will try to describe their mode of employment, without pledging myself to strict accuracy in the cases cited. When the Rhine maidens first make their appearance, one of these short phrases is given out in the orchestra, obviously enough to those who have studied the score previously, but hardly likely to be noted by those who have not; after this, throughout the entire work of prologue and three acts, whenever an allusion to the Rhine maidens occurs, this phrase makes its appearance in the orchestra, and the hearer, for the due appreciation of the work and his concomitant delight, is expected to take note of the same, whilst he is supposed to be following the action of the drama. This would be troublesome enough were there only one Leitmotiv, but, as instanced above, there are dozens of them, and the impossibility of the attempt, save to the composer himself or those who have devoted themselves to learning the work by heart, will be obvious enough. And, after all, this system of self-quotation is by no means original, nor at all invented by Wagner; most composers have used it from the days of Mozart to those of Mendelssohn. Weber is full of Leitmotiven, and Meyerbeer used to be taunted with ticketing his characters by the same device, in the days when music was of more importance than contrivance, however ingenious or elaborate. After the theft of the Rhinegold by Alberich, amidst the howling execrations of the water nymphs, sudden darkness comes over the scene, steam spouts up in all directions, and when it disperses, and the lights are turned on, we are in presence of Wotan, father of the gods, and his wife, Fricka. She is a kind of wet blanket and occasional blister to the All-father, who is indeed potent in nothing but ill to others, himself included. He is moreover, a lying, slippery kind of potentate, who, after out-manœuvring Alberich for the possession of the Rhinegold, which he does by devices that we remember in the story of Puss in Boots, where the ogre is outwitted by the cat, finds himself encumbered with a curse which involves him and his race in destruction. How this can happen to immortals is not explained. There is a poor storm in this scene, a very material rainbow, and a very badly painted scene—so far as perspective and aerial effect are concerned—of the abode of the gods, and no music that it is possible to carry away at a first hearing; the whole (being in monologue or dialogue, and never ensemble, and containing no cantilena whatever) makes the hearing of this "new intellectual delight" one of the most fatiguing trials a poor theatre-goer ever was put to. At the conclusion, my impressions were that I had been present at a very dull pantomime, rather worse constructed than such pieces usually are, with more extravagance and less fun, and that I hoped I should never repeat the dose.

PHOSPHOR, HIS DREAM.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—I must plead guilty to the accusation of having fallen to sleep in church; it is said that I actually snored at Her Majesty's Theatre while the god Wotan was giving one of his most important, certainly his longest, recitals, and I am ashamed to say that in St George's Hall, Liverpool, I committed myself in a similar manner at one of Mr W. T. Best's organ recitals; but on this occasion the day was hot, and I had been on the tramp all morning. But all these little delinquencies are as nothing compared to my somnolence on a recent occasion when I attended a meeting to advance the interests of the Royal College of Music. I had to be violently shaken when the meeting was over, and was only brought to consciousness by the attendant exclaiming in a loud voice, "Please, sir, we are going to turn off the gas." I then started and found that I had had a dream, let me relate it.

* * * * * * * *

"We will go to the Academy of Music where we shall be sure to hear an opera effectively rendered with talented principals, an excellent orchestra and a good chorus.

"But how can the Academy produce so perfect a performance in so small a theatre at so moderate a charge? Do they not pay their company? Certainly not. Every member of this establishment pays to be allowed to sing, even the members of the orchestra—which, as you have heard, is most efficient—are only pupils. I will explain. The Academy of Music was instituted to teach music, and to encourage and introduce musical talent, but it is in a certain sense a self-supporting institution. It possesses a concert-room, and it has also a theatre. When the pupils first enter they subscribe to fixed rules, they bind themselves to support the institution, and remain for a certain number of years as paying pupils. The moment they are sufficiently advanced they commence by singing in the chorus, and as their ability is recognized they raise themselves to take a lead, and at length become soloists. While a pupil is learning, and before he is able to render to the Academy any services, he has to pay full fees; but the moment he can take a part in a public performance these fees are reduced until at length, as principal singers, they receive fixed remuneration. Even the members of the orchestra, as I have said, are only pupils, but their emulation is encouraged by their occasionally playing solos in the concert-room.

"Nevertheless, I can hardly understand how they find time to receive lessons and yet attend rehearsals.

"It is easily explained. The opera house is only open three nights a week and for six months in the year. At the beginning of every term, and at least two months before any public performance, an opera, an oratorio, or both, may be put into rehearsal, and the instruction they receive as private pupils is in the music they are, when sufficiently advanced, to sing in public. The compositions they have to prepare are sometimes original, and thus the attraction is of a twofold nature; for the public hear new singers in new works, and, as plenty of time is given to rehearsing, a respectable performance can generally be secured. Occasionally more advanced professionals are engaged to take principal parts, but these are usually former pupils of the Academy. In most schools of instruction the pupils have very little to promote increased exertion, for however satisfactory their progress they have little opportunity of being heard in public, and less of making a name; but here their steady advancement in public favour must follow their advancement in their art, for the moment a pupil has sufficient experience any genius they may exhibit, or any beauty of voice they may possess, becomes apparent. Indeed, the audiences assembled in a place like this feel that they are trying to bring out latent talent, and while they pay for their amusement they are promoting a good work. Hasty condemnation of a pupil is very unlikely, for in the first instance they are only received as amateurs, but when they do go out into the world they are supposed to be experienced artists. So you now understand that the Academy of Music is a school of instruction, a place of amusement, a theatre, and a concert hall—all in one."

Serenade.

JACK'S FANCIES.

When far away from thee, sweet Maid,
Across the deep blue sea,
Where the Naiads play
In the sun's bright ray,
A fairy form I see.
Come, sweetheart, say, what little fay
Is sporting mid the silver spray
That sparkles on our lee.

Or sailing south the line, sweet Maid,
Where perfumed breezes sigh,
When the bright stars peep
Through the azure deep,
I trace a soft blue eye.
Ah! do I dream?—its glances seem
Across the trackless wave to gleam,
And pale the brilliant sky.

Or when to distant climes, sweet Maid,
Our craft is drawing near,
Where the myrtle springs,
And the bulbul sings,
A charming voice I hear.
Dear maiden, pray, from whence that lay
That's wafted o'er the rippling bay,
And falls upon mine ear?

That fairy form, that soft blue eye,
That voice so low and sweet,
Is a threefold cord
When the tar's aboard,
To draw him to thy feet.
Sweet maiden, mine, that silken line,
Will tighten o'er the flowing brine,
Till heart to heart we meet.

WETSTAR.

DESSAU.—The fourth Anhalt Musical Festival takes place here to-day and to-morrow, the 16th and 17th inst. respectively. The principal works set down in the two days' programme are Fr. Schneider's Weltgericht; Beethoven's overture: "Zur Weihe des Hauses," and Gade's Kreuzfahrer. The chorus, numbering some 350 persons, and the Ducal Orchestra, strengthened for the occasion, are under the direction of Herr Thiele, Ducal Capellmeister. Among the solo artists is Herr Grutzmacher of Dresden.

BERLIN.—Mdme Sachse-Hofmeister has left the Stadttheater, Leipsic, and returned to the Royal Operahouse, to which she formerly belonged. As the Countess in Le Nozze di Figaro and Leonore in Fidelio, she met with a most cordial reception. Her husband, a tenor, who, like herself, formerly belonged to the Royal Operahouse, but who some time since resumed his studies, abandoned twelve years previously, at the University of Leipsic, has just taken his degree as Doctor of Philosophy there.—Herr Theodor Wachtel is still drawing large audiences to Kroll's Theater.

ST PETERSBURGH.—The Italian opera company will occupy the Maria Theatre. The season promises to be very interesting. Among the novelties are Gioconda, four acts, Ponchielli; Le Precauzioni, three-act comic opera, Petrella; Philémon et Baucis, Ch. Gounod; and La Damnation de Faust, oratorio, Hector Berlioz. Of operas already given here the programme will include, among others, Carmen, L'Étoile du Nord, Lohengrin, Le Roi de Lahore, Mefistofele, and Il Matrimonio Segreto. The leading artists are—Sopranos: Marcella Sembrich, Maria Durand, Elvira Repetto, A. Franck-Duvernoy, Victoria Ferni-Germano, E. Colonnesa, Brambila Sordelli; Mezzo-Sopranos and Contraltos: Amalia Stahl, Giulia Prardi, L. Corsi; Tenors: Silva, Marconi, Bulterini, Engel, Syrnio, Corsi, Manfredi; Baritones: Cotogni, Devoyod, Vaselli, Ughetti; Basses: Uetam, Povoleri, Sillich, Scolara, Cernusco; Bass Buffos: Antonio Baldelli and Ciampi.

CHERUBINI.

VII.

Once re-installed in Paris and married, Cherubini determined to resume his career, which had been for a moment interrupted by events. We know that he had written at La Chartreuse the score of a two-act opera, Elisa, ou Le Mont Saint-Bernard, the book of which was supplied by Révéroni-Saint-Cyr. He took steps for the performance of the work, which was accepted at the Théâtre Feydeau, and soon put in preparation there. To fill the principal part he had an interpretess of the first class, an admirable and inspired artist, as remarkable for her histrionic ability as for her fine talent as a singer, who for several years was destined to be mixed up and share in his successes. I refer to Mdme Scio, whose noble qualities and exceptional talent Cherubini was better qualified to judge than anyone else, when, on making her début at the Théâtre Feydeau in 1794, she chose for her first appearance the part of Lodoïska, in which, eclipsing her predecessor, she produced an unexpected and profound impression.

Mdme Scio was then twenty-four, having been born at Lille in 1770. Endowed with a becoming figure, as well as with a mobile and expressive physiognomy, overflowing with intelligence, her look was full of brilliancy, her tones were full of passion, and her gestures full of breadth and dignity; she was gifted, too, with pathetic power of extraordinary intensity. With these rare qualities she combined a superb voice, sometimes slightly deficient, perhaps, in force, but of a penetrating and warm character, rendered still more vigorous by the outbursts of an ardent soul, communicating to others the fire with which it was itself animated, and able to move the inmost depths of the most impassive hearts. Furthermore, there was in this artist, on whom Nature had been pleased to lavish the most marvellous gifts, a variety of inflections, a histrionic suppleness, which enabled her to undertake all parts and venture on all styles, proving herself in all equal to herself, that is to say, constantly most excellent.

Her maiden name was Claudine-Angélique Legrand, and, though nothing is now known about it, her family is said not to have belonged to the lowest classes of society. Mdlle Legrand received a most careful education, in which, however, strange to say, her instructors neglected to cultivate, of all things in the world, her admirable and rare aptitude for music. It has never been known where, when, or in what manner, she made her earliest appearances. But there is one thing certain, namely that, in 1787, she belonged, under a borrowed name, that of Mdlle Crécy, to the lyrical company of the theatre at Montpellier, where she successfully filled a leading position, and that, the following year, she went to play at Avignon, with another member of the company, Gaveaux, whom she was destined subsequently to meet again at Feydeau. The manner in which she was received in the above town was so enthusiastic that crowns and copies of verses were thrown on the stage one night that she played Agathe in L'Ami de la Maison, and Colette in Le Devin du Village. In 1789, she was engaged at the Grand-Théâtre, Marseilles, and it was then that she exchanged her name of Mdlle Crécy for that of Mad. Scio, by marrying Etienne Scio, the conductor at the theatre and a distinguished composer.

Mad. Scio saw her reputation, already firmly established in various provincial towns, grow still larger at Marseilles, where she gave proofs of incontestable superiority. A talented actor, Boursault-Malherbe, forty years later manager of the Opéra-Comique, was then, in virtue of the system of theatrical liberty established by a recent decree of the Convention, busy founding in Paris the Théâtre Molière, where he was to play drama, comedy, and comic opera. A good judge of artists, he engaged Mad. Scio as a singer and her husband as conductor. The latter wrote for this theatre the music of three works: La Femme régénerée, Le Réveil de Ramallaka, and Le Sofa, the first of which more especially made a hit; but his wife's career suffered somewhat at a theatre where the entertainments consisted mostly of grand gloomy dramas, such as La Martellière's Robert, chef de brigands, or political tragedies, like Rousin's Ligue des fanatiques et des tyrans. However, in 1792, when Boursault-Malherbe had been elected a member of the Convention, and when his theatre was on its last legs, Viotti engaged Mad. Scio for the Théâtre Feydeau, where she was at length to find a public and characters worthy of her and whither her husband went at the same time to take a secondary post, that of chef d'attaque of the second violins, in the orchestra, but this did not prevent his producing two short works, Lisidore et Monroe (1792) and Lysia (1793).

It was in the character of Lodoïska that Mdme Scio made her first appearance on the Feydeau stage, and her talent was a revelation for the public and the artists simultaneously. The reception awarded her was most encouraging. She afterwards appeared in several characters of the current repertory, among them being Velbina in the Marquis de Tulipano and Bélinde in La Colonie. She then created several in new works: Louise in L'Amour filial, by Gaveaux: the heroine in Lisidore et Monroe, by Scio; Euphémie in Les Visitandines, by Devienne, a part in which she was especially remarkable; Mdme Dormont in L'Avare puni, by Jadin, &c. These parts, however, scarcely enabled her to do more than enable the public to appreciate the range, flexibility, and purity of her voice, but she soon found an opportunity of causing them to admire her double talent as a dramatic singer and an inspired and impassioned actress. She played successively Séraphine in La Caverne (Lesueur); Juliette in Roméo et Juliette (Steibelt); Léonore in L'Amour conjugal (Gaveaux); Médée in the opera of the same name (Cherubini); Palma in Palma, ou le Voyage en Grèce (Plantade); Calypso in Télémaque (Lesueur); and Constance in Les deux Journées, displaying in all these works an amount of passion, spirit, and dramatic power which placed her in the first rank without a second and without a rival.* The public admired, daily lavishing on her the manifestations of their unalloyed satisfaction, while criticism—as far, at least, as it existed at that epoch—showered on her the most sincere and well-merited praise. We may gain an idea of this great artist by the following eulogium pronounced by a contemporaneous chronicler:

"A very fine voice, an excellent musical method, expression in singing, and no less expression in recitative, great knowledge of the stage, and, in a word, thorough intelligence, such are the qualities which strike us as characterizing this artist, and which place her incontestably in the first rank. We should be much pleased could we unrestrictedly award her such well-merited praise, but we have promised to be impartial and will keep our word. Mdme Scio strikes us, then, as laying herself open to a slight reproach for a certain kind of ambition which causes her to accept parts beyond her strength. Calypso and Médée, for instance, demand a more robust nature than hers and a voice if not of greater compass and brilliancy (which is an impossibility), at any rate, more capable of resisting fatigue; we are the more justified in deploring her blindness in this respect because it is more prejudicial to her health than her glory. We fear that this interesting lady's superhuman efforts will shorten a life dear to all the lovers of art without adding a single gem to her crown."†

We must allow that admiration has rarely been expressed with greater delicacy. Another writer said of Mdme Scio that:

* Among the works in which the leading character was created by Mdme Scio, and to which she contributed the aid of her incomparable talent, we must mention, also, Joanna, Uthal, Héléna, Méhul; Michel-Ange, Nicolo; La Leçon ou la Tasse de glace, Léhéman, ou la Tour de Neustadt, La Jeune Prude, Dalayrac; La Famille Suisse, Les Méprises espagnoles, Boieldieu; Owinska, Le Petit Matelot, La Famille indigente, Gaveaux; La Bonne Sœur, Claudine, ou le petit commissionaire, Bruni; Le Sigisbé ou le Fat puni, Louis Piccini; L'Incertitude maternelle, Solié, and some others, doubtless, which I have forgotten.

"We find few women like this celebrated singer, and, if France lost her, it would be difficult to find anyone to supply her place! We will not be severe upon her delivery, for her talents absolutely wipe out the small defects she may possess. What picture is there without its shadow?" ‡

And another some years later observed:

"Had not the fashion of devices fallen into desuetude, a setting sun might be that of this great singer. She had great successes and a very extensive reputation; her voice was admirable, of rare power and purity; all these advantages are growing weak and her nearly habitual bad health must have rendered their deterioration more rapid than it otherwise would have been. But we shall always recollect that she deserves the highest praise, and that when Steibelt, surrounded by the most famous female vocalists of the Italian company, was rehearsing his Camille in London, he exclaimed: 'Where is Madame Scio?' There is something, however, she will not lose, and that is histrionic talent, which she possesses in a remarkable degree and which will prolong her theatrical existence. It has been remarked that she was better in man's attire than in that of her own sex; consequently she was always very successful in male characters, notably in Dupaty's Jeune Prude, where she passed from one sex to the other with prodigious rapidity and facility."§

At the epoch these lines were written, Mdme Scio was but the shadow of her former self, and the murderous demands to which composers, eager to employ her talent, condemned her, had, while destroying her voice, borne the fruit that might have been expected. The reader sees, however, what enthusiasm her rare histrionic talent still excited. But, when Cherubini had her as the interpretess of his finest works, she was in all the splendour of her youth and beauty, in full possession of her voice and all her powers, and a composer who had such an artist to transmit his inspirations to the public was unusually fortunate.‖

Such a piece of good fortune fell to Cherubini's lot, and Mdme Scio was the principal interpretess of the second work he was about to give at the Théâtre Feydeau. It was a lucky chance for him, as the book was signally weak, and we may doubt whether his score, which, though admirable assuredly in certain parts, was somewhat severe, and here and there too long, would, without the aid of so powerful a representative, have sufficed to ensure success. The success was brilliant, if not prolonged, the public acclaiming the composer and the singer. It was on the 13th December, 1794, that Elisa ou le Mont Saint-Bernard ("le Mont Bernard," as was said in those days, "Saints" being banished from every-day language), was first performed at the Théâtre Feydeau, and the Journal de Paris gave an account of it in these terms:

"This piece, the music of which is by Citizen Cherubini, the justly celebrated composer, achieved a great success, the managers of the theatre having omitted nothing that could invest the performance with all the magnificence of which it was susceptible.

"From her tenderest infancy, Elisa has loved Florinde, and, becoming free by her father's death, has left her native land to find her lover of whom she has not heard for a long time. The scene is laid at Mont Saint-Bernard, at the foot of the glaciers of the same name. Just as Elisa has arrived, Florinde, ignorant of her leaving home, receives a letter in which a friend, who has been badly informed, tells him his mistress is false and about to marry another. In despair at this intelligence, Florinde seeks death among the precipices; a storm formed on the crest of the mountain facilitates the execution of his project and the unhappy lover is carried by an avalanche to the bottom of a crevasse, where death seems inevitable, but the inhabitants of the mountain, brought to the spot by his cries, succeed in saving him. On being restored to life, he finds Elisa, still faithful, and is united to her by a happy marriage. Such is the substance of the piece in which probability is frequently sacrificed to the desire of producing effects by extraordinary situations. Several scenes are interesting, but others contain portions which are too long, and which the author may easily cut. The scenery is most effective; the avalanche is represented with striking truthfulness. None of our theatres have, up to now, given us so striking a picture of the great phenomena of nature." ¶

As we see, the journalist restricts himself to recording the success, giving an analysis of the plot, and praising the scenery; but in all this there is no reference made either to the music or the singers. This often happened at that period, when, as I have remarked, real criticism of the stage and music did not yet exist. We must, however, state that the papers had not then much leisure to busy themselves with artistic questions; their columns were filled with reports of the revolutionary tribunal, and of the trial of Carrier, the execrable author of the "noyades" at Nantes, so that there was frequently no room for the most interesting subjects. It was thus that Le Moniteur universel could not manage to say even a single word about the production of Elisa, while Le Journal de Paris, generally so exact in theatrical matters and, as a rule, publishing its notices the day after the performance, kept its readers on the present occasion waiting a whole week for one.

§ L'Opinion du parterre (by Lemazurier), Year XIII.

‖ I will here quote a few interesting lines borrowed from a biographer of hers: "Mdme Scio was scarcely a musician at all, but no one could perceive it, so delicate an ear did she possess, so sure was she of the time, and so true was her voice. Despite her success in short, florid airs with roulades, she gave up these insignificant pieces, restricting herself to the noble and sentimental style. . . . . Her exertions, but more especially her irregular life, ruined her health. Passionately fond of her art, she was sometimes compelled by a sudden hemorrhage to go off at the wing, displaying, when she came on again, less alarm than the witnesses of the incident. Fault was always found with the over-emphasis of her declamation, which might have appeared offensive, had not her gestures been the true expression of nature. . . . . Having become a widow in 1796, she married on the 18th July, 18 2, a clerk in the Treasury, and, combining the names of her two husbands, called herself Scio-Messié. But, having been divorced, on the 18th September, 1806, from her second husband, Antoine-Louis Messié, and not Messier, she resumed the name of the first. Pulmonary consumption, brought on by her excesses, terminated her life on the 14th July, 1807, at the age of 37." (Article signed: Audiffret in the Biographie Michaud.)

PROVINCIAL.

EASTBOURNE.—Mr Julian Adams gave his annual concert in the Floral Hall, Devonshire Park, with Miss Alice Roselli and Mdme Antoinette Sterling as singers. The excellent orchestra, under Mr Julian Adams's direction, played Gounod's "Nuptial March," Wagner's overtures to Rienzi and Tannhäuser, Weber's "Invitation à la Valse," and other favourite pieces. Solos on the cornet and violin were respectively played by Mr W. Short and Mr J. Daly. Mdme Antoinette Sterling delighted all by her singing of Weber's aria from Abu Hassan, "O Fatima," and Miss Roselli, who made her first appearance here on the occasion, gave Pinsuti's new song, "Heaven and Earth," so much to the satisfaction of the audience that they would willingly have heard it again. The electric light, in violet-coloured glass shades, illumined the hall in which nearly 1,500 persons were assembled.

Elenchus.

At the end of an article on railway statistics, in the Birmingham Daily Post of the 13th instant, we stumbled over the subjoined:—

"There seems to be no halting-place for the imagination till we find the whole race of man perpetually borne in railway trains with restless violence around the pendant world."

The above may fistulate for itself.

KOMOTAU.—Herr Otto Herold, a bell-founder, who died a short time since, had more than a royal funeral peal. Upwards of a hundred bells, in Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, Lower Austria, and Hungary, all cast by him, were, in virtue of a special stipulation with the various parish authorities who had purchased them, tolled on the day he was buried.

DRESDEN.—The eleventh report of the Royal Conservatory of Music has been issued. It contains the returns for the twenty-sixth scholastic year of the institution, a period extending from the 1st September, 1881, to the 15th July, 1882. The total number of students was 646.

LISBON.—The Teatro San Carlo will open on the 1st October with Aïda, principal characters by Mdlle Pasqua, Signori Barbacini, Aldighieri, and Navarrini. This will be followed by Faust, with Vanda Miller, Leoni, Signori Signoretti, Sivori, de Reszké, and Lucia, with Mdlle Lodi, Signori Signoretti, and Sivori. The first novelty will be Lohengrin, with Mesdlles de Reszké, Pasqua, Signori Barbacini, and Aldighieri. At the end of October, Gayarre will appear in I Puritani.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

Following Florestan's solo is the melodrama, or spoken dialogue of Leonora and Rocco with orchestral accompaniment, when they come into the dungeon to prepare the grave in the old well. Their words are to some extent prosaic, but the music suggests the poetry that is hidden under them. They speak of shivering with the cold of the vault and of difficulty in finding the entrance, but the music tells us of the fear that is at Leonora's heart lest she should find her husband in cruel sufferings and not be able to save him. When Rocco points out the motionless Florestan (for he has fallen exhausted after his excitement) and says coldly, "Perhaps he is dead," they bring the lantern and stand over him for a few moments, and find that he is not dead but sleeping. Then the hautboy, with its swaying arpeggios over the sustaining stringed instruments, recalls the feeling of the last solo with its twofold interest.

Ex. 209.

(Spoken.) No, no, he is sleeping.

We cannot but feel that the music here speaks the mind of the sleeping man. Surely that light quivering on his eyelids makes him dream that Leonora is near, though he knows not that she is there trying in vain to distinguish his features in that failing light in the gloom. When Rocco speaks in a matter-of-fact way of their business, the music brings a reminiscence of the movement in E flat of the duet when Leonora showed such anxiety to help Rocco in this task.

Ex. 210.

When Rocco asks whether she is afraid that she trembles so, and she answers with the plea of cold, the music shows the fear in her heart (a), and the resolution with which she shakes it off (b) and bravely begins to work.

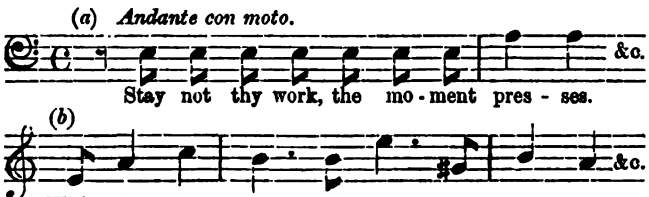
Ex. 211.

You tremble, are you afraid? Oh no! I only feel chill.

All this music is in fantasia form, changeful throughout.

With the settling down to work the music also becomes settled into form. The words are still dialogue: sometimes long, sometimes short sentences, joined by the accompaniment. Throughout, the main thought is of the work of preparation, and to it they constantly recur, and, in the following, (a) is the expression of Rocco's, (b) of Leonora's, words.

Ex. 212.



These, amplified, constitute the principal subject of the rondo. The first episode, in C, is the moving of the stone, after which the principal subject (Ex. 212) returns with some alterations. The second episode has two ideas—the one being Leonora's resolve to aid the prisoner, whoe'er he be; the other Rocco's complaint of Leonora's idleness. The final return of the principal key is in the form of a coda, with a recomposition of some of the first ideas.

CLEVES.—The Monument to the Knight of the Swan* (from whom, according to the local tradition, the Dukes of Cleves were descended) was unveiled on the 28th August. A quadrangular basement supports an octagonal column. In niches of this column stand Beatrix, Duchess of Cleves, and her three sons: Dietrich, with the sword; Gottfried, with the horn; and Conrad, with the ring. On the top of the column is a conically shaped block, surmounted by the figure of the Knight of the Swan in the well-known costume and cloak, as he appears in the second act of Lohengrin. His sword hangs down from his belt in front of him, and in his left hand he holds the horn, while his right rests on the head of a Swan that with its long neck affectionately nestles up to him. The statue and the figures in the niches are of sandstone, and executed by Herr Custodis of Cologne after a design by Professor Steinle of Frankfort. The basement and octagonal column are Belgian granite. Around the base of the Monument are four trefoil-shaped basins, into which water flows through as many bronze swan-heads.

* Lohengrin?—Dr Bliss.

SIR J. BENEDICT'S GRAZIELLA.

Familiar to amateurs as is the proverbial "household word," the name, Sir Julius Benedict, is also not unknown in circles that may be technically called "non-musical." Not merely as a professor whose lifelong devotion to art was fitly recognized by her Majesty some time ago, but as one who, in one or other capacity, is foremost in good works, he has come to be regarded by Englishmen without distinction of classes as one of themselves. To the circumscribed few, as a pupil of Hummel, a friend and confidant of Weber, with whom for three years he lived on terms of the greatest intimacy, anything he may say on current musical topics is of paramount importance. This is intensified by the present "march of events," and the value of his cantata is not to be estimated merely as a valuable iota of the coming Festival programme. He speaks with the authority of a scholar and the ripened experience of a life reaching beyond the allotted time of the Psalmist. While national elan has carried his countrymen far away in abstruse musical metaphysics, and drafted them into meaningless polyphony, Benedict, true to his instincts, has never swerved from the right path, and his latest piece may court criticism with the same fearlessness as his earliest or his most laboriously composed works.

Having the aid of Mr Hersee as collaborateur, the author has given his pen to the illustration of a series of scenes supposed to occur on the island of Procida, in the Bay of Naples. The cantata commences with an instrumental introduction of the tarantella type, of which more than two-thirds is scored in the minor key of A. In its formulation the section clearly, and without the slightest attempt at over-colouring, serves to pave the way for the introduction of the voices, announcing the gathering of the villagers on one of the lovely islands studding the Bay of Naples. The lazzaroni, and those more immediately related to the toilers on the deep, among whom Graziella is presently to stand the central figure in a beautiful and majestic chorus in A major, announce—

See with a slow majestic motion
Sinks in splendour bright yon sun.

The harmony is calculated to at once arrest the ear by its clearness and lucidity, and the absence of undue prolongation is a virtue that under the temptation of so fluent and facile a pen cannot, as is that of Sir Julius Benedict, be too highly commended. After two bars for the instruments an episodic change is initiated by the tenor voices, who, with a flowing accompaniment in quavers for the orchestra, sings a melodious period,

Morning sees us blithely labour, and the soprano supplies the needful answer to the subject.

Evening brings us welcome rest.

In turn with the most discreet manipulation, the phrases are given, sometimes by the part responsible solus, and sometimes in ensemble with clever orchestral treatment, and, the first part of the number —a picture of an Italian sunset scene so far as tone painting can realize the conception, is finished by a return to the original utterance for voices with full orchestral combinations. Scarcely have the echoes died away upon the ear, when the vesper-like theme changes to one of mirth, the tempo is judiciously altered from common time to 6-8, and a tonal divergency occurs to the tonic minor scale. The change, which is ingeniously dovetailed in, is not at all kaleidoscopic. It comes in quite naturally, and there is no arranging of individual constituents in a haphazard manner, such as may or may not offend the musical vision. A phrase in unison for the corni, having a necessary relief in a sequence of full chords, is preliminary to the advent of the voices—

Linger not the red wine quaffing,
Let each face with smiles be gay.

With suitable abandon, the joyous phases of the section is depicted, and, after a passage in unison for tenor and basses, "Chase dull care away," local colour is emphasized by the introduction of a third sub-section—

Now the mirth grows more exciting
To the Tarantell's strain.

This is a bewitching scherzando in 2-4 time in C major, the first phrases of which are given to the soprano voices, answered chiefly in unisons by the male choir.

First advancing, then retiring,
Mark the maiden's furtive glance.

Subsequently both are combined, and the bustle and excitement of the scene—in which, however, no sign of musical turmoil appears—is carried on without intermission by a recurrence of the before-mentioned phrase for corni with its underlying chords, and a reiteration of the subject already named by the voices combined, the rhythm being also dexterously changed from 2-4 to 6-8. Mention might fitly be made of the melodious treatment for the words—

And with dancing, singing, laughing,
Chase dull care and grief away.

By a sequence of quavers, first of all given to the alto, the accompanying harmony being supplied by the three remaining parts at the point where the mode changes from the major of A to the tonic major, and the rhythm back again to 2-4. Also the imitation of this, as an anti-climax, a sonorous phrase for the voices in unison similarly planned comes with excellent effect just previously to the termination of the scene.

The merry-making is slightly interrupted by the appearance of the fisher-maiden Graziella, and her advent on the scene is told by a short chorus in 9-8 time, in the key of F major, and the old, old story of hopeless love is sententiously conveyed thus by Mr Hersee's lines :—

There comes Graziella, whose loveliness fair
Young Renzo still worships, though doomed to despair.

A brief phrase for Graziella, or a sort of waltz-like theme, apparently justifies the expostulations—

Why, Graziella, art thou still so cold to Renzo's pleadings?

To the choral remonstrance, in a recitative and aria, the heroine gives her views of the matter :—

Lovers' vows, with honey laden,
Oft deceive the trusting fair!

The recitative is short but telling, and the aria, in which the key—that of E major—is preserved throughout, has graphic variety by such changes in tempi as from 3-4 to 9-8 and back again. The first section concludes with a very elaborate vocal cadenza, and the succeeding one, "Liberty! thou art to me dearest of books," is a melodious allegro con slanico. At the re-introduction of the initiatory aria, "Lovers' vows," the harp is added to the accompaniment; and again, with effect, comes a second cadenza. The scena finishes with a bold chromatic phrase, extending to B flat in alt, "Let me ever be free." As a sequel to the richly-coloured dialogue, a short instrumental phrase is interpolated Tempo di Tarantella. This, however, is suddenly interrupted by a sforzando chord covering up what should have been the final phrase, and is doubtless intended to depict the startling rapidity with which a Mediterranean storm appears. With a regard for proper physical probabilities, the author seeks not to over-elaborate the scene by any lengthy pourtrayal, and lets his music tell its tale in the space of about a score of bars. In imminent peril Graziella descries her father, who had gone to ply his avocation, and in an impassioned recitative appeals to the bystanders—

Help! see, yonder on the cruel rocks,
My father's boat has struck.

Realizing the danger of the situation, the various groups reply in alternate phrases, in the key of D minor—

None but a madman would endeavour
To launch a boat in such a sea.

The storm increases in strength, and, at the critical juncture, the unsuccessful lover Renzo appears. At once reading the situation, in a short agitato in the key of B flat major, sings—

Give me a boat; I'll save him.

The chorus again remonstrate with the phrase, as before, but unheeding their warning, the brave man turns to Graziella, and asking as his guerdon the silver cross she wears, and her love, if successful, at once rushes to the rescue of her father. Here, again, the author does not allow himself to be drawn from a faithful and at the same time a commonsense delineation. Events crowd so quickly that an aria here interpolated, although great is the temptation, would be quite out of place. Contenting himself with barely twelve bars in the key of D flat major, Benedict contrives to compress each detail with brevity that is all the more commendable inasmuch as it is not ordinarily met with. While the storm movement is left, and naturally so, to the instrumentation, a chorus of nuns sing "Miserere Domini" in a neighbouring convent, answered by antiphonal phrases for the male choir with the same words. With a look for no one but her father, Graziella follows with intense and breathless anxiety the heroic efforts of Renzo to reach the apparently doomed man, and, after the last ejaculation of the nuns with those of the not unmoved group on the shore, thus appeals—

Gracious heaven, have mercy.

The detail of the rescue is told by Graziella, and the welcome of the bystanders to the pair who emerge from a seeming watery grave finds expression in a short choral phrase, "Genaro's life is saved." To this succeeds a highly-wrought aria for Graziella—

Digitized by Google

My heart, that was frightened with clouds of despair,
Is bounding delighted with happinness rare.

This is in the key of A major, and is scored with the power and fluency only to be met with in a perfect master of instrumentation. The fisherman is made acquainted with the promise given by his daughter to Renzo, and the colloquy between the three is carried on quasi-parlante in the ordinary dialogue form. On to the melody of the before-mentioned aria for Graziella is tacked parts for the lover and father, a third element being introduced in the person of Alonzo, a pseudo artist, who is a secret admirer of the village beauty. Together the quartet forms a charming ensemble, and is conspicuous not only for ingenious treatment of the plastic materials at hand, but for the grace and melodiousness to be met with in almost every bar. Ultimately the chorus join, and a lengthy concerted eight-part piece, containing soliloquies for the lovers, and congratulating phrases for the father and the villagers, brings the scene to a termination.

Part II. opens with a recitative for Alonzo—

A month has glided by since I arrived at Procida—

in the key of B flat minor, narrating the growth of his passion for Graziella, and an appended aria in B flat major—

When first this lovely shore I sought; and the two strophes Mr. Hersee has here supplied are beautifully set by the composer, who in this as in other instances shows that he is not deaf either to the claims or the charms of pure melody. Adventitiously, Graziella interrupts his impassioned song by her entrance, and the ensuing dialogue reveals the fact that the artist lover is of noble descent, and according to his own words, "I am in truth the Count of Lavagna." Dazzled at first by the offer of "rank and wealth and endless love," the heroine pauses, but remembering she is an affianced bride, ultimately rejoins, "My faith is pledged to Renzo." In an insidious recitative Alonzo enquires—

Could'st thou not love me, say,
If thy betrothal stood in the way?

and for reply receives in a plaintive andante in the key of B flat major—

If it will console thee, I the truth will own,
If it were free my heart were thine alone.

Unobserved, Renzo approaches, and hears the death-knell of his hopes for future happiness from the lips of his fiancée. With self-sacrificing abnegation he declares, inasmuch as her welfare is dearer to him than his own, they shall part. An exceedingly chastely-written trio in the key of F major, in 3-4 time, is utilized to express the varied emotions of the personages involved. Graziella, who does not yet realize Renzo's renunciation of her hand, promises his rival, "Oft shall thy name be breath'd by me." Renzo utters his sad, yet dignified "Farewell," and Alonzo joins with an earnest petition, "Think of the heart that thrill'd for thee." It is manifestly impossible to give anything like a final opinion upon concerted music like the piece in question from the opportunity at hand, but quite sufficient is to be met with in its evolution, graceful phrasing, musicianly treatment, and evident originality to stamp it as one of the most effective specimens of part writing the author has hitherto given to the world. The even melodic flow of the trio ended, Renzo, in a series of sequentially-arranged recitatives, bids Graziella farewell, and announces his intention henceforth to live for his country, in a martial aria in 3-4 time in the key of C major—

Our dear land is harassed by a fierce invading foe,
To fight for Italy at once I go.

The adieux being spoken, after the departure of Graziella and Alonzo. Renzo, apostrophising the cross which had been given to him on a memorable occasion, sings in a recitative "From thee, dear relic, I never will part," which is preliminary to a beautiful ballad in G major, scored in 12-8 time, "The ship that spreads her pinions white." The aria finished, Graziella and Alonzo return with Genaro, who consents to the union proposed, and the scene closes with a quartet, in which the two lovers take their leave of Graziella, the self-rejected one to go to the wars, and the accepted one to obtain the permission of his mother for the marriage. A short chorus of sailors, picturing the preparation for departure, is also here interpolated.

Scene 3, supposed to open six months after the events just narrated, finds Graziella, whose solitary letter from Alonzo during that period informs her that his mother refuses to sanction their union, just upon the point of commencing her novitiate. The step caused by a contemplation of the faithfulness of Renzo, who had sent as a dying bequest when he fell on the field of battle, the cross so dear to him, with the fickleness of the love she had so hastily welcomed, is explained by a recitative, and the abbess of the convent which is to be her future abode, in a solo "Come, Graziella," endeavours to strengthen her resolution.

The finale shows the nuns who come to welcome Graziella to their peaceful home, and also discovers her tardy lover Alonzo, appearing to claim his bride. Faithful, however, to the lost love, Graziella perseveres in her determination, and the life devotion of the dying soldier is vindicated, as also his earnest prayer at his voluntary renunciation,

Hope and joy have fled for ever,
But in regions far above
We shall meet, no more to sever.

The voices of the people are heard at this touching episode, and with the solemn chant of the nuns the cantata ends.

The Outlaw.

A Sad Story of the Summer Sea.

He held with boatmen on the beach
No meteorologic speech;
The gleeful shrimp (the tripper's goal)
Awoke no echo in his soul;
He took the lodgings as they came,
Without the energy to frame
Inquiries touching on the flea,
Or extras (which shall ever be).

While others grouped, and chummed, and chaffed,
And let themselves be photographed,
He sat apart and brooded thus,
Distinctly non-gregari-us.
Each foot that came, each wave that brake
He greeted with a nervous quake
And glanced around with nerves acute,
As apprehensive of pursuit.

At length, unable more to brave
The light, he sought a lonely cave,
And, crouching there in crushed affright,
Kept close by day, and prowled by night.
FUN sought him out; in abject fear,
Concluding that his end was near;
He cowered, speechless, for a time,
Then, yielding, told his tale of crime.

"A friend of mine" (he said) "alas!
Procured a ticket, second-class,
Proposing to proceed by train
To Little Mudbeach-on-the-Main.
But spermaceti, going down,
Prevented him from quitting town,
And he presented (being free
Of hand) that ticket unto me!

"And I—ah, thing of grief and shame,
That I could do it!—used the same,
Though 'Not transferable,' in black-
And-white was printed on the back.
The clippers clipped, from time to time, [crime;
That little card, nor guessed my
The kind collectors could not see
They had not issued it to me!

"But now I lurk in fear and doubt,
Convinced that they have found it out,
And even now are on my track—
Perhaps with thumbscrews and the rack."
FUN stared, unhinged, disgusted, shocked;
His very powers of speech were locked;
He left; for words were not in place
In so unparalleled a case.

—Fun.

BAYREUTH.—Parsifal is to be performed here twenty times next year between the 15th July and the 1st September. The King of Bavaria has consented to the members of the Munich Opera again co-operating, and this year's representatives of the principal characters have likewise promised their services. The notion of representing other Wagnerian works appears to be abandoned. With regard to the pecuniary result of the sixteen performances given, it is stated that, despite the heavy outlay, there is a surplus of 120,000 marks. The sum expended by the Managing Committee attained the respectable total of 380,000 marks, and the King of Bavaria, whose account is kept separate, paid as much. Commenting on these figures, the Volkszeitung remarks: "According to the returns, then, the Parsifal performances cost upwards of 700,000 marks. Such was the amount which had to be expended to introduce to the world the late fruits of Wagner's mental labours! What part of this immense sum did it cost to place Beethoven's Fidelio on the stage? Wagner's Tannhäuser proved successful with ordinary operatic resources; for the production of the Nibelungenring and Parsifal all Germany was set in commotion, a Festival-Play-House erected, and sufficient money sacrificed to found one of the finest charitable institutions in the world."

Jules Alexandre Demeur, born at Hodimont-lez-Verviers on the 23rd September, 1814, died in Paris on the 21st ult. At one time he belonged as flautist to the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, and was afterwards professor of his instrument at the Conservatory in the same capital. After marrying Mdlle Charton, the well known singer, he led a retired life in Paris.

EXCERPTS FROM PARKE'S MUSICAL MEMOIRS.

Excerpt No. 1.

At these musical performances Mr Ashley, a sub-director, and first bassoon at Covent Garden Theatre, played for the first time on a newly-invented instrument called a double bassoon, an appropriate appellation, it being double the size of the common ones. This instrument, which rested on a stand, had a sort of flue affixed to the top of it, similar (with the exception of smoke) to that of a Richmond steam-boat. I am ignorant, however, whether it produced any tone, or whether it was placed in the orchestra to terminate the prospect. The name of this double bass and gigantic instrument, which was only fit to be grasped by the monster Polyphemus, did not transpire, and the double bassoon, which had never been heard, was never again seen after these performances were ended! The profits arising from these performances, as well as the former ones, were applied to charitable purposes. The official statement of the sum received at the five commemoration performances was £12,736 12s. 10d. The disbursements, among which were £6,000 to the society for decayed musicians, (the members of which attended the rehearsals and performances gratis,) and £1,000 to the Westminster Hospital, amounted to the same sum, with the exception of £286 6s. 6d., left in the hands of Mr Redmond Simpson, sub-treasurer, to answer subsequent demands. That gentleman, as a performer on the oboe, was highly estimated before Fischer arrived in England. He was musical librarian to the Queen, and many years principal oboist to the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, and when he retired he was succeeded by Mr Sharp, my predecessor. At his funeral, in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey, I attended with other wind instrument players who respected him, and we assisted in the performance of the Dead March in Saul over his grave.

The public were so highly gratified with the Abbey performances, that the proprietors of Drury Lane Theatre, perceiving that music was the order of the day, produced, on the 5th of November, a new comic opera in two acts, entitled The Spanish Rivals; the music of which was composed by Mr Linley. This composition was very effective: the song in it, "Let the lark find repose," is a delightful piece, and was twice sweetly sung by Miss Phillips, afterwards Mrs Crouch. The manager of Covent Garden Theatre, not to be behindhand, presented, on the 16th of November, a new comic opera in three acts, with extraordinary success, entitled Fontainbleau; or, Our way in France. The dramatic part of the piece was written by O'Keefe. The music was compiled and composed by Mr Shield. Among the prominent pieces are "Let Fame sound the trumpet," an original and beautiful composition, well sung by Johnstone; Edwin's comic song "In London my life is a ring of delight," the ne plus ultra of comic singing, and Miss Wheeler's bravura, accompanied by me on the oboe, which was (says a critic) a scientific and brilliant display of vocal and instrumental excellence. On this song Peter Pindar wrote the following lines. They first appeared in the Morning Herald, of December, 1784, and are now to be found amongst his fugitive pieces:

To thee, while others pour their praise,
The bard delighted joins the throng;
With pride he tunes though weak his lays,
Where merit justifies the song.

Yet think not Parke thy wond'rous skill
Fair praise alone from mortals draws:
Lo! Phœbus listens from his hill,
And all the Muses join th' applause.

A few days after this highly successful opera was produced Mr Shield gave a dinner party at his house in compliment to those friends who had performed the principal parts in it, among whom were Edwin, Johnstone, Bannister, myself, Mr Fozard, &c. Such a combination of talent could not but prove entertaining, as each one contributed after dinner to the hilarity of the meeting. Mr Fozard (the fashionable horse-dealer of Park Lane) described a new species of robbery which had been committed on his premises during the preceding night. It appeared some villains had broken into his stables, and cut off the tails of a string of valuable young horses just received from the breeder. "This circumstance," said he, addressing his friend Bannister, "has distressed me very much, for I am quite at a loss how to sell them. What would you advise?"—"Why," said Bannister, in his peculiar way, "in my opinion, the best thing you can do is to sell them by wholesale, for you'll never be able to re-tail them." Edwin gave some of his comic songs inimitably, particularly "Amo, Amas," from "The Agreeable Surprise," and "Four-and-twenty fiddlers all in a row;" and Johnstone some of his Irish airs, and duets with Bannister. Shield, who was so good an actor, that Edwin, at the rehearsal of a new opera, would never go through his songs till he had heard him sing them, related with great ability, the following whimsical anecdote of an actor of the name of Digges, who had performed the principal characters at Colman's Theatre in the Hay Market during the preceding summer. This man, (a tragedian,) who had obtained the appellation of the great northern actor, and who was as frigid as the vicinity of the north pole, having had his benefit fixed, began to consider what attractive novelty he should produce to fill the house on that occasion, and at length determined to select The Beggar's Opera, and to perform the character of Macheath in it himself. Digges, who had never before attempted a song, sent for his old friend Shield to ask his advice, and to request him to hear him sing one of the songs, which, on his arrival, in strict accordance with Hamlet's advice to the players, "Suit the action to the word," he rehearsed in the following manner:

AIR.

When the heart [striking his left breast with his right hand] of a man is depress'd with care,
The mist [drawing his hands across his eyes] is dispelled when a woman appears;
Like the notes of a fiddle [imitating the action of playing one] she sweetly, sweetly
Raises his spirits and charms his ear. [Seizing his left lug with the thumb and finger of his right hand.]

Digges proceeded no further, for the lengthened countenance of his friend Shield deterred him; nor did he subsequently appear in the character of Macheath, whereby he not only evinced much prudence, but probably avoided a similar fate to that intended for Mr D———n, an unpopular actor in Dublin, who being announced in the playbills to perform the character of Richard the Third, was luckily prevented from appearing by sudden illness. On this disappointment being communicated to the audience by the manager, from the stage, a gentleman sprung upon the seats of the pit, and addressing the public, said, with a stentorian voice, "Jontlemen! as Mr D———n don't act to-night you may ate your apples."

The King's Theatre opened for the season on the 18th of December, with a comic opera, called Il Curioso Indiscreto; the music by Anfossi, in which Signor Cremonini appeared for the first time; his talent was not very splendid. The music of this opera is not one of Anfossi's best efforts; nevertheless there are in it some pretty airs, and the finales are various and original.

Literary Work and Tobacco.—In response to a circular recently sent out by Mr Arthur Reade, who has been collecting information as to the habits of literary men in regard to stimulants, the Abbé Moigno gives an interesting and characteristic record of his experiences. The letter appearing in his paper, Les Mondes, states that he has published 150 volumes, small and great; that he scarcely ever leaves his work table, and never takes walking exercise; yet he never has a trace of headache, or brain-weariness, or constipation, or any form of urinary trouble, &c. He never has recourse for his work to stimulants, coffee, alcohol, tobacco, &c., a statement which the sequel shows to need qualification. Snuff-taking he has sometimes practised, but he vigorously condemns it. He has learnt 12 foreign languages by a method of his own, and with regard to his acquirements in philology and chronology, he says, "I was one of the most extraordinary personalities of my time, and François Arago sometimes laughingly threatened to have me burnt as a sorcerer." On one occasion when in Munich for a few weeks and spending his evenings with Bavarian savants, who each smoked four or five cigars and drank two or three pots of beer daily (Steinheil the most illustrious, boasted of smoking 6,000 cigars a year), the Abbé came to smoke three or four cigars a day. He had also anew taken to snuff, so that when preparing his calculus of variations, a very difficult mathematical work, he would empty his snuff-box (which held 25 grammes) in a day. But one day he was surprised to find himself painfully unable to recall the meaning of foreign words, and remember dates with which he had been familiar. Thereupon he formed a heroic resolution, and since August 31, 1863, when he smoked three cigars and took 25 centimes worth of snuff, he has up to the 25th of June, 1882, touched neither. This was, for him, a complete resurrection, not only of memory, but of general health and well-being; he has had indefinite capacity of work, unconscious digestion, perfect assimilation of food (of which he can take more), &c. For the rest, he mentions that he takes a small cup of black coffee in the morning, and when all but two or three spoonfuls has been drank, he adds a small spoonful of brandy or other alcoholic liquor. This is his ration of stimulants. He goes to bed about 9, and rises at 5, "full of vigour." The Abbé is over 80.

La Correspondencia Músical of the 6th inst. states that Pablo Sarasate was shortly expected at Pampeluna from San Sebastian.

M. Wieniawski, the pianist, assisted by Mad Zarembska and Mdlle Marie Poirson, gave a concert a short time since at Ostend.

Carl Klindworth, the pianist, has left Moscow and joined the professional staff at the Neue Academie der Tonkunst (Kullak's), Berlin.

A new zarzuela, La Muleta Consejera, illustrative of Cuban manners, is in preparation at the Teatro del Principe Alfonso, Madrid.

The operatic season at the Politeama Rossetti, Trieste, was inaugurated with Verdi's Nabucco, the second opera being the same master's Rigoletto.

The Italian dramatic author, Paolo Giacometti, died recently at Rome. He was born in 1816, and achieved success as a dramatist when only twenty.

Mancinelli's "Hymn" for the Guido Monaco Festival at Arezzo was enthusiastically received and encored. Boïto's Mefistofele, also, was highly successful.

The National Hymn of San Marino, composed by Sig. Marenco, was lately performed in the principal square of the Republic and the presence of the entire population, who were much pleased with it.

With the consent of the author, M. F. Mistral, the well-known poem, Calendal, in the Provençal dialect, has been transformed by M. Paul Ferrier into a libretto, for which M. Henri Maréchal writes the music.

Mdme Minnie Hauk will commence a five-months' concert tour at Boston, U.S., in October, and afterwards visit the other large cities of the great Republic.

Richard Kleinmichel, musical director at the Leipsic Stadttheater, has completed a romantico-comic opera, Manon, which will be produced next year in Hamburgh.

Christian Adolph Hertz, famous for his treatises—Lohengrin and the Wagnerian Tendency, The Future of Art in Scandinavia, &c.—died at Copenhagen on the 21st ult.

The season at the Milan Scala will probably be inaugurated with L'Etoile du Nord, the principal characters being sustained by Signorina Dalty and M. Maurel.

Kéler Béla was conductor at the concerts in the Tonhalle, Zurich; after which he took part in a Benefit Concert at the Zoological Garden, Frankfort-on-the-Maine.

The performers in the Madrid orchestras have banded together to defend their common interest. La Cronica de la Música mentions five societies founded for this purpose.

Gloria Keller, a young lady who has attained the ripe age of eight, is creating a sensation at Alicante by her phenomenal powers as pianist, vocalist, and elocutionist.

Dr Wüllner has declined the directorship of the Hoch Conservatory, Frankfort-on-the-Maine, despite the exceedingly liberal emoluments attached to it, and remains in Dresden.

In addition to the usual annual grant of 20,000 florins for the Klausenburg Nationaltheater, the Emperor of Austria has given 10,000 florins for last year and the same for this.

After an absence of nearly five months, Mdme Materna made her re-appearance at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, as Elizabeth in Tannhäuser, and met with a very cordial reception.

He thought he would mark his new shirts himself. So he marked the first shirt "Alfred Washington Jones," and the other eleven shirts, "ditto." (This must be taken cum grano.—Dr Blitge.)

The twenty-fifth annual festival of the Worcester County (Mass., U. S.), Musical Association will commence on Monday, the 25th inst., and end on the Friday following. Mr Frederic Archer will be solo organist and Carl Zerrahn conductor.

"Harry Croft Hiller is both poet and musician, as shown by five songs, for which he has supplied both words and music. Prettiest of the group is a serenade for a tenor, 'Sweetest slumber now await thee,' which, if sung well, will make a great and favourable impression during the coming out-door season. 'Thy Dear Name' and 'In the Haven' are tender and touching songs, also for tenor voices; the latter is the better and more original of the two. More dashing and spirited are 'The Border Raider,' for a bass voice, and 'The Queen's Shilling,' for a baritone."—Graphic.

"Three songs by Harry Croft Hiller deserve praise, inasmuch as the composer has been successful in writing his own words rather prettily. We like best the serenade, 'Sweetest slumber now await thee.'"—Sunday Times.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs, giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

"Miss Lillie Albrecht, the clever young pianist, has just published a new piece, which we venture to predict will earn well-deserved popularity, and add to the fame of Miss Albrecht as a rising and meritorious composer. The piece is entitled 'Fantaisie Marziale,' morceau de salon."—Life.

"'Fantaisie Marziale' is a brilliant pianoforte piece by Lillie Albrecht, the accomplished young pianist, who knows how to write effectively for, as well as to play well on, the instrument. The principal theme is spirited and is well contrasted by an episode or trio, of a more cantabile character."—The Illustrated London News.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1493. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

HEREFORD FESTIVAL.

Sept. 16.

The Cathedral programme on Thursday morning included three works, each of distinctive interest. First in order came Dr Garrett's new cantata, The Shunamite; next, Beethoven's Mass in C; and last, a liberal selection from Molique's Norwich oratorio, Abraham. Such a group, aided by weather of a genuinely festive character, would be relied upon anywhere to attract a large gathering of amateurs. In these western shires, however, there is an invincible indifference to novelties. I have pointed out the fact over and over again, when discussing the Festival programmes, and it is one which should always be kept in mind. The managers here know well that its consideration is a matter of first necessity with them. They dare not fly in the face of their public, as some advisers would have them do. Ruin would inevitably follow, and, after all, the strongest opponents of the present régime must admit that it is better for provincial amateurs to hear the great classic masterpieces they know and love than to hear nothing. The lesson of these circumstances was forcibly taught to-day by a meagre attendance, several parts of the Cathedral being almost empty. Yet one consoling fact remains. The "sacred oratorio" is set down for to-morrow morning, and, as on many like occasions, will make up lost ground.

Dr Garrett's Shunamite was not heard to-day for the first time, its production having taken place at a concert given in Cambridge last June by the University Choral Society. The work came here, nevertheless, as an absolute novelty to the Festival public, who might have been expected to anticipate with real interest the musical treatment of a theme so full of pathetic human feeling. In preparing his libretto, Dr Garrett had two courses open before him; first, to found a drama upon the Biblical incidents; next, to take the Scriptural narrative as it stands and make it the basis of didactic exposition. Both are legitimate, but it was to be expected from the composer's training and antecedents that he would adopt the more common, more easy, and, probably, more congenial second course. This he did, and hence the book of the Shunamite consists of a story broken up into many parts, each the text of a disquisition in the familiar Greek chorus style. The interest of the narrative is, of course, weakened in proportion to the copiousness and frequency of the interpolated "lessons," which, I may as well say at once, Dr Garrett scatters about his work with an unsparing hand. Some of them are almost forced upon it. For example, when the Shunamite invites her husband to prepare a chamber for Elisha, the chorus warns us, "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares." When the woman is promised a son, no fewer than three reflective numbers spring out of the incident, while Elisha's prayer, as he kneels alone by the body of the child, is actually interrupted, that the comment of some impossible lookers on may be heard. With the subject of a cantata or oratorio treated in this manner, the work becomes not so much an illustration of incident, as a series of anthems tacked together by a slight thread of narrative. Dr Garrett evidently intended such a result, his music savouring more of the church than of the concert platform, with its liberty of dramatic expression. The Shunamite might, indeed, have been written in an organ loft. It has all the comparative stiffness and constraint of the music thought most suitable to a respectable Englishman's well-regulated religious sentiment. The effect is at times decidedly irritating. We wish that the composer would for once let himself go, instead of pulling up with an eye on the law of decorum. He refuses all opportunities, however, and the steady flow of anthem-like music goes on with a "prunes and prism" expression that would commend itself to Mrs General as the pink of propriety. Observe that I am not saying anything against Dr Garrett's anthems as such. I only insist that when a man takes up a dramatic subject he should treat it in a dramatic spirit rather than make it the text of a high and dry musical sermon. The character of the writing in this work may be supposed free from the faults into which the tyro easily falls. Dr Garrett is, ex officio, a learned musician, to whom the tools of his craft and the correct manner of their application are familiar. His work, therefore, commends itself by being well made, but would do so still more were its outline less stiff and formal. It is here that the composer's training as a church musician has stood in his way. He does not seem to have been aware of the liberty allowed him, or else he shrank from using it, and the result is that the music strikes an attentive listener as being a lot of phrases carefully assorted and started in orderly procession. All this might be pardoned if the ideas of the work were elevated above commonplace. Dr Garrett is not wholly incapable of such distinction, as certain parts of the Shunamite prove. Take for example the choruses "Children are an heritage" and "Death is come up into our windows," both of which are distinctive and remarkable. But, as a rule, the music falls upon the ear like a tale that is told. We have heard it all before. It belongs to the ordinary colloquialisms of the art. A feature in the design of the cantata should not be overlooked. Dr Garrett makes liberal use of phrases intended, by their occasional recurrence, to bring to mind conditions and events that have passed. In his employment of this device he shows considerable ingenuity, and from it springs much of whatever interest the work excites. Taking a general view of the Shunamite, I cannot hope to see it occupying a high place among its kind. The cantata belongs to manufactured music. It never had a raison d'être in the inward necessity of an inspired soul to make outward utterance. The characters were distributed thus: The Shunamite, Miss Anna Williams; Narrator, Miss Hilda Wilson (who took the same part at Cambridge); Elisha, Mr Boyle; Gehazi, Mr King. Mr Boyle was not quite happy in the work he had to do, and needed watching; but his associates discharged their task right well, Miss Anna Williams—who is singing admirably here—deserving special mention. The performance, as a whole, was more slipshod than can be excused by ever so much consideration for an inexperienced conductor, who was no other than the composer himself.

Beethoven's "Mass in C" followed the Shunamite, and made the effect usual at these Festivals, The Mass was given to-day under circumstances of special advantage as regards its solos. It seems to have been felt that Beethoven's music deserves the best available interpreters; and Miss Williams, Mdme Patey, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Santley were all engaged upon it, with results easy to imagine. There can be no need of eulogy of this work, since it long ago passed beyond the range of criticism. The mass will ever rank as one of its composer's most divine productions, and as an offering upon the altar of religion worthy before most others of acceptance. Such music is never heard to greater advantage than at a Cathedral Festival, save, of course, in its proper place as a part of divine service. Under the conditions which ruled to-day religious significance comes in full force to the aid of musical beauty, and the entire effect is one that impresses the heart, while it commands intellectual homage.

The programme closed with a copious selection from Molique's oratorio Abraham—a work as strange to the public ear as though it had been written only yesterday. Abraham was first produced at the Norwich Festival of 1860, and obtained, if I am not mistaken, a hearing in London and elsewhere shortly after. Soon, however, it dropped out of sight and almost out of memory. Prima facie, this gives good reason for believing that Abraham is unworthy of life, but to arrive at such a conclusion would be utter injustice. The work is written throughout in the school of Mendelssohn, with occasional reminiscences of Spohr, whom Molique greatly admired, and it appeared at a time when Mendelssohnian echoes, aroused by the immense popularity of Elijah, were everywhere prevailing. Public taste quickly became surfeited with one style of music, and the boldest and best of the great composer's imitators then had little chance. Besides, Mendelssohn alone filled the public mind; the master left no room for the disciples; nor when his fascinating strains were heard would the public ear listen to any other. Circumstances are different now, for while Mendelssohn retains the commanding position which will ever be his, new masters and new styles have arisen to create a greater diversity and to make impossible the palling of any one upon the general taste. Therefore, works like Molique's Abraham have at last a chance, and the revival of the oratorio here must be accounted a timely act. It is a useful act also, since it dispels ignorance of a thing which the world, if it knew what was good for it, would not willingly let die. Granted that the music in Abraham is not marked by the originality that proclaims the opening of another chapter in art history—we may rejoice, perhaps, that there is no attempt at it—and what then? The craze for originality, so called, is the curse of modern music. The parent of all extravagance, distortion, and ugliness, it reduces composers in effect to the position of men grinning through horse-collars at a country fair for the reward of the most extraordinary grimaces. The result is that musicians who might do good service in this, that, or the other school, so conduct themselves as to excite pity or contempt. It is time this pitiful delusion ended, and that those who desire to say anything in music cease to jabber incoherence in the hope of its acceptance as a new idiom.

Abraham addresses us a second time with perfectly intelligible and graceful speech; moreover, it is the speech of a master who knows the spirit as well as the form of his artistic language, and can commend himself to the mind as well as the ear. Every number in Abraham vouches for this, and it will be a marvel if the reward of so much merit does not come sooner or later in full measure. The selections performed to-day included some of the best parts of the work, among them the departure of the patriarch from Chaldea, the Divine covenant, the birth of Isaac, the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael, and the sacrifice on Mount Moriah. I shall not now discuss the various numbers in detail, a better opportunity being, no doubt, at hand. Suffice it that the lovely trio, with horn accompaniment, "Let all those rejoice," and the grand chorus, "Great is our Lord," stood out prominently as examples of technical skill and masterful expression worthy of all honour. In the selection from Abraham Hereford has rehabilitated a master upon whom neglect had unjustly fallen. The performance, as a whole, might have been better, but the solos were capitally rendered by Miss Williams, Miss Fenna, Mdme Patey, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Santley. Mention was especially deserved by Mdme Patey, whose delivery of Sarah's music could not have been surpassed. Mr Lloyd, too, made his mark, declaiming the recitatives with great effect, and singing the air, "Pour out thy heart," delightfully.

The evening concert in the Shire Hall was very well attended by an audience no less distinguished than numerous, this being attributable, in part, to the appearance of Mdme Albani, and, in other part, to the popular character of the programme. The work done does not call for lengthy notice; but more than a word is due to the performance of Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, in which the pianoforte part was played by Mr James Taylor, Mus. Bac. Mr Taylor, whose style is good and whose musical intelligence is obvious, acquitted himself well. He was satisfied to present Beethoven as he found him, leaving others to commit the impertinence of treating the master's ideas as so many stalking horses for an exhibition of their own. The Choral Fantasia, together with the overtures to Die Zauberflöte and Oberon, made up the orchestral part of the programme, which, however, was surpassed in interest for the audience by the vocal selections. Several novelties had a place among the songs. There were, for example, M. Gounod's "Golden Thread," sung, as at Birmingham, by Madame Patey; an aria from Eckert's Guillaume d'Orange, for which Mdme Albani was responsible; and the ballad, "Lovely Graziella" (Mr F. King), from Sir Julius Benedict's new cantata. These all excited interest, as did, no less, Mr Lloyd's finished reading of Beethoven's "Adelaide," and the fine solo playing of Mr Carrodus in a violin romanza by Svendsen.

On Friday The Messiah was performed in the cathedral under conditions exceptionally favourable. Handel's masterpiece draws the country people as nothing else can. It brings them from all manner of outlying places by all manner of conveyances, and the weather is, therefore, a most important factor in the case. This morning the sun shone brilliantly, making the universal desire to hear the "sacred oratorio" stronger by its inviting warmth and brightness. The peculiar characteristics of a Messiah day at these festivals were intensified, therefore; the streets being full of visitors, and the greatest animation prevailing. It is needless to comment upon the performance, in which all the artists engaged here took part. Enough that, if not absolutely without fault, it gave such satisfaction to its audience as only a fairly good rendering of Handel's familiar strains can.

The number of persons present was 1,714, and the collection amounted to £274 4s. 6d. In this connection let me point out a significant bit of statistical evidence, which those should ponder who rail at the Festival managers for not producing novelties instead of Elijah and The Messiah. The aggregate attendance in the cathedral during the week has been 5,852. Of this number 3,108, or 52 per cent., assisted at the performance of the works just named. I may add that the total attendance exceeded, by 206, that of the Festival held in 1879. The sum collected for the charity up to the present time is £806 10s. 3d.; but this will be considerably augmented, as usual, by contributions sent direct to the treasurer.—D. T.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Having been out of town I have just read "a Professor's" letter addressed to you in regard to the "Guildhall School of Music." I don't see why the writer, being sure of what he says, withholds his name. Belonging as I do to the same Institution I cannot express my opinion on the subject, for the simple reason that I was not aware until now the Committee contained among their number members of the musical profession. Now this being the case, according to the assertion of "a Professor," I don't hesitate to say that the only way to do some good, improve matters of detail and prevent occurrences of the kind is to invite in turn all the professors attached to the Institution; perhaps from some of them something to advantage might be known. I take this opportunity to inform "a Professor" that instead of Mr Dicks, Mr Hicks, of the Common Council, was the gentleman alluded to in your issue of July 29th. I remain, Sir, your obedient servant, G. LI CALSI.

91, Lancaster Gate, Notting Hill, September 18th, 1882.

HEREFORD FESTIVAL.—The Hereford Musical Festival, celebrated last week, was favoured by congenial weather, which added to the comfort and enhanced the gratification of its constant supporters. This was the 159th anniversary of the meetings of the choirs of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester, originally instituted for the benefit of widows and orphans of the poorer clergy, whose services for good within the limits of the three dioceses can scarcely be over-estimated. When such energetic workers are called away it seems only just that those who survive to deplore their loss should be cared for. In the cathedral towns of mid-England a vast deal has been effected during the course of a century and upwards in promotion of so desirable an object; and on this account alone the annual gatherings of the choirs, in one or other city, merit help and countenance. It has been urged that the wealthier clergy might, while scarcely feeling the tax upon their resources, provide all that is indispensable for the requirements of their less fortunate co-labourers, and thus do away with the necessity of giving what some persist in designating as "musical entertainments" in their churches, paying for the aid of singers and players upon instruments, and charging money for admission, in order to meet the expenses incurred. But, as it would appear, the wealthier clergy do nothing of the kind. Why, therefore, any antagonism should be shown to the continuance of the Festivals of the Three Choirs, to which laymen so liberally contribute, it is not easy to explain. That the outcry about "novelty" was without significance, as regards the performances, and wholly unjustified on the present occasion, we shall endeavour to prove next week. Enough that the "novelties" actually presented gave unqualified satisfaction, that the programme, taken as a whole, was both varied and excellent, and the execution generally worthy the reputation long maintained, and long still, it may be hoped, in store for the Festivals of the Three Choirs.—Graphic.

BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

Little more remains to be said of this almost exceptionally prosperous meeting. The second performance of The Redemption, which brought it to an end on Friday night (September 1), while as fully attended and as loudly applauded, was in no sense equal to the first, although the composer wielded the bâton with even more than his usual and somewhat eccentric energy. Truth is that both chorus and orchestra were well-nigh exhausted after the week's toil, a result with which M. Gounod himself, through his fidgety desire for a perfection of detail impossible of attainment in the circumstances, was largely responsible. The second hearing, however, by no means weakened the impression created by the first, and The Redemption will assuredly figure conspicuously in forthcoming records of the Birmingham Festival of 1882. The principal singers, as before, were Mesdames Albani, Patey, and Marie Roze; Messrs Lloyd, Cummings, Foli, King, and Santley, who, by their zeal and unflagging attention, did credit to themselves, while giving all imaginable effect to the music with the interpretation of which they were entrusted. It, indeed, may be safely asserted that had not the popular and exacting French musician insisted upon an extra full rehearsal, after declaring publicly his entire satisfaction with its precursor in Birmingham Town Hall, the general effect would have been more satisfactory in proportion. About the merits of the work itself no more need be said till it is submitted to the judgment of a London audience, which will be appealed to not long hence at the Royal Albert Hall, under the superintendence, if we are not mistaken, of Mr Joseph Barnby. With so practised a chief and excellent a musician, it will be as carefully studied, and enjoy as fair a chance of impartial consideration, as though the author himself (both of the literary text and the music, by the way) were to hold the conductor's stick. Until then we bid adieu to The Redemption, with a sincere wish that all predicted of it may be realized—not, let us add, as the beginning of a new era and a new form of "oratorio," which some critics are inclined to think; for that is sheer nonsense, M. Gounod's work, despite its varied beauties, having no solid pretensions to the name of oratorio, for the justifiable assumption of which something considerably deeper is a matter of strict necessity. On the other hand, M. Gounod may content himself with the universally admitted fact, that he has given to the world a composition as engaging as, in its way, it is original, and that his prevalent leitmotive is in every amateur's head and on every amateur's lips. Psyche, the new secular cantata, by Herr Niels Gade, a general favourite, whose talent is only excelled by his utter absence of assumption, will also not long hence be heard in London; and just now we must be satisfied with recording its complete and well-merited success—a success for which Birmingham amateurs had been prepared in advance by other works written expressly for their Festival, and received with equal favour. That Herr Gade is a composer in the school of Mendelssohn, his first discoverer and promoter, musical readers scarcely require to be told—any more than that his writing for voices and his orchestral scoring are as finished and as brightly coloured as becomes the imitator of so great and fascinating a model. Whatever some of our self-appointed instructors may argue, we are not yet quite extricated from Mendelssohn's "leading-strings;" and in this particular Herr Gade stands much in the same predicament as M. Gounod himself—which textual quotations from both The Redemption and Psyche might amply serve to show. Under his unobtrusive and skilful direction, Herr Gade's cantata obtained an execution little short of perfect; and fortunate in such leading vocalists as Mdme Marie Roze (Psyche), Miss E. Farnol, Messrs. Lloyd and Santley, all must have gone to his satisfaction. The work and its composer were received with unanimous favour—and no wonder. To Mr. Gaul's sacred cantata, The Holy City, we have referred, and it only remains to state that, as the production of a local composer, it was naturally welcomed with the utmost cordiality, to which, however, it is a pleasing duty to add that its own intrinsic merits fully justified the applause bestowed upon it, and that the performance, under the direction of the composer, with Mdmes Trebelli and Patey, Misses Anna Williams and Emilie Harris (a "local" professor, we believe), Messrs Maas and F. King as principal singers, was all that could be wished. Mr Stockley, the able chorus-master for the Birmingham Festivals, conducted, and a loud call was made for the composer at the end. The Holy City, too, we hear, is to be given in London. So much the better, this honour being the Ultima Thule of a native artist's ambition. About the new Symphony of Mr Hubert Parry and the "Orchestral Serenade" of Mr Villiers Stanford, both belonging, more or less, to the "advanced school," we shall doubtless, thanks to the eclectic Mr August Manns, hear more, at no distant date, in the Crystal Palace. Mozart's incomparable G minor Symphony, Cherubini's very remarkable Fourth Mass (in C), and Beethoven's Mount of Olives, to praise any one of which would be superfluous, all splendidly given, under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, who, in spite of his recent severe illness, was the life and soul of the Festival, added materially to the attractions of this unusually varied programme, further enriched, it should be added, by Sir Julius Benedict's secular cantata, Graziella, a worthy companion to his Richard Cœur de Lion and St Cecilia, the performance of which, directed by the veteran composer himself, with Mesdames Marie Roze and Patey, Messrs Lloyd and King as leading singers, was received, as it deserved, with frequent and long continued applause. That to the imperishable Messiah a whole day was devoted may be taken for granted.—Graphic.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—A misunderstanding having arisen in some quarters, which may, if not removed, become general, as to the aims and objects of the New Society, I beg to be permitted through your columns to say that the Society has been registered under the authority of the Board of Trade purely in the interests of Art, and not as a commercial speculation. No member being entitled to receive any dividend, bonus, or profit whatever, the whole income and property will be applied to the promotion of the objects of the Society, and recourse has been had to registration as a company with limited liability, as being the simplest method of providing the necessary working capital, and of raising a guarantee fund. On these grounds the appeal is made to all lovers of music, to those of the profession and amateurs who have at any time been connected with the old Society's operations, as well as to the wealthy patrons of the Art, to aid in the re-establishment, in a manner worthy in all respects of its old and cherished traditions, of a Society whose work and influence have been of such an elevating character, and which has justly held so high a position for many years past among the kindred institutions of the country. Reference to the Memorandum and Articles of Association will, I think, convince most that the foundation has been laid for a good Society, embracing various objects, to be pursued according to the support forthcoming, and with a constitution which can lend itself to the requirements of the times.

In conclusion, it should be clearly understood that it remains for the patrons of Musical Art and for the public to determine very shortly, by the measure of support accorded, whether or not such a Society shall have an existence. There is every reason for satisfaction with results so far; but liberal support is still required to help us to the end in view. Those who for any reasons object to hold "Shares" in any undertaking, are enabled to help by means of donations. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

ALFRED J. PUTTICK, Hon. Sec. of the (New) Sacred Harmonic Society.

25, Russell Street, Covent Garden, W.C. Sept. 7.

Alban Förster, appointed Capellmeister to the Grand Duke of Neu-Strelitz, is succeeded as teacher of harmony, choral and concerted singing, at the Dresden Conservatory, by Eduard Welz, musical director, Liegnitz.

STUTTGART.—A rare festival took place here on Sept. 1, when Kammervirtuoso Herr Gottlieb Krüger completed his forty years membership of the Royal Chapel. Herr G. Krüger is one of the foremost harpists of Germany, and was formerly a pupil of Parish Alvars. That he is highly respected by his colleagues as well as the public was evinced by the ovations which he received. The "Festival" began at early morning by the male quartet of the Royal Vocal Chapel serenading him. This was followed by congratulations from his many friends, accompanied by bouquets of choice flowers and presents of various kinds. Herr Krüger afterwards was received in the music room of the Royal Theatre tastefully ornamented with flowers, the busts of their Majesties the King and Queen being placed in the centre. Hofkapellmeister Abert then, in an appropriate speech, expressed the hearty felicitations of the members of the Hofkapelle, and handed Herr Krüger a beautiful laurel wreath decorated with silk ribbons and the Würtemberg national colours. Then followed loud "Hurrahs" and a "fanfare." Subsequently Herr Krüger had an audience of the Royal Chamber-president von Gunzert, who, by command of the King, handed to Herr Krüger the gold medal for art and science, to be worn with the ribbon of the Order of the Crown, expressing at the same time his Majesty's pleasure in remembering on this festive day his long and faithful services. The Royal Chamber-singer, Herr J. Schültz, and Prälat Dr. Gerok expressed their congratulations in some poetical stanzas, which were printed in the Würtemberg Gazette.

AN ACT

TO AMEND THE LAW OF COPYRIGHT RELATING TO MUSICAL COMPOSITIONS. [10th August, 1882.]

Whereas it is expedient to amend the law relating to copyright in musical compositions, and to protect the public from vexatious proceedings for the recovery of penalties for the unauthorized performance of the same:

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. On and after the passing of this Act the proprietor of the copyright in any musical composition first published after the passing of this Act, or his assignee, who shall be entitled to and be desirous of retaining in his own hands exclusively the right of public representation or performance of the same, shall print or cause to be printed upon the title-page of every published copy of such musical composition a notice to the effect that the right of public representation or performance is reserved.

2. In case, after the passing of this Act, the right of public representation or performance of, and the copyright in, any musical composition shall be or become vested before publication of any copy thereof in different owners, then, if the owner of the right of public representation or performance shall desire to retain the same, he shall, before any such publication of any copy of such musical composition, give to the owner of the copyright therein notice in writing requiring him to print upon every copy of such musical composition a notice to the effect that the right of public representation or performance is reserved; but in case the right of public representation or performance of, and the copyright in, any musical composition shall, after publication of any copy thereof subsequently to the passing of this Act, first become vested in different owners, and such notice as aforesaid shall have been duly printed on all copies published after the passing of this Act previously to such vesting, then, if the owner of the right of performance and representation shall desire to retain the same, he shall, before the publication of any further copies of such musical composition, give notice in writing to the person in whom the copyright shall be then vested, requiring him to print such notice as aforesaid on every copy of such musical composition to be thereafter published.

3. If the owner for the time being of the copyright in any musical composition shall, after due notice being given to him or his predecessor in title at the time, and generally in accordance with the last preceding section, neglect or fail to print legibly and conspicuously upon every copy of such composition published by him or by his authority, or by any person lawfully entitled to publish the same, and claiming through or under him, a note or memorandum stating that the right of public representation or performance is reserved, then and in such case the owner of the copyright at the time of the happening of such neglect or default, shall forfeit and pay to the owner of the right of public representation or performance of such composition the sum of twenty pounds, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction.

4. Notwithstanding the provisions of the Act passed in the third and fourth years of His Majesty King William the Fourth, to amend the laws relating to dramatic literary property, or any other Act in which those provisions are incorporated, the costs of any action or proceedings for penalties or damages in respect of the unauthorized representation or performance of any musical composition published before the passing of this Act shall, in cases in which the plaintiff shall not recover more than forty shillings as penalty or damages, be in the discretion of the court or judge before whom such action or proceedings shall be tried.

5. This Act may be cited as the Copyright (Musical Compositions) Act, 1882.

All Musical Compositions published previously to the passing of this Act, are not included in its provisions, or the penalty contained therein: Therefore, the proprietors of the Copyright in "Musical Compositions" published before the 10th of August, 1882, cannot be compelled to print on such compositions, that "the right of public representation or performance is reserved."

And as the words attached to "Musical Compositions" is no part of the provisions of this Act, the authors of such words can claim no exclusive right to prevent the representation or performance of them in public without the written consent of the proprietor of the copyright.

* * * * * *

Mr Charles Purday has favoured us with the following observations on the new Act:—

The provisions of this Act relative to printing on all copies of "Musical Compositions" published after the 10th of August, 1882, the reservation of the right of public performance, with the penalty for the neglect or default of so doing, are not very likely to have the desired effect, as from the experience of the litigation respecting such performing rights on works published previously to the passing of this Act, Publishers will not now purchase the copyright in musical compositions without securing to themselves the right of performing the same in public too. They will also see the impolicy of putting on their title pages that the right of performing their new works is reserved, as it will militate against their being sung at concerts, or Penny Readings given for charitable or other purposes, fearing that some person may pounce upon the singers for a fee, or threaten them with a prosecution if such fee is not promptly forthcoming. Would it not be better, therefore, to state upon the title page "this Song, Quadrille," or other musical composition "may be performed without any fee." A word or two on the decisions that have been given respecting performing rights, which are generally stated to be copyrights. It is a fact that until these litigations took place, when an author sold a copyright to a publisher, he believed he had disposed of all the right that he possessed in his work, and never dreamt of interfering in the public performance of it. Nor did the Publisher who bought such a copyright think of asking an assignment of a performing right in addition to the copyright; consequently, everybody who chose to sing songs that were published believed he or she had a perfect right to do so without let or hindrance, never dreaming of being prosecuted, or being threatened with prosecution for doing so, being ignorant that they were infringing upon anybody's rights. But when such rights were brought before the law courts, and judges gave decisions against such performing rights, everybody was astonished; more especially when school-rooms were termed places of dramatic entertainments, because songs were sung and readings given there. There seems, however, to be a difference of opinion amongst the judges as to whether a single song, unconnected with any drama, can be a dramatic composition; or that a school-room can be a place of dramatic entertainment. And until such questions are settled by the highest tribunal of the realm, it must remain a doubtful matter. Like the question of copyright in foreign authors, in which there was so much difference of opinion, until the House of Lords decided that in the absence of conventions, a foreign author was not an author within the meaning of the Acts of Parliament, and had no power to sell a copyright in England.

DRESDEN AND LEIPSIC.

(Extract from a private letter.)

* * * * * *

DEAR ——.—The opera here is splendid, much better than the Leipsic opera was; but the Leipsic management has been entirely changed, so we may have something besides Wagner decently done in the winter. I heard Weber's Freischütz here last night, and I think it was about as complete as anything I remember.

The "principals" good, all of them, bar the tenor. Chorus very good, and band perfect. There are not so many clever solo players here as in Leipsic, but the band, as a whole, is infinitely better. Here they play the overture and accompany the singers; in Leipsic "every rioter for himself, and no blending." On the whole I think you hit the right nail on the head. Wagner is the death of Art. At all events, he has spoiled the Leipsic opera for a time. You will shortly hear from me again, as my sojourn at Leipsic will be somewhat prolonged.

Dresden, August 20th, 1882. C. W. T.

DOMONT (Seine-et-Oise)—Edmond Membrée, the composer, died here suddenly of the rupture of an aneurism, while seated at table with his family and friends. He was born at Valenciennes in 1820, and was consequently sixty-two. After the religious service, which was performed here, the remains were conveyed to the cemetery of Père-Lachaise and deposited in the family vault. Ludovic Halévy delivered an address in the name of the Société des Gens de Lettres, and Victorin Joncières in that of the Société des Compositeurs.

STRASSBURGH.—François Schwab, composer, musical critic of the Journal d'Alsace, and a member of the staff of the Ménestrel, has died, aged fifty-three, after a long and painful illness. Among his musical compositions may be mentioned the comic operas, Les deux Consultations, La Nuit tous les Chats sont gris, and Les Amours de Sylvio. He composed, also, a Mass, performed in the church of Saint Eustache, Paris, various pieces of instrumental music, and several vocal scenes. Besides writing for the papers already named, he was at one time a contributor to the Courier du Bas-Rhin, the Illustration de Bade, and the Gazette Musicale. He assisted Hector Berlioz considerably in organizing his grand concerts at Baden.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1882.

A year of dawn, skylarks, and hearts' desire,
And lips that ache for kisses into song.
A year of noon, and skies of fog and fire,
And swallows wizened screaming all day long.
A year of twilight, and the rain that pours;
And blackbirds in the dripping sycamores
Laugh; and the night comes, and the light heart snores.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

(To the Editor of the "Times.")

Sir,—I have but now met with your report of the Portsmouth meeting on the 8th inst., to promote the Royal College of Music, including a speech of Dr. Grove to explain the purpose of the proposed institution and to canvas the inhabitants of the district for subscriptions toward the endowment of the intended school. That gentleman has been obviously misinformed in several particulars he stated on the occasion and has stated in other localities; and as it is important in the interests of art that he and the public should know the truth on the subject, I trust you will allow me the privilege of a counter statement in The Times, and that the eloquent speaker will accept what has to be said as offered in courtesy, but as necessary to a right understanding.

1. The Royal Academy of Music is "an essentially national institution," entering on the 61st year of its operations, having been honoured with the sanction and support of the reigning Sovereigns from July 12, 1822, to the present moment, being incorporated by Royal charter, possessing (there is the strongest reason to believe) the confidence of the public, enjoying an annual grant from Her Majesty's Government, and "representing the art of music in the same way that the Royal Academy represents British painting."

2. It is true that some English pupils "study music in Germany, France, and Italy"; it is equally true that some foreign pupils study music in the Royal Academy; clearly, then, there are other causes than the "enormous cost" for the pursuit of musical study in countries alien to the respective pupils.

3. It does not correctly represent the communication between his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh and the Royal Academy of Music, in 1873, to say that his Royal Highness "endeavoured to drag the Royal Academy from its comparative obscurity," because the endeavour had all the air of kind intention with no appearance of such violence as the word "drag" implies, because the institution that had educated composers, singers, and players who had obtained the suffrages of all Europe was not in "obscurity," and because the spaces in the Albert Hall, which were offered for Academy occupation, proved to be unavailable.

4. The National Training School was opened in 1876; the five years expired in 1881 for which the original endowment was made; further subscriptions were raised which prolonged its existence for one year only, and it finally closed in May, 1882.

5. "Attempts were made" (I use Dr. Grove's terminology) "to amalgamate the Royal Academy of Music and the Training School," but these were on the condition that the Academy should surrender its charter, or, in other words, resign its existence. This was legally impossible while any member of the body politic or corporate refused assent, and many were unwilling that the institution should be annihilated which had influenced the education of the country for more than half a hundred years, and had trained some of the best acknowledged artists and teachers in all branches of music throughout that period. Dr Grove did not state, but it is a point of strong significance, that the Lords of the Privy Council, in June, 1880, invited remarks from the Academy directors upon the petition of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to the Queen in Council for a charter to a proposed College of Music; nor did he state the reply of the directors that, while acknowledging with gratitude the interests of his Royal Highness in the art it was their duty to cultivate, they believed the advancement of music would be better promoted by strengthening the long-existing and now successful institution than by founding another which could not but be experimental, and must be its rival, and that the elasticity of the charter admitted of any qualification of the working of the Academy that might meet the Prince's wishes. This reply has been officially communicated to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. Finally, Sir, permit me to say that I personally address you, not officially, while the directors of the Academy are dispersed for the vacation.—I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

G. A. MACFARREN.

WAGNER WORSHIP.*

(A Postscript to our Bayreuth Letters.)

The respect paid to a celebrated contemporary may be deserved—thoroughly or partially so—and yet from its exaggerated form and nature challenge a protest against it. This is the case with the Richard Wagner Worship at the present day. That worship, unexampled in the whole history of art, strikes us as such a remarkable sign of the times that we feel bound to consider it minutely in an unprejudiced spirit. In doing so, we leave entirely out of the question Wagner's artistic efforts, and pass over his merits in complete silence, confining our attention exclusively to the conduct of his followers, and that, too, only so far as we possess printed evidence for it. The most authoritative public document for our purpose is unquestionably the monthly paper, Die Bayreuther Blätter, which, with Wagner's personal co-operation, is edited by H. Wolzogen, and is the official organ of all Wagner Associations. It is now in its fifth year. For a future generation, which will look back on the Wagner epidemic of our time with calm judgment or even with incredulous amazement, the Bayreuther Blätter will possess no small interest as regards the history of culture. The musician will find in it only very scanty and dubious information, for it busies itself with everything else more than with Wagner's art. But, on the other hand, the future historian of culture in Germany will, from the five annual series of this periodical, be able to depict authentically with what violence the delirium tremens of Wagner drunkenness raged among us, and what extravagances it has left in the thoughts and feelings of the "cultivated" classes.

The distinguishing feature in Wagner Worship, when compared with the respect paid to Mozart, Beethoven, and Weber, consists not only in the temperature, which has gone up to boiling point, but more essentially in its thoroughly exceptional nature, which annexes all the branches of modern civilization. What views, violent fancies, or whims, apart from and independently of his art mission, Mozart or Beethoven cherished is a matter about which at most only a biographer troubles himself. Never did it enter the head of Beethovenian or Mozartean to accept as infallible truths and swear by such non-musical idiosyncracies of a composer. It is otherwise in Richard Wagner's case. For his adherents, whom, as we know, a chain of Wagner Associations has united in one large organic body, he is not merely a composer towering over every other, but without more ado The Master, the highest authority in every department of knowledge, a teacher and redeemer of mankind. Every opinion he utters on politics, philosophy, morals, or religion, has the value of a grand new fact, a revelation, to be obeyed like a religious commandment. This can be literally proved from the five annual sets of the Bayreuther Blätter, through which I have toiled with many a pang. The principal of these Wagnerian utterances, which are adored and indefatigably interpreted by his followers relate: firstly, to Schopenhauer's philosophy and its profound connection with Wagner's operas; secondly, to the religious, social, and political regeneration of the human race, and its deliverance from our unworthy culture; and thirdly, to the agitation against the Vivisection of animals, an operation indispensable to the study of medicine; and fourthly, which is especially amusing, to the propaganda of the Vegetarians' bill of fare. Now, these are certainly all subjects not having anything in connection with dramatic and musical art. What ground Wagner personally takes up with regard to them is for his artistic significance and the world of music absolutely immaterial. But the peculiar feature of that incredible and curious thing called Wagner Worship consists, as already stated, in the fact that The Master is taken as the standard in everything. The true Wagnerite must be not merely an unconditional adorer of every line and bar of Wagner's, but also a Schopenhauerite, a pessimist, an opponent of vivisection, an enemy of the Jews, a vegetarian, a believing Christian, and whatever else The Master prescribes.

The conceited infatuation of the Wagnerites with regard to Schopenhauer, the comprehension of whom they think they alone have taken on lease, we have already discussed at some length (when speaking of the Nibelungen), and may be allowed to refer the reader to what we then said.† The wish we expressed on that occasion, that we might at last be spared hearing any more about the assumed profound application of Schopenhauer's categories and terminologies has not been fulfilled. The young gentlemen of the Bayreuther Blätter parade their Schopenhauer at every opportunity as much as ever, as though they had grown grey in philosophical studies. "Parsifal," so their latest writings inform us, "Parsifal reproduces, though stript of all details, the pith of Schopenhauer's metaphysics and ethics. In Parsifal, Wagner merely transferred Schopenhauer into art when transferring Christianity into the latter." What absurdity! Because "pity" constitutes, or is supposed to constitute, the principal motive in Parsifal, and Schopenhauer extols it as the "basis of all genuine human love," Wagner's Consecrative-Festival-Play must needs be Schopenhauer transplanted into music! They will soon want to make us believe that pity for the misfortunes of others was an invention of Schopenhauer's, and unknown before his time. A man might and may write a drama on pity without ever having read a line of Schopenhauer, just as Shakspere wrote his Timon of Athens without having first learned from Schopenhauer pessimism. We may observe, parenthetically, that it was not Christianity, but Buddhism, which Schopenhauer called the "Doctrine of our most sacred religion," and drew for himself a portrait of Buddha as others do a head of Christ.

Sound common sense, which tells us that we should not consult an operatic composer about philosophy and its various systems, teaches, also, that it is medical men, authorities on physiology and pathology, and not a musician, who have to decide as to the necessity or otherwise of vivisection for scientific purposes. But this consideration has no value with Wagnerites. The Master has without more ado condemned vivisection, and the Bayreuther Blätter, the object of which had previously been supposed to be the knowledge and advocacy of art, immediately overflowed with articles which—always in the most arrogant language—condemned vivisection as a frivolous torturing of animals, and, among other things, took the German Reichstag sternly to task because it passed over an anti-vivisection petition and proceeded to the order of the day. "Have we Germans really any culture? Have we a creed?" is the pathetic conclusion of one of these childish manifestoes. When, in answer to all this dilettante declamation, we simply quote the utterance of Professor Billroth that he should never have ventured to undertake certain difficult and dangerous operations, by which human lives were saved, had he not first convinced himself by experiments on animals that they were possible—this will probably be sufficient for every sensible person. But the genuine Wagnerite has renounced thinking for himself. Among other sacrifices he offers The Master the sacrificium intellectus. Connected—at least partially—with this tender benevolence towards animals there is another private passion of Richard Wagner's: his propaganda for a vegetable diet. It is, we are told, a sin to kill animals. Besides which, meat food has ruined the human race physically and morally. "The system of wolfing down meat is the cause of all the wretchedness in the world," we read in the Bayreuther Blätter (1882), which even speaks of a "vegetarian view of the world." As we are aware, gentleness carried to sentimentality with regard to animals, is often found in people by no means distinguished for exaggerated love of their fellow-creatures. We know how tenderly Robespierre treated his pigeons. Wagner, then, proclaims an exclusively vegetable diet indispensable to the re-organization of mankind, when, lo and behold! herbs become an article of faith and a party principle among Wagnerites. Can anything be more comic than to see among the public announcements of Parsifal a request from the Editor that those holding the same opinions as himself will signify as soon as possible their intention of attending the "vegetarian dinner." There is a charming naïvete in the way in which the Bayreuther Blätter presents the connection between the vegetable world and Wagner worship: "The thought of vegetarianism," writes one gentleman, "raised by the genial hand of the finder" (that is to say, Wagner) "from out the ethically religious depths of our field of labour, has attracted to us all at once a circle of very seriously minded men" (the vegetarians) "stretching over vast countries. They bring with them that gentleness of feeling which even the work of art requires that the human soul may grasp it with proper comprehension and live itself into it. We, on our part, have contributed to their efforts a wonderfully strengthening afflux from the eternal spring of the Ideal." In fact, a regular alliance between vegetable-eaters and Wagnerites! "Help us to forward the Wagner propaganda, and we will agitate for your green meat." We can scarcely trust our eyes when reading such absurdities, all proclaimed with solemn seriousness in honour of The Master. Unfortunately, too, with his knowledge and sanction. To tranquillize, however, numerous Wagner Worshippers, who have at least remained reasonable in the matter of nutriment, we announce on the most undoubted authority that Wagner condemns animal food only theoretically, enjoying exceedingly his roast joint and likewise his wine, prohibited though it be by vegetarians. We cannot doubt this an instant. No one could compose a work like Tannhäuser, or even depict a pious Knight of the Graal, on sour milk and beans. But, as we are aware, theory and practice, precept and example, in Wagner's case, go hand in hand with, or diverge from, each other according to circumstances. The majority of his followers assembled at Bayreuth preferred the example to the theory, and the "vegetarian dinner" came to as sad an end as did the solemn meeting summoned on the 28th July by the "Bayreuth Patrons" to form a fund "out of which stipends might be paid to worthy and necessitous visitors at the Festival Performances." Richard Wagner himself suggested the notion, and sanctioned the proposed statutes of the new fund "intended to effect in a more intelligent and sensible manner what at present ridiculously useless travelling stipends are thoughtlessly intended to do for crowned prize composers on condition of their going through a complete and high course of study in Rome or Paris." After this "high-myinded" initiative, it would naturally be supposed that the "high-myinded Master"—mode of spelling adopted by the *Bayreuther Blätter—would have put himself down for a considerable sum at the head of those who wished to establish the new fund. As, however, he always figures as "through pity knowing" but never as "through pity giving aught away," the Bayreuth Patrons, who had already made sufficient sacrifices for the sacred cause, thought the best thing they could do was to imitate The Master's example. With gigantic pity for the unhappy beings excluded by poverty from the salvation of Bayreuth, and with trousers' pockets closely buttoned up, they dissolved the meeting.

The tendency of the Wagnerian school to represent only as a mere secondary consideration the circumstance of The Master's being the greatest of poets and composers while his principal merit consists in the fact that he is a prophet to illumine and redeem mankind, has in the last few years reached its climax. Two of his essays Zur Religion und Kunst, and Erkenne dich selbst, have let loose a tempest of admiration in the Wagnerian camp, and are constantly set up, interpreted and preached as dogmas by the Bayreuther Blätter. We will not now go minutely into these pamphlets which have been sufficiently discussed, and some may think refuted, and which in a bombastically oracular tone advocate an agitation for the protection of animals and the persecution of the Jews. Real friends would have been bound strongly to advise Wagner not to publish these pamphlets—a god, however, has no friends; he has only worshippers. We must here mention two books, which, harmonizing in their tendency with his notions of religious and political reforms, are among the latest objects of Wagner's passionate devotion. One of these works, only little known by the general public, is called Thalysia or the Salvation of Mankind. It is by A. Gleïzès and preaches a "bloodless diet as the most necessary condition of health and beauty, intellectual and bodily;" the other work; On the Inequality of Races, by Count Gobineau, is an extension of Schopenhauer's Pessimism, and, after a review of all races, ends by announcing "the speedy decline and torpidity of the western world." Scarcely had Wagner taken these two books under his protection, ere every Wagnerite swore by Gleïzès and Gobineau, and the Bayreuther Blätter celebrated the preconization of these two secondary saints by The Master as a great and saving act on his part. "With the pure heart and sharp glance of genius,"—writes the Bayreuther Blätter—"has Wagner grasped this theory" (that propounded by Gleïzès) "and with the undaunted courage and consciousness of a reformer, which we have found him to be in the domain of art, he pronounces here, too, the great watchword for the reformation of human society and earthly life."(!) In a long and turgid article, "Luther and the Peasants" (in the last April number), the "work at Bayreuth" is placed almost on an equality with what Luther effected. "Whoever only took with thorough earnestness," we read, "the best and profoundest sensations awakened in him by a work of Wagner's when represented in the noblest manner, would thereby immediately find it impossible to participate longer in the only apparently indifferent but really and truly murderous everydayisms of life and thus render himself an accomplice in the great lie of the civilization of the age." In a sermonising tone, growing more and more unctuous the nearer the performance of Parsifal approached, were these absurdities put forward. With a quotation from Parsifal even war is to be for ever rendered impossible. An article concerning the "Philosophy of Militarism" being adorned with Gurnemanz's "Christian admonition," "Away quickly with your weapons! Offend not the Lord who to-day without resistance gave his sacred blood to expiate the sins of the world." This, too, the fact of Wagner's declaring war to be a misfortune, is, we are told, something new and great!

From these few instances the reader will have remarked that an affectedly pious and Christianly religious tone has lately been assumed in the Wagnerian periodicals and is becoming continuously stronger. Wagner, growing old, has, with the "sigh which we once heard at the Cross on Golgotha and which now forces its way from out our own soul," given the cue, and immediately we behold his disciples imitating his example and praying with him. "Our Blätter," we read in Wolzogen's new year's article, "shall also be the outward sign of the conciliation which has found in these words the avowal of a religious conviction." Christianly and Christianity will be the next words. This swaggering with and dressing up in Christian sentiments borders on the repulsive.§

"And music?" we hear the reader impatiently ask. "Does music no longer play any part in a periodical of Wagner's?" She plays a part certainly, but a very subordinate one. Since Wagner uttered the ironically arrogant words: "I am no musician," adding at the same time the assurance that he would rather see our whole musical system swallowed up by an earthquake to-day than to-morrow—since then, it must have struck Wagnerites as utterly unbecoming to make much fuss about music. Already in the same number of the Bayreuther Blätter which contains Richard Wagner's latest "Public Letter" to Herr Schön, of Worms, there appeared a cringing writer who goes into ecstacies that, "for the salvation of art," Wagner should at last have declared he was no musician! The few musical articles are, by the way, not uninteresting. Herr H. Porges still goes on chewing the cud of his articles relative to the rehearsals of The Nibelungen Ring in the year 1876. He informs us at every bar what remarks Wagner made to the orchestra, most of them being of the merest matter-of-fact description. Thus: "The Master emphatically required the ascending bass figure" (passage given in notes) "to be most distinctly audible." In reference to another theme (theme given in notes) he exclaimed: "Play with greater conscientiousness!" And thus is every word reverentially handed down to posterity. Another article, "Art and Science," lamenting the stepmotherly manner in which music is treated by æstheticians, offers an amusing instance of the ignorance of the writers on the Bayreuther Blätter. In reply to this lament the editor indulges in the satirical observation that "Vischer, the classical æsthetician of modern times, knew, as we are aware, so little how to deal with music, that, like an embarrassed step-mother, he was obliged to ally himself with Herr Hanslick, in order that that modern authority in the domain of musical science might take his place and supply instead of himself the chapters on music, in consequence of which a splendid homunculus out of the Viennese retort then certainly slipped in among the learned paragraphs of the great Faust scholar." The gentlemen of Bayreuth merely prove by the above that they never saw the sixth volume (published in 1857) of Vischer's Æsthetics, for the preface to it distinctly states that Professor Carl Köstlin, of Tübingen, wrote the musical portion, the views in which agreed with Vischer's. Thus, for seven-and-twenty years, everyone taking an interest in æsthetics knows to whom the musical portion of Vischer's great work is due, but the chief organ of the Wagnerites does not know it even now. The Master once (without the slightest ground) designated me as Vischer's colleague, and that suffices to make his organs go on vilifying the monumental work in question for evermore.

I have kept the most amusing bit till the end. Herr Joseph Rubinstein, he who made a name by his "annihilation" of Robert Schumann, published in the Bayreuther Blätter an article on "Symphony and Drama," the conclusion of which is to this effect: "If, when looking at post-Beethovenian attempts in the department of absolute symphony, we must consider the last symphonist, properly so called, as carried to the grave with Beethoven, it must be allowed that all the essentially musical qualities of this class of writing celebrate, as it were, their resurrection in the music-drama, and, moreover, in so strict a sense that it is there they first appear in a completely spotless and, so to say, transfigured shape." So, the Symphonies of Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Brahms, are all superfluous works of the decline of art; after Beethoven we have as symphonist Richard Wagner alone. The orchestral accompaniment in Tristan and the Nibelungen fully, and in transfigured shape, supplies the place of the Symphony, buried with Beethoven.

It would be doing the Bayreuther Blätter too much honour or insulting it too deeply to regard it as the sole literary clinical specimen of the Wagner-Paroxysm. In numerous and sometimes very remarkable books and pamphlets we come across acute cases of what in the perodical is chronic. For to-day, we have already detained the friendly reader too long with the Bayreuther Blätter. Let him sum up the different items and decide for himself whether the present Wagner idolatry is or is not, in form and substance, to be reckoned among epidemic mental diseases.

EDUARD HANSLICK.

ANOTHER "improved version" of Da Ponte's Don Giovanni, which Mozart immortalized by his music, is about to be presented at the Leipsic Opera. The authors are Herr Grandauer and Herr von Wolzogen, whose best excuse is that they have restored not only the duet for Zerlina and Leporello, but the second finale as it originally stood in the score, though time out of mind as a rule omitted. Otherwise this interference with the plan of a recognized masterpiece would have no colourable plea for toleration.

TERESA TUA.—Mdlle Teresa Tua has signed an agreement with M. Alfredo Fischhof to play for two years in Europe and America. The celebrated young violinist was to make her first appearance on the 15th inst., at the Kroll Theatre, Berlin, where, together with the well-known pianist, Robert Fischhof, she will be heard in eight concerts. At Vienna, during October, she will take part in two, which, by contract between Baron Hoffmann, Intendant of the Imperial theatres, and M. Alfredo Fischhof, are to be given at the Operahouse. This has occasioned no little sensation in artistic circles, the use of the above-named establishment never having been granted for concert purposes. Buchholz and Diebel, of Vienna, have recently published eight Lieder, composed by Robert Fischhof, which had been unanimously awarded the first prize at the Vienna Conservatoire competition. In January next Mdlle Tua accompanies her impresario to America, to meet, at New York, M. Maurice Strakosch, uncle to M. Fischhof, and most genial of musical entrepreneurs.

EDMOND MEMBRÉE.

The death is announced of M. Membrée, a composer of no small merit, but who had all through his life to contend against ill-fortune professionally. He seems to have been one of those men who, having great gifts, somehow contrive not to put them to the best use, and allow themselves to be beaten in the struggle for fame and fortune by men very much inferior to themselves. One song he wrote years ago—"Page, Ecuyer, Capitaine"—he sold to a musical publisher for 50 francs. Upwards of 200,000 copies of it were sold, but the publisher never added a penny to the fifty francs he had paid. Fortunately for himself, M. Membrée had married wisely and well, and though he failed to secure "the bubble reputation," and the more substantial rewards that fell to the lot of the Offenbachs, Lecocqs, Hervés, et hoc genus omne, he had a cheerful home, a pleasant family, and enjoyed life thoroughly. His very mode of departing it was what his epicurean nature would have chosen. He died at dinner, surrounded by cheerful and happy faces. He had just taken up the knife to carve a chicken, when he was seen to lay it down suddenly. Then he sank back in his chair, dead.

BALFE.

I read in the papers that a memoir of the Life and Work of Michael William Balfe, the gifted composer of the Bohemian Girl and of a hundred works as charming, which will live as long as English music lives, is in the press. The author of the memoir is Mr W. A. Barrett; and the book, it is hoped, will be ready by October 20th next, the anniversary of Balfe's death, and the day fixed for the unveiling of the monumental tablet to his memory in Westminster Abbey.—G. A. S., Illustrated London News, September 19.

SIGNOR SCHIRA has returned from Italy. During the winter season we hope to hear his new comic opera, The Isle of Beauty, of which report speaks highly. The libretto, by Mr Desmond L. Ryan, is said to be written with much humour and esprit—which we may easily credit.

MR CARL ROSA has resolved to spend his Christmas at Liverpool, and has hired the Court Theatre in that town for six weeks from Boxing Day next. On Easter Monday the London season will begin at Drury Lane. In accordance with his desire to produce during every season in London at least one new work of pretension by a native writer, Mr Carl Rosa has commissioned Mr Francis Hueffer to write, and Mr A. C. Mackenzie, of Edinburgh, to compose, a new and original opera on the subject of Colomba, the story of which will be founded upon Prosper Merimée's famous romance of that name. This will, it is understood, be Mr Mackenzie's first experience in grand opera, though he has written two cantatas, several overtures, and other works heard at the Crystal Palace and elsewhere, besides a pianoforte quartet,* a string quintet, and other chamber music. Mr Mackenzie is a native of Edinburgh, and in 1857, at the age of ten, was sent to Schwarzburg-Sonderhausen to study music under Ulrich Stein. At fourteen he entered the ducal orchestra as violinist. He remained in Germany till 1862, when he returned to London, entered at the Royal Academy of Music as a pupil of M. Sainton,† and was elected King's Scholar. In 1865 he returned to Edinburgh, and has since occasionally visited London and Florence, gaining his living entirely by writing and teaching. At thirty-five Mr Mackenzie is still a young man; he is regarded as a writer of great promise, and, indeed, Mr Carl Rosa could not have made a more prudent choice.—London Figaro.

VENICE.—The Teatro Malibran has been opened for a short operatic season, the works already performed being Il Barbiere, Don Pasquale, and Faust. The buffo-opera season at the Lido has come to an end. With regard to the Fenice, there is a report that Rosani intends opening it for a Carneval and Lent season, with Les Huguenots and Massenet's Roi de Lahore as the chief attractions. A girl pianist, Luisa Cognetti, has been for some time creating a lively impression. She played here recently before the Queen with the same success as at the two concerts she gave at the Liceo Marcello Benedetto.

* Introduced by Mr Arthur Chappell at the Monday Popular Concerts.

PROVINCIAL.

LIVERPOOL (from a Correspondent).—An air with variations and fugue, by Mr T. J. Dudeney, occupied a place in the programme of a recent highly interesting organ recital, given by Mr W. T. Best in St George's Hall. That the eminent organist should be thus lending an ear to rising English composers is a matter for sincere gratification, I subjoin the programme in extenso :—

Scherzo for the Organ, A minor (W. T. Best); Air, "Ave Maria" (F. Schubert); Military March (E. Schulz); Air with Variations and Fugue (T. J. Dudeney); Andante Cantabile (Omer Guiraud); Finale, Grand Chœur Dialogue (E. Gigout).

—The Faust of Hector Berlioz has been, for the third time, given here under Mr Hallé's direction with still increasing success. The local press are still in raptures with the work and its performance. The Hallé-created Manchester orchestra seems to carry everything before it in these marches, and its reputation is gradually spreading to the out-isles.—QUIG.

BRADFORD.—The English Opera Company last night entered upon a six nights' engagement in St George's Hall. Gounod's Faust was produced with great effect. Mr Frederick C. Packard took the part of Faust; Mr James Sauvage, Valentine; Mr Richard Temple, Mephistopheles; Miss Helen Armstrong, Siebel; Mrs Oliver Summers, Martha; and Mdme Blanche Cole, Marguerite. The audience showed their appreciation by loud applause.

MALVERN.—On Friday last week Mr W. H. Speer, son of Mr H. T. Speer, gave an organ recital in the Priory Church in aid of the new organ fund, when there was a large congregation, and the young gentleman's playing was greatly admired. On Wednesday afternoon Mr F. F. Rogers, of Malvern Wells, gave an organ recital at the Worcester Exhibition, when he played a selection of classical and popular music from the best composers. There was a large attendance.—Malvern News.

MANCHESTER.—The Carl Rosa company gave Maritana at the Prince's Theatre on Tuesday with great success. Miss Georgina Burns, as the heroine of Wallace's popular opera, was warmly received. Her greatest successes were in "Scenes that are brightest" and the subsequent duet with Lazarillo (Miss Josephine York). Messrs J. W. Turner, Henry Pope, and Brooklyn were respectively Don Cæsar, the King, and the Marquis. "The laurels of the evening, however," says the Evening News, "must be awarded to Mr Leslie Crotty, who undertook the thankless part of Don José in a masterly manner, and fully merited the plaudits he received."

FOLKESTONE.—A grand concert was given last week at the Town Hall, under the direction of Mdme Mina Gould, a lady eminent in the musical world as a musician and composer. The artists were all exceptionally good. We never attended a concert that gave such general satisfaction. Without detracting from the great abilities of M. Ovide Musin (unavoidably absent), the splendid playing of Mr. Booth (his substitute) in a Cavatina, by Raff, and still more in a Berceuse by Renard, delighted the audience so much that it was re-demanded. Messrs Traherne and Cecil's duets were most effectively sung. Mdme Gould's charming song, "The Time of Roses," was beautifully rendered by Mrs Hutchinson, who was loudly encored, but she substituted "Dearest Heart"; Mr Thorndyke's "Toreador's song" (Carmen) was grandly sung, his fine voice telling in every passage. The ballad of "The Miller and the Maid" was charmingly given by Miss Ellen Meason, a most promising singer. The other parts of the programme were most effectively carried out. We must not forget to mention the ability of Mr Eric Lewis; his sketches were inimitable and caused roars of laughter. The arrangement of the platform was exceedingly good, the sides being filled with plants, ferns and flowers, tastefully arranged by Mr Peden, of Sandgate Road. We shall be glad to hear of Mdme Gould soon paying Folkestone another visit.—Folkestone News.

HADLOW.—A bazaar has been held in the grounds of Hadlow Park (kindly lent for the occasion by Lady Yardley), in aid of the fund for paying off the debt on the new organ chamber in Hadlow Church. Tents were erected for the purpose, presided over by Mrs Edward Leney, (of Hadlow Place) and her sisters, the Misses Laurence; Mrs Monypenny and Mrs Hargreaves; Lady Yardley, the Misses Yardley, Misses Wilkin, Hales, E. Simmons, and Taylor. The refreshment tent was under the care of Mrs and the Misses Golding, the Fine Art Gallery by Mrs C. Stow and E. Yardley. In another tent was "Fortune Telling," conducted by Mdlle Felicia de Bunsen, (dressed most becomingly as a gipsy), which formed one of the great attractions of the afternoon, numbers of young ladies crowding round it anxiously awaiting their turn to learn their future fate. Among the visitors were the Baroness de Larpent and party, Col. and Mrs Evans, &c. During the afternoon the Birling Band played some excellent music. The exact amount realized by the bazaar is not yet known, but is believed to be between £80 and £90. The debt on the organ chamber was about £260, and it is hoped that after one or two more similar exertions have been made to wipe it off, the debt will be a thing of the past.—Tonbridge Free Press.

OSWESTRY.—The preparations for the Oswestry Triennial Musical Festival, to be held on Friday and Saturday, under the direction of Mr Henry Leslie, are approaching completion. The first festival, which was the outcome of Mr Leslie's efforts and influence, was held in 1879. That festival resulted in the establishment of a school of music for the district, with Oswestry as its centre, and it was resolved that the festival should be held triennially. A number of village choirs were afterwards formed in connection with the school of music, and the progress made by these choirs suggested to Mr Leslie the idea of organizing a festival of village choirs, with the primary object of improving congregational singing. This project was most successfully carried out last year, when 1,700 persons assembled in the Cross Market at Oswestry to listen to the singing of a choir of 1,200 voices. Owing to acoustic and other defects which were discovered in the Market Hall, and which could not be well overcome, this year's festival will be held in the Powis Hall. On Friday morning the first and second parts of the Creation will be performed, and will be followed by miscellaneous selections. The soloists will be Miss Anna Williams, Mr J. Maas, and Mr H. Blower. The choruses will be sung by the Oswestry Festival Choir, and there will be a full professional band. In the evening there will be a miscellaneous concert, in which Mr John Thomas (Pencerdd Gwalia) will take part. On Saturday at noon the village choirs will compete for a banner of honour. There also will be a competition by the juvenile choirs, and prizes will be awarded for singing at sight.—Local paper.

PRESTON.—The Royal English Opera Company commenced a six nights' engagement at the Theatre Royal, on Monday evening, when Gounod's Faust was submitted to a crowded house. This troupe includes many celebrated artists, such as Mdme Roze Hersee, Miss Ellen Armstrong, Miss Philipine Siedle, Messrs J. Sauvage, W. Parkinson, Aynsley Cook, R. Temple, Charles Lyall, Faulkner Leigh, Ernest Harrison, Frederick C. Packard, and Mdme Blanche Cole, who have all won laurels. The caste on Monday evening was strong. It was :—Faust, Mr F. C. Packard; Valentine, Mr Jas. Sauvage; Mephistopheles, Mr R. Temple; Siebel, Miss Ellen Armstrong; Martha, Mrs Oliver Summers; and Marguerite, Mdme Blanche Cole. The plot was gradually and skilfully unfolded, and the interest once aroused, was not only fed but well sustained. Everyone knows that Satan, in the guise of Mephistopheles, is the motive power of the opera, and hence it is necessary that he who takes that rôle should not only be a superior singer but a gifted actor. These attributes Mr Temple possesses, he sings correctly and with good enunciation and feeling. For the serenade "Maiden now in peace" he was rapturously encored. Mr Packard, a charming tenor, had a very intelligent conception of the title character, while Mr Sauvage played and sung as Valentine with both brilliancy and energy. Madame Blanche Cole was suffering from influenza, but the lady, heard even at such a disadvantage, did not fail to please. She interpreted the music allotted to her share with skill, care, and verve. Miss Armstrong is a competent cantatrice, and in the fourth act complied with the wishes of the audience for an encore. Mrs Oliver Summers was engaging as Martha. The chorus did good service, especially in the "Wine or beer" chorus, and the orchestra is very efficient. The principal dancers were the Sisters Elliott, and the conductors Mr A. Howell and Mr J. Edwards. Last night Bellini's Sonnambula was performed, and Mr Aynsley Cook, an old Preston favourite, was much enjoyed. Mdme Roze Hersee, as Amina, proved that she deserved the reputation which had preceded her arrival in Preston. To-night (Wednesday), The Marriage of Figaro, to-morrow, (Thursday), Il Trovatore; Friday, Les Huguenots; and on Saturday Fra Diavolo will be presented.—Preston Herald, Sept. 13, 1882.

BERLIN.—The Italian company at the Philharmonie have given La Sonnambula, with Varesi as Amina. The lady, who pleased both as vocalist and actress, is becoming a great favourite.—At a performance in aid of the Berlin Press Association, Theodor Wachtel gave his aid. To mark their sense of the service rendered, the Association presented him with a bronze vase bearing this inscription: "To the Tenor Prince, in grateful remembrance, from the Berlin Press Association."

THERE is no foundation for the report that Joseph Joachim has resigned the post of "Principal" at the Berlin "Hochschule." He has simply re-organized it, with the consent and approval of his fellow professors, and among the rest, of Herr Kiel. In fact, there will be, in lieu of a Director, a Directorium, over which Joachim continues to occupy the place of honour, as well befits his exceptional merit. We shall return to the subject.

THE PATTI CONCERT AT SWANSEA.

(Correspondence of the "Western Mail.")

No musical event that has taken place in South Wales has ever caused a greater sensation than the concert given by Mdme Adelina Patti, assisted by some of her distinguished musical friends, at the Albert Hall, Swansea, on Thursday week. The interest created by the performances of the famous Welsh Choir which, under the leadership of Caradoc, won the prize for choral singing at the Crystal Palace, was of quite a different character, and was based more upon national and patriotic sentiment than upon purely artistic considerations. The nearest approach to the furore occasioned by Mdme Patti's appearance in Swansea was excited by the visit of Jenny Lind to Cardiff more than a quarter of a century ago. But in that case "the Swedish Nightingale" sang for the benefit of herself or her impressario, whilst, in the present instance, the Italian Queen of Song, with a generosity which does as infinite credit to her heart as her vocal achievements to the trained artistic faculty of which they are the result, has sung for the benefit of one of the most catholic and deserving charities in the world—a hospital for the relief of the sick and suffering. Some who read these lines will remember how the greedy herd of speculators in the Jenny Lind tickets burnt their fingers, having ultimately to dispose of places they had reserved at a great loss instead of reaping the usurious premium anticipated. If there was no speculation in the Patti concert tickets there was an ample demand to fill to its utmost capacity the capacious hall in which the entertainment was given. All the rank and fashion of Swansea were present—in fact, the local world and his wife may be said to have been there, and there were also representatives of the great towns in the Principality, attracted partly by the fame of the prima donna, partly by curiosity, and partly by a genuine love of musical art, which, in this instance, was embodied in its most distinguished form. So great has been the financial success of the concert that it is anticipated that a sum of between £700 and £800 will be available, after defraying all the incidental expenses, for the Swansea Hospital. This may be regarded as a free gift on the part of Mdme Adelina Patti to the Swansea charity. It is true that she was assisted in her concert by a number of eminent artists, but it is no disparagement of their motives to say that their services were rendered out of regard to their hostess rather than as acts of individual charity. I have heard her many times in grand opera, and on the concert-room stage, but never in finer voice; nor can I believe that she ever strove more earnestly to please her audience than yesterday afternoon in the music-hall at Swansea. Her first piece, "The Shadow Song," from Dinorah, was magnificently given and rapturously applauded, whereupon she sang her always welcome "Home, sweet home" with a grace and pathos that has never been excelled. In the second part her duet with Signor Nicolini, "Parigi o cara," from La Traviata, was re-demanded and repeated accordingly. But it was when, at the close of the concert, the--bénéficiaire, I was almost going to write, but I recollect myself and substitute the more appropriate phrase, benefactress—sang Verdi's "Ernani involami" that the enthusiasm reached its highest pitch. The house rose at the fair prima donna. Showers of bouquets were thrown upon the stage, hats and handkerchiefs were waved, and "bravissimas" were shouted with tremendous effulgence. In vain Mdme Patti bowed to every portion of the audience; they would not let her pass from their sight. So, with a charming readiness to oblige, she motioned to the conductor and sang "Within a mile o' Edinboro' Town." When her voice had died away the acclamations of the audience again rent the air, and the beautiful singer was cheered to the echo as she left the stage. Then we all experienced a delightful surprise, for unsolicited, and of her own free will, the Queen of Song came back and sang "Coming thro' the rye." It would be impossible to describe the witchery and vivacity which were imparted to the rendering of this charming little song. The space at my disposal will not admit of more than a passing reference to the artists who assisted Mdme Patti. Signor Nicolini was in capital voice, and by his rendering of the music entrusted to him added greatly to the interest of the concert. Mademoiselle Thérese Castellan's violin solos will be long remembered as most marvellous performances upon a most marvellous instrument. Signor Bonetti sang with much humour and ability. Signor Tito Mattei's pianoforte solos were of themselves worth all the money that was paid for the concert. The ease and grace of his execution, the taste and feeling of his expression were a lesson the audience must have profited by. Nor must I forget to mention the services rendered by Herr Ganz the conductor. Suffice it to say that his services were worthy of the occasion, and of the distinguished artists with whom Herr Ganz was associated. I believe all the artists, together with Mr Josiah Pittman and Mr Edward Hall, of the Covent Garden Opera, are at present the guests of Mdme Adelina Patti at Craig-y-Nos. Crowds of people assembled to witness the arrival and departure of the prima donna, and so great was the interest that the streets from the station to the music hall were decorated with bunting and appropriate devices, whilst from various public institutions flags were displayed. In conclusion the general sentiment of Swansea was that by this gracious act of charity Mdme Patti has won a high place in the estimation of her neighbours, who henceforth will never think of the Lady of Craig-y-Nos without remembering how to the generous impulse of her heart is due a queenly benefaction to a deserving institution.

MONTIGNY-RÉMAURY AT BADEN-BADEN.

Mdme Montigny-Rémaury has achieved the conquest of all the dilettanti here. She played yesterday at the grand concert, with all the dash, fire, and spirit characterizing her splendid talent, Beethoven's Concerto in C (No. 1), together with an "Introduction and Allegro" by Benjamin Godard. The applause burst forth so vehemently after Beethoven's Concerto that she was compelled to resume her seat and play a short solo piece. Seldom have we seen our public—which is cosmopolitan and consequently little homogeneous in its tastes and aspirations—so unanimous in applauding a foreign artist. It is a great triumph for the French pianist, who was presented with a gorgeous silver crown. We sincerely congratulate her and add: "May we soon seen you again."—(Correspondence of the "Ménestrel.")

The Walküre is in many respects more interesting to listen to; there is some human interest in it, and the music is far more vocal than that of the Rhinegold. Wotan now appears as the father of two mortals—twins, and, as a matter of course involves them in the direst misfortune. These wretched creatures, by his permission, if not instigation, form an unnatural attachment for one another, although they are aware of their relationship. It is an unpleasant episode, quite unnecessary for the development of the story, and need not be dwelt upon. No sooner is the mischief done than Fricka, who suddenly becomes the representative of indignant virtue, though she ought surely to have become inured to similar lapses amongst the "gods," appears before Wotan, and by dint of scolding forces him to punish by death and destruction his unhappy offspring. Was there ever such a poor, miserable "god," able to work nothing but ill to his creatures! He has, moreover, nine daughters, born of Erda, the goddess of primæval wisdom, and these frisky young ladies pass most of their time on horse-back, riding through storms to battlefields, where they devote to slaughter the bravest amongst mortal combatants, in order to carry them off to Walhalla to become demi-gods and boozing companions of old father Wotan! In order to fulfil his promise to Fricka, Wotan commands Brünnhilde, one of the nine daughters, to lead Siegmund, his devoted son, up to slaughter, which she at first undertakes to do. When, however, she sees Siegmund, and his half-dying wife, she compassionates them, and endeavours to avert the doom which her presence should tell her is inevitable. She makes the attempt, however, and the result is that Wotan himself has first to assist in his son's despatch and then to punish his luckless agent by striking him dead. The music of this scene is very protracted, and consequently wearisome to listen to, but the ride of the Walkyries is full of character, though noisy. The mechanical representation of the ride was, to say the least of it, unfortunate, and more provocative of mirth than terror. To close the act, there remains but the punishment of Brünnhilde for disobeying old Wotan, and "relenting" in so undignified a manner, so the All-father storms at her, degrades her, and not being able to do anything worse, puts her into a magic slumber from which she is to be awakened by the kiss of a mortal, and to become subject to him by the power of love. The whole of this scene is highly dramatic, and much more melodious than anything that has gone before. If shortened to reasonable limits, it is even capable of giving pleasure; but, spun out as it is, it is a heavy tax on the hearer, who has to guess at a not overpoweringly interesting story from 7.30 till 12.15, at which time the first opera-drama Die Walküre, ended. Before proceeding further, I should in fairness mention that the love duet between Siegmund and Sieglinde, in the first scene, is in places very fine—full of melodious and impassioned writing, showing what Wagner could do if he did not fetter himself by his own theories. There is, however, too much repetition of familiar phrases; and as this is done at caprice and regardless of length, the hearer is rather wearied than interested.

The second section of the "Trilogy" is devoted to the story of

Digitized by Google

Siegfried, the son of Siegmund and Sieglinde. He, it appears, has fallen into the hands of a "designing dwarf," who educates him. While still in pupilage he forges a magic sword, "Nothung," with which he sallies forth to kill the dragon that guards the Rhinegold, achieving which, and in possession of sundry other potencies, he arouses Brünnhilde from her mysterious sleep, and with the inevitable love rhapsody the piece concludes. Siegfried is not so interesting a drama as the Walküre, nor has it so much engaging music; it is just as oppressive from its extreme length, the final love duet lasting about half an hour, in which a remarkable love motive borrowed from Chopin's Andante Spianato, comes over and over again ad nauseam. The bird's song, and scene of Siegfried under the tree, is charming, and makes one think over and over again that it is a pity that Wagner cannot conform to ordinary operatic rules as to length, self-restraint, and the partiality of the majority for the song form, as he would no doubt be able in that case to appeal successfully to a less restricted circle. But Wagner has evidently no respect for singing as an art. In these dramas it is nearly all declamation, and in the nearest approach to cantilena it is in the strident school of Verdi, and is hardly more than impassioned yelling. Of course, the nearer the singers get to breaking a blood-vessel, the more the unintelligent applaud, and so I suppose, as some find this easier to do than to sing artistically, it will remain the vogue so long as the public encourage it. As to the matter of tune, so far as Wagner attains to it, I do not consider him original at all. Many of his best phrases—most indeed—are Weber's and Meyerbeer's; nor is he uninfluenced by Verdi and Chopin. Wagner's individuality is most signally manifested in his orchestration, which may be considered as a development of what Meyerbeer and others have done, and very much influenced by the works of Hector Berlioz; to me it seems overdone, entailing needless expense, an overpowering noise, and conditions which render their adequate presentation almost impossible. The pantomimic effects in this section, including the slaying of the dragon and deliverance of Brünnhilde, were poorer than anything I ever saw in a pantomime, and in the first instance moved a very sympathetic audience, "fit though few," to frequent laughter.

As the concluding section of the Trilogy, called the Götterdämmerung, consists of a prologue and three acts, the audience were required to be present as early as half-past six—another addition to the disagreeables of this exacting work. The prologue begins with a dreary and uninteresting scene between the three Norns, who foretell the approaching destruction of the "gods." On their disappearance Siegfried and Brünnhilde enter; he has donned her armour, in order, on the steed Grane, to go forth in quest of adventures. Why, when he is in possession of everything necessary to his happiness, is only known to Wagner and himself. After a noisy and protracted scene between the lovers, Siegfried departs and "she is left lamenting."

The third part of the Trilogy opens in the halls of the Gibichungs. Here is found the villain, Hagen, son of Alberich, now dead, and a noble chief, Gunther, with his sister, Gutrune. These two seem innocent people enough until Hagen puts it into their heads that Gunther ought to possess Brünnhilde in order to ensure perfect happiness, and Gutrune to be mated with Siegfried. How this is brought about by means of a magic potion administered to Siegfried, who shortly after appears on the scene; how Siegfried consequently forgets all about Brünnhilde and devotes himself to Gutrune; how Siegfried makes Brünnhilde over to Gunther, to that lady's intense disgust; how Siegfried goes out hunting and is treacherously slain by Hagen; and how everyone gets killed save Brünnhilde, who commits suicide after restoring the accursed Rhinegold ring to the Rhine nymphs—it would serve little purpose to tell, and would demand no little time and trouble, which after so much said may fitly be dispensed with. The final catastrophe somehow brings about the end of the "gods," though one would have thought that restitution having been made, the "gods" might have avoided their doom; but so it is, and in the midst of a tremendous disturbance of the elements, the Rhine rising to the heavens, and the heavens being in flames, this extraordinary farrago of power, impotence, crime, and cruelty, incoherent throughout, comes to an end. As a specimen of "rational" opera as against the old style of thing, it is no whit the better; and, if a drama is to be treated vocally at all, surely it is preferable that it should be done by pleasing and appropriate strains rather than by howls and yells and descriptive noises in the orchestra, however illustrative. With his strong dramatic instincts and power of orchestration, Wagner might have carried on the grand tragic operas of Meyerbeer, or the more romantic series commenced by Weber, where the vocal charm gives relief to the declamatory passages necessary for the due conduct of the story; instead of which throughout the Trilogy there is nothing but declamation, unrelieved by melody, save of the feeblest kind; and it is difficult to believe that for the general musical public such works can have any attraction. As for the scenic and dioramic effects, though well enough imagined by Wagner, they cannot be carried out as they should be, and become puerile and merely pantomimic. The Rhine catastrophe, for instance, where the river is supposed to overflow its banks, was represented by the ordinary green cloth elevated in a very clumsy way and waved about vigorously. What idea did this give of the overflow of a mighty stream? The conflagration of Walhalla in the heavens was represented by a poor transparency; and as for the dragon, it was more like a cow or a hippopotamus in appearance, and manifested no sign of animation save in opening its mouth. The poor horse that represented the fiery steed Grane was a weedy-looking animal, selected, of course, because of its being able to stand being sung at, and not minding fireworks much, and equally of course it showed no sign of a fiery, untamed nature, but the reverse; it was led in and out carefully, but it was evident the poor animal was by no means happy, and the declamatory shrieks of Brünnhilde at the last seemed to fill it with misgiving, not to say disgust. It seemed the only rational creature in the very absurd situation. I should not dwell on these manifest failures, which are no worse than those of the Magic Flute, for instance; but in that and such like works we go for the music and care little if the scenic effect is poor. With Wagner it is different. He has claimed so much in the way of having bettered on the old methods—which he has covered with unsparing ridicule—that one cannot avoid the obvious comment. As for the music, there is little to say about it after having said that its effect lies in the orchestration. From the necessity of its construction it is so fragmentary and broken up that it is impossible to judge of it as music. Then, throughout these works singing as an art is nowhere manifested, and I should judge, consequently, that Wagner knows nothing at all about it. It is all declamation, nearly always awkward to sing; intervals are taken that it is almost impossible for the singer to take in tune, and there is much that is unpleasant and painful to listen to. As an illustration of the text, moreover, it is so overdone as to overpower the voices; consequently much of the point of it is lost. As stated before, as a melodist Wagner is feeble and by no means original, and as for developing an idea, it does not seem to be in him—there is abundant reproduction of it in different keys, but no elaboration of a fine thought. With all this, there is an abundance of poetical feeling, airy fancy, and charming effects. How far these may tell on a general audience I have no means of judging. I should say that for the proper appreciation of them a man ought to be an advanced musician, and, moreover, should agree generally with Wagnerian theories. Of course there is no knowing how far musical knowledge may develop in the future, but until it becomes more general and profound, one can hardly expect such music dramas to become popular, or to find even moderate acceptance.

Messrs Remington are publishing a biography of Balfe (by W. A. Barrett), with portraits of the musical celebrities of his day.

Das steinerne Herz, romantic opera, book and music by Theobald Rehbaum, of Berlin, is accepted at the Stadttheater, Leipsic.

Johannes Elmblad, the popular concert-singer, has appeared at the Theatre Royal, Dresden, as the Commander in Don Juan.

Not being considered safe in case of an outbreak of fire, the Stadttheater, Kiel, has been closed by order of the municipality.

The managers of the Scala, Milan, and Teatro Apollo, Rome, intend entering into partnership and working the two theatres in common.

Ambroise Thomas' Mignon, with pretty little Lablanche in the principal female character, has been produced at the Teatro Brunetti, Bologna.

Ullmann is organizing for next season a concert-tour, with Etelka Gerster as leading vocalist, in Germany, Belgium, Holland, and Scandinavia.

Willem de Haan, conductor at the Ducal Theatre, Darmstadt, has composed the music of a grand opera, Die Kaisertochter, book by W. Jacoby, of Mayence.

The prize offered by the Real Istituto Musicale, Florence, for the best five-part chorus, has been awarded to Camillo di Nardis, Naples. There were thirty competitors.

Mdlle Feyghine, whose sad death has caused so great an impression, was a cousin of Servais, the celebrated violoncellist, and a niece of Joachim. (Joseph?—Dr Blitge.)

Signor Bevignani, who has returned from his tour in Italy, leaves London for St Petersburgh on Monday next, to fulfil his engagement as conductor of the Imperial Italian Opera.

"Grasp the Flag."—Her Majesty the Queen has been graciously pleased to accept, and to approve of, the new patriotic song (poetry by Carleon, music by Hugh Clendon), entitled "Grasp the Flag."

Eduard Strauss and his band commence on the 25th inst. a concert tour, during which they will visit Stuttgart, Cologne, and Munich. The first concert, in the large hall of the Musical Association, Vienna, is announced for November 5th.

Mr Oberthür has arrived in town from his tour in Germany. After leaving Munich, he explored parts of the Tyrol, and then proceeded to Vienna, where he was fêted by Herr Zamara and his many friends. From Vienna Mr Oberthür visited Salzburg, Stuttgart, Baden-Baden, and Frankfort, stopping, of course, at Drexel's (Hotel de Russie), where he met his cara sposa, accompanied by her niece (little Miss Mischief), and returned, viâ the Rhine and Cologne, to London.

Madrid.—A feature of the approaching Italian season, under the management of Rovira, at the Teatro Real is Mefistofele, got up and conducted by Arrigo Boito himself. The season is to be inaugurated on the 1st October with Les Huguenots, the leading parts sustained by Elena Theodorini and Masini. The second opera being Lucia, for the début of Marcella Sembrich as the ill-starred heroine, supported by Lestellier as Edgardo and Pandolfini as Enrico. The third, La Juive, with another début, that of Mdme Fursch-Madi. The fourth and fifth operas are to be Dinorah and Le Prophète, Sembrich impersonating the heroine in each.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

HEREFORD FESTIVAL.

That the programme of the 159th meeting of the Three Choirs was judiciously varied, and the execution in most respects all that could be desired, is generally admitted. Mr Langdon Colborne, organist of the Cathedral, and, by traditional prerogative, conductor at the Festival, had engaged an orchestra of the highest efficiency, with Mr J. T. Carrodus as leading violin, and first-class London professors at the head of each department. His chorus, too, was unusually good, and lent no small attraction to the performances in the Cathedral. At these, although no absolute "novelties" were brought forward, some things of real importance were included, all the more welcome because previously unknown to Hereford and its Festival. At the same time it is of no use hiding the fact that the quasi-novelties proved far less remunerative than the long-established favourites. The largest attendances at the Cathedral were on the first and fourth days, when Elijah and The Messiah were respectively performed; the second, devoted to a copious selection from Handel's Judas Maccabæus, followed by other pieces, comprising Beethoven's Symphony in B flat, the expressive setting of the 137th Psalm by the late much-regretted Hermann Goetz, and the better known "Magnificat" of J. S. Bach—a veritable surfeit of good music—coming next in order. The smallest attendance was that on the third day, when a short oratorio, entitled The Shunamite, succeeded by Beethoven's Mass in C and a large part of Molique's Abraham, were presented. And yet, in the face of all this, we are admonished by some of our present teachers that the Festivals of the Choirs must inevitably collapse unless the oratorios of Handel (including The Messiah) and Mendelssohn are put aside to make way for new things, no matter from what source they may spring. The directors of these institutions, however, know better. They know that The Messiah has taken a hold on the English mind likely to be maintained for a century hence, and that Elijah, as a Biblical drama set to music, stands nearest in its chances of enduring popularity to the sacred masterpiece of Handel. They also know that without these compositions the financial prospects of their festivals must, at the best, be gravely doubtful; and so, with wise discretion, they adhere to them. Of course, a Birmingham Festival without Elijah, the introduction of which shed such lustre on its then promoters, is not to be thought of. People who talk extravagantly about M. Gounod's Redemption forget to take into account the peculiar interest attaching to the composer of Faust. They also forget, or purposely ignore, the fact that the Redemption has only been heard twice, while Elijah, during thirty-six years, has been heard not only in Birmingham, but wherever an efficient choir and a respectable orchestra, with a conductor who knows his business, can be got together, and yet, as its frequent performances all over the country can testify, has lost none of its vogue and freshness. The Festivals of the Three Choirs, for reasons not far to seek are more closely bound by these considerations than even the great triennial meeting in our Midland emporium of commerce; it is but natural, therefore, that they should consult their own interests no less than those of the admirable charity to which they afford help and countenance. Moreover the criticism occasionally levelled at them is unfair even from an artistic point of view. There were novelties, for example, and more or less interesting novelties, at last year's Worcester gathering; and if Hereford this year had done nothing more than revive Bernhard Molique's Abraham, originally written for and brought out at the Norwich Festival of 1860, and very rarely heard since—but once, indeed, in its entirety, if we are not mistaken—enough would have been effected to stamp the occasion on the memory of all true amateurs. Abraham may be "Kapellmeister's music," as certain of our "advanced" instructors insist; but if so we can only retort that Kapellmeister's music is very fine music, and that it would be well if more of such music were vouchsafed to us just now. That Molique, living so many years in England, honoured by all who knew him, was more or less influenced by the fascination of Mendelssohn's style, and was not altogether indifferent to that of Spohr, must be conceded; but why a musician should not belong to a "school" as well as a painter, and produce masterpieces in that school entitling him to consideration as one of its foremost representatives, it is not easy to explain. Such, at the least, was Molique, and every one capable of appreciating genuine art must look up to him with respect and admiration. Had he written nothing more than Abraham, where the keenest sense of musical expression, a perfect mastery of counterpoint, without a knowledge of which no musician can give fluent utterance to his ideas, and an unmistakable dramatic instinct are apparent, he would take high rank among composers. Its performance, indeed, apart from the old and universally or (pace the "advanced") almost universally recognized masterpieces, was the most striking incident of the Festival; and though the execution—no wonder, coming as it did at the end of so lengthy a selection—was not altogether perfect, it evidently impressed all hearers. That more of Abraham will be heard ere long may be taken for granted. About The Shunamite of Dr Garrett, and The Ode to the Passions, charmingly and congenially set by Mrs Meadows White to the well-known poetry of Collins, we shall have another opportunity of speaking, as they are at no distant date sure to be reproduced in London. The leading singers at this Festival—Mdmes Albani and Patey, Misses Anna Williams, Marian Fenna, and Hilda Wilson; Messrs E. Lloyd, C. W. Fredericks (a local professor), Frank Boyle, F. King, and Santley, all in their best form, enhanced no little the general excellence of the performances. We should add that the evening concert of Wednesday was devoted to Mendelssohn's St. Paul. In the miscellaneous selections at the Shire Hall, our distinguished violinist, Mr Carrodus, created a lively impression by his admirable solo displays, while Mr James Taylor gave a spirited and conscientious rendering of Beethoven's Choral Fantasia. About the vocal displays of Mdme Albani, Mdme Patey, Miss Anna Williams, Mr E. Lloyd, Mr Santley, &c., who all contributed more or less familiar and admired pieces, it is unnecessary to say more than that their efforts were appreciated at their just value. On the whole the Festival may be recorded as a complete and well-merited success.—Graphic.

* * * * * *

The meetings of the three choirs, held each year successively at Hereford, Gloucester, and Worcester, must be numbered amongst the foremost of those provincial gatherings which, while ostensibly ministering to the cause of charity, promote and substantiate the cause of art. It is the fashion to decry such celebrations as possessing merely a local interest; nevertheless, they continue to exist, and are likely to flourish until—as the Vicar of Bray has it—"the times do alter." People who shower blame on these festivals on account of the feeble influence they exert on contemporary musical art, do so unthinkingly; the charge of re-producing familiar works is easily met with the counter statement that the local patrons are not educated* up to the times, and are quite content to hear Elijah or The Messiah performed by a fine orchestra and solo artists of world-wide celebrity. A real objection might, truly, be taken to the celebrations, quite apart from the question of local or general interest; and it might be founded upon the disproportion of the results achieved to the means employed. Never mind the old wrangle between the Worcester clergy and laity; lay aside for the moment the bone of contention between musical reformers and musical conservators; the bare fact remains that the Hereford Festival, now chosen for the exemplar of the three associated gatherings, owes nothing whatever to its entertainments, but everything to voluntary donations. The sale of tickets cannot be expected to cover the expenses of engaging artists from London, &c.; a certain deficit will be incurred, and so as many stewards as will agree to become responsible are banded together as guarantors to pay for the festival, after the balance of accounts has been struck. The collections are paid into a separate fund, and these go in bulk to the charity—I need hardly state that this charity is for the relief of the orphans and widows of the clergy of the three dioceses and the assistance of necessitous clergymen—while the festival receipts proper are devoted to the liquidation of the debt incurred in the preparations for the entertainments. There is obviously something wrong somewhere, but it is almost hopeless to expect that the triennial festivals will ever be made paying speculations in the humble centre of an agricultural district. All that can be ascribed to them is the virtue of promoting the practice of choral music, and the merit of inducing those to loosen their purse-strings, which, but that the time breathed of charity, would remain tightly fastened. Sham sentiment is worse than mock heroics. The Three Choirs Festival exists because it has a precedent of over a century and a half to speak in its favour, and, above all, because English people will not willingly suffer old institutions to die without a long and strenuous protest.—Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News.

MEETING OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

On Saturday last a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Festival was held, the chair being occupied by Mr J. H. Arkwright, Chairman of Stewards. Present:—The Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean of Hereford, Rev. Canon Musgrave, Mr T. Llanwarne (Mayor), Sir H. S. Stanhope, Bart., Rev. Custos Duncombe, Rev. Canon Powell, Mr J. F. Symonds, Mr J. G. Woodhouse, Mr Langdon Colborne, Rev. Berkeley L. S. Stanhope (hon. sec.), and Mr Capner (secretary).

The Chairman moved "That the grateful thanks of the stewards be respectfully offered to Her Majesty the Queen and the other members of the Royal Family for their continued patronage of the Hereford Festival." The Dean of Hereford seconded, and the resolution was carried unanimously. The Chairman proposed "That the thanks of the Committee of Stewards be given to the Lord Bishop and the Dean and Chapter for the effective aid and countenance afforded by them to the Festival, and for their hospitality on all occasions." The Mayor of Hereford seconded, and the resolution was carried. The Dean proposed, and the Rev. Canon Musgrave seconded, a vote of thanks to the Rev. Sir G. H. Cornewall, Bart., for his very excellent sermon preached on behalf of the Charity, and the wish was expressed that it might be printed for circulation. The resolution was carried. The Dean of Hereford moved "That the thanks and congratulations of the Stewards be offered to Mdme Albani and the other soloists, both vocal and instrumental, on the great success which has attended their performances." The Rev. Canon Musgrave seconded, and the resolution was carried. The Chairman proposed "That a vote of thanks be accorded the members of the Chorus for their careful and spirited work throughout the week." Mr Colborne (conductor) seconded, and the resolution was carried unanimously. Sir H. Scudamore Stanhope, Bart., proposed "That the thanks of the stewards be tendered to Mr Langdon Colborne for his able and efficient services as conductor." The Rev. Custos Duncombe seconded, and the resolution was carried. Mr Colborne briefly acknowledged the compliment, testifying to the willing support he had been accorded in the orchestra. The Rev. Canon Powell moved "That the best thanks of the Stewards be offered to the Rev. Berkeley L. S. Stanhope (hon. sec.), and Mr J. W. Capner (secretary) for their indefatigable and highly successful efforts, which have made the Festival of 1882 eminently satisfactory." The Mayor seconded, and the Dean of Hereford supported, the resolution being carried unanimously. Mr Alderman Symonds proposed, and the Rev. Berkeley L. S. Stanhope (hon. sec.) seconded, "That thanks be offered to the several railway companies for the convenience of visitors to the Festival."—Carried unanimously. Mr Langdon Colborne proposed, and the Rev. Custos Duncombe seconded, "That the thanks of the Stewards be conveyed to Dr Stone and Mr J. Taylor for their valuable and voluntary services during the Festival, and to Dr Garrett for the care and attention he had bestowed on the production of his work, The Shunamite, the rendering of which had afforded him so much pleasure and satisfaction."—This was carried unanimously. The Mayor moved, and Mr J. G. Woodhouse seconded, "That thanks be conveyed to the Press for their full and careful reports of the proceedings."—This was also carried unanimously. The Chairman proposed "That the best thanks of the Stewards be tendered to the City Decoration Committee for their spirited and energetic efforts in decorating the city upon the occasion, and to the citizens generally for their support, with congratulations upon the pleasing result, and that the Mayor be requested to convey the same." The Dean of Hereford seconded, and the resolution was carried. A vote of thanks was unanimously passed to Supt. Davies, and the City Police force, for their successful arrangements during the Festival week, and for the preservation of order in the vicinity of the Cathedral. The Dean of Hereford proposed, and the Mayor seconded, "That the best thanks of the Stewards be given to the Chairman for presiding on this occasion, and for the unabated interest he has taken in promoting the success of the Hereford Festival." The resolution was carried unanimously.

The collections, which were made after each service and oratorio in the Cathedral, amounted in the aggregate to £806 10s. 3d., which has since been increased to £841 19s. 2d., among the recent donations being that from Mr W. Farrer Ecroyd, M.P., £5; Rev. T. Shackleton, £5 5s.; Rev. Lister Venables, £2 2s., and other sums. As several Stewards and others who, from various causes, were unable to attend the Festival may be anxious to contribute to the Widows and Orphan's (Clerical) Fund, we are authorized to state that the list of contributions will be kept open until October 15th, and that the Rev. Berkeley L. S. Stanhope, as the Hon. Sec., will gladly receive, and pay over to the Treasurer, any sums which may be forwarded to him for that purpose. As regards the financial result of the Festival, we are not yet able to give the figures, several accounts being still outstanding, but we are informed that the Steward's guarantee fund will in all probability cover the deficit, and that there will not be occasion for any further call.

Offers from all parts of the States asking for Miss Emma Thursby's services, so we learn from the New York Music and Drama, are pouring in upon her manager, Mr Maurice Strakosch.

The new Théâtre des Arts, Rouen, was to be inaugurated this evening, the 30th inst., by the overture to La Dame Blanche, as a tribute to Boieldieu, a native of the town, and the first four acts of Les Huguenots.

PORT ELIZABETH (Algoa Bay).—Miss Ellen N. French gave a soirée musicale at the Liedertafel Hall with great success. The reputation of this lady as a most accomplished pianist had preceded her from Grahamstown, and, in consequence, the audience, which included the élite of Port Elizabeth, was numerous and appreciative. Miss French has a perfect command over the pianoforte, and plays with a brilliancy and delicacy rarely combined. Besides her performances on the pianoforte, Miss French sang Taubert's "In a distant land," and Roeckel's "A bird in the hand." We subjoin the programme:—

Sonata, Op. 31, No. 3 (Beethoven); Barcarolle in F (Rubinstein); Valse (Chopin); "Clarici"—"A te o cara" (Fumagalli); La Legerezza (Moscheles); Spinnlied (Litolff); Fantaisie Impromptu (Chopin); La Truite (Stephen Heller); and Fantasia on Carmen (Leybach).

OSWESTRY TRIENNIAL MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

Sept. 23.

The second Oswestry Triennial Musical Festival was held yesterday in the Powis Hall, Oswestry, under the direction of its founder, Mr Henry Leslie. At the first Festival, which was held in September, 1879, the performances of the choir, which numbered about 200 voices, fully justified Mr Leslie's anticipations, and the profits of the Festival enabled the committee to found the Oswestry School of Music, out of which has grown the organization of village choirs. Last year a very successful Festival of village choirs was given, when they competed, as they will again to-day, for the banner of honour. In the preparation for this year's Triennial Festival Mr Leslie and his coadjutors have had to encounter unforeseen difficulties. In the Ruabon district the prolonged strike of colliers which took place last spring resulted in such widespread distress and disturbance that a large number of excellent voices were lost to the Festival Choir, while depression of trade and other temporary circumstances have also had an adverse influence upon the Festival both as regards the choir and the general attendance. In addition to the voice tests which were imposed in 1879, compliance with a certain standard of musical knowledge has been required as a preliminary condition of admission to the Festival Choir, so that the choir yesterday, though smaller in numbers than at the last Festival, was still more efficient. The morning's programme consisted of the first and second parts of the Creation, and miscellaneous selections. The choir, numbering about 150 voices, was supported by a fine band of nearly 50 performers. That the principal singers were Miss Anna Williams, Mr Joseph Maas, and Mr Henry Blower was a sufficient guarantee that the solo numbers of Haydn's great work would be adequately interpreted. Musical festivals upon a scale of any magnitude are costly undertakings. On Thursday the committee found the sale of tickets had been so unsatisfactory that they issued a circular in which they pointed out that in the event of the Festival proving a financial failure there was imminent danger of the Festival Choral Society and the whole organization of the School of Music being dissolved. The town has been decorated, though rather sparsely, in honour of the occasion.

The performance began about half-past one, when the spacious hall was not filled; but the attendance was better than had been expected, and a considerable number of county families were represented. Lord Harlech brought a large party from Brogyntyn, which included the Marquis and Marchioness of Hertford, Lady Florence Duncombe, and Lady Penrhyn. Mr Leslie, on taking his seat as conductor, was cheered by the orchestra and the audience. The National Anthem was sung to an arrangement by Mr Leslie, and the performance of the Creation (the first and second parts) was then proceeded with. The choir, on the whole, did their work admirably. The parts were well balanced and the voices were young and fresh; and although the performance was not free from a few small blemishes, it more than satisfied a not uncritical audience. It would be difficult to say too much in praise of the band, and no other fault can be found than that they now and then slightly overpowered the choir. Miss Anna Williams sang with her accustomed devotional feeling. Mr Maas sang in a manner worthy of the high reputation he has achieved, and his rendering of the air "In native worth" was exceedingly fine. Mr Henry Blower, who is less known to fame, made a very favourable impression. In the miscellaneous part of the programme were Sterndale Bennett's part-song, "Come, live with me," charmingly sung by the Festival Choir; "O, ruddier than the cherry," by Mr Blower, which was re-demanded, but not repeated; Boccherini's minuet for stringed instruments, which was encored; "Cujus Animam," and another selection from the Stabat Mater, in which the airs were sung by Mr Maas and Miss Williams with fervour and pathos; and the march from Le Prophète. Mr Leslie conducted with his usual success. A miscellaneous concert was given at night, in which Miss Anna Williams, Mr Joseph Maas, Mr Henry Blower, Mr John Thomas, Mr Percy Mull, and the Oswestry Festival Choir again took part.

For the excellence of the arrangements for the Festival special acknowledgment is due to the honorary secretaries, Captain Arkwright and Mr M. H. Roberts. To-day, at noon, the village choirs will compete for the banner of honour. Mr John Thomas will adjudicate. In the afternoon there will be a combined performance by the choirs and the Oswestry Volunteer Band.

Sept. 25.

The programme of Friday night's concert contained a happy admixture of classical compositions with those of a lighter kind. The audience were rather unreasonable in the matter of encores. Mr Joseph Maas excused himself from repeating "The Bay of Biscay" upon the plea of a cold, from which Mr Leslie assured the rather sceptical audience he was suffering. Several glees and part songs, as well as Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God," were well sung by the Festival choir. During an interval in the programme, Lord Harlech, the president, proposed a vote of thanks to the distinguished artists, to whom he said Mr Leslie had placed himself to a considerable extent under obligation for the help they had given him in the work of the festival. Mr Leslie, in responding to a vote of thanks to himself and the honorary secretaries, Captain Arkwright and Mr M. H. Roberts, proposed by the vicar of Oswestry, said the town and neighbourhood of Oswestry possessed a festival choir of which they ought to be very proud, and it would be a matter for great regret if, for want of adequate support, the School of Music, which had been so remarkably successful in promoting musical education in the district, should cease to exist.

The second annual Festival of Village Choirs was held on Saturday in the Powis Hall. About half-past twelve the choirs entered the hall, each carrying a distinctive banner, under which they took their seats in the orchestra. The adjudicator was Mr John Thomas (Pencerdd Gwalia). The first competition was for juvenile choirs, the subject being the Angels' trio from Elijah, "Lift thine eyes." Four choirs competed. The first prize was awarded to the Bronygarth choir, conducted by Mr Hughes, and the second prize to the Guilsfield choir, conducted by Mr R. E. Jones. Mr John Thomas, in giving his adjudication, spoke in the warmest manner of the work Mr Leslie is doing in the cause of musical education in this part of the country, and said that those who had attended the festival performances must have been struck with the remarkable results which he had already achieved. The conductors of the successful choirs were then invested by Mrs Leslie. Various prizes awarded for sight-singing and knowledge of elementary music were presented by Mrs Dumville Lees. The examination was conducted by Mr Leslie, who described the competition as exceedingly good. The principal prize was awarded to Emily Morris, of Llansilin, who is only nine years of age. The chief event of the day, the competition for the banner of honour and a silver medal for the conductor, followed. The banner, to be held from year to year by the choir gaining the prize, was the gift and work of Mrs Leslie, and is a very handsome one. Last year it was won by the Maesbury choir. This year's subject for competition was Mr Leslie's beautiful part-song "When the shades of eve descending." After an interesting competition, in which seven village choirs took part, Mr John Thomas adjudged the banner to the Lodge and Bonygarth choir, containing 41 voices. The conductor of the successful choir, Mr H. M. Hughes, of Oswestry, was invested, amid loud cheers, by Lady Harlech.

At three o'clock there was a performance of the combined choirs and the Oswestry Volunteer band. The attendance was larger than in the morning, but the hall was not filled. The soloists were—Miss Wakefield, Mr John Thomas, harpist to the Queen, and Mr Percy Mull, Principal of the School of Music. Mr Henry Leslie again conducted. The combined choirs sang "The March of the Men of Harlech," "See the conquering hero comes," with band accompaniment, the part-song "O, who will o'er the Downs so free," and the National Anthem as arranged for choirs by Mr Leslie. The Oswestry Festival Choir sang three part-songs with much precision and effect. Mr John Thomas greatly pleased the audience by his performances on the harp. Two songs by Miss Wakefield, in which she was accompanied by the eminent composer Mr Randegger, and a violin solo by Miss Clara Smith were encored. The Festival from a musical point of view was exceedingly satisfatory, but it is feared it will result in rather heavy pecuniary loss. The expenses amount to £400. The Committee will do well in future to make the Festival more widely known than they appear to have done this year.—Times Report.

[From the foregoing it may be surmised that Mr Henry Leslie intends making the Oswestry Festival triennial.—D. T.]

BAYREUTH.—The orchestra at the Parsifal Performances consisted of 31 violins, 12 violas, 12 violoncellos, 8 double basses, 4 flutes, 4 oboes, 2 alt-oboes, 4 clarinets, 2 bass clarinets, 4 bassoons, 1 double bassoon, 7 horns, 3 trumpets, 4 trombones, 1 tuba, 2 kettle-drums, 5 harps, and the "bell instrument" especially constructed for the occasion, making a total of 106 instruments.

DRESDEN.—Hermann Götz's Widerspenstigen Zähmung has been well received at the Theatre Royal, and will probably become a stock piece.—There died here a short time since, aged eighty-five, Herr von Schober, long well known for his friendly relations with the artistic and literary notabilities of Germany, especially Franz Schubert, for whom he wrote the libretto to Alfonso und Estrella, Liszt, Moritz von Schwind, &c. He resided for many years at Weimar. He married Thekla von Gumpert, the clever authoress of numerous works for young persons, but the match did not prove a happy one and was dissolved in 1864.

MUSIC FROM THE EAST.

The presence amongst us of an orchestra and troupe of dancers—or, rather, dramatic performers—from the far East has naturally had the effect of reviving attention to a phase of art peculiar, if not absolutely unique, in its interest, and may stimulate further inquiry into a subject of which Sir W. Jones, Laborde, Jomard, and others only touched the fringe. We are accustomed to look towards the "cradle of the human race" for the origin of things, not without the special reason that comes from the changelessness of Eastern forms and customs. Against that, however, has to be set our own changefulness, and when we fail in identifying what we seek, the result is often due to the obscurity of some steps in the process of development or transmutation. Music is frequently called the youngest of the arts. We of the West claim it as a creation of the last few centuries, and as something that has sprung from our own advancing civilization. This is true enough in a sense. A symphony by Beethoven, for example, belongs to the West, and is the product of a seed sown within comparatively recent times. But the art of music, as distinct from a particular development of it, appertains to the far as well as to the near past. Its origin, like that of all things most ancient, is shrouded in myth and fable, and we cannot go back to the remotest point of national history without encountering it in a position of importance as an element of social life. It is worth while to have these facts in mind by way of guard against the limitation of sympathy and research which comes of despising whatever lies beyond our own circle. Such limitation should especially be avoided with reference to Eastern music, since the more we know of the form and spirit of an art which has been handed down almost unaltered from age to age, the nearer we get to the fountain-head whence flowed all the streams that have fertilized the world. It may be now that we can appropriate nothing useful from this source. It may be, on the contrary, that there is yet something to learn. Music, of all the arts, can least afford to overlook that which is humble and mean. Its development has always been from below, and our noblest composers have gone, not condescendingly, but with eagerness, to the gipsy and the peasant for ideas upon which to work. The time may come, therefore, when Eastern music will contribute more fully than it has yet done to the resources of its Western offshoot. We call to mind numerous examples either of its direct transference or of its reflected spirit in the works of classic masters. Beethoven, Weber, Glück, Romberg, David, Mozart, are names that at once recur, and, though it be true that these composers aimed at special effects of "local colour," it does not follow that materials from the same source are useless for other purposes in connection with an art whose fullest development will be reached when it is most cosmopolitan.

A contemptuous frame of mind, or one that seeks only a bizarre amusement, is certainly the worst company in which to visit the Javanese musicians, and will not be taken into the presence of those interesting performers by persons of intelligence. It is something, if only to meet with a form of art distinctly typical of that which obtains among the oldest nations of the world, and one, undoubtedly, that has come down from remotest times. We are told of the pure Javanese stock to which our visitors belong, that while their religion and language have changed, and in many respects they themselves have become degenerate, their drama and music remain intact, the sole survival of a golden age. Who then shall measure the antiquity of the entertainment just brought to our doors? But more important than its antiquity is the fact that here we have the Eastern equivalent of Western opera, and, in some respects, of its most advanced form. The combination of music, dancing, and drama, first effected in Italy under the name of opera, is not three centuries old, and between it and the Greek stage, the glories of which its founders sought to emulate, lies a huge gulf of time. Java, more fortunate than Europe, preserved its primitive musical drama without breach of continuity, and no more curious or suggestive relic of the far past of a far away land was ever offered for our inspection. The drawback is that we have no key to much of its significance. No scholars have given us a clue to the purport of the music, or to the meaning of the gestures, and the whole story, though obviously told with infinite artifice, is as one spoken in an unknown tongue.

Perhaps the most remarkable feature in this curious drama is the predominance of the dance. Music continuously accompanies it, and there are frequent passages of recitative, very much of the Wagner pattern, but the dance ranks before all. It possesses however, hardly anything in common with our Western cult, since the legs are little used compared with the upper part of the body, every joint of which has its flexibility tried in a series of elaborate yet carefully measured movements. In his "History of the Indian Archipelago," Mr John Crawfurd mentions this as distinctive of all Malay dances. "Whatever be the occasion in which dancing is exhibited," says the author just named, "it is always grave, stately, and slow, never gay nor animated. As in all Asiatic dancing, it is not the legs, but the body, and especially the arms down to the very fingers, that are employed. Dexterity, agility, or liveliness are never attempted." There is the further peculiarity that no idea of seductive grace seems to be entertained—a fact which places the dramatic dance of Java a long way from the dance pure and simple of neighbouring races. Indeed, the attitudes of the performers are often as angular and awkward as the most æsthetic spectator could desire. Obviously, therefore, some higher purpose than that of mere sensuous pleasure governs the art, and, if we had the key of the movements, we should no doubt discover their connection with and subordination to the argument of the play. If the superior position assigned to the dance be thought trivial and undignified in an entertainment of which recitation forms part, the idea is promptly corrected by reference to the exalted position in which Javanese custom places this exercise. "All orders executed in the presence of a Javanese monarch on public occasions," says the author before quoted, "are accompanied by a dance. When a message is to be conveyed to the royal ear, the messenger advances with a solemn dance and retreats in the same way. The ambassadors from one native prince in Java to another follow the same course when coming into or retiring from the presence of the Sovereign to whom they are deputed. When the persons whose business it is to let the tiger loose from his cage into the hollow square of spearmen have performed their duty, and received the Royal nod to retire—an occasion, one would think, when dancing might be spared—they do so in a slow dance and solemn strut, with some risk of being devoured by the tiger in the midst of their performance." Java is, therefore, a dancing nation. It appreciates the eloquence, if not the poetry, of motion, and we cease to be surprised at the subordination of language in its musical drama. Coming to the subjects represented we find ourselves in contact with things less strange, because a touch of nature makes us kin. As a rule, they are drawn from ordinary life, the virtue of the myth, recently proclaimed in Europe, not being recognized to any appreciable extent. Love, of course, prevails. Four women plot and counterplot to win a gallant gay Lothario, who, after exciting the hopes and fears of each, takes them all. A page becomes enamoured of his mistress, and conquers through the agency of a love potion. A prince out hunting comes upon a castle wherein is confined a beautiful princess till she shall accept the man chosen for her. The pair fall in love, and, as in all countries and ages, love laughs at the locksmith. We have met with something like this before, and there seems to be a great deal of human nature in Java. In performance something of the "argument" may appear to those who understand the spoken language, but the gestures are a study of themselves, and so, for that matter, is the music in its connection with the drama—a connection which appears to be of the closest. "To understand the music," we are authoritatively told, "it is necessary to understand the story it accompanies, as it forms an integral part of it, just as the intoned declamation and the gestures do."

The hero of Tennyson's Maud calls upon a "happy day" to blush certain happy news from East to West, "till the West is East." When reading the quotation given above, we are conscious that the confusion of opposite points has actually been achieved. The principle of Javanese music-drama, as thus laid down, is nothing more nor less than that promulgated from Bayreuth. So the remote past and the "future" join hands. Wagner, pushing westward, with his back to civilization, has touched the East; "the West is East," and the earth is round. There are curious points of resemblance in detail between these far extremes. It may be said, at any rate, that the Javanese are votaries of an "infinite melos." Their orchestra, like Dr Watts's sun, "never tires nor stops to rest," but keeps hard at it from beginning to end of the drama; repeating certain melodic passages with a persistence that inclines us to accept them, without further proof, as representative themes. Sometimes, moreover, it is as hard to distinguish a dominating musical idea in the Javanese orchestra as in that of Wagner. Both get "mixed," while the harmonic combinations are, in the one case, no more referable than in the other to any known law. What are we to conclude from this phenomenon? Perhaps that art moves in cycles, like Wagnerian performances, and that the "advanced" people have got round to the starting place.

Let us, however, set aside all such speculations, the more readily because they are not needed to create interest in the Javanese band and their music. As will be assumed, the instruments are nearly all of the percussion class, the tomtom and cymbal uniting their changeless voices with the sounds of graduated metal vessels suspended in a wooden framework, and struck with padded sticks. The ensemble is not at all unpleasant even to Western ears; but amateur listeners find more to engage their attention in the nature of the music performed—in its melody, for example, which is characteristically Eastern by reason of the employment of intervals not existing in our scale. A first impression is, that the instruments are imperfectly tuned—precisely the idea our own music conveys to Orientals accustomed to quarter-tones. After a while, however, this wears off, and then the piquancy of the effect and its power of acute expression begin to be perceived. The reiteration of short phrases usual to Eastern music is not wanting here, but, as dancing is concerned, the apparently erratic variations of rhythm observable in vocal melodies are absent. This must, however, be said with a qualification. What we may call the fundamental rhythm goes on unaltered, but, in certain cases, various subordinate rhythms are combined therewith. If, for example, the piece be in "common time," a performer will occasionally strike in with crotchet triplets, and so on. Analogous to this is the sometimes polyphonic structure of the music, short inferior phrases being now and then associated, by no means harshly, with the superior theme. As for the harmonic laws observed—if any such crystallization of harmonic custom exist—their study would be interesting, since the effects to which they lead are so beyond a doubt. Referable to no rule of our own art, those effects, by their systematic recurrence, point clearly to a rule somewhere, and though strange, convey an idea that Western music does not embrace every possible good. The whole subject of Eastern music in its various applications is one that should receive more attention than seems now given to it. We are year by year extending our knowledge of Eastern poetry, and discovering that the lands towards the rising sun have given birth to singers sweet as our own. The Javanese musicians, whatever the merit of their particular art, will serve a useful purpose if they stimulate curiosity to know more of the music indigenous to the venerable lands which had a civilization of their own when savages ranged the hills and plains of Europe. —*D. BRESLAU.—At the Festival Concert lately given by the Municipality to celebrate the presence here of the Emperor Wilhelm and his princely visitors, and which went off most brilliantly, Mdme Annette Essipoff played Franz Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasia." Mdme Schmitt-Czany was the vocalist and Herr Bernhard Scholz conducted.

BERLIN.—(Correspondence).—The Italian performances at the Philharmonie are much in vogue. The leading members of the company, Signore Varesi and Ciuti (who made her début as Norma), Brogi, the barytone, and Bimboni, the conductor, have become favourites.—During the season just concluded and extending from the 6th May to the 17th inst. inclusive, at Kroll's Theater, there were 134 performances, thus apportioned among 31 operas: 12 performances, Le Postillon de Longjumeau; 7 each, Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor, Czar und Zimmermann; 6 each, Joseph en Egypte, Il Trovatore, Das Nachtlager in Granada, Faust; 5 each, Der Freischütz, Fidelio, Undine, La Dame Blanche, Le Nozze di Figaro, Lucia di Lammermoor; 4 each, Entführung aus dem Serail, Waffenschmied, La Sonnambula, La Juive, Les Huguenots, Norma, Rigoletto; 3 each, Diana von Solange, Un Ballo in Maschera, Don Giovanni, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Stradella; 2 each, Hans Heiling, Martha, Guillaume Tell, Robert le Diable, La Muette de Portici; 1, Die Zauberflöte. Herr Theodor Wachtel played fifteen times, and netted as his percentage on the receipts £1,200, or £75 a night.—Herr Bilse inaugurated his concert season very successfully on the 16th inst. at the Concerthaus. The new band, in place of the old one, which threw off its allegiance and set up for itself, gave general satisfaction. Two of its members, Herr Cornelis, violinist, and Herr Henric Chaussier, harpist, won especial distinction as soloists, the first with the "Fantaisie caractéristique" of Servais, and the second with a "Concerstück" of his own.—Two "Cycles" of three concerts each, under the direction of Dr Wüllner, of Dresden, will be given this winter at the Philharmonie. The first three will take place before, the last three after, Christmas. Mdme Sophie Menter will play at the inaugural concert. The band will be the whilom "Bilse Orchestra," reinforced for the occasion.—In accordance with a very generally expressed wish, the class for ladies' choral singing at Stern's Conservatory has been expanded into a class for mixed chorus, under the direction of the Royal Capellmeister, Herr Radecke.—In consequence of being compelled to leave its old domicile in the Raczynski Palace, which will be pulled down to make room for the new Reichstag Palace, the Royal High School for Music has found a new home at a fine mansion, No. 120, Potsdamer Strasse, with a large garden in front, and extensive park-like grounds in the rear.

WE'LL CONQUER OR WE'LL DIE.

Who says that Britain's sun has set
In clouds to rise no more?
That ne'er again her sons will fight
As fought their sires of yore?
From Egypt's arid sandy plains
There comes the bold reply,
"Where proudly waves our British flag,
We'll conquer or we'll die!"

Chorus.

Then march, march, march,
Where the bullets thickest fly,
Old England's sons, behind their guns,
Will conquer or they'll die.

The Highland host, with serried steel,
Are eager for the fray,
And right and left the Lowland blade
Awaits the coming day.
Mark Erin's sons, behind their guns,
What says each flashing eye?
"Where proudly waves our British flag,
We'll conquer or we'll die."
Then march, march, march, &c.

Let Britain's foes this lesson learn,
Her flag still rules the wave;
'Tis blazoned on a thousand fields
Where sleep her noble brave.
Still handed on from sire to son,
We hear the thrilling cry:
"Where proudly waves our British flag,
We'll conquer or we'll die!"
Then march, march, march, &c.

WETSTAR.

LEIPSIC.—In honour of the numerous visitors from all parts to attend the fiftieth anniversary of the Gustavus Adolphus Foundation, a special concert was given at the Gewandhaus, when the programme comprised Haydn's "Oxford Symphony," Mozart's "Pianoforte Concerto," D major, No. 26 (C. Reinecke), Schumann's overture to Genoveva, "Notturno" and "Scherzo" from Mendelssohn's music to A Midsummer Night's Dream, and Beethoven's Symphony in A major.

MUNICH.—Richard Wagner's Parsifal will be produced here next May, one performance at least being exclusively for the King, in conformity with the usual practice. The cast will be as follows: Parsifal, Vogl; Kundry, Mad. Vogl; Amfortas, Reichmann; Gurnemanz, Siehr; Titurel, Kindermann; Klingsor, Fuchs. Wagner will lend the costumes but scenery will have to be painted on purpose, on account of the difference in size between the Theatre Royal here and the Theatre at Bayreuth. Mad. and Herr Vogl have left on a seven months' holiday; Herr Levy has been resting after the fatigues of Bayreuth; Mad. Weckerlin has been indisposed for some little time, and Mdlle Aglaja Orgeny has been temporarily filling her place. In December, Herr Gura will play a certain number of nights with a view to obtaining a permanent engagement, and succeeding Herr Reichmann, who goes to Vienna.

VIENNA.—Adam's one-act Chalet is about to be revived at the Imperial Operahouse, where it has been frequently given since 1858. On the 19th November, Verdi's Simon Boccanegra, with Mad. Friedrich-Materna, Herren Beck, Bignio, Broulik, and Rokitansky, in the principal characters, will be performed for the first time here. Boccaccio has been brought out, under von Suppé's personal direction at the Theater an der Wien.—Herr Julius Sulzer, conductor at the Imperial Burgtheater, has composed new "Faust music," including an overture. It is to be played at a performance of Goethe's work in November.

MARRIAGE.

On Sept. 19th, at the parish church, Plymstock, South Devon, by the Rev. W. H. Colmore, M.A., Vicar of Moseley, assisted by the Rev. T. Coulthard, Vicar of the parish, REGINALD BLAYNEY COLMORE, Lieutenant Royal Navy, seventh son of the late Thomas Colmore, Esq., of Ashfurlong, Sutton Coldfield, Warwickshire, to FLORENCE EMMA, second daughter of Thomas Bulteel, Esq., of Radford, near Plymouth.

On Sept. the 27th, at the Cathedral, Canterbury, by the Very Rev. the Dean of Canterbury, D.D., assisted by the Rev. Precentor Hake, M.A., MORRIS ALFORD, second son of Thomas Alford Chubb, Esq., to MARY SOPHIA, second daughter of W. H. Longhurst, Esq., Organist of Canterbury Cathedral.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1882.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

On the re-opening on Saturday of the Royal Academy of Music, Tenterden Street, Hanover Square, Professor Macfarren, the Principal, delivered an address. Among the professors present were Messrs H. C. Banister (harmony and composition), G. Benson, M.B., Cantab., F. R. Cox, W. H. Cummings, P. Goldberg, F. Walker (singing), H. R. Eyers, W. H. Holmes, F. B. Jewson, Walter Macfarren, A. O'Leary, Brinley Richards, A. Schlösser, Harold Thomas, Thomas Wingham (pianoforte), and Mr John Gill, the secretary. There was a large attendance of students.

Professor Macfarren, after remarking that this was the sixty-first anniversary of the institution, said he hoped to enhance the interest of the students in their studies by offering them a glance at the history of the art. It was curious to note that, while savage nations had all some kind of music, with the civilized people of remote times it seemed to have been more a spirit of calculation than of impulse and impressionability. Music and astronomy were regarded as kindred, the different effects of music being assimilated to astronomical phenomena. For a long time the attention of musicians was spent in the calculation of mathematical niceties of intonations, and their ideas of what we called musical beauty seem to have been little in accord with the impression entertained by persons in times dating back already several hundred years from the present moment. There was a story related of Pythagoras, which had been repeated for hundreds of years and which, impossible as it was, had gained ready credence —the story that he observed the difference of the fifth and fourth and measured their ratios in consequence of hearing smiths at an anvil beating with hammers of different weights, and thus producing the different sounds. He (Professor Macfarren), however, thought it was within the range of every one's observation that the sound produced from any resonant body, whether it were a string or a plate, depended on the intonation of that string or plate, and not the weight or the lightness of the instrument used to play on it. Curiously, not only had this story been repeated from classic to mediæval and thence to our own times, but it had even been plagiarized in a story of more recent origin—that Handel, while living at Stanmore, listened to smiths working at their anvil, and from the effects of their different productions of notes by the weight of their hammers observed a melody upon which he constructed a variation and named it "The Harmonious Blacksmith." Handel, however, did nothing of the kind, and could have done nothing of the kind. It was remarkable that we could not determine where the ancient Greek system of music ceased and where modern music began. Doubtless there must have been an overlapping of one and the other, and both must, to some extent, have been practised at once, as was the case with the heathen religion and the Christian. In many particulars music advanced in England earlier than in other regions. At the end of the 12th century, a Fleming who founded the first musical academy that had been known—the Conservatoire in Naples—writing of the new art of counterpoint, said, "This is practised in England with greater success than elsewhere." Again, in the early days of the thirteenth century, they found counterpointed compositions in this country of an elaborate nature, and there were also persons to practice them when other countries had not yet so far advanced. It seemed to have been at the beginning of the sixteenth century, from 1500 onwards, that musical erudition was turned to secular subjects. Hitherto, music had been practised among the people without tuition or known principles. All learning on this, as on other subjects, had been confined to the Church, and as Italy was the centre of the Christian Church of the period, so music was drawn towards Rome. At the beginning of the sixteenth century, musical scholarship began to be applied to secular uses, and in the madrigals, which were then first written, exemplifications were found of the same rules which previously had been applied only to sacred works. Much was credited to the Roman school of musical composition, but it was very remarkable that this Roman school rose from the tuition given by Flemings in Rome to persons who went thither for the sake of their instruction. What might be said to have been the means of converting the ancient into the modern of music, or changing the strict of the former use into the free of the present practice, was the first employment of the chord of the dominant seventh. The first person to whom, as yet, any trace could be made as to this chord, in the free manner in which it was now employed, was a Fleming, Jean Mouton, who, he believed, was born in 1475. It had been customary to ascribe the invention to Claudio Monteverde, who lived a hundred years later. It was at the verge of 1600 that some noblemen in Florence surmised that the music, the extraordinary effects of which were described by persons who had witnessed them in Greece, and whose writings had then become patent to all modern Europe, must be capable of re-production. Opera had its first home in Italy, was introduced into France by an Italian, and, in course of time, came the employment of opera in England. We were too much aware of the general notion that this country was incapable of musical excellence, that we could pay for, and perhaps enjoy, music, or affect to do so, but that we could not perform or produce it. There was, however, nothing in our soil, or our climate, or our physical construction which prevented Englishmen from rising to the highest in the attainment of this art. After observing that, in opposition to many, he held that science and art supplemented each other, he commented on the relation of these two pursuits to music, and urged them to think of the power the musician had to give to poetry a higher meaning than the words seemed to convey, and still further, apart from all words, to produce a deeper effect on the feelings, by instrumental music, than written words could ever express. Then they would have a just right to believe in the high vocation they followed. * * * * Standing amongst the works of great masters, they might with pride, and yet with becoming humility as to their own powers, repeat, with a slight alteration, the exclamation of a great painter, and say: "I, too, am a musician."

MR A. C. MACKENZIE'S COLUMBA.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—In your issue of last week you reproduced a paragraph from the London Figaro, in which it is stated that "in accordance with his desire to produce during every season in London at least one work of pretension by a native writer, Mr Carl Rosa has commissioned Mr Francis Hueffer to write, and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, of Edinburgh, to compose, a new and original opera on the subject of Columba, the story of which will be founded upon Prosper Merimée's famous romance of that name."

I have pleasure in complementing the above by informing you, and, through you, the musical world in general, that, so far from being still "in nubibus," Columba is an accomplished fact. This morning's post brought me a letter from my friend Mackenzie, dated Strada, per Borgo alla Collina, Sept. 21st, in which he says "Columba, by F. Hueffer and your humble servant, was finished yesterday." Yours &c., C. A. B.

Sydenham, Sept 25, 1882.

[Who said "in nubibus?" Not we. Perish the thought! All to be hoped is, that Mr Mackenzie may give us as much of himself, and as little of Wagner-Liszt as possible. Fancy Wagnerizing the impulsive Columba and the beautiful Miss Neville! Oh! No "superfluous seconds" on any account. Prosper Merimée, a hater of superfluities, could not abide them.—D. T.]

GEORGE GROVE'S "DICTIONARY."

Musical amateurs had to wait long for the just issued instalment of Mr George Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians (Macmillan and Co.), but, in possession of a double number, they no doubt find it easy to forgive delay, the more because there never was any difficulty in assigning a reason. The course of his laborious progress through the alphabet had brought Mr Grove to the letter S, and it was not likely that he would entrust the articles "Schubert" and "Schumann" to other hands than his own. Nor was it at all probable that, being full of matter and sympathy, he would deal with those composers save in the most copious form. This, of course, took time, but at last the Schubert and Schumann papers are before us, and extremely valuable ones they prove to be. That on the first-named master fills sixty-three closely printed pages, and that on the second occupies forty. It may be said that these are biographies, not dictionary articles; but few will raise against them a purely technical objection, in view of the mass of carefully arranged facts they present, and the amount of original information they contain. The editor's enthusiasm for his heroes detracts somewhat from the value of his criticism, which, moreover, is out of place in a work of the present kind. On the other hand, enthusiasm has served him well throughout the laborious task of leaving unturned no stone under which the smallest biographical truth could be supposed to lurk. The Schubert article especially is a monument of research, and, we believe, the most successful attempt at lifting the veil that so long concealed the details of an obscure life. For obvious reasons we cannot follow Mr Grove into particulars, but we may say emphatically that amateurs will obtain a clearer view and a better knowledge of Franz Schubert through the medium of his paper than has heretofore been possible. A most valuable feature in the article deals with facts concerning the first publication and performance of Schubert's multitudinous works. By its aid we are able to trace the gradual appreciation of the master's genius which, step by step, and tardily though surely, raised it from obscurity to a pinnacle of fame. Even more acceptable to students is a catalogue of Schubert literature, alphabetical lists of his published works, and a complete enumeration of all his productions, whether published or not, in chronological order, with key, opus number (if any), and exact date. For this, musicians, those especially who are concerned in the literature of the art, have cause to be grateful. We may add, incidentally, that Mr Grove brings the total of Schubert's compositions up to the astounding number of 1,131! Yet the master had but just passed his 31st year when death claimed him! The article on Schumann, if less striking than its fellow, is full of interesting details, and contains a mine of information bearing not only upon the nature of his genius, but his character as a man. It should be read by all who desire to understand a somewhat difficult master. As usual, in the later numbers of the Dictionary, Mr W. S. Rockstro occupies a prominent position with his rather prolix and not always well-judged compilations. Mr Rockstro fills fifty-five pages with an article on "Schools of Compositions," and the space is not out of proportion to the importance of his theme. But instead of giving us a clear and full idea of what the schools taught, with examples, he makes the mistake of introducing the professors, and telling us about them that which should be said under their respective names. The reader of Mr Rockstro's article will learn a good deal concerning persons, but not as much as he desires about principles. Moreover, the closing pages are taken up by a mass of comparatively trivial details regarding modern English music and musicians, and ends with a puff direct of the proposed Royal College of Music. Alike in scope and character, the article, which should be one of the most important in the Dictionary, inflicts a disappointment upon intelligent students. At the same time, we are glad to know that Mr Rockstro is sound upon the burning question of Wagner's innovations, and can give a reason for his faith. Here is a short but pointed utterance: "If evil combinations and unconnected arguments, and a weary waste of interminable recitation, be really necessary to the existence of dramatic music—so necessary that the genius capable of delighting us with pleasant harmony and structural symmetry, and melodies of acknowledged beauty, must needs deny us these luxuries, in order that the lyric drama may rest upon a philosophical basis—there are not a few among us quite ready to vote for a retention of the luxuries, even at the cost of leaving the lyric drama in the condition to which Mozart and Weber reduced it. Granted that the combinations are not always evil, the argument not always unconnected, the recitative not always dreary, nor always unrelieved by tuneful episodes and delicious instrumentation, still there must be something radically wrong in a system which admits the introduction of deformity, under any circumstances whatever."

Among other articles in this issue, one on Scottish music, from the pen of Mr. J. Muir Wood, stands conspicuous by its learned treatment of a subject anent which more is said than known. Mr Wood shows a thorough acquaintance with authorities bearing upon the subject, and presents his information in a very condensed and intelligible manner—one which other writers for the Dictionary might imitate with advantage. Few relics of early Scottish music survive, but Mr Wood shows, by interesting and amusing extracts from the Lord Treasurer's accounts (fifteenth century), that musicians were in high esteem and request. Approaching nearer to our own time materials accumulate, and we learn from the painstaking writer a host of facts regarding songs and tunes that are closely interwoven with Scottish life. The whole article, in point of fact, is readable and valuable; while the student of national art will find much to exercise his thoughts in the sections on "Scottish Scales and Closes" and on Gaelic music. Mr Wood's contribution is supplemented by some remarks upon Jacobite songs and Scottish dance music, from the pen of Mr T. L. Stillie, a Glasgow amateur familiar by name to all who have watched the recent development of art in Scotland. These also are of striking interest and sufficient authority. In a word, the subject of Scottish music is one of the best treated throughout the entire work, as far as it has yet gone.—Daily Telegraph.

* * * * * * * *

PROVINCIAL.

BRISTOL.—The dates for the forthcoming Musical Festival are, October 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th. The president is H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh, K.G., and Mr Charles Hallé will conduct a band and chorus of nearly 500 performers. The general programme includes Elijah, The Redemption, Moses in Egypt, Beethoven's Mass in D, and Haydn's "Spring," The Messiah, and a secular cantata, called Jason, by Mr Mackenzie. We shall return to the subject.

DUNDEE.—The chief of Scottish song commenced a short series of entertainments on Monday last. We quote the following from the Advertiser:—"Regarding Mr Kennedy's work in the Kinnaird Hall at the first of three entertainments nothing more need be said than that it was, in every respect, equal to the best he has ever presented in Dundee. He was in excellent voice and in perfect form, as that word is now used to indicate a performer's general condition before his audience. He sang his Scottish songs and told his subtle, pawky, and irresistibly humorous stories with all his accustomed raciness and point, convulsing his audience with laughter at every 'cute turn of humour. As to the audience, it was large, and sympathetic to the last degree, which largely accounts for the spirit with which Mr Kennedy and his family conducted their interesting programme. Quite one-half of the programme was re-demanded in a manner that left the performers no choice in the matter. Mr Kennedy's 'Get up and bar the door,' 'Woo'd and Married and a''; Mr Robert Kennedy's 'March of the Cameron Men' and 'Sound an Alarm'; Miss Helen Kennedy's 'Caller Herrin''; Miss Marjory Kennedy's 'Wae's me for Prince Charlie' were all repeated. Of the concerted pieces with which the entertainment was pleasantly varied, 'Ae fond kiss,' as a duet by Miss Helen and Mr Robert Kennedy deserves special mention. Miss Maggie Kennedy, though but in her pupilage, gives promise of having a very useful voice. Her singing of 'We're a' noddin'' was remarkably good. We might point to the improvement in quality of tone manifested by Miss Helen, Miss Marjory, and Mr Robert Kennedy on what we have been accustomed to hear from them, as showing the progress made under recent study, but enough has been said to indicate the quality of last night's entertainment and the enthusiastic reception accorded. This may be taken as a sure augury of the pleasure in store for the audiences of to-night and to-morrow night."

MANCHESTER.—The fourth season of the "Popular Chamber Concerts," established and directed by Mr S. S. Stratton, began at the Masonic Hall on Monday night. There was a discriminating audience, whose applause betokened perfect satisfaction. The programme consisted of Mr C. Villiers Stanford's quartet in F major for pianoforte and strings (given at one of the Popular Chamber Concerts about two years ago, and on Monday repeated in reply to a "plébiscite" of Mr Stratton's subscribers), played by Messrs Alfred Luton, T. M. Abbott, W. Griffin, and J. Owen; J. S. Bach's Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, in D minor (Mr Luton); Gade's Sonata, in D minor, Op. 21, for pianoforte and violin (Messrs Luton and Abbott); Chopin's Ballade, in A flat, Op. 47 (Mr Luton); and Haydn's Quartet for Strings, Op. 64, No. 4 (Messrs Abbott, Abbott, jun., Griffin, and Owen). At the next concert (October 30th) a Quartet, in G major, for strings, composed by the late Mr Charles Lucas, is included in the programme.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

After this duet there is some spoken dialogue in which Florestan begs Rocco to send a message to his wife, Leonora, in Seville, and begs him to give him water. Rocco refuses to send the message, but consents to give him wine from their flask. Leonora recognizes the voice and face of her husband, and eagerly runs to him with the wine.

The dialogue which grows from this is set as a trio in the form of a sonata. Florestan gives her thanks for the refreshing draught, and prays that she may, in better worlds, have the reward he is powerless to give. This is the first subject.

Ex. 213.

Rocco's words of willingness to have fed the poor man are set as the connecting link between first and second subjects. Leonora's cry that her heart throbs violently between joy and pain begins the second subject in the dominant key, which is continued by all three, either together or in alternation. Here all have the same direction of thought, Leonora of her throbbing heart and of the fateful hour that is at hand, Florestan of the pity he sees in the eyes of the other two, and Rocco hating the horrid deed he is concerned in. When the meditative nature of the dialogue gives way to action, the second part or fantasia of the sonata comes, full of changing ideas and keys. Leonora brings out the bread which she has hidden ready for such an opportunity, prays Rocco to let her give it to the starving man, and Rocco dares not; entreaty and answer are alternated for some time with new ideas and new keys.

Ex. 214.

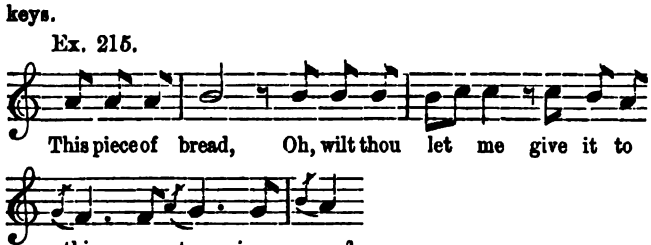
Ex. 215.



In the accompaniment a good deal of use is made of the phrase (a) which is taken from that of the first part at the point where Rocco said he would have fed Florestan if he had dared; and now it is used when Leonora urges him to let her give Florestan the bread.

Ex. 216.

Another new idea comes when Leonora gives it; and when Florestan takes it, the phrase (a) comes again. Florestan's halting words of thanks make a restful break in the action, and come fitly into a rest upon the dominant chord of the main key (b) as the end of the second part; this point also forms a connecting link to a repetition of his thankfulness, with a return (c) to the first subject of the sonata (Ex. 213).

Ex. 217.

From this point the three sing together their meditative words, different, but kindred in thought. The connecting link between the two subjects is here, but transposed, and again with words on the subject of refreshment and pity; and from the half close of this grows, not the second subject, as in the first part, but a coda on thoughts similar to the first subject, which draws the trio to an end.

HENRY OF STEIER.

(Translated from Scheffel for J. V. Schachner's Cantata.)

"Ye birds of the woodland," the nightingale sings,
"With melody golden the welkin all rings:
Cease, twitt'rers and pipers, you pitiful band,
For Henry of Steier is back in the land!"

The cobbler, uptossing his bonnet in glee,
Cries—"Merciful Heaven is mindful of me,
Such dancing and romping no leather can stand—
Gay Henry the Fiddler, is back in the land!"

Now hies to the lindens each beautiful maid,
Bewitched and bewitching, in garlands arrayed,
Why tarry the lovers at Cupid's command?—
Bold Henry of Steier is back in the land!"

And who tucks her kirtle and trips it along?
To-day wrinkled Grannie again will be young;
She steps and she strides like a stork in the sand—
"Smart Henry of Steier is back in the land!"

"The host leaves his flagon, the herdsman his cows,
The ostler his horses, the ploughmen their ploughs;
The bailiff and farmer in vain would withstand—
"This fiddler, this Henry, is back in the land!"

Dark-hooded, is weeping, 'mid flowerets bright,
A nun in the convent that stands on the height;
"Sad sister, whose bosom all pleasure hath banned—
Thy Henry of Steier is back in the land!"

In silence his fiddle he raised to his breast,
Half dreaming, half playing, though round him they pressed;
Like fire sped the sound from the master's deft hand—
"For Henry, the Minstrel, was back in the land!"

HERR LEVI.*

(From a Correspondent.)

Herr Levi, Capellmeistr at the Theatre Royal, Munich, who conducted the Parsifal Performances at Bayreuth, denies the current report that he is about to marry a step-daughter of Wagner's, and that he has turned Christian.

The programme for next season at the National Theatre, Pesth, will include Herodias, Orpheus, Die Meistersinger, Der häusliche Krieg, and the ballets, Der Spielmann and Renaissance.

CHERUBINI.

After producing his Elisa at the Théâtre Feydeau, Cherubini kept aloof from the stage more than two years, not returning to it till the commencement of 1797, when he brought out Médée. It was at this epoch that he began writing, like Méhul, Lesueur, Catel, and Gossec, some of the occasional songs or patriotic hymns, which the Republican Government caused to be performed with great solemnity and an amount of display often touching and superb, at the grand national festivals and the anniversaries of important events. I find several entered in his Memorandum Book, under the date of 1795. Here is the list as given by himself:—

"Hymn of the Panthéon, with grand chorus; Hymn to Fraternity; Song for the 10th August; Hymn and Funeral March on the death of General Hoche; Ode on the 18th Fructidor; Republican Saltpetre; Hymn for the Festival of Youth; Festival of Gratitude."

The list was followed by a note thus framed:

"These pieces, of which I have not in every instance the exact date, were composed at various epochs of the Revolution, ranging from this year to the year 1798."

As mentioned in the note, these pieces, some of which were of great importance and admirable in style, belong to different epochs. The titles are not always quoted correctly, as, for instance, in the case of "Pompe funèbre du Général Hoche," of which I shall speak further on, under the date of the performance, and also in that of the "Ode pour l'anniversaire du 18 Août," for which Cherubini wrote, to Lebrun's verses, some extremely remarkable music. "Le Salpêtre républicain" was sung in the month of Pluviôse, Year II., at the festival given to celebrate the commencement of the manufacture of saltpetre. The "Hymn to Fraternity" was performed some months previously, on the 1st Vendémiaire, Year II., in the Tuileries Gardens, the lines having been written by Desorgues. Those of the "Festival of Youth" (10th Germinal) were by Parny; those of the "Festival of Gratitude" (10th Prairial), the music of which was superb, by Mahérault.*

At this epoch, when I do not find any other compositions entered in his Memorandum Book, it may be supposed, I think, that Cherubini was completely absorbed in the duties of inspector, which he had been appointed to fulfil at the Conservatory. We know how conscientious and methodical, what a slave to duty, he was, and, at a time when everything had to be created and organized in the new institution, he devoted himself no doubt entirely to the task. As, however, Hoffmann, the celebrated critic of the Journal des Débats and the colleague of Méhul and Nicolo, had entrusted him with a three-act libretto, he set to work and wrote a new score.

The libretto was that of Médée, and the reader may consider the subject rather gloomy for the place, the Théâtre Feydeau, where it was destined to be brought out. Hoffmann, moreover, had not been able to invest the horrible story with more interest than the immortal poets, no others than Seneca, Euripides, and Pierre Corneille, who had treated it before him. Cherubini, failing, perhaps, to perceive the original defect of such a dramatic theme, could owe only to himself the success which he hoped to achieve with his work, and which, indeed, greeted it. Médée was produced on the 13th March, 1797, its principal interpreters being Mdme Scio (Médée), Gaveaux (Jason), and Dessaules (Créon). The result was for the composer a genuine triumph, and one in which the poet was not called upon to claim a share. All the papers were unanimous in finding fault with Médée for the too great length of certain portions and for offensive improbabilities, as well as for a want of interest inherent to the subject itself, but all agreed in pronouncing the music admirable, and in recording the impression which such music—severe, grandiose, and passionate, at one and the same time—had produced on the spectators.

"The first act," says one, "contains portions that are too long, dumb show, choruses that never end, marches, and a great deal of mere spectacle. The second act is more dramatic and closer than the first, while the music is majestic and imposing; in the part of Medea it rends the soul, it paints. The third act is full of action; the catastrophe is truly moral; Medea is punished and crime does not triumph. Lastly, the music is broad, expressive, majestic, and terrible. Perfect execution of the choruses, correctness and richness of the costumes—nothing has been neglected in this opera."†

The Journal de Paris remarks in its turn:

"The success was complete, and the execution as good as is compatible with a first night. Overture, recitatives, duets, and trios in the forms of dialogues, concerted pieces, marches, choruses, and accompaniments, are all rich in melody and perfectly adapted to the action on the stage."‡

Finally, this is how the Courier des Spectacles chronicled the reception accorded to the work:

"Never did a first performance attract more people than were seen last night at the Théâtre Feydeau. The lyric tragedy of Médée achieved a most brilliant and most deserved success. The music, which cannot be too highly praised, is by M. Cherubini, and the book by M. Hoffmann, already known by several agreeable productions. The scenery is magnificent; in fact, nothing was wanting to render the opera worthy of the highest admiration. The public called for M. Cherubini, who appeared, and so did M. Hoffmann. Mdme Scio played the part of Medea with the greatest talent; among her pieces there were some in which she was in very great force; there was a call for her at the end and she came on again, the public testifying their satisfaction by the loudest applause. At the conclusion of the piece, M. Gaveaux read some verses in honour of M. Cherubini."§

Even at this epoch Cherubini was bound to Méhul by affection as profound as it was sincere, and Méhul gave him a strong and public proof of it. A journal—one of the most honest of that day, be it parenthetically remarked—the Censeur, wrote, when noticing Médée: "The music, by Cherubini, is often melodious and sometimes virile, but the public noticed in it reminiscences and imitations in Méhul's manner." Méhul immediately took up his pen and sent this reply to the paper:

". . . O, Censeur, you do not know this great artist. But I do know him, and admire him because I know him well, and I say, and will prove to all Europe that the inimitable author of Démophon, Lodoïska, Elisa, and Médée, never required to imitate in order to be successively elegant or tender, graceful or tragic, to be, in a word, that Cherubini whom some few may accuse of imitating others, but whom they themselves will not fail to imitate unfortunately at the first opportunity. This justly celebrated artist may find a Censeur to attack him, but he will have as defenders all who admire him, that is: all who are capable of understanding and appreciating the highest talent. "MÉHUL."

NEW YORK.—Mr Mapleson begins his Italian season on the 19th October, but Mad. Patti will not appear till the third week. Sufficient subscriptions have been received to place the season on a secure basis, financially.—Aimée and Capoul open a three weeks' season at the Fifth Avenue Theatre on the 9th October. They will sing alternately three nights a week and also divide the matinées. After Mad. Théo's departure for Europe, in January, M. Grau will split his company into two, putting Mad. Aimée at the head of one and Capoul at that of the other.—Mad. Théo made her first appearance on the 9th inst., in Madame L'Archiduc, and met with a very cordial reception.

* Castil-Blaze, though he could not have been so well informed as Cherubini himself, attributes to him (Académie impériale de Musique, vol. I., p. 15) two other patriotic songs: a "Hymn to Victory," of which Carbon de Flins is said to have written the verses, and a "Funeral Hymn on the Death of General Joubert," the verses of which are attributed to Chaussard. Cherubini mentions neither the one nor the other.

† Journal d'Indications of the 25th Ventôse, Year V.

‡ Journal de Paris of the 26th Ventôse.

§ Courier des Spectacles of the 24th Ventôse.—The verses in question are far from being good; I will, however, quote them as a curiosity:

Poursuis, Cherubini, ta brillante carrière;
Chaque jour te conduit à l'immortalité.
L'envie aux grands auteurs est trop souvent contraire;
Goûte en paix les douceurs de ta célébrité.
De Gluck en toi renaît le talent admirable;
Par tes accords divins, on se sent transporté:
De Médée en fureur tu peins si bien la fable,
Qu'elle prend à nos yeux l'air de la vérité.
De fleurs et de lauriers que n'ai-je une couronne?
Je brignerois l'honneur de te la présenter;
Mais en t'applaudissant le public te la donne.
L'obtenir est moins doux que de la mériter.

PIANO PLAYERS AND PLAYING OF THE NEAR PAST.

I remember when I was quite a little fellow, a stout good-natured looking German paying a visit to our house. He complained that his fingers were getting so fat that he would have to leave off pianoforte playing, or that the keys would require to be made broader. The stout good-natured looking German took a good deal of snuff, some of which, I remember, got into my eyes as I stood watching his performance. I can also remember that he partook freely of sauerkraut, and that he had no objection to a glass of "Schnapps" to settle his digestion. His name was HUMMEL, and, although now said to be but a "dull classic,"* he had a touch so light, and a style so pure, that even to this day I can distinctly remember the impression he left upon my youthful mind.

My height had hardly increased a couple of inches, when another visitor came to our town—one so essentially different, that, although he also was a German, he had nothing in common with the first, excepting that he played on the same instrument. I have no difficulty in recalling his face and figure. He was a young man, with long flowing hair and classical features; but he appeared so painfully affected, and so filled with the idea of his own greatness, that I candidly acknowledge his startling ability did not impress the circle I mixed with. His execution was the theme of musical society, for the name of LISZT was even then whispered with a certain amount of adoration I could hardly understand. True, in after years, he lost much of the affectation that distinguished his youth, and raised for himself a host of friends, attracted as much by his kindly manner as his undoubted ability.

Again, a recollection comes before me of a sprightly little Frenchman, who sat at the piano as if he had sprung from the key-board, and never seemed happy when away from it; who ran his fingers over the keys in a light and airy manner, and made himself agreeable to every one in a moment. We had a dance on the particular night when he paid his first visit, and as the quadrille pianist had not yet made his appearance, he asked whether we should like him to play a set of quadrilles, and he did play his first set, not published for many years afterwards. HENRI HERZ was a great favourite, both in public and in private, and the quadrille which I danced to his playing is a pleasant memory to this day.

Another face comes before me associated with this period of my life—a handsome, expressive face, full of animation, with eyes that appeared always to look on kindly and approvingly. When he sat at the pianoforte he seemed like a giant; his large hands running over the keys appeared to make nothing of difficulties, and although even then regarded more in the light of a musical "scene painter" than in that of a great artist, his broad style and powerful execution won the sympathies of all. THALBERG cannot readily be forgotten by those who heard him, and must be remembered with additional pleasure by those who frequently saw him, and particularly by those who had an opportunity of speaking with him. Free from affectation, he acknowledged that he took his effects from the playing of the harpist, Parish Alvars, who was also a good pianist and a genuine artist.

The faces of many that have now departed readily appear before me as I knew them in life, and the countenance of JOHN BAPTIST CRAMER is stamped indelibly on my recollection. * * * * Some may have surpassed Cramer in execution, and, as a composer, he was decidedly weak;† but who can forget that marvellous equality of playing, that charming expression, coming from the heart, that distinctive touch common to both hands, which placed him apart from the common herd. His playing of his own studies was like the recitation of so many poems; you could hardly say that this arose from any remarkable excellence of their own.‡ The love song was there, but it was the singing of the lover that imparted to it its distinctive charm, and, as he played some of his advanced studies, their tenderness and exquisite expression gave the listener more pleasure than any powers of execution could possibly do, for he belonged to a school that excelled in taste and feeling.

I recal, a few years later, CHARLES NEATE, one of the best informed but most egotistical of pianists, whose admiration for, and acquaintance with, Beethoven made his society at all times enjoyable. To hear him relate, at the residence of Thomas Tomkinson, the well-known pianoforte manufacturer and art critic, how they first tried over some of the great German Master's quartets, sent to him in MS. by the composer (?), was a rich treat. Neate lived a great deal in Brighton, where he died on the 30th March, 1877. His Majesty George IV. had a high opinion of his ability, and Neate used to relate with great gusto his being ordered to attend at the Pavilion one evening when the King was entertaining some foreign guests. The hours passed on, and still the pianist was not called upon, until at length the concert terminated. Neate, incensed, returned home, but did not sleep all night. In the morning, a messenger came from the King desiring to see him, and, before the irritated musician could ask an explanation, his Majesty said: "I have no doubt, Neate, that, after being in attendance last night, you were surprised at not being called upon to play; but the truth is, my guests were more numerous than I at first anticipated, and we had to dine in the Octagonal Chamber, and, as some of my friends had been speaking somewhat disparagingly of English music and English musicians, I determined that you should not be heard to so great a disadvantage as you would have been in a room so badly fitted for sound. This evening our number is less, and we dine where you can be better listened to." "In my intercourse with the King," Neate added, "I always found him a staunch supporter of his countrymen, and upon every occasion he encouraged English musical talent, when he could get it." ‖

Neate introduced into England many celebrated works of Beethoven, Weber, and Hummel—and he did not forget, when you were in his society, to let you know it.

Another active worker of this period, and, indeed, a distant relative of my father's, was CIPRIANI POTTER. A good firm all-round pianist, and a thoroughly sound musician; his concerts were my delight, and it was in the Hanover Square room, under his direction, I first heard Beethoven's Pastoral, and many other works that have become familiar. I only speak now of pianists whom I have heard in private and public at a very early period, before the pianoforte was the universal instrument it has since become. From the beginning of the century, indeed, a change has come over most players, influenced no little by the construction and compass of the instrument itself. In those days attention was more particularly directed to touch; cantabile playing was cultivated, and crispness as contrasting with indistinctness was held in the highest estimation. The quantity of notes that could be played in a given time was not so much a consideration as their quality. The player in those days regarded his piano as the violinist does his violin, and carried it about with him, so that he could ensure the production of his usual tone, and the exhibition of that touch upon which he prided himself. If the present pianist would try in some measure to follow the example of the past, we should have more effective performances—at least in chamber music—and less dependence upon a large body of tone that sometimes is little better than an unmeaning noise.

PHOSPHOR.

It is proposed to give this winter at Antwerp a performance of the oratorio, Le Paradis Perdu, music by BLOCKX, book by VAN BEERS.

Mdlle Carlotta (Dorè) Desvignes, the accomplished young singer whose fine mezzo-contralto voice has been so well cultivated by our Maestro Sangiovanni, and who, during the last musical season in London, sang with such distinction in concerts with Mdme Patti and other celebrities, is now in Milan, where she is studying hard for the Lyric stage. Mdlle Desvignes will make her début in the part of the Capraio, in Meyerbeer's Dinorah, at Vercelli, in December next.—Il Trovatore.

* "Said to be"—by whom?—Dr Blidge.

† I wish Arthur Chappell—classical-music-purveyor for the people—would (pace the "Advanced") give his ever-increasing flock an opportunity, once in a way, of testing this question.—Dr Blidge.

‡ Beg pardon. I have often said thus much, and shall persist in saying thus much till I am undeceived and (as the late Manfredo Maggioni would say) "taken from my error."—Dr Blidge.

‖ "When he could get it" is good. All this about Neate is "nate, mighty nate"—but clear moonshine all the same. To say that Neate was a pianist and composer for the piano, who lived to the ripe age of ninety, would be to sum up his career. He was, in short, a ripe professor who played occasionally at the Philharmonic. Nevertheless, that he died at Brighthelmstone is too true.—Dr Blidge.

EXCERPTS FROM PARKE'S MUSICAL MEMOIRS.

Excerpt No. 3.

The "Ode for the New Year" was composed by Mr Stanley, master of the King's band, and composer of the odes, as well as the minuets danced at Court on their Majesties' birthdays. After these places became vacant on the death of Dr Boyce, in 1779, Fischer the oboe player, who was one of the Queen's band, posted off to Windsor to solicit the King to appoint him composer of the minuets. When he arrived there he found his Majesty had gone to the stables. Fischer followed him, and, in his odd sputtering way, thus preferred his suit:—"Please, your Majesty, I can write minuets." "Can you?" said the King, "then you may go and play them." His Majesty had previously appointed Mr Stanley to both places.

The manager of the King's Theatre, who felt the loss of Pacchierotti, and who had made every endeavour to obtain efficient performers, presented to the public, on the 21st of January, the serious opera of Demetrio, in which Signor Crescentini and Signora Ferrerese made their first appearance. The singing and acting of Crescentini, though by no means equal to Pacchierotti's, was at all times neat, and often brilliant. Ferrerese had a sweet voice, and sang with taste, but she was not calculated to shine as a prima donna. They were both much applauded. Cherubini, who selected and composed this opera, was a scholar of Sarti: he was a young man of genius; and the overture, and the duet in the third act, gave promise of future greatness. Cramer led the band. The comic opera was considerably aided by the appearance of Signor Franchi, on the 24th of January, in "Il Pittore Parigiano." Franchi's voice was clear and powerful, and he sang with great taste. The manager, being desirous of strengthening the serious opera, engaged Signor Tenducci, who had been singing with success at the Hanover Square concerts: he appeared on the 11th of May in Sir Christopher Gluck's opera, Orfeo. Nearly the whole weight of this opera lay on Tenducci, who, though an Atlas of former times, found his physical powers so much diminished, that he was unable to bear the pressure to the satisfaction of the public. Signora Ferrerese was not equal to the part of Euridice. No other novelty was presented that season.

In the early part of this winter, Mr Crosdill, the celebrated violoncello player, who had the honour of being instructor on that instrument to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, called on me to enquire if I could attend a concert on the following evening at Carleton House. I replied that I should be happy to do so, but I must ask permission of the proprietor of Covent Garden Theatre before I could decide. He said he would call on me for my answer the next morning; which he did, when I had the mortification of being compelled to inform him that Mr Harris had refused me. Mr Crosdill observed, that he was sorry for it, for when he attended his Royal Highness to state my answer of the former day, the first question he asked was, "Does young Parke come?" At that time I had not sufficient experience to know that the commands of my Prince should have superseded every other authority.

The latter part of last year (1784) Giardini left England for Italy, under the patronage of Sir William Hamilton, the British ambassador to the Court of Naples, a gentleman highly distinguished for his love of the arts. Before his departure, I was introduced to Giardini, at the house of a friend, and, after dinner, sang a part in his popular glee, "Beviamo tutti tre," with him and Mr Shield. As a young man, I was much gratified at being introduced to one who possessed such splendid talent, and had rendered such essential benefit to his profession. Giardini, who was a sensible and gentlemanly man, with a high and honourable spirit, had for several years given musical instruction to the Duchess of M——h, and had been in the habit of passing two or three months of the summer for that purpose at the family seat, B——m, in O——e, where he had lived as one of the family. The duke, who was a very reserved man, at length considering his presence at meals to be a restraint, caused the duchess to request Giardini would have a table furnished for him in his own apartment, which he refused, declining to stay any longer at B——m. He, however, attended her Grace as usual in London, till the end of the following winter, when the duchess, who was said to be fond of money, observing to him, whilst settling his account, that he had charged one lesson too much, deducted half a guinea. Giardini, whose pride was greatly hurt, bowed submission, but would never afterwards attend her Grace. For many years after his arrival in England he was so popular, that while performing his violin concertos in public, he was as much applauded as Garrick. His favouritism in private life was also very great, and he was patronized by a host of the nobility, &c., who almost idolized his extraordinary talent. Among his numerous admirers Lady Bingley was conspicuous. That lady, whenever his annual benefit was announced, always gave a grand party at her house; and, during the evening, addressing her friends individually, said, good-humouredly, without specifying her object, "Give me five guineas, my lord,"—"Give me five guineas, my lady," and so on, which being of course complied with, she in return presented them with a ticket for Giardini's benefit. Lady Bingley was not only Giardini's living but dying friend, for on her death-bed she bequeathed him four hundred pounds per annum during life.

Lolli, the great violin player of the continent, who had lately arrived in England, gave a public concert, in which he performed a concerto. His execution was astonishing, and the tricks he played in various parts of it excited the risibility more than the admiration of the auditors.

The Pantheon concert commenced on Thursday, the 2nd of February; Mdme Mara and Signor Franchi were the singers. Crosdill performed a concerto on the violoncello, in which he evinced such power, brilliancy of execution and taste, as to defy competition. This gentleman possessed an uncontrolled dominion over the finger-board of the violoncello. I have heard him play the favourite minuet of Handel's in the overture to Ariadne, in three parts, as distinctly and as perfectly as if they had been performed by three of our most finished performers. Salomon led the band, and played a violin concerto, in which he displayed original and powerful talent. Salomon, in his own country, attended the Prince ———. After teaching him for some time, the prince said to him one day, "Well, Mr Salomon, how do I get on?"—"Please your highness," said Salomon, "der are tre stages of music. First, der is pick out, read notes, count time, &c., not play at all. Second, der is play, but play very bad—out of time, out of tune, noting at all. Now your highness has just got into de second stage."

The will of the late Mr. William Hutchins Callcott has been proved for over £14,000.

The Orchestra of the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, commenced their "Symphony-Soirées" on the 22nd inst.

The inauguration of the Bellini Monument, Catania, is now definitely fixed for the 28th November.

Fursch-Madi has been in Madrid some little time. Masini was expected by the 25th inst., at the latest.

Reinthaler's opera, Das Kätchen von Heilbronn, has been favourably received at the Stadttheater, Leipsic.

Ilona Eibenschütz, the young pianist, commences in November a concert-tour through Germany and Russia.

Cécile Ritter is engaged for December and January at Vicenza to play the leading parts in Carmen and Mignon.

Mdme Montigny-Rémaury has been created an "Officier d'Académie." (Connu! Connu!—Dr Blidge.)

According to the Arpa, Mancinelli has completed the opera he was commissioned to write by Ricordi of Milan.

Professor Wylde's Lectures on Music are announced for the 6th, 7th, 8th and 10th of November at Gresham Hall.

Tomaso Salvini, the great tragedian, had a fall some time since, on leaving his house, and was rather severely shaken.

Bottesini has set a "musical idyll," Nerina, book by Duke Proto. It will be first performed in the Ducal Palace, Bivona.

Lablanche, ("la petite blonde") has been favourably received as the heroine in Mignon at the Teatro Brunetti, Bologna.

Bottesini has been commissioned by the Italian Minister of Public Instruction to re-organize the School of Music at Parma.

The new zarzuela, El gran Tamerlan de Persia, music by Señores Caballero and Nieto, has not proved successful at Madrid.

Verger and Santa Athos, baritones, have declined engagements at the Milan Scala, not deeming the proposed terms satisfactory.

Gayarre, the Spanish tenor, was lately in Milan. He has had the misfortune to lose his father, who died at Roncal, in Navarre.

The receipts at the third German Singers' Festival, Hamburgh, were 200,005 marks and the expenses, 158,000, leaving a surplus of 42,005 marks.

Sophie Heilbron makes her re-appearance on the lyric stage not, as originally intended, at Monte Carlo, but at the San Carlo, Naples.

Petri, of Hanover, has been appointed leader at the Leipsic Stadttheater and Gewandhaus Concerts in place of Schradieck, who resigned.

Levy, the Israelitish conductor at the late Bayreuth performances, has been baptized. Is this a result of the effect produced on him by Parsifal?

Mdme Adelina Patti will leave for New York, by the Servia, next month, to fulfil her engagement with the Royal Italian Opera Company, Limited.

Wilhelm Hartkäs, the Nestor of Berlin organists, died in that capital on the 12th inst., having been born at Bennungen, near Rossla, in 1805.

The Carltheater, Vienna, after remaining closed five months, has been re-opened, with the buffo-opera, Javotte, under the management of Herr Strampfer.

Salvator Rosa was lately played at Pernambuco for the benefit of the composer, Carl Gomez, who, after the performance, was treated to a torch-light serenade.

Mdme von Decker, from 1828 to 1832 the popular prima donna at the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, died, aged 71, on the 9th inst., at her Eichberg estate near Hirschberg.

Signor Arditi has gone to New York by the S.S. City of Chester, to fulfil his duties during the ensuing season as conductor of the Royal Italian Opera Company, Limited.

A grand opera, Herrat, by Felix Draeseke, Dresden, has been accepted at the Stadttheater, Hamburgh, by Herr Pollini, despite the great scenic difficulties it is said to present.

Blumner's Fall Jerusalems, Bach's Johannes Passion, and Mendelssohn's St Paul, will be performed successively at the Berlin Singakademie's three concerts in the coming season.

The Nazione of Florence, and other influential Italian papers, bestow great praise on a new mass by Sig. Ciro Pinsuti, which has recently been performed at Sinalunga, his native town.

Anton Rubinstein will, at the beginning of November, conduct the first performance in Leipsic of his opera, Die Maccabäer. The cast will include Mdlle Marianne Brandt.—(Lucky Anton!—Dr Blidge.)

A part of Ferrari's Buenos Ayres Company, including Signorina Borghi-Mamo et Sgra Schalchi, have been singing at Rio Janeiro.

Theodor Vollmer is appointed director of the Grand-Ducal Theatre, Schwerin, during the absence, through illness, of the Intendant, Baron von Wolzogen.—(The Wagnerian?—Dr Blidge.)

A new Fantasia, "Russia," written by Anton Rubinstein, and founded entirely on characteristic Russian airs, followed by the Russian national hymn sung by a chorus, has been performed at Moscow.

Several French papers announced the death of Lesage, formerly a member of the company at the old Théâtre-Lyrique. The announcement, M. Lesage says (and he ought to know), is utterly incorrect and premature.

The King of Wurtemberg has conferred the Frederick Order, Second Class, on Steinhardt, Musical Director, and the Gold Medal on Krüger, Royal Chamber Virtuoso, in commemoration of their 40th official anniversary.

The season at Kroll's Theater, Berlin, was brought to a close with Le Postillon de Longjumeau, the leading principal part sustained by Theodor Wachtel.—(Wachtel must have played this character eleven thousand and eleven times.—Dr Blidge.)

Mdlle Eugénie Coulon, the accomplished pianist, has left Boulogne-sur-Mer, where she has been passing her vacation, and has returned to London, to the regret of her admirers in la belle France, but to the delight of those in "Perfide Albion."

Bernardino Ferrari, born in 1810, has died at Vercelli, his native place. He was at one time first violinist in the Ducal Orchestra, Parma, and then conductor at the Milan Scala, as well as teacher in the Conservatory and Institution for the Blind. During the latter years of his life he was deaf.

The Whitehall Review of Sept. 21st contains an article, headed "Mad. Marie Roze-Mapleson," well worth reading by the many admirers of that popular artist. It is from the brilliant pen of Mr Dion Boucicault, and is accompanied by a photograph likeness of her as Leonora, the heroine of Beethoven's Fidelio.

Dr Spark's "special performance" on the organ at the Town Hall, Leeds, "in celebration of the triumph of the British army in Egypt," was attended by at least 2,000 persons. Dr. Spark had composed for the occasion a descriptive fantasia called "The Battle of Tel-el-Kebir," which was received with uproarious applause.

A story is told by a pastor of the Biganny Church in the city of Cushna, U.S. The organ loft and choir gallery, immediately in rear of the pulpit, were a little elevated. The organist, a German not remarkable for presence of mind, and easily disconcerted, was also a little elevated. The hour for afternoon service was three, the organist was in his place, but the choir had not arrived. By some mishap the key of the organ had been misplaced. The minister, not knowing these facts, slowly and solemnly arose, and after reading a hymn, took his seat. There was no response from the organ or choir. Silence reigned supreme. Time passed on. The minister and congregation were becoming uneasy. All eyes were turned to the organ loft. At length the organist with a fidgety manner and face as red as a beet, came to the railing in front of the loft, and in a tone evidently intended as a whisper, but distinctly heard by all, gave the following explanation:—"Mister breecher, mister breecher, ve von't have no singing dis afternoon. De key not coomed, and de lady vat sings de sobrana bees not coomed, and de rest of de peobles vat sings be not coomed, and de organ bees not opened, and ve von't have no singing dis afternoon, mister breecher, dat's so." The effect was past description.

Great excitement has been caused in Frankfort-on-the-Maine by the arrest of a popular favourite upon the charge of theft. The well-known tenor * * *, member of the opera company, and formerly of Berlin and other European capitals, is now in gaol. For some time a series of thefts had been perpetrated in the dressing-rooms of the Frankfort Theatre, and suspicion had fallen, unjustly in each case, upon various servants of the stage of a lower class. Nothing, however, could be traced home. Actors and actresses, returning from the stage to their dressing-rooms, found that small articles of value had been abstracted from the pockets of their ordinary clothes. Recently one of them discovered that her jewel-case had been burst open while she was occupied on the boards, and that some jewels, upon which she set great store, were missing. She went staight to the police court, and insisted upon a strict search being made all round. The result took everyone by surprise. One of the stones was found in Herr ——'s possession, and the police discovered that he had been in the habit of selling or pawning similar articles. He was consequently arrested, and is now in the gaol on the Klapperfeld, a caged songster of unusual quality. Naturally enough the previous thefts are attributed to him, and he will probably put forward kleptomania as his defence.

WAGNER AT KÖNIGSBERG.—Many English votaries of the Wagnerian cultus are unaware that two important events in their High Priest's early life occurred at Königsberg, the Prussian Coronation City. It was in the Town Theatre of this ancient stronghold that William R. Wagner, commonly called Richard Wagner, when a young and unknown musician, first wielded the bâton some six-and-forty years ago. A few months after he had been appointed to the post he was married, in Tragheim Church, to Christine Wilhelmine Planer, third daughter of Gotthilf Planer, a Dresden mechanician. The wedding was solemnized on the 24th November, 1836, Wagner being just twenty-four, and his bride one year younger. Twenty-five pairs of lovers were united on the occasion. William and Christine were the twenty-second, and the last entry but three in the church register recorded their marriage, as well as a declaration upon oath by the bridegroom to the effect that he was neither married nor betrothed to any other person than to "Spousa Planer." This declaration the future author of Parsifal signed in full, "William Richard Wagner, Music-Director." The Königsberger Gazette, to which we are indebted for the above interesting details of the "Great Tone-Poet's" youthful career, deems it likely that the autograph—which can be seen upon application—is unique of its sort, the Master dropping his "front name" shortly after—for what reason our contemporary does not state.—C. THE SONGS OF SCANDINAVIA
AND NORTHERN EUROPE.

EIGHTY-THREE NATIONAL AND POPULAR SONGS.

THE SONGS OF EASTERN EUROPE.

ONE HUNDRED VOLKSLIEDER OF AUSTRIA, HUNGARY, BOHEMIA, SERVIA, &c.

WITH ENGLISH WORDS BY CLARA KAPPEY.

EDITED BY

J. A. KAPPEY.

Price 2s. 6d. each, paper covers; 4s. cloth.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs, giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

"An unusually long but extremely elegant symphony introduces this Ballad, one of the most expressive we have seen from the pen of this composer. The change into the tonic minor, and the transient modulations which follow, seem to grow naturally from the feeling of the melody, which is throughout thoroughly sympathetic with the words. We are glad to call attention to so good a specimen of unpretentious song-writing."—Musical Times.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 873 and 1422. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. PARSIFAL AND REDEMPTION.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—From Bayreuth to Birmingham—from Parsifal to Redemption—was a tremendous leap!—Many, confirmed Wagnerites as well as Gounodites, would probably aver that the respective works of the German and the French master should not be mentioned in the same breath. Still, it seems worthy of observation that their two most recent works have more in common, both generally and particularly, than one would have expected.

To speak generally: both are pervaded by a profoundly religious spirit; the Saviour is the protagonist of both—allegorically represented in the one, actually personified in the other. In both the "eloquence" is for the most part sustained by the orchestra rather than by the voice.

On this latter point I ask: Has not the immortal Mozart furnished a sufficient precedent for such a mode of procedure, though with him it appears to have been one rather of precept than of practice? In a letter, dated Mannheim, Nov. 12, 1778, Mozart wrote (I quote from Lady Wallace's translation):

"I have now something to say. I may perhaps make forty louis d'or here. To be sure, I should have to stay six weeks, or at most two months, in Mannheim. Seiler's company is here, who you no doubt already know by reputation. Herr von Dalberg is the director. He will not hear of my leaving this till I have written a duodrama* for him, and, indeed, I did not long hesitate, for I have often wished to write this style of drama. I forget if I wrote to you about it the first time that I was here. Twice at that time I saw a similar piece performed, which afforded me the greatest pleasure; in fact, nothing ever surprised me so much, for I had always imagined that a thing of this kind would make no effect. Of course you know that there is no singing in it, but merely recitative, to which the music is a sort of obbligato recitativo. At intervals there is speaking while the music goes on, which produces the most striking effect. What I saw was Bender's Medea. He also wrote another, Ariadne auf Naxos, and both are truly admirable. You are aware that of all the Lutheran Capellmeisters Bender was always my favourite, and I like these two works of his so much that I constantly carry them about with me. Conceive my joy at now composing the very thing I so much wished! Do you know what my idea is? that most operatic recitatives should be treated in this way, and the recitative only occasionally sung when the words can be thoroughly expressed by the music."

From the above quotation it seems then that Mozart advocated even a less musical mode of procedure (as many would call it) than either Wagner or Gounod have adopted.

In reference to the monotonous (I use the word in its technical sense) manner in which Gounod has treated his recitatives and the homophonic character of many of his choruses, I would remark to those of his Birmingham critics whose minds seem to have been greatly exercised thereby, and who have credited him with extreme originality, that this is no new thing, and that, especially in the case of the choruses, an ample precedent is to be found in a series of motets by Gounod, published in Paris in his very early days, and reprinted some years ago by Novello & Co., as well as in the choral recitatives of Berlioz's Romeo et Juliette, and in Liszt's setting of the hymn, Stabat Mater Speciosa, in his oratorio, Christus.

Mention of Liszt reminds me that, by way of illustrating the doctrine of the Holy Trinity (in the last chorus of The Redemption), Gounod has made use of a long succession of tonic triads. With a similar aim, Liszt has done the same thing both in the Credo of his Graner Mass and in his Dante Symphony. I would ask, therefore: With which of the old ecclesiastical composers did the idea originate that the tonic triad is symbolical of perfection? This is a question to which I have never yet been able to get a definite answer.

Reverting to the particular points of agreement between Parsifal and Redemption, I confine myself to one—but that is a very remarkable one, and again involves a series of questions. For the Wehelaute (lamentations) in the Heilandsklage (Saviour's mourning) motive in Parsifal, as von Wolzogen has designated it, Wagner has made use of the following chromatic passage:—

In a similar situation, depicting Christ upon the Cross, Gounod accompanies the speech of the impenitent thief thus:—

And, again, when the Virgin Mother addresses her Son and Saviour, the following modification of the same theme is used:—

These three passages, it will be seen, are identical in their germ, though not in their outcome. Collusion between the two masters being impossible, the following questions suggest themselves:

(1). Has Wagner, as in the case of the Grail motive in Parsifal, for which he has adopted the well-known Dresden Amen, again appropriated an old ecclesiastical phrase, regarding it as common property? (2). Has Gounod done the same thing? (3) And if so, to whom did the passage originally belong?

Since writing the above, a further consideration of Gounod's fondness for exercising his ingenuity in harmonizing the chromatic scale, both ascending and descending, as instanced in other passages in the Redemption than those quoted, as well as in Gallia, has led me to suspect that after all, perhaps, I have been hunting on a wrong scent, and that the coincidence may be purely an accidental one. It is only, therefore, after some considerable hesitation that I send you the above rambling remarks, the determining point being a wish to elicit a reply to some of the queries suggested by them.—Yours, &c.,

C. A. B.

Sydenham, Sept. 29, 1882.

* Elsewhere in Mozart's correspondence spoken of as a monodrama and a melodramatic opera.

M. GOUNOD'S REDEMPTION.

Charles Françoise Gounod, like Joseph Haydn, is one of the few musicians who have been permitted to inscribe upon the pages of a life's history a complete artistic narrative. If it may not be claimed for him that he possesses the exuberant melodic flow of a Mozart, or the elegiac mind of a Chopin, he has at least been granted opportunities for demonstrating what can be done in a long career by a union of genius and industry. At the very threshold of life circumstances were favourable to him, as his very earliest surroundings were musical. To his mother, a pianist of no ordinary ability, he was indebted for thorough initiation in the rudiments of the art of which he was destined to become a brilliant exemplar. The ecclesiasticism with which he speaks when opportunity serves is also doubtless the result of early impressions. Indeed, so much did this at one time influence him that, seriously contemplating a novitiate, he for two years was an out-pupil of the Catholic Seminary. After gaining his Bachelor's degree at the Lycée, Gounod placed his name upon the books of the Paris Conservatoire in 1836, and the year following tried for the Prix de Rome with his cantata Marie Stuart et Rizzio. This obtained the second place, but the next competition resulted in his carrying off the coveted honour with his work Ferdinand. One of the privileges of the prize being facilities for a temporary residence in Rome for the purpose of studying the works of the older masters, advantage was at once taken, and the pages of Palestrina and others occupied the attention of the young prize-holder. Returning in due course from the "Eternal City," he was offered and accepted the post of organist and choirmaster to the "Mission Etrangers," and it was during the earlier part of his tenure of this office that he underwent the theological training before alluded to. During the latter part of this decade—1840-1850—Gounod appears to have utilised most of his time in study, and the almost solitary production of La Messe Solennelle showed that his labours had not been in vain. Through the instrumentality of Mdme Viardot Garcia, Gounod became known to Dr. Hullah, and immediately discerning the ability of the author, the English musician took tangible steps to place four excerpts from the Mass before the public. To Dr Hullah and a British audience Gounod is indebted for the first real presentation to the world, and the memorable event happened at St Martin's Hall, London, January 15th, 1851. Opinions soon travelled across the channel, and a commission for an opera, Sappho, very speedily followed. Barely four months elapsed ere the MS. was ready for the Academie, and the creation of the principal part was undertaken by his stedfast friend, Viardot Garcia. In 1858 La Médecin Malgre lui, an opera comedy drawn from Molière's book, written for the Théâtre-Lyrique, did not do much to expedite a success slowly but surely coming, and it was reserved for Faust and Marguerite to enable him to reach the summit of the lyric pillar at one bound. Strange to say, though it created an extraordinary sensation, with Miolan-Carvalho as the heroine, it took the opera over four years to travel to the British Metropolis. It was not until nearly the end of the spring season of 1863 that a London impresario could be induced to mount the opera. We believe we are right in stating, on the authority of Dr Hullah himself, that the same kindly and genial sponsor of the four numbers of the Messe Solennelle, had no inconsiderable share in the persuasion which induced Mr Mapleson to put Faust on the bills for June 11, 1863. Its subsequent fate is a matter of history, and in all probability "music of the future" notwithstanding, it will, if for the Kermesse and Garden scene alone, maintain its position against all comers. Henceforward, in his own school, having no lyrical adversaries worthy his steel, he might have rested. However, he elected to continue, and, if the truth be told, cannot be said to have approached this success, as neither his Reine de Saba, his pastoral, Mirelle, his Polyeucte, and the very last opera, Le Tribut de Zamora, have in any way emphasised the verdict won by the imperishable setting of "Gretchen's" story. In the department of sacred music, save and except his Messe Solennelle, Gounod is practically unrepresented, and no inconsiderable amount of interest arose on the announcement issued some time ago that he had turned his attention to a work of the dimensions of an oratorio.

At first sight, it is difficult to see the reasons prompting Gounod to the choice of his subject matter, but when the pages are put under closer consideration, and the treatment and musical setting re-judged collaterally, a deeper meaning appears. The inscription on the imprint, Opus vitæ meæ, may have as a further comment, "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." There is not much doubt that he has deliberately formulated his epic not merely as a sequence of events, but intends and does speak subjectively his mind on a great Christian dogma. If this be so, the parallelism between the text and music is at once evident, especially if we may grant—and that also appears almost certain—that Gounod intended his musical ideas to be so clear that "he who runs may read." Although there is from end to end a genial smoothness, and nothing either unworthy or empirical, there are no results attempted that are unachieved. Neither is length anywhere in excess of interest, and the simplicity with which the "old story" is told is rarely, if ever departed from. We look in vain for the sonorous effects so largely characterizing the modern school in the logical expression of Gounod's thoughts. Considering his ripe scholarship and inventive faculty, he must have exercised much self-control to refrain from elaboration and adopt now, a simple canto fermo, then, harmony of anything but an abstruse kind. The student of fugue will not find any subtleties of his art within its boundaries, and will search without success for mere scholasticism in canonical treatment. In short, considering, doubtless, that art slips when pushed beyond a certain stage of definiteness, Gounod articulates his notions of the personal and sentimental part of the tale, as well as its reflective phases, in plain and unvarnished language. From the comparatively meagre data of a pianoforte score it is manifestly impossible to give an exhaustive resumé of the work, while to give an ultimate opinion of it from the experience of choral rehearsals, minus the orchestral parts, would be just as unfair. Gounod has challenged the issue in his departure from the present style of musical unrest, and can afford to await a verdict when all the conditions favourable to an unbiassed judgment are at hand. Bearing in mind the foreshadowing in Holy Writ of the dogma as well as its complete consummation on Calvary, and the subsequent Pentecostal phenomena, Gounod very naturally turns to the first book of the Pentateuch for his prologue. This closely follows the Mosaic account of a primæval happiness, the fall and the promise of a Saviour. The first section proper includes the latter part of the history of the crucifixion and resurrection; the second narrates the re-appearance of the Messiah and his ascension; and the third, which is styled an epilogue, conveys the visitation at the day of Pentecost. The work opens with a short instrumental introduction in the key of C major, in which are to be noted changes and rhythmical device by the agency of soliliquæ; the chain of events is told alternately by narrations severally allotted to tenor and bass solo voices. They tell in quasi-recitative, the episodes of the Creation, and at once follows a brief chorale for celestial choir, "The earth is my possession." This finished, Part I. begins with the scene at Calvary, starting from the condemnation by Pilate at the Forum, which is given by the bass narrator. Gounod does not make the central figure of the great tragedy impersonal, but allots to a third voice—baritone—the utterances of the Messiah, and they are uniformly given in the first person. In this section we have the expostulation, "If my deeds have been evil." The march to Calvary is depicted by a lengthy orchestral interlude in the key of A minor, after which some sustained chords for the wood wind lead to the chorus, plain song, "Forth the royal banners go," the canto fermo being relieved by a semi-florid accompaniment for strings. This is in E major, and has for its full close the customary cadence. The adjuration, "Ye daughters of Israel, weep not for me," is next succeeded by a shorter orchestrel prelude, a brief reflex of the initiatory one, and afterwards the canto fermo before alluded to again occurs with identical treatment, only this time in the key of A minor. It cannot be said that the translation invariably carries the force of the original, and the occasional confusion of tenses might, perhaps, be excused on the plea of hasty preparation. If "Helas! ils vout Li'mmoler sur la croix" can just be passed over when rendered, "Alas! they go then to put him to death," "Alors Jesus le front inclinne' vers la terra," might surely have had a better interpretation than "And Jesus, then, on the ground he was looking." To revert again to the narrative, the tenor solo details the nailing to the cross in a recitative and aria, and the railings of the bystanders are conveyed in a not over tumultuous chorus in plain harmony, "Ha! thou that destroyest the temple." In these deriding cries the priests ultimately join, with "Can he not save himself." To a short passage for the narrator and a brief prayer for Jesus, "Pardon their sin, O my Father," succeeds a rather elaborate concerted piece in D minor, called the Reproaches, "O my vineyard." The appearance of the Virgin Mary at the foot of the cross and the short narration of the evangelist as to her being confided by Jesus to the care of the "Faithful disciple" is told in a dialogue for the sufferer and the bass narrator. Here, again, a hiatus in translatian arrests the eye, "La mere du Saveur, immobile" is not over elegantly or correctly given, "A face the mother wears." A short and extremely simple melody for the Virgin is placed at this juncture, "While my watch I am keeping," and this is a little later on given as a choral antiphon in plain song, accompanied by full organ, trumpets, and trombones. Proceeding, according to the chronological order of episodes, next come the mocking remarks of the impenitent thief, and the earnest plea of his companion, who appeals for mercy. These are given to bass and tenor voices respectively, the latter having a short solo in addition, "Lord, remember me." The climax of this part of the detail forms the basis of a chorale in plain harmony, "Lord Jesus, Thou to all bringest light and salvation." Perhaps the scene now imminent—the death of Jesus—shows more than any other number the rigid self-control of the composer. Not even the appalling phenomena that then occur tempts his mind to wander from his self-imposed path. There is a total absence of full polyphony, technically considered. The rending of the veil of the temple, the breaking of rocks, and the opening of the tombs are told by the narrators in the same style as the other parts, the suitable colour for the orchestra being apparently attained without the slightest attempt at graphic scoring. The asseverations of the Centurion is preliminary to a chorale of Doric-like simplicity, "For us the Christ is made a victim," which also forms a climax for the first part. The second division, which takes in the movements of the now scattered disciples and the miraculous reappearance of the Messiah, opens with a choral apostrophe, "Saviour of men," fully accompanied. A short pastorale in A minor, strings muted, leads up to the trio for the three holy women, who were anxious to visit the sepulchre, "How shall we by ourselves," in the same key and tempo. With strings still muted the realization of their hopes is indicated by the tenor narrator, and on the advent of the angelical visitant to the group, "Why seek ye the living among the dead?" the harp is employed, and the harmonies are sustained by the flutes and clarionets. Rapidly and just for a moment the events at the Sanhedrim now come in review—viz., the story of the watchers at the tomb, and the endeavours of the priests to bribe the soldiery to say the disciples had effected the abduction of the body. In short ejaculatory phrases the events of the night are set forth by a chorus for male voices, and the entreaties of the members of the supreme council are similarly treated. The discomfiture of the plot serves to bring in the full choir with a chorus, "Now behold ye the guard." Leaving the baffled priesthood, the assembly of disciples is visited, and a melodious and jubilant trio for three sopranos, "The Lord is risen," is interpolated, but this does not settle the doubts of the mourning group, who express their misgivings in a short chorus, "Though we fain would have believed you." A pertinently placed soprano solo, "From Thy love as a father," one of the two most important in the book succeeds, and upon this is engrafted a chorus for the full complement of voices, which ends with an apostrophe to faith. This finished, the Divine appearance is immediately manifested, and the colloquy between the Messiah and his disciples is carried on by the customary means. The commission to the eleven for the evangelization of the world is narrated quietly, yet with a masterful use of orchestral resources. Without at all approaching the dangers of an anti-climax, the chorus, "Unfold, ye everlasting gates," in which the voices are occasionally duplicated, supplies a fitting termination to the scene at the Ascension.

Although, as might be expected from the foregoing remarks, it contains no fugue, and is planned in the simplest style, it immediately claims serious attention by the boldness of its declamatory phrases, and the richness of its scoring. The consolidation of the Apostolic college being now complete, Part III. shows its expectant members in the upper room awaiting the promised visitation. A pastoral chorus, didactic in nature, ushers in this sub-division. It is to be regretted that a little alteration in the formulation of the vocal parts had not been made so as to accommodate different words for "Ah quils sont beaux, sur la montagne," instead of "Lovely appear over the mountains." However, the coincidence of rhythmical and musical accent coming here upon the penultimate preclude the employment of the better known and much more suitable lines. The accompaniment to this appears to be a model, in that it judiciously supports the voices without abstracting a single iota of interest indisputably belonging to the several melodic phrases given to each. To this is attached a second soprano solo, "Over the barren waters," the initiatory chorus being again employed at its completion. A short instrumental number is preparatory to the narration by the bass voice of the descent of the Holy Ghost, upon which musical treatment Gounod also seems to have given scrupulous care and attention. Here, again, there is no sign of overscoring, and the only departure from simplicity is the occurrence twice of a sequence of chromatic sixths upon a pedal bass, the voice having also phrases built upon one note only. A vigorous duet next succeeding supplies the sequel. "At once the Spirit came upon them." A valedictory solo for soprano conveys the Divine imprimatur upon their mission, "Go ye forth on your way," and the last number extended so as to employ occasionally the solo quartet, "The Word is flesh become," brings the oratorio to a close.

THREE STARS.*

Three stars there are that ever shine
So brightly and so clear;
They shed o'er all a light divine,
Life's rugged path to cheer.

The first is Faith, a glorious star,
That with its radiance bright
Fills old and young both near and far
With an undying light.

The next is Hope, whose brightest rays
Are seen 'midst grief and pain,
Assuring us that happier days
Will soon return again.

With Faith and Hope, the Star of Love
To all on earth is given,
By Him who rules us from above,
To draw us near to Heaven.

DRESDEN.—During the recent visit of the German Emperor, Ignaz Brüll's Goldenes Kreuz, a favourite opera with his Majesty, was given at the Theatre Royal, with Mdlle Malten and Erl in the two leading characters. There was, also, a Court Concert.

LYONS.—A phenomenal tenor named Desflages has been discovered in a smithy, and the Municipal Council have voted 1,200 francs to enable him to enter the Conservatory. ("Phenomenal" as usual!—DR BLIGE.)

STATISTICS.—The following is a list of the monthly salaries of the artists at the Paris Opéra-Comique:—Talazac, 6,000 francs; Isaac, 5,000; Van Zandt, 5,000; Nicot-Bilbaut, 4,500; Nicot, 3,000; Stéphane, 3,000; Taskin, 2,500; Bertin, 2,500; Herbert, 2,500; Fugère, 2,200; Mouliérat, 1,000; Merguillier, 1,000; Cobalet, 1,000.

CHERUBINI.

Cherubini thanked Méhul by dedicating his score to him in the following terms:—

CHERUBINI TO MÉHUL.

Receive, my friend, from the hands of Friendship the homage she delights in paying to a distinguished artist. Your name placed at the head of this work will lend it a merit it did not possess, namely, that of appearing worthy of being dedicated to you, and this will serve it as a support; may the union of our two names everywhere attest the tender sentiments which bind us to each other and the respect I entertain for real talent.

CHERUBINI.

This noble score of Médée, though certainly its style now appears to have grown somewhat antiquated, and though it is sometimes disfigured by instances of excessive length, is written in superb musical language, and contains pieces of exquisite beauty. Its greatest defect, inherent to the subject which inspired it, is a certain monotony, a sort of too persistent majestuousness, occasioning in the long run downright fatigue. But, on the other hand, to what splendid pages we can point in the grandiose and powerful work, with its severe lines and its accent full of pride! In the first act the delicious introduction sung by the women: "Quoi! lorsque tout s'empresse," the chorus: "Tendre hymen," and Medea's expressive and touching air: "Vous voyez de votre fils la mère infortunée"; in the second, the fine quartet: "Ah! du moins à Médée accordez un asile," and a superb finale; and, lastly, in the third act, Medea's wild air: "Eh quoi! je suis Médée et je les laisse vivre!"—all these pieces are full of grandeur, nobleness, and poetry, and were calculated to excite the admiration of audiences then little accustomed to a style so virile and so pathetic.*

Mdme Scio, as I have said, was far from having no share in the brilliant success of Médée, in which she proved herself to be as remarkable a tragic actress as she was a vocalist full of fire and passion. The dialogue of Médée was written in verse, frequently well turned and finely sonorous, and she distinguished herself particularly, it seems, by the manner in which she delivered it. "Not only," said a critic, in connection with this point, "was she a great singer, but she gave her lines like a skilful tragic actress." She was truly admirable in the part, which set the seal upon her reputation, and all Paris flocked to the Théâtre Feydeau to see her in a work in which she was successively touching and impassioned, harrowing and arrogant, wild and timid, to a degree that defies description. It was in this character that she inspired one of her admirers to write the following verses:—

"O toi, de qui les chants pénètrent tous les cœurs,
Étonnante Scio, reçois ce pur hommage;
C'est le seul convenable aux attraits enchanteurs
Dont tu sais chaque jour embellir chaque ouvrage.
Médée obtient par tes accents
L'intérêt que l'on doit aux larmes d'une mère;
Ses forfaits sont par toi rendus attendrissants,
Et son art, à nos yeux, est le seul art de plaire.
Suis dans ton vol hardi
La noble et brillante carrière
De Sainval, de Saint-Huberty;†
Tu nous seras toujours plus chère.
À qui sait réunir des charmes si flatteurs
On doit une double couronne;
Euterpe et Melpomène en tressèrent les fleurs
Et l'amour des talens en leur nom te les donne."‡

* Being at Rome in 1813, and writing thence to a friend, Anson, a violinist in Paris, at the time that Medée et Jason, a bad work by Fontenelle, had just been performed at the Opera, Herold says: "I have read in the papers the sorry success of the new Médée, whom I consider very audacious to come and show herself, when she knows she has an elder sister, the very remembrance of whom is sufficient utterly to confound her." We see how highly Herold esteemed Cherubini's Médée.

† Mdlle Sainval was one of the best actresses of the Comédie-Française; as for Mdme Saint-Huberty, the inspired interpretress of Gluck, she was, as we know, the glory and honour of the Opera.

‡ Babault's Annales dramatiques.

The great success of Médée was, according to the custom in those days, consecrated by parody. On the 27th March, 1797, the management of the Théâtre de la Cité-Variétés produced for the first time La Sorcière, "a one-act parody, with vaudevilles (songs), of Médée." It was written by Sewrin

VIII.

Cherubini's health at this period was delicate. The fatigue he had to undergo in bringing out Médée compelled him to take a little repose. For this purpose he thought it advisable to leave Paris and seek refuge once more with his good friends the Louis, at La Chartreuse de Gaillon. Thither he proceeded in the latter part of April, 1797, and it was thence that, on the 9th Floréal Year V (28th April), he sent his wife, who had remained in Paris, the following letter, which shows what tenderness he felt for those connected with him, what sincere affection he entertained for his friends, Méhul among the number, and how little the Cherubini here revealed resembles the harsh, insensible, and cold portrait which some of his biographers have left us of him :§

"Gaillon, the 9th Floréal.

"I have at length received a letter from you, my darling, and hope to receive another to-morrow. I thank you for the pleasure you have procured me, for it is a pleasure to hear about you and my little Cocotte.‖ Pretty dear ! So, she often asks for me, does she ? Kiss her well for me, as I cannot have the satisfaction of kissing her myself. It is horrible weather here ; nothing but wind and rain. This is exceedingly annoying, for I wanted very much to go out walking. This arises perhaps from the fact that I walked five leagues at first going off, and the rest I have had since this prank does not suit me. I have not as good an appetite as the first day I came. However, I shall go out to-day after dinner,¶ for the weather is not so bad as it was. Not having Madame Angot to amuse me, I pass my life in eating and sleeping, for we go to bed at half-past ten. We have a little music and play the remainder of the time ; occasionally we have billiards and harmless games in the evening.

"I am delighted that you, also, are amused. You are very lucky to be able to go to the first performance of Méhul's piece.†† I shall look forward anxiously for the news of his success. If he achieves such a success as I hope he will and as the work deserves, he will have a great one. The only thing that annoys me is not being able to be present at his good fortune so that I may share it with him and be the first to tell him what gratification it affords me. But I shall have one delight the more on my return, in hearing my friend's new work after having previously been informed of its success. Remember me kindly to him as well as to his Aunt. Tell him I expect an answer to the letter I wrote him. Greet everyone for me. I am glad to learn that dear Minette has come to keep you company during my absence. Try and make her stay as long as you can. Adieu. Give my dear Victorine, who writes like a little angel, a thousand kisses for me. All the ladies here desire their kind regards ; they wish you had been with me, but that will be some other time. Good bye, my darling ; with very best love I remain your affectionate husband and friend, "CHERUBINI."

"When you see M. Sageret,‡‡ thank him for thinking of me and give him my compliments. Ask him how they are getting on with the design for the title of the score of Médée. Just add I hope he will make what haste he can so that it may be ready as soon as possible. Ask him when the concert will be given, and beg him not to forget Médée, but to have it played at least twice a decade."

DESSAU.—The first day of the fourth Anhalt Musical Festival was devoted to Schneider's oratorio, Das Weltgericht. On the second there was a vocal and instrumental concert—the whole was under the direction of Thiele, Ducal Capellmeister.

and performed by Dumont, Frédérik, Brunet, Mdmes Brunet, Desarnaud, and Julie. Annexed are the final lines ; they are very bad, but flattering for the authors of Médée:

"Auteurs de l'ouvrage charmant
Qu'aujourd'hui tout Paris admire,
Pardonnez si pour un moment
Chez vous nous cherchons de quoi rire.
Nous célébrerons en tout temps
Le vrai mérite, le génie :
L'on peut rendre hommage aux talens
Sans exclure la parodie."

§ Before them all, Berlioz.—DE BILLE.

‖ "Ma petit Cocotte" (sic).

 It was the period of the immense success of Madame Angot, at the Ambigu, in 1796.

†† The piece in question was Jeune Henri, produced on the 1st May at the Théâtre Favart.

‡‡ Sageret was then manager of the Théâtre Feydeau.

SCRAPS FROM PARIS.

The theatres which closed after the summer season have, one by one, re-opened their doors. At the Grand Opera, Françoise de Rimini, withdrawn for a short period in consequence of the absence of certain artists, has cropped up again in the bills with the original cast, except that Mdlle Rosita Mauri, being indisposed, is temporarily replaced by Mdlle Subra in the ballet. Another principal fact of interest is the promised production early next year of M. Saint-Saëns' Henry VIII., with Mdlles Gabrielle Krauss, Richard, MM. Lassalle and Sellier in the principal characters. Meanwhile the "business" is good. Even during the month of August the nightly receipts averaged between 18,000 and 20,000 francs.—Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet was played for the 195th time on the occasion of Maurel's last appearance previous to his holiday. Mdlle Griswold, who, by the bye, as well as Mdlles Anna de Bolocca and Fouquet, has been engaged by Sig. Vianesi for the Italian season at Nice, was Ophélia. Mdme Marcella Sembrich occupied a private box and followed the performance with unflagging attention. She will sing the part at the Teatro Real, Madrid, and came to Paris for the express purpose of studying it with the composer himself. She left for the Spanish capital on the 29th ult.—The 360th representation of Ch. Gounod's Faust inaugurated the resumption of the non-subscription nights.

The new season at the Opéra-Comique was inaugurated by Le Pré-aux-Clercs, preceded by Le Châlet. Then came Les Contes d'Hoffman. Roméo et Juliette, also, and Philémon et Baucis, have re-appeared in the bills, Ch. Gounod himself, fresh from Birmingham, being present at the rehearsal of the former work. Mdlle Isaac was Juliette, MM. Talazac, Belhomme, Mouliérat, and Barré, Roméo, Frére Laurent, Tybalt, and Mercutio, respectively. Mdlle Pierron, who, together with two other prize-winners at the Conservatory, Mdlle Rémy and M. Labis, has been engaged by M. Carvalho, made her début as the Page, Stephano, a part formerly sustained by Mdme Engally. MM. Belhomme and Mouliérat replaced MM. Giraudet and Furst. The latter is no longer a member of the company, having left to try his fortune in grand opera. The barytone Dufriche is likewise a seceder. The cast of Philémon et Baucis included Mdlle Merguillier, Baucis; Nicot, Philémon; Taskin, Jupiter ; and Belhomme, Vulcan. Merguillier had on a previous evening sang for the first time as Catarina in Les Diamants de la Couronne, and, despite considerable nervousness, was indulgently received. Mdme Bilbaut-Vauchelet is rapidly approaching convalescence, and will be able in about a fortnight to resume the part of Benjamin in Méhul's Joseph.—Report speaks highly of a tenore robusto, Lescoutras by name, discovered by Carvalho, at Bordeaux, on his return from Vichy, and immediately engaged, but when the lucky Lescoutras, who is just finishing his twenty-eight days as a "réserviste," will make his first appearance at the Salle Favart is yet unknown. Mdlle Marie Vanzandt has been back about a fortnight, and is busy studying her part in Léo Delibes' Lakmé, which will probably be the first novelty, to be succeeded by M. Ferdinand Poise's Carmosine and M. J. Massenet's Manon, not forgetting a one-act trifle, Le Fermier de Franconville, by Félicien David, the overture to which has just been found, completely finished and ready for the orchestra.

La Fille de Madame Angot is the present attraction at the Folies-Dramatiques, having been performed there for the 745th time on the 16th ult. Ch. Lecocq was in front the first night, and after the first act went behind the scenes. In the matter of novelties, the public are promised at the Renaissance a work, on a Spanish subject, by M. Emile Jonas, Johann Strauss' Joyeuse Guerre (Lustiger Krieg), and a posthumous comic opera, temporarily entitled La Tabatière, of Albert Grisar's; at the Bouffes-Parisiens, Gillette de Narbonne, by M. Edmond Audran, and La Fée aux Perles, by M. Olivier Métra ; at the Folies-Dramatiques, Fanfan la Tulipe, by M. Louis Varney, La Princesse des Canaries, by M. Ch. Lecocq, and François les Bas bleus, by M. Firmin Bernicat ; at the Nouveautés-Brasseur, Le Cœur et la Main, by Lecocq.

Marie Sass's School of Singing was inaugurated on the 15th September.—Some time ago Government commissioned the sculptor Matabon to execute a bust of Félicien David for the Opéra-Comique ; he is now ordered to furnish a copy for the Institute.—Faure spent a few days here lately, accompanied by his son, a law student.—Alice Bilbaut, younger sister of Mdme Bilbaut-Vauchelet-Nicot, has married M. Labis, who is engaged by Carvalho.—Denizot has become the new manager of the Fantaisies-Parisiennes.—The Eden-Théâtre is to be opened on the 1st December.—Referring to the late lamented Edmond Membrée, the Ménestrel of the 17th September says :—

An event, as unexpected as it was sad, has happened this week and carried consternation into the world of music. In the country, on the estate of M. Glandaz, at Domont, in the midst of his family, even while he was at table and opposite his friend Jacque, the painter, Edmond Membrée, author of the Esclave, and of many charming melodies, was suddenly struck down by death. He was only 62, and leaves a young wife with two young daughters plunged in profound grief.

Born at Valenciennes on the 14th November, 1820, Edmond Membrée began to study music in his native town. His natural taste for it, aided by hard work, attracted the attention of his fellow townsmen, and he was sent to the Paris Conservatory, with a modest but useful allowance granted him by the Municipality. After completing his studies under the direction of Zimmermann and Ch. V. Alkan, for the piano, of Dourlen for harmony, and of Carafa for composition, he sought in teaching resources which might enable him to find leisure for composition. His first essays were successful, and his interesting vocal melodies displaying a taste new for France, and the elevated style which constituted the glory of Schubert, could not fail to attract the attention of artists. They were, moreover, fortunate enough to please the public, thanks, doubtless, to the admirable manner in which the celebrated tenor, Gustave Roger, delighted to render them. The first melody of Membrée's which was especially remarked was not, as is generally supposed, his grand scene, which became so popular, of "Page, Ecuyer, Capitaine." Before this was published, Roger, fond of making the public acquainted with new composers, had interpreted with as much talent as success the ballad of "Ondine et le Pêcheur" written by Membrée to Schiller's ballad poetically translated by Henry de Latouche. This was the first gem in the melodic crown of him who gave us the opera of L'Esclave, performed with genuine success on the boards of the Ventadour — when our National Academy of Music was compelled to transport its Penates thither in consequence of the burning of the house in the Rue Le Peletier. We know that Lassalle and Mdlle Mauduit especially reaped a plentiful harvest of legitimate applause in this score, which was, we must confess, followed by two others far less fortunate, Les Parias and La Courte Échelle. Edmond Membrée's first lyric essay was produced in 1857 at the Grand Opera, where he succeeded in getting the management to accept and perform François Villon, a work in one act, of which his friend Got, of the Théâtre-Français, wrote the book. With reference to the latter theatre, I must mention the stage-music and the choruses written by Membrée for the Œdipe Roi of Jules Lacroix, which was recently revived there. Among other dramatico-lyric works not yet brought out, Edmond Membrée has left in his portfolio a score written on Mérimée's Colomba, and a grand five-act opera, Freyghor, poem by MM. Foussier and Got, assisted by M. Jules Barbier. This work, to judge from what is said by those who know it, is Edmond Membrée's crowning work—the work destined to mark his definite place on the stage.

As regards drawing-room music, Edmond Membrée not only published a volume of melodies which has placed his name high in the speciality of the French Lied, but he wrote several trios for violin, violoncello, and piano, dedicated to his friend Edouard Lalo, which obtained for him the Chartier Prize, in 1873. MM. Armaingaud and Jacquard very frequently performed with the author these "genre" trios, entitled Aux champs and A la ville.

Snatched away so prematurely from musical art and his family, this fertile producer was conveyed last Wednesday, by numerous and devoted friends, to his last resting-place. Two addresses were delivered at his tomb; one by M. Ludovic Halévy in the name of the Society of Dramatic Authors, and another by M. Victorin Joncières, representing the Society of Musical Composers.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—To commemorate the centenary of laying the foundation-stone of the "Curhaus," a vocal and instrumental concert, under the direction of Brennung, was given in that building. Among the solo performers was Emile Sauret, the violinist.

AGRAM.—Wilhelm Müller, composer, and formerly conductor at the Nationaltheater, has died here, aged eighty-two. His father was Wenzel Müller, once so popular in Vienna, composer and conductor at the Leopoldstadttheater in that capital. (Wenzel used familiarly to be styled "the People's Composer."—Dt Bllgt.)

THE SONG OF THE SUNBEAM.

Over the meadows I glide along,
Up from the depths of the azure blue,
Waking the lark with his matin song
To plume his wing in the morning dew;
And pausing to kiss a maiden's cheek
That is pale with thoughts of what may be,
I hasten away o'er the mountain peak
To brighten the path of her love at sea.

Merrily dancing, gliding along,
To the joyous trill of the feathered throng,
And roving the woodlands through and through,
I sprinkle with gems the morning dew.

Into the city I gladly stray
As the bells ring out a merry peal,
And down where the ragged children play,
Through their crowded courts I love to steal.
I tell them of flowers, and fields, and streams,
That I touch with gold as I pass along,
Till they seem to hear in their childish dreams
The voice of the lark in his matin song.

Merrily dancing, gliding along,
To the joyous trill of the feathered throng,
And roving the woodlands through and through,
I sprinkle with gems the morning dew.

THE KENNEDYS IN DUNDEE.

It cannot surely be necessary nowadays to dilate upon the qualities of the Kennedy entertainments. Time has been when it was advisable, and perhaps needful, for the reviewer to touch upon their salient points, that public taste might the better appreciate the new, the stronger, and the purer light which Mr Kennedy's native genius casts upon the poetry and music of Scotland. In a similar line Wilson and Templeton had been educating the public, greatly delighting the ear, the one with his pleasant tone and neat mechanical expression, the other with his manly voice and graceful mannerisms; but both were singers more than interpreters. Kennedy, following, hit a deeper vein. He grappled with the heart of his songs, felt with the poet, and with vocal ability as highly cultured as that of his predecessors struck at the emotions of his audience, causing his hearers to forget the artist in the faithful pictures which, with artless art, he drew of national life and character. Herein lies Kennedy's greatness—in subordinating the music he sings to the expression of human feeling, and thereby, as an inevitable consequence, touching the hearts of his auditors. Whoever has listened to Mr Kennedy without discovering this secret does not yet know what is the highest mission to which a vocal artist can aspire. There cannot be many such among Scotchmen at least, and as Scotchmen are to be found everywhere, so Mr Kennedy, with his family, have been everywhere singing to them of their native mountains and glens, and streams and flowers, and cottages and shielings, of their loves and their quarrels, their merry-makings and their deadly wars, until the world, which has been his audience, has learned to acknowledge him as King of Scottish Song.—Dundee Advertiser.

VIENNA.—Der Kleine Prinz, a new buffo opera, music by Adolf Müller, the younger, book by Julius Rosen, is to be produced at the Theater an der Wien.

Vianesi (late conductor at the Royal Italian Opera) is in Paris. There is a talk of his engaging Galli-Marié for four appearances in Carmen and Mignon, during the Italian season at Nice.

Sarasate, the Spanish violinist, has been playing at concerts in Tudela and Pampeluna for charitable purposes. During this month and the first half of the next he will give twenty concerts in Galicia and Asturia. He is accompanied on the tour by the Spanish pianist, José Tragó, who, like himself, received his musical education in Paris.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

On the re-opening, on Saturday, September 23rd, 1882, of the Royal Academy of Music, Professor Macfarren (the Principal) delivered his annual address to the Students. Among the Professors present were Messrs H. C. Banister, G. Benson, F. R. Cox, W. H. Cummings, H. R. Eyers, W. H. Holmes, F. B. Jewson, Walter Macfarren, A. O'Leary, Brinley Richards, A. Schloesser, and Mr Harold Thomas. Mr John Gill, the Secretary, was also present.

Professor Macfarren, in greeting the Professors and Pupils on the opening of the sixty-first year of the Institution's work, said: Times past must be regarded as a mirror, in which we shall see at least the hopes of the future. Let me speak to you, Professors, many of whom, having gained your musicianship by the studies you have pursued in this Academy, reflect great honour upon the past. Many others, who have not been Students here, who are kind enough to give us the benefit of your experience in the training of the Pupils, still are stimulated in your endeavours by the remembrance of important things effected here, and with a determination that the time to come shall compare with honour and with advantage with the time that has gone by. Let me speak of the many former Students of the Academy who have passed away from the world, and have left the reputation of their doings and of the honours they have brought to the Institution—those who have been excellent performers; and those others who are still among us in the works they wrote. Let me speak to you, Students, who return to your work, of the interest which you prove in the tasks before you from this very fact of your return; the courage you show, though in some instances you have not as yet accomplished the success at which you aim, proves that you are willing to persevere, and intend from future fortune to accomplish what as yet remains to be done, but what is by no means beyond trustful expectation. Let me speak to you, new-comers, whom I meet here for the first time, and urge you to feel all the confidence you may from the example of your elders in the Institution, from those who preceded them, and from the fact that musical history has run side by side with the Academy's progress for sixty years, and that many of the most important things which have been effected in the course of the Art's development have emanated from this Institution; that you are members of the working body, and that upon you rests the responsibility to hold up the Academy's honour and to raise the importance of Music in England.

I hope to enhance the interest you have all evinced in the tasks you have before you, by offering to you a rapid and very concise glance at the history of the Art we study. Incomplete it must be from the limit of time in which there will be to tell a long story; incomplete it will be from the inability of him who has to tell it; but it will at least show you that there is so much matter in the subject as to prompt you to make further inquiry into it, and many particulars that stand out more conspicuously than others and may help you to a general knowledge of how music has grown into what we now know it.

The earliest cultivation of music seems to have been by the Chaldeans, Babylonians, and Assyrians, and from them to have proceeded to Egypt and thence to Greece. It is curious to know that while savage nations have all some kind of music, with these civilized peoples of remote times, it seems to have been more a subject of calculation than of impulse and impressionability. Music and astronomy were regarded as kindred. The different effects of music were assimilated to astronomical phenomena, and for long and long the attention of musicians was spent in the reckoning of mathematical niceties of intonations, and their ideas of what we call musical beauty seem to have been little in accord with the impression entertained by persons of modern times, which date back already several hundred years from the present moment. So in the earliest ages was perceived a phenomenon that is worth the attention of all musicians now and of any future period—the distinction of the perfect intervals from those which may be major or minor, and augmented or diminished, all of which, distinguished from the perfect, are flexible. In Egypt, the year is divided into three seasons, instead of into four as in the north and west—the inundation of the Nile beginning in July, seed time in November, and reaping in March; and there of old the interval of the fourth was symbolical of Winter, the interval of the fifth, of Autumn, and the interval of the eighth, of Summer. Again, as to the scientific regard of music, what was the equivalent to the key-note of our consideration was not at the bottom of the musical scale, as with us, but in the centre; the sun was then supposed to move about the earth, and to be the principal of the planets pursuing this orbit; so was the key-note of the planetary scale, having above it three notes and below it three notes—for the lyre of the period owned but seven strings; and comparing with the stars, there were on the one side of the central, Sun, Mercury, Venus, and the Moon, and on the other, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn. Saturn, being the remotest from the Earth, was represented by the longest string; the Moon being nearest to the Earth, by the shortest. It is a curious mistake of some persons who have discussed antique music, to say that the Greeks, and the Egyptians before them, reversed our sense of high and low in sound. The longest string was of course the highest, and represented the deepest sound; the shortest was of course the lowest string, and represented the highest sound; and thus their sense of high and low in pitch was precisely the same as ours. If you look to the strings of a pianoforte or harp you observe the same regulation of shorter and longer—the terms having then been applied to the length of string by which we define the acuteness or gravity of sound. Among the Greeks still this study of perfect intervals was made a matter of great nicety, and there is a story related of Pythagoras, who was one of the first to introduce from Egypt into his own country the most important branches of learning—a story which was repeated for hundreds of years, and which, impossible as it is, nevertheless has gained repeated and repeated hearing, and repeated credence—the story that he observed the difference of the fifth and the fourth, and measured their ratios in consequence of hearing smiths at an anvil, beating with hammers of different weights, and thus producing the different sounds. Now, I think it is within every one's range of observation that the sound produced from any resonate body, whether it be a string or a plate, depends on the intonation of that string or plate, and not on the weight of the instrument that is used to play upon it. If you strike the pianoforte string with a hammer of any more or less lightness, and with any more or less force, it will give the same note so long as the string is at the same tension; nay, if you struck it with a sledge-hammer, if it sounded and did not break under your blow, it would produce the same note. And so it is utterly fabulous that Pythagoras, or any one could have noted the difference of the fifth and the fourth, from the striking the metal of an anvil by different weighted hammers, or with a different amount of force by several smiths engaged in the task. Curiously, not only this story has been repeated from the classic to the mediæval, and thence to our own times, but even it has been plagiarized in a story of more recent date. It is related of Handel that when he lived in the little village of Stanmore, up the Edgware Road, he listened to smiths at work at their anvil, and from the effects of their different productions of notes by the weight of their hammers, observed a melody upon which he constructed variations, and named his piece "The Harmonious Blacksmith." He did nothing of the kind, and could have done nothing of the kind, any more than Pythagoras so many hundreds of years before him. The various heat of a bar of iron, according to the various exposure of its different parts to the fire, may induce a slightly different pitch in sounds produced from these several parts, but this is wholly independent of the ponderosity of the blows. These are examples of the readiness of hearers to swallow, if not digest, any curious stories that may be offered to their notice; but they should be warnings to us not to be too ready to believe everything stated.

We cannot trace where the ancient Greek system of music ceased, and when modern music began. Doubtless there must have been an overlapping of the one or the other, and both must, to some extent, have been practised at once, as was the case with the Heathen religion and the Christian. The first records that appear of a distinct method of music from that which prevailed among the classics belong to the end of the fourth century, and refer to St Ambrose, who was Bishop of Milan. We are told that he organized certain musical scales, and required that music in his episcopate should be framed upon those scales. This appears to be one of the many errors of imperfect investigation. St Ambrose did certainly organize the orders of the prayers, the ritual, and the musical arrangements of the Cathedral of Milan; but these musical arrangements consisted of the adoption of the Hebrew practice of singing psalms alternately by one side and the other side of the choir, instead of by all the voices together, and had nothing to do with the choice of melody to which these psalms were to be sung. It is ascribed to St Ambrose that he composed the "Te Deum," and, because the word "composed" is somewhat vaguely employed, it has been suggested that he made music for that grand hymn. He selected, and, of some passages, wrote the text, but certainly he did not supply the music, though such and such forms, having had long prevalence in the early Church of Milan, go by the name of the "Use of St Ambrose." The term refers not merely to his period, but to the Musical Use of that diocese for long subsequent.

It was in the fifth century that a Roman philosopher, Boethius, framed a code of musical regulations professedly upon the principles of his Greek predecessors, and his name is very conspicuous in musical history, because his work on the subject was studied by all musicians throughout the entire of the middle ages. In our Universities it was the text-book by which all musicians were proved; and this is to be accounted for from the fact that the Latin tongue in which it was written was more generally understood than Greek, and the book was supposed to be a faithful representation of the Greek principles. Such is, indeed, not the case. There are many highly important things that he has totally misrepresented, one of which is the fact to which allusion was now made, of mistaking the highest string for the highest note, whereas the longer the string the lower the note; and another is in the division of the scale itself. We are accustomed at large to speak of tones and semitones, as if those two terms comprehended equal divisions; but there are major and minor tones, and those who have listened with nice ears and careful discrimination to a performance of the musical scale have again and again observed that the interval between the key-note and the second is a slightly larger degree than that between the second and the third of the key, these being the major and the minor tone. Now Pythagoras arranged in his plan of the musical scale that these two tones should be equal, and so reduced the interval between the third and the fourth of the scale to something less than what we term a semitone. Hence the interval of the major third was then accounted a discord, because it was larger or sharper than the major third of nature. It was not till the time of Claudius Ptolemy, who gave his name to the Ptolemaic system of Astronomy, that it was clearly defined there should be this arrangement of a smaller tone between the second and third, and a larger tone between the first and second, the difference being in the proportions of eight to nine, and nine to ten. Boethius reversed this arrangement, which all subsequent science has tended to confirm. Boethius was a philosopher, Boethius was a statesman. He had enemies in the State who accused him of treason and wrought his downfall, and he was publicly beheaded. One must always regret the untimely end of notable or historic personages, but if that was to be his fate—if the Roman Emperor of the time did listen to these false accusations—we can only regret that the event did not happen before Boethius wrote his volume on music.

The next person of note is the famous Saint Gregory the Great, who came into office at the end of the sixth century, and who gives his name to the Use that prevailed in Rome, and so instead of saying Roman Use, it is common to say Gregorian Use; and there is ascribed to him the selection and arrangement and regulation of musical models. The Greek practice of employing the letters of the alphabet to represent musical sounds had entirely passed into disuse, and there is no trace of any other system of notation having been yet devised. Saint Isidore of Seville was an intimate friend of Gregory; he lived until a very long time after Gregory's death, and there is an extant statement of his, to the effect that except those melodies be retained in the memory they cannot exist, for there is no means of writing them. So you will see how totally false is the ascription of any particular melodies that are treasured in the Church to Saint Gregory himself, since there is no means but memory—which varies from person to person, and age to age—by which these melodies could have been traditionally followed, and they belong to a period far later than his, the term "Gregorian Use" meaning the "Use of Rome." A fallacy may now be dispelled which has had general prevalence in historic accounts of the course of music, and this is the high respect that is supposed to be due to a monk of Arezzo, Guido—such high respect, that lately a monument in that town has been erected in his honour. It is said that Guido invented the staff and the musical notation upon it. It is said that he taught the use of the red coloured line to denote the sound we call F, and the saffron line to denote the sound called "C." It is said he was the first to employ the initial syllables of six lines of a hymn to St. John the Baptist, as the names of musical notes, "ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la." All these things are untrue. In his own treatise, "Micrologos," the things he does mention he speaks of as established things, and not by any means as things of his own framing. The staff which he described had the syllables of the text inserted in higher or lower spaces between lines, to indicate the higher or lower sounds to which they were to be sung, but this staff had nothing written on the lines themselves. Guido is known to have been alive in the year 1067. There is a book extant which belongs to Winchester Cathedral—a service book—comprising a prayer for King Ethelred and the English people, set to musical notes, which notes are written on a staff of four lines (some on lines and some in spaces), and King Ethelred died in the year 1016. It is quite obvious then that in this country of England music was in a very far higher state of advancement all those fifty-one years, before we know Guido to have been alive and active, than it was in that part of Italy in which he collected the particulars stated in his own dissertation on music. Thus he is not the great musical pioneer he is supposed to be, and music was in a higher state in the north than in that country famous for musical aptitude among the people, and musical scholarship among the learned, which lies in the south of Europe. It is to note that in many other particulars, music advanced in England earlier than it did in other regions. At the end of the twelfth century, Tinctor, a Fleming, who founded the first musical academy known, the Conservatorio of Naples, writing of the new art of counterpoint, says this is practised in England with greater success than elsewhere, and specially has been defined by John of Dunstable in more clear terms than by other theorists. Again, in the early days of the thirteenth century, shortly after the period of this John of Dunstable, even while he still lived, we find counterpointed compositions in this country of an elaborate nature; often has been quoted of late a round or canon, truly a six-men's song, dating prior to 1240. It is gratifying to find that the persons who repeatedly bring this instance into notice have spent time in the quest of such erudition; it would be more gratifying and far more useful if the same persons spent equal pains in ascertaining the musical history of our own day, rather than in propagating views that are apt to mislead hearers who have not means at hand to refute them.

There has lately been deposited in the British Museum some manuscript music bearing date 1260, which is in counterpoint of sometimes two, sometimes three parts, and there has been no composition in harmony traced to any other country of so early a period. Thus it is found that not only had our forefathers writers among them to theorize on the uses of counterpoint, but to practice them when other countries had not yet so far advanced.

It seems to have been at the beginning of the sixteenth century—from 1500 onwards—that musical erudition was turned to secular subjects. Hitherto music had been practised among the people without tuition, or without known principles, and all learning on this, as on other subjects, had been confined to the Church, and as Italy was the centre of the Christian Church of the period, so music was drawn towards Rome. It was at the beginning of the sixteenth century that musical scholarship began to be applied to secular use, and in the madrigals which were then first written we find exemplifications of the same rules which previously had been applied only in sacred works. We find that the secular music of that period was written on the same principles as ecclesiastical music. Such likewise has been the case throughout the whole career of the social music of the people—the concert music of public performances, and the ecclesiastical music which was written specially for the sanctuary. Music may be more grave or gay, more plaintive or more bright, according to the subject to which it is applied, but the same technical principles for its construction have always prevailed coincidently for the Church and for the chamber, for the opera, theatre, and for the oratorio. Antiquaries have thus far been unable to trace the origin or meaning of the word madrigal, and have shown only that there were Spanish poems, so styled, to which the first musical compositions were set that are classed under the definition. At the same time, when scholars were constructing their elaborate pieces which took the name of madrigals, music of the same class was written in England, not so-called, but of which specimens are preserved in a collection that goes by the name of the Fayrefax Manuscripts, from a certain Dr. Fayrefax their collector, of the time of Henry VIII., which are for the most part pure in counterpoint, and are generally of a pastoral, but some of an amatory character, and these are quite equal in merit to the scholastic productions of other lands. The composers are little known to the present generation, but their names stand to their works, and their works are at least a monument to the curious of the ability of the writers who produced them.

Much is credited to the Roman school of musical composition, but it is very remarkable that this Roman school rose from the tuition given by Flemings in Rome to persons who went thither for the sake of their instruction. The first of those of note was Ockenheim of Hainault, who formed many renowned scholars. One of the chief of them was a composer who is known by the name of Josquin Després, or, in Latin, Josquinus. He was a singing boy in the cathedral of St Quentin, and his playmates converted his baptismal name of Josse into the pet form of Josquin, and by that name he is now generally known. He went to every court in Europe to practise his art. He dwelt long in Rome, and there disseminated his principles. It may enliven our story to repeat an anecdote of this said Josquin Després—that when in Paris, at the time of Louis XII., he very greatly wished to have some fixed appointment at the Court, and he found a nobleman who promised to befriend him and obtain for him such an engagement as he desired. From time to time he met his pretended patron, and from time to time he received no appointment, and whenever he applied to the said dispenser of favours for the promised post, my lord always met him with the Italian reply to his enquiry, "Lascia fare mi."

Josquin left him to do everything, but still nothing was done; and so he wrote a Mass, in which the principal musical subject consisted of the notes la, sol, fa, re, mi, and this was many times repeated in the course of the composition: the work was performed in the nobleman's presence, who felt the admonition; the words "lascia fare mi" were taken out of his mouth—he said them no more, but exerted himself successfully to obtain for the composer the post he desired.

Another important Fleming was Claude Goudimel. He is classed as a Fleming, though we find his birthplace is now in French territory. He was the first person who opened a school for music in Rome, and the famous Palestrina and another Fleming who went to Rome and who Italianized his name, Orlando di Lasso, with many more, were his pupils. The career of Goudimel was cut short in that terrible historical event, the massacre of St Bartholomew, he being in Lyons on the fatal night of the 24th August, 1572. He did great things for music; what more he might have done, but for the bigotry of the assassins, it is impossible to conceive.

An incident of this period may be said to have been the means of converting the ancient into the modern of music, or changing the strict of the former into the free of the present practice. This was the first employment of that very remarkable and distinguished harmony which we know as the chord of the dominant seventh. The first person in whose music as yet any trace of this chord has been found—employed in the free manner in which it is now used, without any preparation and with due resolution of its two discordant notes, the third and the seventh—was a Fleming (Jean Mouton), born in 1475. It has been customary to ascribe the invention of this chord to Claudio Monteverde, who lived a hundred years later; or let me rather say discovery than invention, for the notes of this beautiful harmony are combined by a natural law, the first perception of which laid open a great scientific fact to the world. It is the case with most of the chief facts in science that they have been simultaneously or almost co-incidentally discovered at about the same period by different persons; and at that age, when communication was not so rapid as at present, one cannot account for the wide discrepancy of a hundred years as representing so remote a period as it does in modern times; and though Mouton wrote his dominant seventh, it by no means follows that Monteverde knew his work, but this master may also have employed the chord without knowing of a precedent. His use of the chord elicited the most stringent blame from the censors of his day, and Artusi wrote a strong stricture upon the impropriety of employing this unprepared discord. Monteverde replied, and the polemics that passed between these two writers made famous the use of Monteverde; whereas his predecessor gave no larger publicity to his discovery than might accrue to it from the insertion of the chord in his music. For a long time to come it remained that whoever employed this chord of the dominant seventh and analagous harmonies, comprising higher discords than the seventh, did so only from the precedent of others, or in the brave self-reliance that enabled them to trust a good effect which as yet had no rule for its justification. Only consider for a moment, when we listen to the delightful sound of this now everyday, familiar musical combination, what must have been the impression of those who first heard it, and first distinguished it from the discords of previous use, which had the imperative necessity of preparation by the sounding of their discordant notes in the preceding harmony. It must have been as a revelation of a new principle which, in fact, was really the case.

But although these chords, the dominant seventh and its analagous harmonic kindred, were employed by musicians, the fact of their derivation was still unproved until, in this country, in the year 1676, two graduates of Oxford, one of Merton College and the other of Wadham, one named Noble and the other Piggott, not working together—another example of coincident discovery of the same phenomenon by different observers—found the wonderful fact that a string set in vibration will divide itself into several nodes, and that each node yields a harmonic sound, and that this series of harmonic sounds is the real occasion of the musical combination being so satisfactory to our ears, which is composed of harmonics only, and which has been described as this particular chord.

There is to speak of another great invention in which Monteverde was concerned, though he was not the man to whom its origination is due. You are aware, of course, of the revival of learning in Europe after its torpor in the middle ages, which was first promoted by Petrarch, and which introduced anew the literature and the sculpture of the classics into European knowledge. It was at the verge of the year 1600 that some noblemen in Florence surmised that the music, whose extraordinary effects were described by the persons who had witnessed them in Greece, and whose writings had now become patent to all modern Europe, must be capable of reproduction—that these wonderful effects must have resulted from the combination of music with words, and the higher declamation which could be given to a poetic text, with music as accessory, than when speaking was the sole medium of utterance. The complicated music of the schools, consisting of canonic or fugal imitations, where several voices would be singing different words at the same moment, could not be assumed to give just expression to the poetry, though, perhaps, presenting a general aspect of the sentiment. The ballad tunes of the people, neither, could be supposed to represent a continuous poem in which the sentiment would vary from stanza to stanza; whereas the same melody would be repeated again and again. These Florentine nobles conceived that a musical recitation might be formed in which the sense of the words, and the particular emphasis of special words, might be thrown into such prominence as would produce a higher effect than could proceed from speech. Among them was the father of Galileo, the notable astronomer, and he made one of the first essays of composition in this school, which, because it is a recitation of words for the sake of words, and for the sake of the expression they are to convey, goes by the name of recitativo or recitative, or speaking music. More important was it, that instead of indulging his own love of composition, he was the means of engaging two notable singers of his time—Peri and Caccini—to write vocal music to passionate verses, their calling having naturally qualified them to experimentalize in the new direction. The success of their tentative efforts induced Monteverde to apply his skill as a contrapuntist, and his strong insight into the resources of harmony, to a like task; and in 1607 he reproduced, in Mantua, an opera that was set almost throughout in the style now described. His musical renown and skill, more than the excellence of the work, established general acceptance of the principle, and so, in a twofold sense, he was a great musical innovator. His work may be said to be the pediment on which all modern music has been constructed.

Let us now glance from this origin of opera, dating from the year 1600, to note the last change through which that branch of music has passed, and how large a resource of pleasure it has been to hearers, how grand an exercise of imagination it has been to artists. Let us notice the rise of music in different nations, and you will find that opera had its first home in Italy. Then in France it was introduced by an Italian. Lulli was a Florentine, who was taken to France first in the capacity of page; but when he displayed his musical powers he deserted his menial occupation, and became the admired and respected of all the highest persons of that very artistic age and country.

Next, in course of time, came the composition of opera in England—I repeat, in England—where the forerunner of Handel and Bach, the great Purcell, lived and wrote. I say again, in England, in association with the forward march of music because we are too much aware of the general notion that this country is incapable of musical excellence; that we Englishmen and Englishwomen can pay for music, can perhaps enjoy it—though possibly we only affect to do so—but that we cannot perform or produce it. The several instances already named are, I trust, enough to show that there is nothing in our soil, or our climate, or our physical construction, which prevents Englishmen from rising to the highest in the attainment of this art; and from such a fact, I think we may all take courage to work our best, and to believe that if excellence is not in ourselves, whatever steps we take to approach it may afford an encouragement to others who are more fortunately gifted, and who will still be the country's honour, and prove us to be a musical nation (applause).

There is to speak of the branch of music which may be classed under the name of Symphony, and which comprises instrumental compositions whether for a full band—in that term of symphony is the technical word employed; or for a single instrument, when we call it sonata; or for a larger or smaller number of solo instruments, which we call trio, quartet, or the like; but which, whether for a more or less number of performers, still presents a certain arrangement of musical ideas—an arrangement built upon physical or, may I say, scientific principles—not the accidental current of one or another of even great men's thoughts, but a fabric that is constructed upon certain natural rules that spring from the harmonic system, to which we owe not only particular chords, but particular arrangements of keys. You will read through the sonatas or the compositions for instruments which may come under your studies, and under the direction of your professors you will trace in these a particular plan or design as obvious as may be traced in any of the beautiful productions of Nature, and in this respect Art may be assimilated to Nature. In fact, every great work of a true artist is framed upon a plan constructed with a design, and fulfils a principle; such principle you will trace in the dissection of a flower, in the anatomy of any animated being, and such principle of structure is to be found in a work of Art.

It is said that Haydn was the father of the symphony. Well, if that is to be admitted—and we will not for ever be disputing popular fallacies—we must then admit that Emanuel Bach was the grandfather of the symphony, because Haydn expressly stated on many an occasion that he based his views of musical plan upon the example of Emanuel Bach; and the particular arrangement of ideas and the juxtaposition of the keys that constitute the plan of one of these compositions of which we speak, was incipiently practised by composers long prior even to the time of Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, the grandfather, to whom in truth it had yet descended through a long line of musical ancestors. The fact that this very plan is, as I hope I have convinced you, framed on natural principles, with that of its slowly reaching to maturity, again exemplifies the truth that many explorers, successively or simultaneously, bring to light one scientific phenomenon. It is to con with gratitude the works the great masters in our art have left us to admire—with still higher gratitude the examples they have left us to study, whence we may learn how to pursue the same course which they successfully followed.

Let us think of the names of the greatest men who have practised this art of symphony—compositions for one or many instruments. Let us think of Haydn, let us think of Mozart; and let us compare those two men, who it is customary to suppose lived in the successive order in which I have named them. But I must beg you to remember that though Mozart was born many years after Haydn, he died eighteen years before him, and that Haydn produced his most famous and many of his most beautiful works even after the death of Mozart, and that though Mozart may have learned, and freely owned he did learn, from the example of Haydn, Haydn took back the lessons and learned greater from Mozart. Nothing more distinguishes the character, the greatness of Haydn, than the lovable modesty with which he deferred to the excellent genius of Mozart, and the pretty story is worth remembering that when Kozeluch, an inferior composer, but one of some merit still, being in company with Haydn, listening to the first performance of a composition by Mozart, observed, "That is an unheard-of progression; you and I should not have written such stuff." "No," said Haydn, "because you and I could not." After this comes the gigantic name of Beethoven, before which all musicians bend with reverence, and yet with pride. But, be it remembered, had not these men written before him, there could have been no Beethoven, and all his greatness has been based on the firm foundation which his predecessors laid; and be it remembered that many of the characteristics which are most especially ascribed to Beethoven are to be traced in the writings of Mozart.

It is too much the use nowadays to speak of Mozart as old-fashioned—to speak of Haydn as rococo. Oh, do believe there is endless youth, eternal spring, in the writings of those men, and that the more scrupulously we look into the beauties of their work, the more fit we are to understand what has been written since, and the more capable we are of enjoying it all.

Review of the symphony must not be dismissed without acknowledgment of the delight we have enjoyed and the lessons we have learned from the rich sweetness of Spohr, the glowing ardour of Mendelssohn, and the passionate yearning of Schumann, and with these men must be associated the ever young and always graceful Sterndale Bennett. Their noble art has living representatives; and when the future can make retrospect of the present, it will select musicians of our own time to class with those who have rendered the past undying.

Our story has advanced longer in time than I wished to have detained you, but I will allude to a matter which has engaged much attention in these last two decades. It is assumed by one class of students that science is usurping the place in general study of literature, and advocates of scientific discovery and of poetic pursuits are, so far as friendly relations may evidence, in hostile camps. It is unquestionable that these two pursuits of the human mind, Science and Art, each supplement the other—that the artist draws his materials from the accumulation of Science; that the scientist finds suggestions for his explorations in the works of Art. It is notable to us musicians that our pursuits must naturally comprise both these fields of activity for the mind. Instrumentalists exercise their mechanical powers and their anatomical functions in their performances; vocalists, still more, in the employment of the organs of respiration, exemplify in every note they utter some power in their physical organization. You may remember the interesting lectures given here by Dr Llewellyn Thomas on the use of the vocal organs, in which he proved to us that the singer's art is illustrated by the science of the physiologist. I believe—nay, I hope—that no player or singer thinks of the dissection of the human frame when he produces the sounds with which he delights his hearers. While, however, we think not of physical formations when exercising our musical functions, we know that our organs are in active employment, and that we are exemplifying natural facts in the application of these specialities to our musical productions. Composers know that the system of harmonies yield what has been adduced already as to the combination of notes in harmony and the succession of keys in the structure of musical plan, and all musicians must feel that the wonderful phenomena of acoustics, which are especially evidenced in music, display the immensity of creation in one of its grandest manifestations.

The ancient philosophers spoke of the music of the spheres. They compared music with astronomy, they spoke of stars as emblematical of notes. It is a fact, that every sound which is uttered, sets the air in vibration; that the quicker or slower vibrations of the air which are induced either by speech, singing, or by instrumental productions, are carried on in larger and larger circles. The planets rotate in their orbits by the same law that impels the air in waves of sound; they move in unbroken order; they return as faithful to their position as does a trembling string; and it is this strictly periodic movement which is in truth the point that separates musical sound from accidental noise. So much for the scientific relation of music, and now for the art's relation.

Let us think of the power the musician has to give to poetry a higher meaning than the words seem to convey, and still further, apart from all words, to produce a deeper effect on the feelings, by instrumental music, than speech can ever exercise. Then you will have a just right to believe in the high vocation you follow in pursuing the study of music. It is notable that an Englishman, Dr Edward Young, the predecessor of Sir Humphrey Davy in the professorship in the Royal Institution, was the first who discovered and enunciated the priciple that sound moves in waves, and it was the motion of the sound waves which first suggested the observation that we have waves of light, and that the motion of light, much more rapid than the motion of sound, is upon the same or an analagous principle. You hear the voice of the lark when he springs up to greet the daylight; the tiny bird is lost to your sight; the sunshine and sound of his song come to you as one—light and music united. That is the combination of science and art.

And now let us, when we recall the names of those great instrumentalists, and those great vocalists, who, though we can no longer witness their performances, have stamped their names on musical history—let us still more, when we listen to the compositions of those great men whose works are their monuments, of which the beauties are as integral in the music, and as obvious to our perception, as they were at the moment when the authors lived—let us exclaim as a painter did, when surrounded by great master-pieces of his art—let us exclaim, but with the same becoming humility, paraphrasing his expression, "I too am a musician."

Professor Macfarren resumed his seat, amid warm and repeated applause.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

In grand contrast with the beauty and tender emotion of the movement just past, the quartet which follows is full of fierce excited action. The words are dialogue except towards the end. They are with constant change of idea, though with frequent recurrence of the same; and in accordance with this the music, though with fantasia-like changefulness of key and idea, agrees in the general outline with the sonata form without a second part. First there is the entry of Pizarro with the cry "Thou diest!" followed by his fierce ravings to Florestan. His numberless different thoughts take the music into many different keys, but the thoughts are all included in the main idea of revenge, and so the keys are all enclosed within the main key (D) of the first subject.

Ex. 218.

Florestan's calm words, "A murderer stands before me," make the bridge between the first and second subjects, and bring the music to the key of A. Once more Pizarro recalls the degradation which he suffered in former years at the hands of Florestan, and with this the music of the first subject (Ex. 218) begins again, but in the new key of the second subject and differently developed (see Haydn's symphony in Part I., pp. 11, 12). Now he prepares to stab Florestan, but at that moment the music is stopped in its flow by an interrupted cadence (a), and Leonora rushes forward.

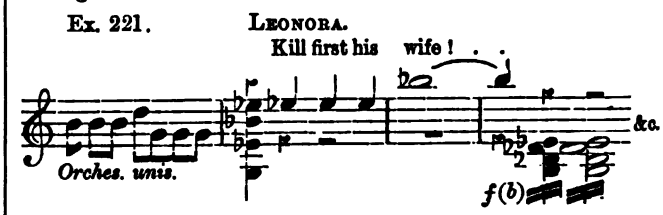
Ex. 219.

And then continues "Thou must first pierce through this breast." The main idea of the second subject now comes; Leonora has sworn death to him for his lust of murder.

Ex. 220.

It is in a new key, and is again worked in another, in alternation with the accompaniment of Pizarro's first idea (Ex. 218), and is carried on with ejaculations from the other singers up to a sudden stop, when Leonora again rushes in front of Florestan as a protecting shield.

Ex. 221.



This, with her declaration that she has sworn comfort to Florestan and ruin to Pizarro, and the astonished ejaculations of the others—for even Pizarro cannot help admiring her courage—forms the long preparation for the return of the first part. Following the last quotation is the long hovering on the chord of E flat with its minor 7th (b) (Ex. 221), and by-and-bye the longer stay upon the dominant of D which brings back the original key in its major form. Pizarro again tries to stab Florestan, and with that comes the recapitulation of the first subject (Ex. 218) in the original key of D, but much compressed. Leonora is still there protecting, "Pierce first this breast," so the second subject (Ex. 220) is also recapitulated, though in new keys. The recapitulation ends with a half cadence on Leonora's drawing the pistol.

Ex. 222.

On this ominous word, dead, comes the trumpet call from the back. The State Minister is at the gates, and Pizarro dares do no more. The music is now the coda, beginning with the episode in B flat contained in the middle of the overture. There is relief from tension—the end of the struggle—there is no more to be done. Here we may begin meditation again, though there is not strength for much. Leonora and Florestan can but say, "Thank God," and the music says the rest for them, while Pizarro and Rocco vent their chagrin or astonishment.

Ex. 223.

Flute & 'Cello.

The remainder of the coda, after Jaquino's spoken announcement of the arrival of Prince Fernando, is the more lengthened expression of feeling on the hour that has arrived; and, with its simple harmonies and transient modulations to the minor key of the supertonic, which serve but to confirm the key, draws the piece to its close.

After Pizarro and Rocco have gone, the husband and wife express their joy at being re-united. Their words are not many, but the music speaks clearly. The duet is in the form of a sonata of delicate proportions and without a second part. The first subject, sung partly in alternating phrases, partly together, is of the nameless joy of their union after such heavy trials. Several short ideas are comprehended in the second subject, and it therefore goes through several keys before settling finally into the key of the dominant (Part I., pp. 17, 18). Another idea, "Thou art Florestan," "Thou art Leonora," with manifold repetitions of the dear names, falls to the long passage which draws back the recapitulation of the first part and ideas. The first subject is here much abridged, and is followed by one of the ideas of the second. This is also much abridged, and transposed into the main key; and a few notes of coda bring the duet to an end.

CONCERTS.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.—A considerable number of those who love good music assembled on Wednesday evening, and listened with great interest to a selection of classical pieces, amongst which were the overtures, Leonora and the Scotch Symphony, repeated "by special request." To the foregoing were added other works of a lighter character, such as the variations on "God Preserve the Emperor," composed by Haydn for his well-known quartet. These, however, were not performed according to the master's design, but in the shape of an arrangement for orchestra and military band. The author of the bold travesty in question conceals his name, and we trust he does so because he is ashamed of his work. He may rightly consider himself as having gained a bad eminence; absolute genius for wrongdoing being required even to conceive the notion of so treating Haydn's most delicate music. This comes of taking such comparatively venial liberties as Mr Manns permits himself at the Crystal Palace when quartet-music is played by "all the strings." It is the old story. Once leave the right road and there is no knowing to what quagmire the wrong path may lead. Three movements—gavotte and musette, cavatina, and finale—from Raff's Suite for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 200, offered a more legitimate attraction, but was indifferently performed, not only by the pianist, Mr Frederic Cliffe, but by the orchestra. Here let it be said, once for all, that the classical pieces, with scarcely an exception, suffered much through the imperfect rendering they received. We will not accuse the instrumentalists of carelessness; but the effect was the same as though they had been guilty of that unpardonable sin. The higher merits of orchestral work were wanting, while, as for intelligent and consistent "reading," we could not discover that it was attempted. It may be said that we ought not to look for great excellence at nightly promenade concerts, and the observation has weight; but classical music, if given at all, should be given well. It places all who touch it under an obligation impossible to evade or weaken—an obligation affecting not merely the credit of the executants, but the repute of the composers, and the artistic interest of the public. Maurer's favourite Concertante for four violins and orchestra served to introduce a quartet of very youthful artists—Miss A. Ward, Messrs E. Parfitt, E. Crook, and Mr Bernard Carrodus—by whom the pleasant and, to the performers, grateful music was played with considerable success. It is but fair to say that the young lady held her own among her male associates, and it is imperative to state that this exhibition of rising talent gave promise of future distinction. The vocalists were Miss Ella Lemmens, Mdme Isabel Fassett, and Mr Burgon. Miss Lemmens was obviously indisposed, and ought not to have sung such a trying piece as the polacca from Mignon. Physical weakness, however, could not conceal evidence of admirable training and abundant talent, such as must clear a path for their possessor to an enviable place. Mdme Fassett's singing of Hasse's "Rivornerai fra pooo" gave satisfaction; but Mr Burgon took more liberties with the tempo of "O ruddier than the cherry" than was fair either to the music or to Mr Barrett, whose piccolo obbligato deserved praise all the more.—D. T.

(Omitted from our last.)

PROVINCIAL.

IPSWICH.—Messrs Lindley Nunn and Edwin Nunn, conductors of the Ipswich Musical Society, have announced their intention of giving three concerts during the ensuing season. The first, in December, in aid of the Essex Hall Asylum Building Fund and the Ipswich Nurses' Home; an oratorio concert in January, and a miscellaneous concert in April. The first "practice" took place at the old Museum, an excellent room for the purpose.

BRIGHTON.—Mr A. King, the borough organist, began a series of organ recitals on Monday afternoon in the Dome. His programme consisted of Smart's andante in A and an arrangement of one of the choruses in Handel's Solomon; an allegretto in B flat, by the late M. Lemmens; Bach's St Anne's fugue, &c., concluding with the Coronation March from Meyerbeer's Prophète.

MANCHESTER.—The performance of Gounod's Faust by Mr Carl Rosa's English Opera Company, at the Prince's Theatre, Manchester, on Saturday evening, was marked by an innovation which, although improvised, proved so successful that it will not be surprising if it should in some degree form a precedent. Faust was announced for the evening's performance. But, almost at the last moment, Miss Burns, who was to have played and sung the part of the heroine, in which she is, deservedly, a favourite, fell ill, and the management was placed in a difficulty. Marguerites are not to be found at five minutes' notice. At the most accentuated point of this operatic crisis Mdme Marie Roze was appealed to, and the result was that she consented to sing the part in French, as she had never studied it in English. When the announcement of the novel arrangement was made by Mr Rosa, before the commencement of the opera, the applause of the audience showed their approval of the solution of the difficulty. It is probable that, when, for the future, Faust is sung, as it ought to be in England, in English, the audiences will, judging from the experience of Saturday evening, prefer that the part of Marguerite should be rendered by Mdme Marie Roze in French. The effect of her marvellously realistic acting, when accompanied by the freedom inspired by the use of her natural tongue, was electric. The experiment was all the more interesting to those aware of the perils of the situation, because of the supposed possibility of some of the other artists failing to take up the "cues." But, as a matter of fact, no difficulty of the sort occurred. As for the artistic effect of the curious ensemble, the performance abundantly proved that in opera there does not exist the objection to a mixture of languages which prevailed so strongly in the case where Rossi attempted to play Shakspere in Italian with an English company. The poetic influence of song destroys the incongruity which obtrudes itself where an attempt is made to give a polyglot representation of the non-lyric drama. Mdme Marie Roze may well be proud of her successful, although unrehearsed, effort to meet the exigencies of an unanticipated crisis.—Manchester Latest News, Sept. 25.

EALING.—At Mr Harold E. Stidolph's "Popular Concert," given in the Lyric Hall, on Wednesday evening, the singers were Mdlle Lilas Spontini and Miss Ida Meynell; Messrs Bernard Alfieri and G. Busch. The instrumentalists were Messrs Rooke, Acraman, and Stidolph, who gained the approbation of the audience by their performance of movements ("Rondo alla Turca," and "Rondo all' Ongroise") from trios by Hummel and Haydn. Mr Rooke also played a Gavotte, for the violin, by Rameau, and, with Mr Stidolph, De Beriot and Osborne's duet for violin and pianoforte, on airs from La fille du Regiment. Mr Alfieri sang with effect Pinsuti's "I fear no foe," and Gatty's "The gallants of England," Mr Busch winning applause for W. H. Cummings' "Just as of old," and Mrs J. Stafford Bush's "Arise." The ladies were no less successful, Miss Meynell rendering Wellings' "Golden love," and Molloy's "Little Match Girl," with taste and expression, Mdlle Lilas Spontini "winning all hearts" by the charming style in which she sang Ignace Gibsone's deservedly popular song "Sail on, O love, sail on," and Michael Watson's "When I meet you." Besides the two songs just named, Miss Spontini gave (owing to the indisposition of Miss Alice Davies) Marziali' "Summer Shower," and the favourite old ballad "Meet me by moonlight alone," gaining hearty applause and "re-calls" after each. In the course of the evening, Mr Ernest J. Stidolph recited, with effect, "Christmas-day in the workhouse." The concert altogether gave general satisfaction.

WEEL MAY THE KEEL ROW.

The usual autumnal migration of distinguished artists from London to New York is about to begin. Mr Mapleson starts from Liverpool with the greater part of his opera company, of which during the coming season the principal prima donna will be Mdme Adelina Patti. Mdme Patti and Signor Nicolini will not arrive in New York until a week or so after the rest of the troupe. Mr Mapleson will commence his season at the so-called "Academy of Music," the name given to the New York Opera House in memory of the Grand Opera of Paris, early in November. Mdme Patti will sing twice a week, and receive for the services of herself and Signor Nicolini £880 a night, the extra £80 representing the commission of 10 per cent. on her salary payable to her agent. These are the highest terms that a prima donna has ever obtained, and they must be looked upon, even in Mdme Patti's case, as exceptional. The directors of the Academy of Music considered it necessary to engage her at no matter what expense, in order to render unavailing an opposition by which they were threatened. Mdme Christine Nilsson takes ship for America on the 14th of October, and will give her first concert at Boston on the 28th. Mdme Nilsson will be accompanied by one of the most perfect of our vocalists, Miss Hope Glen, who sings much as Mdme Nilsson would sing if instead of a soprano she had a contralto voice. A Swedish tenor, too, will form one of the concert party, which will be completed by the addition of a string quintet. Mdme Nilsson and her associates will probably appear not only in the concert-room but also on the stage. It would be a pity, indeed, if the Americans were denied an opportunity of hearing her in her best dramatic impersonations. — Manchester Guardian.

"THE INITIALS."*

(From the "Musical Times.")

The title of this piece is suggested by the initials of Professor Macfarren's Christian names, and the Sonata commences accordingly with the notes G. A., each occupying an entire bar. Although the "Initials" are thus impressed upon the ear, they only occur at the opening and in the closing bars of the composition—effectively, however, and with sufficient significance to justify its name and to prevent its being spoken of merely as "Sonata in B flat minor." There is much good writing in the first movement, the second subject of which, in the relative major, is extremely melodious, and passes gracefully into B flat major, in which key the movement ends. The Allegretto which follows, in F sharp major, has a charming principal theme and is treated throughout with appropriate simplicity. There can be little doubt that this will be the favourite movement of the piece, as, apart from the attractiveness of the subjects, the passages make no great demands upon the executive powers of the performer. The final movement, Allegretto Scherzando is musically, we think, the best of the three, but this by no means proves that it will be the most popular. The light and playful theme with which it opens derives much of its effect from the chords against the natural accent in the left hand, a figure which is kept up throughout. The appearance of fragments of this subject in various keys, and its return, after a pause upon the dominant harmony, in the original key—B flat minor—are points which cannot but interest the attentive listener. The Sonata—which has been performed by the composer at a Concert of the Musical Artists' Society—is appropriately dedicated to Madame Natalia Macfarren.

WAIFS.

Mrs Ole Bull, widow of the violinist, has returned to America.

Del Puente is engaged to sing with Christine Nilsson in America.

The son of Ed. Colonne, the well-known Parisian conductor, died recently.

Emma Thursby was to sing at Chickering Hall, New York, on the 2nd inst.

Eugen Ysaye, violinist, lately gave a concert at Pawlowsk, near St Petersburg.

Mdlle Pfeil, from Kroll's, Berlin, is engaged at the Grand-Ducal Theatre, Wiesbaden.

A new zarzuela, La Sotana y el Manteo, music by Barbieri, is being rehearsed in Madrid.

The Augsburg Stadttheater re-opened with Les Huguenots, with Ucko, the manager as Raoul.

The visit of the Lucerne Liedertafel to various towns of Italy, including Milan, has been successful.

Carlotta Patti, and her husband, Ernst de Munck, begin their concert tour in Germany next month.

An English version of von Suppé's Schöne Galatea has been produced at Tony Pastor's Theatre, New York.

Bernhard Scholz's comic opera, Vornehme Wirthe, is to be produced at the Stadttheater, Leipsic, in January.

Maschinka Schubert, formerly Mdlle Schneider, a favourite at the Theatre Royal, died recently in Dresden.

Lhérie, ex-tenor, is announced to appear in Hamlet with Donadio at Barcelona, and with Sembrich at Madrid.

Hermann Fliege is appointed conductor of the Czar's Private Band, consisting of 100 Imperial Chamber Musicians.

Mdlle Jona has made a successful début at the Theater An der Wien, Vienna, as Boccaccio, in von Suppé's popular opera.

The Theatre Royal, Munich, is to be connected telephonically with the Royal country palaces of Berg and Hohenschwangau.

The Alhambra-Theater (formerly the Woltersdorf), Berlin, was opened for buffo opera with Der Graf von Gleichen, by Hellmesberger, jun.

The Municipal Council of Montpellier approve the plans for rebuilding the Grand-Théâtre at an estimated cost of four millions of francs.

Mr Albert McGuckin, the young barytone (brother to Mr Barton McGuckin), is engaged by Mr Kuhé for his forthcoming festival at Brighton.

Regina Klein, of Berlin, who has abandoned buffo opera, is engaged at Prague, the part of Valentine (Les Huguenots) being selected for her début.

The Corporation of Mannheim have voted 66,000 marks over and above the usual yearly grant of 54,000 marks to the Court and National Theatre.

The Grand Theatre, St Petersburg, repaired and re-decorated, opened with Glinka's Life for the Czaar. The second opera was Anton Rubinstein's Démon.

Josef Kotek, hitherto professor of the violin in X. Scharwenka's Conservatory, Berlin, is appointed by Joachim to a similar post in the Royal High School of Music.

The Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz has bestowed the Silver Cross for Merit of the House Order of the Vandalic Crown on Capellmeister Tömlich, Hamburgh.

Bouhy, the barytone, has returned to Paris. Previously to Sembrich's departure for Madrid, he rehearsed Hamlet with her, under the direction of Ambroise Thomas himself.

The artists already engaged for the Milan Scala are Bruschiatti, Turolla, and Datti (sopranos and contralto); Vergnet, Morin (tenors); Verger, Bianchi (barytones); Medini (bass).

Mdme Anna Bishop—The American Art Journal informs us—has received a special invitation to sing at the Worcester Festival where she scored triumphs in former years, and won a host of friends in the society, which will again be honoured by the presence of the world-renowned vocalist.

MEMORIAL OF BALFE.—It has been arranged that the tablet erected in Westminster Abbey in commemoration of M. W. Balfe, the eminent musical composer, will be unveiled on the 20th inst., that day being the anniversary of his death. The ceremony will take place at three o'clock, after the usual evening service.

MR WILLING'S CHOIR.—The prospectus of this new musical association has just been issued, and from it we gather that, in view of the dissolution of the Sacred Harmonic Society, some members of the chorus determined to resolve themselves into the above association, under the presidency of the Earl of Lathom and an influential committee, with Mr Willing (sub-conductor of the late society) as conductor. A series of four subscription concerts is announced to take place in St James's Hall, at the first of which, on December 12th, will be produced, for the first time in London, Niels Gade's cantata, Psyche (written for the Birmingham Festival), in conjunction with Handel's Acis and Galatea. The Princess of Wales has accepted the dedication of Psyche, and it is expected that Her Royal Highness will be present at this performance. At the remaining concerts, Mendelssohn's Elijah, Handel's Messiah, and a miscellaneous concert, including a new work, will be given. The orchestra, entirely professional, complete in every department, with Messrs Carrodus, Doyle, Howell, White, &c., as principals, will, together with the chorus (including many of the most efficient members of the late Sacred Harmonic Society), number about 250 performers. The principal vocalists announced include Mdmes Marie Roze, Anna Williams, Mary Davies, Orridge, Rosse, and Patey; Messrs Edward Lloyd, Vernon Rigby, Joseph Maas, Frederic King, C. Henry, and Lewis Thomas. Exeter Hall has been secured for rehearsals, which will be shortly resumed.

MISS FANNY DAVENPORT.—It will interest many old Brightonians to know that Miss Fanny Davenport, the "American" actress, who has appeared recently in London, and who will appear at the Brighton Theatre on October 16th, is the grand-daughter of the late Mr Frederick Vining, for many years lessee of the Brighton Theatre, though it was directed chiefly by his mother, Mrs Bew, he himself being absent so much from Brighton, as stage-manager of the Haymarket, and could only occasionally come down here. His daughter (the mother of Miss Fanny Davenport, and widow of Mr Davenport, deceased, formerly of Boston, U. S. A., an actor of repute both in England and America) was a great favourite with old Brighton playgoers, familiarly known as "Little Fanny Vining." From a letter to Mr C. F. Dennet, of 1, St George's Place, an old school-mate of the Davenports, we learn that Mrs Davenport ("Little Fanny") made her first appearance at the Theatre Royal, Brighton, when three years old, in a piece called "The Hunter of the Alps." She remained at Brighton until eleven years of age, ; then went to a boarding-school in London ; and when just over fourteen made her first appearance at some provincial theatre with Charles Kean, playing the round of juvenile business. Miss Fanny Vining afterward travelled with Macready, and eventually appeared with success in London. She was married to Mr Davenport in London (where Miss Fanny and her sisters, Blanche and Lily, were born), and subsequently appeared with her husband in the United States, she taking the leading female characters. Mr Davenport died in 1877, but his widow still "frets her hour upon the stage," and with as much success as ever. It is an interesting fact that, after all these years, a daughter of Mrs Davenport should appear on the same stage where her mother won her earliest triumphs ; and it would, perhaps, be not too much to say that she may safely count upon a cordial welcome from all old Brighton playgoers who knew "Little Fanny."—Brighton Guardian, Oct. 4.

GRASP THE FLAG!

PATRIOTIC SONG.
Words by CARLEON.
Music by
HUGH CLENDON.

"Grasp the flag! We fight for England!
Grasp the flag and clear the way;
English men will English honour
Keep untarnished as the day.
Though opposing foes a barrier
Wall of iron should oppose;
English pluck and English daring
Front the steel, nor failure knows!"

"The victory of our arms in Egypt gives some actualité to this spirited song. As its title announces, it is decidedly martial. The words, by Carleon, are simple and vigorous, and easily singable, while the music is stirring and melodious enough to make 'Grasp the Flag' a popular patriotic song."—Lloyd's Newspaper.

"An unusually long but extremely elegant symphony introduces this Ballad, one of the most expressive we have seen from the pen of this composer. The change into the tonic minor, and the transient modulations which follow, seem to grow naturally from the feeling of the melody, which is throughout thoroughly sympathetic with the words. We are glad to call attention to so good a specimen of unpretentious song-writing."—Musical Times.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

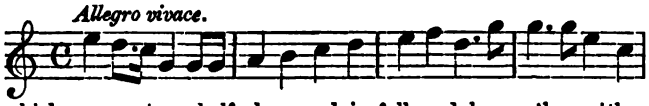
The finale to the second act begins with the entry of the State minister, attendants, people, and prisoners. The chorus first sing "Hail to the day! the door of the prison-grave is open." This, after introductory chords, is to a simple strain:

Ex. 224.

Allegro vivace.



which comes to a half-close, and is followed by another with a full close and a coda. Fernando's address to the people and prisoners is recitative in time; it is declamation in music. A pause in his address is filled up by a repetition of a phrase of the chorus, "Hail to the day" (Ex. 224). Again Fernando speaks, and is interrupted by the entry of Rocco with Florestan and Leonora. Rocco brings the pair to Fernando, and tells their tale to him. It is not a simple narrative, but is made a dialogue by the constant interruptions of the others by question and ejaculation. Pizarro tries in vain to stop him; Fernando will hear it all. He is astonished to see Florestan, whom he thought dead—the noble fellow who strove for truth. Leonora and Marcellina have their words to say, and the chorus has a cry: "Punished be the wicked one." After the story is told, Fernando has one word more, to direct first Pizarro and then, instead of him, Leonora, to take the chains off Florestan; and the action of the drama is all over. The whole of this part of the scene, from the beginning of Fernando's speech, is comprised in a fantasia section, like the second part of a sonata. It is the action of the scene, and throughout there is change of idea and change of key and rhythm. At the close of this part, when action is done, and settled idea, by meditation, begins again, there is also return to settled key and rhythmic form. All (save Pizarro) thank God and attribute justice to his ways. This is set to a rhythmic melody in F, first divided between the principal voices and the orchestra, and afterwards given, with some changes, by all, together with the chorus.

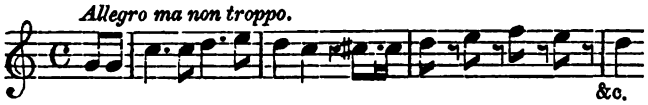
Ex. 225.

Sostenuto assai.

At the close of this they praise the noble wife, Leonora, for all her brave deeds. This is expressed in an air repeated in ballad fashion and with variations in the accompaniment.

Ex. 226.

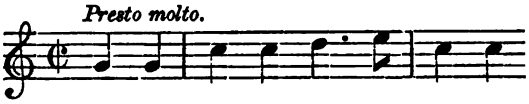
Allegro ma non troppo.



First it is given by the chorus, with a second strain divided between Florestan, Leonora, and the chorus. Next, the air is given by Florestan with a different effect in the orchestra and an ejaculatory accompaniment of the men of the chorus. Next, it is given by Leonora with new words, "Love hath rent thy bonds," the other principal voices accompanying her with the original words, and yet another orchestral accompaniment. Following this is a coda, worked out of the same idea (Ex. 226) in quicker time, recomposed and extended.

Ex. 227.

Presto molto.



It is sung by all the solos and the chorus, sometimes in alternation, sometimes together; and the union of all voices brings the opera to an end.

Form, in an opera, consists then in the designed and justly balanced alternation of restfulness and changefulness of idea, both musical and poetical, with tonal or key-form to strengthen or make clearer the design of the ideas. These ideas are expressive partly of feelings and partly of the actions which are either the cause or the effect of those feelings. Some say that meditation is not wanted in a drama—that action is wanted, and nothing but action; and, as a consequence, there should be no settled key-forms, but a continual free fantasia or second part aided by the lamp-lights of leit-motiv.* But do we not want to know what the different characters think, as well as what they do? It concerns us very much who are in the audience to know that Pizarro is enraged and terrified at the thought of the coming of the State minister, and his possible discovery of Florestan, the prisoner. How else should we know the reason of his dastardly plan to murder his chained prisoner? If we do not know Leonora's thoughts we should be as much in the dark as to her identity as were the gaoler and his daughter and Jacquino, and should lose all the growing interest of the opera from the overture up to her declaration, "Kill first his wife!" We should lose for all that time the sympathy which we have for the brave, struggling wife, who, when he who should have been her protector was rendered helpless and suffering, was enabled, by the strength of her love, to be his protector and saviour. All honour to the rough man, Beethoven, who chose for his ideal woman one whom love made strong, instead of the usual operatic ideal woman whom love makes weak—proof enough, in a woman's eyes, of Beethoven's own nobleness of character.

Music is to pourtray and express the emotions, and some emotions require time for their pourtrayal. Pizarro's revenge is a feeling that has been in his mind for years; surely some little time is necessary to show it to the audience. Leonora's hope has borne her up for two years of anxiety and wandering. Florestan's thoughts of his own integrity in the past and his dream of Leonora have been his only companions in all this long time of darkness. Reflection is the truest expression of such lasting thoughts as these. They cannot be dismissed in a phrase or two, and if the words which express them are short, the music must carry out the fulness of the ideas and of the way in which the thoughts come again and again into the mind, now from this direction, now from that.

It is not only the feelings of the persons in the drama that require time for expression, for in some cases the restful idea is one of action—of continued action in the same direction. For instance, in the grave-digging duet the continued action of preparation is to be expressed. In the prison-quartet the persistent action of Pizarro in his efforts to murder Florestan, and Leonora's constant efforts to prevent him, justify the use of formal design, while the manifold ideas within the set purpose of the two justify the freedom of its treatment.

What more appropriate means could there be of expressing a lasting thought, whether of action or of feeling, than the use of a rhythmic movement or portion of a movement, which, by its extension of one musical idea, extends and makes more lasting the emotion of which it is the expression.

CASSEL.—The inauguration of Spohr's statue, which had been fixed for the 23rd ult., has been postponed till next April. The statue is ready, but the Swedish granite, destined to form the pedestal, is still untouched by the chisel.

MOSCOW.—Max Erdmannsdörfer, from Sondershausen, who has accepted a professorship at the Conservatory, together with the post of conductor at the concerts of the Society of Music, has entered upon his new duties. His wife, the well-known pianist, Pauline Fichtner-Erdmannsdörfer, must, doubtless, have felt gratified.

* There is something small and puny in this application of the word motive to that which is little more than a theatrical gag without its fun. We have seen the same smallness in a journal of needlework, "motive in Russian point": a pattern of lace stitch. We are in danger of forgetting the grand English meaning of the moral motive—the moving power of a man's actions, the thought which draws his character towards good or towards evil, and which may be the wreck or the salvation of his whole life. Far better than the musical mis-use of the word is that of the painters, who apply it to the whole ideal subject of a painting—that which gives it poetical meaning and raises it above mere technical workmanship.—O. THE FUTURE OF ITALIAN OPERA.

(To the Editor of the "Times.")

SIR,—Allow me a few words on this subject. First, we are asked why artists should be brought to London to sing to us in a language understood only by a small part of the audience. The answer is that there is no living language, except Italian and Latin (which cannot be called dead), so well adapted phonetically and mechanically to music. In English the recurrence of the letter "s" is terrible, as everyone has heard in the dismal hiss of an oratorio of Handel; and English is not spoken with the open mouth of Italian. In French there is, among others, the difficulty of the "e" mute, as in "belle." In Italian "bella" is a perfect musical word. Perhaps your readers are not aware to what an extent the "poet" of an opera has been bullied by singers, who insist on having particular words which they consider favourable to their voice. It is true there is the word "si;" but there the open, broad "i" makes up for the "s." Where can we find in English such musical words as these in Semiramide—"Bella immago degli dei;" and in Otello—"La dolce speme fuggi dal cor?" Translate it—"Sweet hope fled from my heart;" "sweet" cannot be sung. The beauty of Italian singing is that the words combine homogeneously with the notes. I will only quote another passage from Semiramide:—"In odio al cielo, in odio al ciel tu sei: Ma sei mia madre, ma sei mia madre ancor." The "s" in "sei" is followed by the open "ei," and the words are music. Then, take the open mouth in Te Deum laudamus and Magnificat Anima mea Dominum. But the words must be pronounced ore rotundo, like Italian. We have heard the sonorous and powerful voice and Roman pronunciation of Pio IX. chant from the gallery of St Peter's, "Benedicat vos omnipotens Deus, Pater, et Filius, et Spiritus Sanctus." No other language except Italian could fully display such a volume of melodious sound.

The next question is why we have not now the great singers of Italy whom we, many of us, remember. The land of Guido, the Monk of Arezzo, must always contain great musical talent and science. But where are the great singers? Fra Giovanni, the Franciscan, was the last illustrious tenor, and he died young a few years ago. Italy has not now a great European artist to sing the divine compositions of the masters. Why so?

It will, perhaps, be admitted that political agitation and revolution, the feverish excitement of factions, the struggle for existence, the greediness for money, the violence of partisans, and the discouragement and persecution and oppression of religion are not favourable to high art.

There is another cause for the want of great singers—I mean an enormous standing army maintained by the conscription. This calamity must injure every branch of the fine arts. I am convinced that if you were to search the ranks of the Italian Army you would find men with splendid voices and all the qualities of a great artist serving as common soldiers. You would find there also the "mute, inglorious Milton," and men intended by nature for the highest departments of art and science. Let us beware ourselves.—Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BOWYER.

THE VOICE OF ONE WE LOVE.

There is one sound that's ne'er forgot,
Though years betwixt may rove,
Though joy or sorrow be our lot,
The voice of one we love!

From infancy to end of time,
As on thro' life we move,
The echo of that voice will chime
The voice of one we love!

It is as music wondrous sweet
Sent to us from above; [beat
When heard our hearts with rapture
The voice of one we love!

Through sickness, poverty and pain,
This fact 'twill always prove:
It cheers us, soothes us, the refrain,
The voice of one we love!

EMILY JOSEPHS.

STOCKHOLM.—The centenary of the opening of the Theatre Royal was celebrated on the 30th ult. The proceedings commenced with a "Festival Overture" by L. Normann. This was followed by a Prologue by Professor Nyblom, and illustrated with nine tableaux vivants of groups from the most popular operas, tragedies, comedies, and melodramas. The final tableau represented the apotheosis of Gustavus III., founder of the theatre. The prologue was spoken by Mdlle Börkagren, in the character of Thalia. Then came Cora and Alonzo, a three-act opera, by G. G. Adlerbeth (founded on Marmontel's Incas où la destruction de l'Empire du Pérou), music by Naumann, with which, performed by the members of the Royal Academy of Music, the theatre was first opened on the 30th September, 1782, in presence of the King, &c.

TOOLE'S THEATRE.

Having brought his provincial tour to a successful end, Mr J. L. Toole was at home again on Saturday night, with a theatre full of staunch admirers, and ringing with applause and laughter. Dramatic London, in the absence of the comedian who may be called everybody's favourite, is sensibly incomplete, and this, no doubt, lent vigour to the welcome Mr Toole received. His coming back marked the re-opening of a fountain of bright and healthy amusement; for the mirth Mr Toole calls forth is that which need never be ashamed of itself; and the pleasure of the crowded audience simply represented the just satisfaction of all who love drama that neither perverts nor sullies. Mr Byron's comedy, The Upper Crust, again occupied the place in the bills with which it has so long been familiar; doing so now, however, only as a stop-gap during the rehearsals of a new piece by Mr Pinero. That there is no actual need to put The Upper Crust on the shelf was made clear by unquestionable evidence of continued life. Its humours moved the house as readily as when they first stirred up laughter; and we hardly exaggerate in stating that every act was played to a continued accompaniment of spontaneous mirth. So much freshness where it was reasonable to expect the staleness that comes of familiarity may be credited in great part to a performance of exceptional merit. The comedy has seldom or never been played with such unflagging spirit and vivacity as on Saturday night. It had not a dull moment, nor one in which the audience felt conscious of a relaxed hold upon their amused attention. As the cast was that of last season, it is superfluous to say that there were no weak points in it, and equally needless to enter into particulars. Enough that the Lady Boobleton of Miss Emily Thorne, the Sir Robert of Mr Garden, and the Lord Heaketh of Mr Billington were again recognized as in all respects worthy to be associated with Mr Toole's inimitable Doublechick. Nor could the services of Miss Ada Mellon, Miss Effie Liston, Mr Ward, and Mr Shelton be overlooked. They completed an ensemble which use and wont, combined with no mean art, have perfected.

The comedy was followed by a new musical piece in one act, entitled Mr Guffin's Elopement, the joint production of Mr Arthur Law and Mr George Grossmith. A new development has begun, it seems, at Toole's Theatre, and—the audience had Mr Toole's own word for it on Saturday night—threatens portentous expansion. "We shall get on to Italian opera next season," said the genial manager; nevertheless, the initial step is a modest one, and need not give Mr Gye cause for immediate alarm. Dramatically speaking, Mr Guffin's Elopement presents the slightest of sketches. The hero—represented, of course, by Mr Toole himself—turns up at a country inn, where he has arranged to meet a romantic widow (Mrs Trundel) for the purpose of a secret marriage. Having floundered through a bog on his way, he presents himself in a pitiable plight, and is suspected of burglarious proclivities by Susan, a waitress of strong imagination. Presently comes, thirsting for vengeance, Mr Collingwood Hannibal Trumpington Sampson, cousin, lover, and trustee of the fair widow. He does not recognize Mr Guffin, and invites that gentleman to enter into the fun on hand, showing him a choice selection of whips destined for the person of his rival. In due course Mrs Trundel appears, and an explosion seems imminent. Happily, however, Mr Guffin sees the landlady, Miss Crump, an old and unforgotten "flame." Incontinently he reverts to his first love, Mr Sampson takes the widow, and, rounding matters off, Policeman Robert Beate, sent for to arrest the supposed burglar, captures Susan instead. The burden of this little piece mainly rests upon the shoulders of Mr Toole, who bears it as lightly as, from its character, may be assumed. Nothing can be funnier than his setting forth of Mr Guffin's perplexities and terrors, more especially in the scene with the vengeful Sampson, where affected enjoyment of the sport in prospect struggles hard with the very real fright of the too conscious victim. The musical numbers of importance are three, namely, a song for Susan as she speculates upon the vocation of her destined husband, a duet for Sampson and Guffin, and a song wherein the personage last named recounts the legend of "The Speaker's Eye." In each case Mr Grossmith's music is bright and tripping, full of humour and "go," as, under such circumstances, music should be. "The Speaker's Eye" will soon take rank with the most popular of comic effusions, doing so none the less readily because it touches one of the burning questions of the hour. It would be hardly fair to disclose the "argument" of the ditty. Let those who enjoy a laugh go and hear it sung, with admirable humour and skill, by the actor among whose successes it already counts. Mr Toole was well supported by Miss Thorne as Miss Crump; Miss Eliza Johnstone as Mrs Trundel; and Mr Ward as Sampson; the part of Susan falling to Miss Isa Marsden, a débutante whose personal advantages and good voice promise well when the nervousness natural to her position has worn off.—*D. BALFE.

The unveiling of the monumental tablet in memory of Michael William Balfe, erected in the Abbey Church of St Peter, Westminster, will take place on Friday next, October 20th, the anniversary of his death, after evening service at 3 o'clock p.m. That permission should have been granted to raise this tribute to the most tuneful of modern English composers reflects the highest credit on the Dean of Westminster; and to the Very Reverend cleric and Chapter of the Abbey the warmest thanks of all friends of Balfe and all lovers of our national music are due. I have seen a photograph of the tablet, which is surmounted by an oval medallion portrait of the composer, in high relief. The inscription simply recites the dates and places of Balfe's birth and death, and that he was a Knight of the Legion of Honour of France, and a Commander of the Order of Charles III. of Spain. In his own country he was not even a "Mus. Doc."—G. A. S.—Illustrated News.

KENNEDY AND SCOTTISH CHRISTIANITY.

(From a Dundee Correspondent).

The extraordinary enthusiasm with which Dundee welcomes Mr Kennedy and his family is a sign of the times. There have always been in Scotland not a few—Scottish Episcopalians chiefly and "Moderates"—who have refused to abstain from innocent amusements. The true-blue Presbyterian and all the more pronounced evangelicals have eschewed all mirth, all places of secular pleasure. A flower show, or a bazaar for religious purposes, has been the limit of a Seceder's folly. A Free Kirk elder, indeed, might sometimes be seen, so it was said, in a London theatre when there on a "deputation," or as a railway witness, but that was generally understood to be a mere spiteful and unfounded scandal. But Mr Kennedy, like Jeannie Deans, may do anything he likes, and sing anything he likes, and reverend Presbyters and the most sanctimonious elders, and the most douce and circumspect maiden ladies laugh until their "sides are sair." No doubt Mr Kennedy is careful to make his entertainment of the very best kind. He does not go beyond Tam o' Shanter and "Green grow the Rashes, O." Still, it is delightful to see the most straitlaced and devout captivated with the humour and the pathos of Robert Burns. There has, we fear, been a sad misunderstanding in Scotland of the true use of laughter. Mr Gladstone, a grave Scotchman, who, if he had not been Prime Minister, would certainly have been Archbishop of Canterbury, leaves the cares of an Empire, and laughs like the rest of the world at the delightful nonsense of twenty love-sick maidens in Patience. Surely if so devout and serious a statesman as Mr Gladstone refreshes himself with such an amusement, the rest of us may not allow our consciences to accuse us for following his example. It is a delight to the nation to know that the venerable Prime Minister can enjoy an hour of such perfect rest and relaxation. But we all go, as a matter of course, to hear Kennedy; and the effect of his mirth has been altogether beneficial.

The fact that a man so well known as a warm friend of Sabbath Schools that his own girls and boys are always seen in the church choir wherever he goes, proves that he is in sympathy with all that is best in Scottish Christian life. His very sorrows have endeared him to all who have borne bereavement; and there is no fireside but has one vacant chair. All this gives a meaning and an emphasis to the effect of his mirth, which is doing not a little to liberate our national Puritanism from its artificial and pernicious portentousness, and to restore to Scottish Christianity the naturalness and innocent mirth displayed by John Knox. The sour sanctimoniousness of some evangelicals and revivalists is a caricature of the seriousness of the early reformers, as well as an utter misrepresentation of Him whose first miracle was to turn water into wine at the marriage festival at Cana. The gloomy visage, the whining voice, and the total absence of mirthfulness display only a lack of joyful, healthful Christian life.

The creation of artificial sins stains the conscience of the young with supposed faults, and ultimately prevents right and wrong from being clearly distinguished. Not the least advantage of Mr Kennedy's life has been to destroy the remaining vestiges of this pernicious cant. He has indeed done much to improve congregational singing; he has, with his children, mingled in the Sabbath School life of both Scotland and America; and best of all, he has proved that mirth and laughter are not only innocent, but that the highest and best, the most earnest men and the noblest women in Scotland, by their appreciation of his delightful entertainments, can not only share in the pathos, but enjoy the laughter-giving mirth.

MUSIC AT THE ANTIPODES.

(From our own Correspondent.)

A revolution has just taken place in theatrical and operatic management in this city. Messrs Coppin, Greville, and Hennings, who for many years past have been lessees of the Theatre Royal, have retired from that position; Mr Frederick Marshall, the comedian, has abandoned management at the Princess Theatre; and Mr Musgrove has relinquished the office of sole impressario at the Prince of Wales Operahouse. Messrs Coppin & Co. and Mr Marshall retired on account of their leases having expired. The outcome of all this is that a partnership has been entered into by Mr J. C. Williamson, Mr Arthur Garner, and Mr Musgrove, and that those gentlemen are now the joint managers of the three houses of which I have spoken. The Theatre Royal was opened under the new management, on the 1st July, with Gilbert and Sullivan's Patience, which ran till the 11th inst. The principal members of the company were Miss Alice Rees (Patience), Miss Fanny Liddiard (Lady Angela), Mr H. Vernon (Bunthorne), Mr G. Verdi (Grosvenor), and Signor Riccardi (Calverly). The musical director was Signor Giorza. The Pirates of Penzance was reproduced by the same company on the 12th inst., and is to run for a week, after which a dramatic season will be commenced, the first performance being Hamlet, in which Miss Louise Pomeray will play the part of the "melancholy Dane."

Miss Emilie Melville, an old Melbourne favourite, who has recently re-visited Australia, has been appearing for some weeks past at the Prince of Wales Operahouse. She has already appeared in La Perichole, Giroflé-Giroflà, and Les Cloches de Corneville. The last-named opera is at present being performed. In the third act Miss Melville interpolated Bishop's "Lo, here the gentle Lark." Miss Jennie Lee is the bright particular star of the Princess's just now; but it is understood that after the dramatic season at that house is brought to a close, on the 20th inst., Miss Melville will remove from the Operahouse to the Princess's. The leading artists assisting Miss Melville (Serpolette), are Miss Nellie Stewart (Germaine), Mr Armes Beaumont (Grenicheux), Mr T. S. Casselli (Gobo), Mr E. Farley (Henri), Mr E. Kelly (Gaspard) and Mr G. Leopold (the Bailie). Mr C. Van Ghele is the musical director, and Mr T. Zeplin the leader of the orchestra.

Messrs Dunning and Wallace have just arrived from Europe with an opera company, who will open in a few weeks at the Operahouse. The principal members of the troupe are Miss Kate Chard, prima donna, late of the Carl Rosa Opera Company; Miss Annette Ivanova, from the Alhambra Theatre company, Leicester Square, London; Miss Agnes Mitchell, from Booth's Theatre, New York, and the Strand Theatre, London; Mr Knight Aston, late of the Alhambra; Mr Guillaume Loredan, from the London opera and opera-bouffe theatres; Mr Dean Brand, late of Mr D'Oyley Carte's opera-bouffe companies; Mr Edgar, from the the Princess's Theatre, Manchester; and Mr T. B. Appleby, late of the Opera Comique, and the Olympic Theatre, London. It is stated that Messrs Dunning and Wallace have brought with them a number of novelties for Australia, amongst them Boccaccio (Von Suppé), Manteaux (Bucalossi), Monopole, and Le Jour et la Nuit (Lecocq).

The Mastodon Minstrels have had a good season at St George's Hall. With the aid of some members of the dramatic profession they are now playing Uncle Tom's Cabin.

The bi-weekly Organ Recitals at the Town Hall, by Mr D. Lee, the city organist, are as attractive as ever.

BERLIN (Correspondence).—Stern's Vocal Association will resume their concerts on the 4th November with a Mendelssohn commemoration, in which Joseph Joachim has promised to take part. In the course of the winter the Association will give Max Bruch's Odysseus, a Mass by Cherubini, and Handel's Judas Maccabæus. The Italian season at the Philharmonie, just over, has been successful. Several of the artists have become great favourites, especially Varesi, whom some of the leading critics declare one of the finest exponents of the lyric drama, both for singing and acting, known for many years.—Teresina Tua has been playing here, delighting everyone. She gave her farewell concert at Kroll's on the 1st inst.—Y. L.

EXCERPTS FROM PARKE'S MUSICAL MEMOIRS.

Excerpt No. 4.

The Hanover Square concert, now for the first time styled the "Professional Concert," it being undertaken by a company of professors, began the same evening. Harrison and Tenducci were the singers. Fischer's oboe concerto was replete with taste and expression, and the veteran Abel, who had recovered from a severe indisposition, performed a solo on the viol di gamba with his accustomed elegance and sensibility.

Abel, who had for many years made large libations at the shrine of Bacchus, had ruptured a small blood vessel, which confined him for some time. During this illness he was ordered by his physician to keep in bed, and to abstain from wine. The latter injunction mortified him extremely. When the doctor made his daily visit, Abel, with great anxiety, asked him of what colour the saliva was, when, if he replied that it was red, Abel would sink his head on his pillow and exclaim in despair, "Oh! I shall never taste my beloved old hock again!" On a future day, however, Abel having put the usual question to the physician, and receiving for answer that it was white, cried out in an ecstasy of joy, "Ah! tank Got! I shall taste my beloved old hock once more!"

Their Majesties honoured the oratorios at Drury Lane Theatre with their presence on the six Fridays in Lent. The first was on the 11th February, when was performed The Messiah. The principal vocal parts were sung by Messrs Norris and Reinhold, Misses Phillips and George; and the concertos were performed by Crosdill, on the violoncello, the elder Parke on the oboe, and Miss Parke (first time) on the pianoforte. This young lady displayed neat and brilliant execution, together with great taste and expression. She was loudly applauded. The leader was Mr. Richards, and the conductor at the organ Mr Stanley, who, though blind, performed with the utmost accuracy. This eminent organ player was deprived of his sight when a child, by falling on a marble hearth with a wash-hand basin in his hands.

Some few years ago, his Majesty George the Third patronized and honoured with his presence the oratorios at the King's Theatre in the Haymarket, on the Friday evenings during Lent, conducted by Mr Bach, the celebrated German composer, who was musician to the Queen. These performances notwithstanding were so thinly attended throughout the season that they might (as the theatrical hero has it) have been termed "a beggarly account of empty boxes." On Friday morning, General Fitzpatrick meeting Mr Hare, the witty member of Parliament, said to him: "Do you go to the oratorio in the Haymarket this evening?" "Oh, no," replied Mr Hare, "I have no wish to intrude on his Majesty's privacy."

The concert of ancient music, which was for the first time honoured with the presence of their Majesties, commenced at Tottenham Street, on the 19th February. Mdme Mara, Miss Abrams, Mr Harrison, and Signor Tasca sang to the entire satisfaction of their Majesties and the subscribers. Cramer led the band, and Mr Bates presided at the organ.

A new opera in two acts, called The Nunnery, written by Mr Pearce, was produced at Covent Garden on the 12th April. The overture and the rest of the music were composed by Mr Shield, whose abilities were never more successful. At the rehearsals of it Mrs Webb, an excellent though very irritable actress, in the line of The Duenna, &c., being unable to articulate the word inexplicable, and Mr Harris, the manager, having frequently, though in vain, endeavoured to set her right, she at length impatiently exclaimed: "What the devil does the author mean by writing such damned nonsense in his piece?" This lady, who was one of the tallest and most bulky women I ever beheld, coming to the theatre one morning, complained of a pain in the small of her back, and was incensed beyond measure at a gentleman saying to her, "Pray, Mrs Webb, which is the small of your back?" Mrs Webb was a great favourite with the public, and acted in play or farce, often in both, every night. She was in the habit of recruiting herself after the fatigues of the week by dining in bed on Sundays, even in the dog days, off a hot roasted leg of pork, stuffed with sage and onions!

Mr Hull, the respectable stage manager of Covent Garden Theatre, having determined to give for his benefit, on the 22nd April, Milton's Mask of Comus, and intending to bring forward, as an attractive novelty, Mrs Pinto (the once celebrated Miss Brent, the original Mandane in Arne's Artaxerxes), to sing the song of "Sweet Echo," requested I would do him the favour to call on her, and rehearse it with her, the responses being made with the oboe. I accordingly went to her residence the next day, which was at a shop in Blackmoor Street, Clare Market, one half of which was occupied by a confectioner, and the other by a vender of bark and rhubarb, a combination of callings calculated to show that the sweets of life are seldom to be met with unaccompanied by their concomitant bitters. I was introduced to Mrs Pinto, and rehearsed the song with her. Although nearly seventy years old, her voice possessed the remains of those qualities for which it had been so much celebrated—power, flexibility, and sweetness. On the night Comus was performed she sung with an unexpected degree of excellence, and was loudly applauded. This old lady, as a singer, gave me the idea of a fine piece of ruins, which, though considerably dilapidated, still displayed some of its original beauties.

There were this year four grand performances of sacred music from the works of Handel, in Westminster Abbey, on the same grand scale as last year, by command of their Majesties, the profits of which were applied to the fund for decayed musicians and their families, the Westminster Hospital and St George's Hospital. The whole of the performances, the first of which was on the 2nd June, were executed with great effect, in the presence of their Majesties and full and fashionable audiences.

A new comic opera, in three acts, written by Mr Cobb, was presented at Drury Lane Theatre on the 8th December. It was entitled The Strangers at Home. The music was composed and compiled by Mr Linley, one of the proprietors of that theatre. Mrs Jordan, the fascinating comic actress, in the song, in male attire, "When first I began, sir, to ogle the ladies," to the old tune of Alley Croker, enraptured the audience, who honoured her with a loud encore. The music of this opera is highly creditable to the talent of Mr Linley. Mrs Jordan, though not what could be termed a regular singer, occasionally introduced into her characters in comedy a ballad or two, which she sang without accompaniments, in a style of such exquisite sweetness and expression, as uniformly delighted her auditors.

The Italian opera was this year aided by Signor Babini and Signora Sestini. They appeared, for the first time, in a new opera of Paesiello, entitled Il Marchese Tulipano, under the direction of Cherubini. Babini possessed a pleasing voice, and sang with great taste. In the beautiful air, "Madamina," he was greatly applauded. This air in English words, beginning "For tenderness formed," was afterwards introduced and sung by Mrs Crouch, at Drury Lane Theatre, in General Burgoyne's comedy of The Heiress, with universal approbation. Signora Sestini, as well known on the English as on the Italian stage, sang and acted with great animation; and in the duet with Tasca, "Nobile al par che bella," was loudly encored. The music of Paesiello deserves the highest praise. Mdme Mara, who was engaged for the serious opera, made her début on the 11th February, in Anfossi's Didone abandonata, to the fullest house during the season. This opera afforded Mara full scope for the display of her extraordinary powers. She sang five airs, and a part in a terzetto, and in all evinced the utmost energy, taste, and expression. She was vehemently applauded. The serious opera was at length rendered complete by the first appearance of Signor Rubinelli, in conjunction with Mdme Mara, on the 4th May, in a new serious opera, composed by Tarchi, called Virginia. Rubinelli's figure was good, his acting chaste and expressive; and his voice (a contralto) and style of singing incomparable. He gave the utmost satisfaction, and was vehemently applauded. Mara, who, on account of her hauteur, had received some sharp rubs from the public, sang with great effect; and all her airs, with the exception of those she herself assumed, excited great admiration.

Shakspere, in his Comedy of Errors, has drawn two characters (the two Dromios) so much alike in person that they are continually mistaken for each other. This has been generally considered a dramatic fiction, calculated to produce amusing incidents, and to bring about a striking dénouement; but it is believed that no such thing ever occurred in real life. This opinion, however, must be founded in error, for we have on record a well attested case, in the wife of a gentleman in France, whose twin children grew up so much alike that the mother was at length compelled to fasten a coloured ribband round the waist of one of them to distinguish him from his brother! An instance of a similar kind, in adults, which comes within my own knowledge, exists in this country. His Royal Highness the late Duke of Cumberland, brother to George the Third, had amongst his household band of musicians two Germans, brothers, who resembled each other so strongly that when they occasionally attended separately to play on the violin at Vauxhall Gardens I have frequently discovered that I was speaking to Casper when I imagined I was addressing John. Nay, even the members of the duke's household were at a loss to recognize them when they were not together. Likenesses also, where no degree of consanguinity existed between the parties, have been so powerful that persons have been very seriously inconvenienced thereby, as the following fact will show:—there lately belonged to the orchestra of the King's Theatre in the Haymarket a highly respectable and clever musician (a foreigner) named Gehot, who, according to the custom of the performers of that establishment, was in the habit of frequenting the Orange coffee-house on the opposite side of the street. This gentleman, as it proved, bearing a strong resemblance to a thief, was watched into the coffee-room one Monday evening, and was there apprehended for a highway robbery, committed between the hours of ten and eleven o'clock on the preceding Saturday night. When taken before the magistrate at Bow Street for examination the prosecutor swore most positively to his identity; and he must have been committed to prison for trial had not an alibi been clearly proved by the manager of the King's Theatre, the leader of the band, and a host of the performers swearing that he was, as usual, engaged professionally in the orchestra during the performance of an opera, from seven till twelve o'clock on the night on which the robbery was perpetrated.

The concert of ancient music commenced at Tottenham Street, January 31st. Their Majesties honoured it with their presence. The Earl of Exeter was director, Mr Cramer was the leader, and Mdme Mara and Mr Harrison the principal singers. The professional concert began in Hanover Square on the 6th February. Signor Tenducci, Signor Babini, Miss Cantelo (afterwards Mrs Harrison), and Signora Ferrerese were the singers. Clementi presided at the pianoforte, Cramer and Fischer played concertos on the violin and oboe, and Abel performed a solo on the viol di gamba inimitably.

A week before this concert commenced, I met Abel at dinner, at the house of Mr B——l, where, according to custom, he indulged so much in the pleasures of the table that he was with some difficulty got into the drawing-room in the evening to a music party. Abel, having repeatedly refused to play, Mr Richards, who led the orchestra at Drury Lane Theatre, an intimate friend of his, said to him good-humouredly, "Come, come, Abel, pray oblige us; if you'll play I'll play, though I know how much I must suffer by comparison." On hearing this, Abel, whose constitutional vanity was roused, stared at him indignantly, and exclaimed aloud, "Vat, shallenge Abel! No, no, dere ish but one Got and one Abel!"

DIBDIN'S GRAVE.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Two ladies told me that they went to see Dibdin's grave at the Cemetery, Pratt Street, Camden Town. They had great difficulty to get into the place, as the gates were closed, and no notice up with information. At last they saw a man in the place at work in a vegetable garden in the Cemetery, who, it seems, is the man in charge of the place (his name is Bloomfield). They quietly asked if they could see Dibdin's grave; he spoke to them in a very insolent manner, and after a great deal of trouble they were allowed to enter, he following them and using the most disgraceful language, so as to attract a crowd. I was so surprised that I went myself, and found it even worse than I was told. I found poor Dibdin's grave in a very bad state, dirty and scarcely readable, the rails rusty, and pieces of old bricks pushed under to keep them up. The man began the same kind of conduct, until I gave him my card, and asked him the meaning of his behaviour towards the ladies. He did not deny that the ladies had told the truth, and could not explain his insolent conduct. The cemetery was in a very neglected state, and a large heap of rubbish was shot close to Dibdin's grave, and the vegetables growing within a few inches of other graves. I went to St Martin's-in-the-Fields Church (to which the Cemetery belongs), and saw the Chaplain, but got nothing satisfactory. He said the Vicar was away, and referred me to the Churchwardens. I wrote to them nearly two months ago, and have had no answer. I now write because I know the public would not allow such a state of things to exist if it was known.—Yours, &c.,

CH. J. BISHENDEN.

Mr Clifford Harrison will also give recitations, and the choir, which has been trained for the committee during the summer months by Mr W. Henry Thomas, will appear for the first time and give variety to the programme by part songs.

PLANQUETTE'S new opera, Rip Van Winkle, has been in rehearsal for several weeks, and will be produced this evening (Saturday), at the Comedy Theatre. It promises to be a great success, as the music is is said to be sparkling and beautiful, and the story well sustained from beginning to end. The dresses and scenery are unusually attractive. The composer has been present upon several occasions during rehearsal, and highly complimented all concerned upon the success of their efforts.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1882.

THE JAVANESE GAMELAN.

That a great and healthy art-movement has London for its central pulse, that London, indeed, is becoming the very heart of the art-world, few unprejudiced persons will refuse to believe. Out of many arts more or less effete, a new art is arising to live and thrive in our modern atmosphere, and, from the radical influence exercised on it by the Japanese and kindred styles, the visit of Javanese musicians to this city must be regarded as constituting an artistic event of the utmost importance. Between the words Japanese and Javanese there is but the difference of two letters philologists tell us may easily be interchanged. And this fact alone would seem to indicate that the Djocjokartans, as our visitors are called, were related to the subjects of the Mikado. Attentive observers will soon have their minds set at rest. For the Javanese entertainment is suggestive of nothing so much as of an animated Japanese fan. The attitude, gestures, and attire of the performers, their curious voices, and the music they declaim, all tend to heighten the impression, though certain minor details should be excepted. If this product of a far away land and an old time be considered in a liberal disposition of mind, its many intrinsic beauties cannot fail to be acknowledged. Javanese art, now-a-days, may be likened to the ruins of a once beautiful palace, wherein music, poetry, and dancing lived in the unity of the complete drama.* After surviving countless generations of men, the palace has become a ruin covered with ivy and haunted by a ghost.

Unfamiliarity with Java and things Javanese need not hinder speculation, for ruins look best by night. But there is one side of ruins which, unillumined by the moon, is generally hidden in impenetrable shade. That side consists here of the language spoken, our ignorance of which renders it quite impossible for us to appreciate what wise of connection the poetry may have with the music and dancing. Nor does the meagre information vouchsafed in the programme render much assistance. It may be said that, considering how the dramas enacted have been handed down by a long tradition to the present race, much of their significance is veiled even to the Javanese themselves. At all events, the Javanese are provided with a lantern, so to speak, where we are compelled to grope in the dark.

Concerning the musical part of the drama we are better able to form an opinion. At first, despite a certain wildness and gorgeous colouring, chiefly due to the soft yet powerful resonance of the percussion instruments, a feeling of monotony is experienced. What we hear seems disconnected, much as though each member of the orchestra were following the bent of his own caprice. Soon, however, the ear gets acclimatized, and we are swayed by an intimate charm which leaves behind it the desire for further hearing.

To describe the Javanese music otherwise than vaguely would be unsuitable. Suffice it to say that intermittent declamation, frequently not unmelodious, appearing and disappearing like foam on the mid-sea wave, an almost continual use of syncopation, combined with—enharmony, shall we call it?—are its characteristics. They prove the analogy and sympathy existing between the most ancient-known exemplification of art in a far away country, and what is, now and nearer home, being evolved in accordance with the spirit of the age. Many pleasing effects are noticeable—one particularly where, after a spell of unaccompanied declamation, the muffled note of the tom-tom, in a syncopated measure, joins the voices and gradually leads back the remainder of the orchestra. A piece called "Senantie Solo; or, The Flower of the Land of Solo," affords several instances of this effect.

To finish off on sundry notes which include neither the tonic nor dominant of the key is a prevalent custom, from which a beautiful duet, played on the harmonicon and the quaint two-stringed violin, happily deviates by arriving at a close on the tonic of the key in the minor mode. The foregoing application of the musical terms, "key" and "mode," must be taken cum grano salis.

The Javanese orchestra contains two harmonicons—instruments with a soft, mellow tone, whose performers display not only technical facility of a high order but also an unmistakable artistic sentiment. The two-stringed violin resembles an eccentric viola, and often sounds rather out of tune, owing, no doubt,* to the quarter-tones.

A curious feature in these performances is the absence of men's voices. The singing devolves exclusively upon the ladies of the company, whose voices and method of delivery will occasion no surprise to anybody that has previously heard the Japanese. On the dancing, which lives in the weird meandering music like a fish in water, the verdict can only be one of sincere admiration.

With Europeans, dancing is little better than a fascinating amusement.† With the Javanese, it has been exalted into a fine art, not unworthy of taking part in religious ceremonies. This is as it should be; and anything of a more truly poetic nature than this slow and graceful dancing would be hard to imagine. Of course, violent and rapid movements are almost entirely dispensed with. More use is made of the upper than the lower part of the body, the elaborate, yet lively action of the hands being full of expression. Fine differences of gesture are to be observed among the various characters of the play. We are told that the Javanese race is physically degenerate. This probably explains an over-refinement and attenuation of limb which reminds us of the Hindoo. But these exquisitely fashioned hands and lissom fingers are peculiarly well adapted to motion-designing in its subtlest intricacies. The whole aspect of the dance is harmonious, and certainly reveals the most interesting side of the Javanese drama.

In conclusion, we have only to express our firm belief that benefit could be derived from the conscientious study of the Javanese Gamelan. In many ways our taste is capable of improvement, and this exotic art, ancient and ghostlike notwithstanding, may still give us a lesson, not only in generalization, but in style:‡ let us hasten to make the best of it. By an eternal law, the stream of life must follow in the track of the sun. As our forefathers, in pre-historic time, wandered hither, following the sun, as Columbus sailed to the discovery of America, following the sun, so, with reviving influence, come even these strange Art-notes from the region of the source of all things.

We append a few reminiscences of the Javanese music—rough jottings, consisting of mere scraps and shreds of sound, only possessing some slight interest for those who have already witnessed a performance at the Westminster Aquarium. Nor do we answer for their accuracy in any way:—

PROVINCIAL.

WORCESTER.—We read in the Worcester Journal that the grand ballad concert which was given in the nave of the Exhibition did not prove such an attraction as was anticipated, and it is doubtful whether it will result in any material contribution being made to the surplus which it is confidently expected will accrue from the holding of the Exhibition. Regarded from a musical standpoint, it was an unqualified success. The vocal portion of the programme, which comprised eighteen selections, was rendered with the efficiency which every one would expect to characterize the performances of such accomplished vocalists as Mdme Marie Roze, Miss Orridge, Mr Maas, and Mr F. King. Their efforts evoked expressions of the liveliest satisfaction, and encores were rather the rule than the exception. Mdme Roze rendered three solos, "Softly sighs," "Bend of the river," and "Nothing else to do," and acknowledged the demand for an encore called forth by the last-mentioned selection by singing "Coming through the Rye."* Miss Orridge was also responsible for a trio of selections, including "Huntingtower," which was enthusiastically encored. In response "The Banks of Allan Water" was given. "The Death of Nelson," "Rita," and "The Message" were sung by Mr Maas, who was in excellent voice, and gave "Come into the garden, Maud," as an encore to the first-mentioned of the songs. Mr King's efforts were fully appreciated; as was also Mr Ffrench Davis' artistic playing on the harp. Mr F. Cliffe officiated as accompanist, and opened the programme with a pianoforte solo.

[* Who would not have come through the rye had he known that Marie Roze was an involuntary obstruction? "Gin a body kiss a body" would necessitate no further explanation.—Dr Blinge.]

BRIGHTON.—The second of Mr A. King's series of Organ Recitals was given at the Dome on Monday afternoon. The selections were of a varied and interesting character, and Mr King played with his customary excellence. The programme consisted of—Overture to Zauberflöte; Andante in C (H. Smart); Prelude and Fugue in G minor (Bach); Fantasia (J. L. Hatton); Barcarolle from 4th Pianoforte Concerto (S. Bennett); Meditation on a Prelude of Bach (Gounod); Fanfare (Lemmens); and the Coronation Anthem, from Zadok the Priest (Handel).—At the Royal Aquarium on Monday evening, Mdme Alice Barth's "Operetta Company," consisting of Misses Marchese and Yorke, Messrs Dudley Thomas, Eric Lewes, John Cross, Arthur Hyde, and H. D'Egville, gave Widows Bewitched and A Storm in a Teacup. The company will play every evening during the week. Mr. Corder's farewell concerts at the same place were given on the morning and evening of last Saturday, and on the Wednesday evening previous Mr. George Watts gave the first of his "Philharmonic Concerts," with Mdme Christine Nilsson as the "star."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—The Royal English Opera Company commenced a six nights' engagement at the Tyne Theatre on Monday evening with complete success. The immense auditorium was filled, and the house presented a most brilliant spectacle. The opera was Gounod's Faust, given with an amount of completeness and finish very satisfactory to the audience. With the exception of the Carl Rosa troupes—for whose performances the ordinary tariff of prices is always raised—no English Opera Company that can be compared with this has visited Newcastle for very many years. The task of presenting before the public operas in English, is a very difficult one, and has been fraught with disaster to many that have undertaken it. Between the palmy days of the Pyne and Harrison companies and those of Mr Carl Rosa's enterprise there was a long and dreary interregnum, during which operas in English were very often represented in a most inadequate fashion. Vincent Wallace, Balfe, Barnett, Bellini, and Verdi were often very roughly handled by some of the small and badly equipped companies that travelled the provinces, and the net results of their campaigns were generally disastrous to the caterers who found the necessary capital for them and equally damaging to the cause they represented. They had not the means of presenting the works of the leading composers in a manner at all satisfactory to the musical public, so that section of the community was conspicuous by its absence, whilst, on the other hand, the style of entertainment which they furnished was of a kind not appreciated by the votaries of the music halls. Of course, there were brilliant exceptions to the dead level of inadequacy, and amongst these may be mentioned Mr Loveday's companies, of which Miss Florence Lancia was prima donna, and one or two of Mr Elliott Galer's companies. Mr Carl Rosa has made English opera an entertainment at which musical people can assist with pleasure, and the movement which he has done so much to forward will be materially aided by the success of such a troupe as that appearing this week at the Tyne Theatre. The Royal English Opera Company is composed of a double set of leading artists, with whose names at least every musician in the kingdom is familiar. The principal sopranos are Mesdames Blanche Cole and Rose Hersee; the tenors, Messrs Packard (late of the Carl Rosa Company) and Parkinson; the basses, Messrs Aynsley Cook (of the Carl Rosa Company), Richard Temple, and Mr James Sauvage; buffo and tenor, Mr Charles Lyall (late of the Carl Rosa Company). Misses Helen Armstrong and Phillipine Siedl are also included in the company, together with Messrs Faulkner Leigh, Ernest Harrison, and other well-known vocalists. The conductors are Messrs Arthur Howell and Julian Edwards, the band and chorus travelling with the company numbering fifty. A corps de ballet is also included in its arrangements, and the leading danseuses are the Sisters Annie and T. Elliott.—Newcastle Daily Chronicle, Tuesday, Oct. 10.

Worcester.—A concert was given on Monday night at the Exhibition by the Worcestershire Yeomanry Cavalry band combined with that of Messrs Synyer and Gilmer. Mr D'Arcy Ferris sang military songs. Mr Garton presided at the organ. The total attendance was 6,582. The number admitted by season ticket and otherwise was 611, leaving the number who paid for admission 5,971 the largest attendance yet recorded.—Berrow's Worcester Journal.

THE OSWESTRY FESTIVAL.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—Read the subjoined report, extracted from the columns of our highly-esteemed contemporary, the Monmouth News:

"At the meeting of the Oswestry Festival Committee, it was reported that the late triennial festival and festival of village choirs had resulted in a total deficit of £180. It was resolved to appeal for voluntary subscriptions for the purpose of making up the deficiency."

What?—already so early with the hat?—notwithstanding the high support received! It would appear that this newly-organized Lesleyan "Festival" is likely to collapse. It is perhaps not quite distant enough from Hereford, Worcester, and Gloucester to make promoters of the time-honoured "Three-choir" meetings shake in their shoes. They have existed for more than a century, and will continue to exist for another century, in spite of all preaching to the contrary. Nevertheless, 'ware Oswestry. Oswestry is a great matter. And then there is Chirk to fall back upon. 'Ware Chirk!—Yours respectfully, P. Joyce Twrst, M.D.

Georgetown (Demerara).—(From "The Colonist.")—Mr Miller, composer, and master of the Militia Band, proceeded to England in the "Roraima," on the 19th inst., on leave of absence. On the previous day Mr Miller was presented with a handsome silver cup, and the following address, by the members of the Portuguese Philharmonic Club:—

J. Miller, Esq., Bandmaster.

Dear Sir,—We, the undersigned members of the Philharmonic Club of the 1st of December, beg you will accept the accompanying Silver Cup as a token of our esteem.

The interest you have always taken in the progress of the members of our Club in their musical studies, and your universally kind and amiable ways, have endeared you to every one of us. We hope you will enjoy your trip home, and when you return it will be with renewed energy and strength that you will renew your duties with us.

FEMALE COMPOSERS.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—Some of your contemporaries have lately been writing in a wondering tone as to the scarcity of female composers; and I do not see why I should not give you a woman's ideas on the subject. I admit freely that I know no feminine names among the composers of the past: but for the past I cannot account. I also admit that there are fewer composers now among women than among men; and I wish to give some reasons for that deficiency.

First, there is the grand reason that dates from Adam and Eve—I mean matrimony. Now, I am not, I hope, one of the shriekers of the world; and I honour a good matron quite as much as I honour a good old maid. At the same time, matrimony is quite enough of a profession for one woman to do well, without undertaking a second. Then, again, a young woman may often be deprived of the aid necessary for the genuine study of composition, as it is considered she is sure to marry some day; and even if she professes not to wish to marry she is kindly smiled at. This acts against the long years of persistent study necessary for composition more than it does against other arts, because there is small hope of rapid or large earnings; and the study requires more persistence in the student and outside aid from the friends.

Another reason I believe to be, in the immense strength and endurance of brain required for thorough composition. I believe that a woman's mind is quite equal to man's in what I would call quality (I might quote the mathematician, Dr Whewell, in support of this)—comparing, of course, exceptional with exceptional, ordinary with ordinary, dunce with dunce, and making allowance for difference of temperament. But I believe that the lesser strength of body of the woman goes against her capability for the long, hard study, the hours and hours of brain and nerve work necessary to build up the knowledge of a Mozart or Beethoven.

Now, supposing these two objections overcome, and that neither matrimony nor want of strength have hindered a woman from being a composer, there remains yet another.

I wonder whether people ever think of the amount of fight that is necessary for a man to make his way as a composer, and to make himself known and understood. There are many men composers not naturally fitted for fight, who prefer to remain unknown and to write on in hopes of the someday coming when their writings will make a way for themselves; and this, not from want of musical power, but from want of fighting power—want of self-exaltation. This is true of past as well as present. Now apply this to women. Is the real woman's nature fitted for fight and self-exaltation? Is not the best woman nature quiet, gentle, tender, unasserting? A good composer, being a man, must be possessed of the best of manly qualities; and being a woman, of the best womanly qualities. Now, I will not deny that a good man may be a fighter: but for a woman to be a fighter will go dangerously near taking away her womanly qualities, and then what becomes of her power of writing womanly music?

There is a great deal of woman's music in the world now. I know symphonies, overtures, quartets, operettas, and songs and choral music without end, written in spite of difficulties by different women, the knowledge of the existence of which has hardly gone beyond the composers' homes. I think if your contemporaries were so daring as to advertise, "Wanted—A Female Composer," their waste-paper basket would be very full the next day.—I remain, yours faithfully, O. P.

Connaught Theatre.—This theatre has been sold, subject to the approval of the Court of Chancery, by Messrs Thurgood and Martin of Chancery Lane. The premises, after decoration, will be opened under the management of Mr John Baum.

Bristol Musical Festival.—The revised programme for the festival, which commences on Tuesday next, is published. On Tuesday (17th) the oratorio will be Mendelssohn's Elijah, with Miss Williams, Mr Santley and Mr Maas as principal singers, and in the evening Beethoven's Mass in D, followed by a secular selection. On Wednesday morning Gounod's Redemption will be given; and in the evening a miscellaneous selection, including a part ("Spring") of Haydn's Seasons. On Thursday morning Rossini's Moses in Egypt, and in the evening a new cantata, Jason, by Mr A. C. Mackenzie (composed expressly for this festival) will be produced, the festival closing on Friday morning with Handel's Messiah.

WAGNER AND ROCHE.*

Edmond Roche supplemented his duties as clerk at the Board of Customs in the day-time by acting as chef d'attaque of the violins at the Porte Saint-Martin in the evening. On one occasion, working in his gloomy office, his attention was aroused by the noise of a somewhat lively altercation hard by. A new arrival, a German, was with difficulty struggling against the formalities which the authorities of the Customs heap up beneath the traveller's steps. Roche interposed; the stranger's name was Wagner. Making a bow, Roche placed himself at his service, and, when Wagner thanked him, replied, "I am only too happy to oblige a great artist." "You know me then!" exclaimed Wagner, surprised at finding any one attached to the French Customs familiar with his name. Roche smiled, and, for sole reply, hummed some fragments from Tannhäuser and Lohengrin. "Ah!" said Wagner, in great delight; "it is a good augury. The first Parisian I meet is acquainted with and appreciates my music. I will at once write to Liszt. But we shall see each other again, Sir." And they did see each other again. The author of Tannhäuser had long yearned for a devoted and earnest translator, penetrated with admiration for the books as well as the music of his operas. Roche, the translater for whom Wagner had yearned, told his friend Sardou what his task was when working with Wagner on Sundays.

"At twelve, one, or sometimes and frequently two o'clock, worn out and dying with hunger, I let fall my pen and felt as though about to faint. 'What is the matter?' Wagner would inquire in great surprise.—'I am so hungry!'—'Ah! True! I never thought of that. Well, we will make haste and have a bit of something, and then go on.' So we hastily swallowed that something, and, when evening came, it found us still at work. I used to be utterly exhausted, with my head on fire and my temples feverish; I was half mad with the pursuit of the most uncouth words, while he, still erect and as fresh as the moment we began, walking to and fro, and tapping away on his piano, ended by frightening me with the big, hooked shadow which danced round me, amid the fantastic rays reflected by the lamp; like one of Hoffmann's personages, Wagner would cry out—'Go on, go on;'—filling my ears with cabalistic words and notes from other worlds."

This work, which took Roche a whole year, was destined to prove sterile. We all know about the failure of Tannhäuser. Perhaps it hastened the unhappy translator's death, which occurred on the 16th December. Roche carried with him to his dying moments a firm hope that the day of triumph would eventually come for his favourite composer, to whom he dedicated by way of consolation the subjoined verses:—

"Quand la Fatalité semble vous terrasser,
Penseurs, levez le front—C'est Dieu qui fait passer,
Pour que l'idée en vous se ranime et s'enflamme,
L'archet de la douleur sur les cordes de l'âme."

OPERA COMIQUE.

In Vienna and in all the large cities on either side of the Danube, even as far away as Constantinople, the ladies' orchestra is a recognized institution. It is impossible to go into a coffee-garden, a public singing-room, or any place where pleasure lightly resorts, without finding a band of very capable female musicians. Every instrument is pressed into the service; there are ladies with the violin and violoncello, ladies with the flute and clarionet, and ladies ready to come on with the triangle and the drum. There is nothing ungraceful in the practice; the ladies are well behaved; and if the Austrians, the Greeks, the Hungarians, the Armenians and the Turks choose to sip their coffee and drink their beer to such a musical accompaniment who shall say them nay? The ladies do not offend and the people like it.

The happy thought of introducing the ladies' orchestra to England has evidently struck Miss Lila Clay, who, owing to the extraordinary and mixed legislation connected with places of public amusement, is compelled in self-defence to seek refuge for herself and her musicians in the theatre. The music-hall would naturally be the place for a variety entertainment, however well done or however startling; but so incomprehensible are the statutes connected with those simple words, "Music and Dancing," that Miss Lila Clay is no doubt well advised in seeking protection from the Lord Chamberlain instead of risking the caprice of a magistrate's licence for anything that is unusual. Accordingly playgoers at the Opera Comique on Monday night, unaccustomed to novelties, were surprised to see a stage fitted up and adorned as it would be in a Vienna beer garden. It was a startling sight. First a complete row of crimson damsels—crimson as to their gowns, and crimson as to their prominently displayed hose—then a complete row of cream-coloured ladies, then of Prussian blue, then of mauve. High up at the back was ranged the orchestra, with harps, tambourines, and timbrels, and in the centre at the piano sat Miss Lila Clay, in short white skirts, conducting her female band with much modesty and no little skill. Unfortunately, it was impossible to reproduce the taste of Vienna intact. Englishmen require stronger meat, and so to the Viennese ladies' orchestra was added just a faint flavour and suspicion of the negro serenader. The front row of crimson maidens was, in reality, a red nigger band. There was a corner woman with jokes and castanets, and an opposite corner woman with a tambourine. A solemn leader in petticoats gave out the songs with well-considered emphasis. This was the division of the programme labelled "something new," and, on the whole, it really was not very bad. The comic songs were not very inane, and some of the sentimental songs and glees were remarkably good. There was genuine enthusiasm, for instance, when Miss Alice Aynsley Cook, daughter of a well-known singer, sang the popular ballad, "Dreaming," with very excellent expression, and the genuine spirit of fun in Miss Emma d'Auban was quickly recognized. So far so good. But when the concert was over the gaiety and grace of the entertainment seemed to fade and faint, the songs, dances, and ballads that followed were of indifferent merit, and the promise of the commencement was not fulfilled except in an American shadow and boot dance, again led by the clever and vivacious Miss Emma d'Auban. Then came a decided change. The ladies filed into the orchestra proper. Miss Lila Clay, surrounded by garlands and bouquets, presided at the piano, and the curtain rose on an operetta by Mr Robert Reece and Mr Meyer Lutz, called On Condition, which was rather too ambitious an effort for the majority of the performers. The conductor's wand was severely wanted, and a considerable amount of discipline might have been imposed on the lady low comedians, whose vivacity was unchecked. But Miss Edith Vane and Miss Aynsley Cook did their utmost to counteract the obtrusiveness of their comic sisters. The experiment is no doubt a strange one, and though only partially successful, there were bright moments in it. But the entertainment is given in distinctly the wrong place. The variety show is not yet acclimatized to the theatre, and it may be hoped it never will be.—D. T.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

The opera season is over, thank goodness, for Les Huguenots, La Favorite, and other "grand" works, interpreted by artists of second-rate talent, could not make the effect they ought on an intelligent audience.

The winter season has begun with vaudeville, drama, opera comique, and bouffe, and I hope, for the sake of M. Berard, it will be a success. Hitherto the theatre has not been crammed, but "nil desperandum." We know our manager is an excellent caterer for the public. The latest novelty has been La Poudre d'Escampette (by the author of La femme à Papa), a folie-vaudeville in three acts, the mise-en-scène of which is laid at Boulogne-sur-Mer. The plot consists of the "escampette" of the directors of a company who wish to establish at the "French Queen of Watering Places" a mineral water drinking establishment, but find that the money of the shareholders comes in better than the water, so that they appropriate the former and leave the latter to "run" by itself. Suffice it that all ends happily. An English company buys up the shares at an "enormous premium," and, in conclusion, the directors appeal to the audience to take shares, or, at all events, grant their patronage to the new company.

Le Parisien, by Ferrier, author of Les Mousquetaires au Couvent, was played last night. Les Braconniers (opera-bouffe), Les Victimes Cloitrées (drama), and Nos Députés en robe de chambre, are in rehearsal.

CHERUBINI.

Under the date of the 17th Floréal (6th May), I find this second letter from Cherubini to his wife. He was then preparing for his return to Paris:

"I thank you for all the news you sent me, my dear. I have hardly any to tell you in return. I have always the same song to repeat, namely: that the weather continues detestable, and that, had I thought I should have had such a bad time of it, I would have put off my visit for a month. Talking of visits, M. and Mad. Louis, and M. and Mad. Ethis, have pressed me very much to come down with you to Chartreuse next summer. I should be delighted, if the idea suited you, and my business allowed me to carry it out. Mad. Ethis, who is going to Paris in a few days, is sure to invite you. All the inhabitants of La Chartreuse desire their kind remembrances. I am sorry the concert is given on the 9th of the decade;* had I only known it, I would have set out from here a day earlier, so as to arrive in Paris on the 19th. But my place is taken in the coach, and I am now unable to make any change. It is not necessary for you to answer this, for your answer would not find me here. I suppose that on the day of the concert you will dine at M. Sageret's, for I am sure he has invited you. Do not refuse, for it would not be polite on your part to reject his amiable attentions. As for your brother's marriage, I am not at all offended at his contracting it without me. On the contrary, I am glad he spared me the trouble of it. All the worse for him if he is wanting in respect towards his parents. But who were the witnesses who attended the ceremony? You must tell me all this on my return. Papa† sent me a letter in which he tries to excuse himself for not being able to prevent his son's marriage being solemnized without me. I am about to reply to set his mind at ease and show that my tranquillity is not disturbed by the matter. I am delighted the public acted justly to Méhul; they were certainly bound to give him that slight compensation. I wrote two days ago, endeavouring to console him for the disappointment he has had. He has doubtless told you so himself.‡ Best compliments to everybody. I thank all who have tried to amuse you during my absence. Good bye, dear, I shall see you soon. A kiss for my Victorine and the same for you. Your faithful husband,

"CHERUBINI."

We learn from this letter that Cherubini had returned to Paris by the early part of May, 1797. He, no doubt, immediately resumed his duties at the Conservatory, and appears not to have engaged in any kind of composition, for his catalogue at this epoch is perfectly dumb. However, an unexpected circumstance was about to make him shake off for a moment his inaction. The sudden death, with the army of the Sambre-et-Meuse, of Hoche, that hero who, like Bayard, might be called the chevalier without fear and without reproach, had struck France with stupor. Paris determined on rendering striking homage to the glorious soldier, grand patriot, and noble citizen, whose soul was characterized by virtues worthy of the times of antiquity. To carry out this idea, Joseph-Marie Chénier and Cherubini were commissioned to write the words and music of a grand lyric scene to be executed simultaneously at the Opera and the Théâtre Feydeau. It was entitled the Pompe funèbre du général Hoche, and performed, as intended, at the two theatres mentioned on the 19th Vendémiaire, Year VI (11th October, 1797). The programme was published with Chénier's verses, and is curious enough to induce me to quote it:§

Scene of the third act of Roméo.—Towards the centre, and raised a few steps, the sarcophagus of the hero-pacificator. It is covered with a tricolour cloth and surmounted by a funereal urn, surrounded by palms of victory and all the attributes of a general's rank. At the rising of the curtain, a Woman in tears is leaning against the tomb; on the opposite side, some distance off, a group of Old Men, motionless with grief; on the steps, fronting the audience, a young Child, supported by its Mother and gracefully presenting an offering as pure as justly deserved. On the left, in front of the stage, a group of Women and Maidens, invoking the Supreme Being. To the right, on the same level, a Mother presses with emotion her two sons to her breast, while the father, already of a certain age, holds the eldest of the boys by the hand and seems to indicate to the Hero's spirit that they are being brought up to defend in their turn the cause for which the Hero died. Behind them is an Ensign in an attitude of despair; a little further, on a raised platform, there is seen a group of Women offering as a model to several Generals him whose exploits have conducted him to immortality. A General-in-Chief, stationed at the back of the stage, has in his hand a crown of laurel and cyprus, which he holds out from a distance towards the mausoleum. All the Staff take part in this act of homage. The tricolour flag is majestically suspended at the top of the picture, which is surrounded by various bodies of National Guards under arms. After a long silence, and at three rolls of the drums separated by as many blows on the tamtam, the picture is further developed; a funereal march begins. The Maidens respectfully approach the tomb, which they salute and then commence in chorus the first stanza of a funeral hymn; at the burden, they lay down their garlands and cover with flowers the steps of the sarcophagus. More rolls on the drums and more blows on the tamtam. The Old Men advance, the other personages making way for them; they sing the second stanza of the hymn; at the burden, they pass before the tomb, and, in their turn, lay down oak branches as a tribute of their gratitude. At the same time, the General-in-Chief, followed by all the Staff, comes down the stage and crowns the funeral urn. His comrades in arms, grouped round the mausoleum, indicate that this act of homage is that of their hearts. They sing the third stanza. At the burden, the Commander-in-Chief and his followers draw their swords, and cross them over the tomb. At a given signal, all the Troops hasten down the stage and defile past the sarcophagus. The Women, by a counter-march, advance simultaneously to the highest part of the platform previously occupied by the Troops. The fourth stanza is sung; the Troops give a running fire, and a general group, arranged in a manner contrary to that at the beginning, terminates the ceremony. The curtain falls amid the beating of drums and a military flourish of trumpets.

"HYMNE FUNÈBRE, PAR CHÉNIER, MUSIQUE DE CHERUBINI.

"LES FEMMES.

"Du haut de la voûte éternelle,
Jeune héros, reçois nos pleurs;
Que notre douleur solennelle
T'offre des hymnes et des fleurs.
Ah! sur ton urne sépulcrale
Gravons ta gloire et nos regrets;
Et que la palme triomphale
S'élève au sein de tes cyprès.

"LES VIELLARDS.

"Aspires à ses destinées,
Guerriers, défenseurs de nos lois:
Tous ses jours furent des années;
Tous ses faits furent des exploits.
La mort qui frappa sa jeunesse
Respectera son souvenir:
S'il n'atteignit point la vieillesse,
Il sera vieux dans l'avenir.

"LES GUERRIERS.

"Sur les rochers de l'Armorique
Il terrassa la trahison;
Il vanquit l'hydre fanatique
Semant la flamme et le poison.
La guerre civile étouffée
Cède à son bras libérateur;
Et c'est là le plus beau trophée
D'un héros pacificateur.

"Oui, tu seras notre modèle;
Tu n'as pas terni tes lauriers;
Ta voix libre, ta voix fidèle,
Est toujours présente aux guerriers.
Aux champs d'honneur où vit ta gloire,
Ton ombre, au milieu de nos rangs,
Saura captiver la victoire
Et punir encor les tyrans."

* A grand concert given at the Théâtre Feydeau on the 19th Floréal.

† "Papa" was Mdme Cherubini's father.

‡ The piece meant is still Jeune Henri. In consequence of the worthlessness of the libretto, by Bouilly, the work was a failure, and was not allowed to be finished, despite the beauties scattered about the score. But, while hissing the librettist, the audience wished to do justice to the musician, and enthusiastically encored the overture. The latter survived the shipwreck, and became celebrated under the title of "La Chasse du Jeune Henri."

"YES, I HAVE DARED TO LOVE THEE."

This little ballad, which is causing such a sensation in the fashionable world,—has thrown so many a tea-table into confusion, and cooled the muffin on the lip of female beauty—this little ballad had its origin in the following startling incident:—In an aristocratic family, not five thousand miles from Belgravia, the youngest daughter of the house was a creature all gaiety and gushiness, who added to the carol of the lark, the eye of the eagle, the neck of the stag, and the ringlets of the raven. That heart, having all the softness of the sponge, had absorbed the delicious ballad of "Will you love me then as now," and she was in the habit of trilling it out from morning till night in her boudoir not five thousand miles from Belgravia.

Among the numerous serving-men in the vast establishment of her father was one who evidently had a heart of Indian-rubber bounding about under a waistcoat of red plush, and who, in the course of his duties, frequently came into close communication with the Belgravian maiden. His impressible fancy soon took the image of the eagle-eyed, stag-necked, raven-ringleted creature, and the rosy fetters of Cupid were continually tripping him up when he entered with the coals, or came to deliver the card, the message or the billet. This went on for some time, until on one occasion he entered the salon just as the syren of Belgravia had commenced her accustomed word-larking of the popular ballad, "Will you love me then as now?" when, seized with a sudden inspiration—the bounding heart fluttering under the waistcoat, causing him to forget the plush, and reducing him as it were to a non-plush,—the sensitive serving-man bust forth with the passionate exclamation of "Yes, I have dared to love thee!" A popular composer, hearing of the incident, availed himself of the circumstance with his usual tact, and the result has been the ballad, which is now in every lady's mouth, upon every lady's piano, and in every boarding-school music bill.—Punch.

"YESTERDAY."*

(For Music.)

A rose tapped at my window-pane
But yesterday—but yesterday!
It said: "The summer's here again"
(But yesterday! Sweet yesterday!)
"Then wander in the garden ways,
And hear what one who loves you says,
For love is for these golden days,"
Oh, yesterday! Sweet yesterday!
The sun is shining—the roses bloom,
But Life and Summer must pass away,
And Love will linger a night—a noon,
And then—it will be yesterday!

The grass was green and gold with flowers
But yesterday! Sweet yesterday!
And oh, the brief and laughing hours
Of yesterday—of yesterday!
We lingered in the jasmine bowers,
Our feet were set in summer flowers;
A little space of love was ours
But yesterday! Sweet yesterday!
The sun is shining, &c., &c.
* * * *

It seems a weary while ago
That yesterday—that yesterday!
My heart it was not aching so
But yesterday! Sweet yesterday!
There is no rose upon the tree,
The breeze it sighs so wearily,
And all we dreamt of—cannot be
Since yesterday! Oh, yesterday!
The sun is shining, &c., &c.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE GREAT ORGAN.—The great organ in the Crystal Palace transept has been for some months in course of thorough reconstruction by its builders, Messrs Gray & Davison, and will be inaugurated to-day (Saturday), by Mr. A. J. Eyre, organist to the company. Arrangements have been made for recitals by the most distinguished English and foreign organists on successive Saturdays.

WAIFS.

BALFE.—I read in the papers that a memoir of the Life and Work of Michael William Balfe, the gifted composer of the Bohemian Girl and of a hundred works as charming, which will live as long as English music lives, is in the press. The author of the memoir is Mr W. A. Barrett; and the book, it is hoped, will be ready by Oct. 20th next, the anniversary of Balfe's death, and the day fixed for the unveiling of the monumental tablet to his memory in Westminster Abbey.—G. A. S., Illustrated London News, Sept. 19.

ALBANI.—We are happy to inform our readers that Mdme Albani has most kindly consented to sing at a concert to be given in the New Public Hall, in aid of the Broadway Church Restoration Fund, on Tuesday, the 14th or 18th November; and it is expected that several distinguished amateurs will assist on the occasion.—Berrow's Worcester Journal.

Max Bruch is expected in America next month.

Engel, the tenor, has been singing at Aix-les-Bains.

Mad. Wilt has begun a series of performances at Trieste.

Ponchielli is writing a Mass for the Cathedral, Bergamo.

Mad. Zagury-Harris has signed with Mr Mapleson for America.

Rafael Joseffy, the pianist, remains in New York another year.

Mr J. Rosenthal, the accomplished violinist, has returned to town.

Scalchi, the contralto, is engaged by Mr Mapleson for his American season.

The Italian season at the Teatro Solis, Montevideo, was a failure.

Stagno, the tenor, was lately in Milan, and may possibly appear at the Scala.

Campanini, Mr Mapleson's once most cherished tenor, has been singing at Parma.

Suppé's Donna Juanita is in preparation at the Teatro de la Alhambra, Madrid.

After her benefit at Messina, Teresa Singer's admirers gave her a torchlight serenade.

It is said that Angelo Neumann will take his Nibelungen Company next month to Milan.

A new Politeama, accommodating upwards of 2,000 persons, has been opened at Alessandria.

A new ballet, La Cetra incantata, by Pulini, has been produced at the Circo Nazionale, Naples.

An Italian opera company, under Scalvini, has been performing at the Alhambra Theatre, Madrid.

The "Théo" is expected back in Paris some time next month. (Happy Parisians!—Dr Blitz.)

Aimée has cancelled her engagement with Maurice Grau, and will not revisit America for the present.

Bianca Bianchi will fulfil an engagement in November at the Operahouse, Frankfort-on-the-Maine.

Tamberlik, "the Great," is at the Circo-Teatro, Vigo, in the double capacity of manager and singer.

The pupils and admirers of the late Theodor Kullak intend erecting a monument over his grave at Berlin.

Kleopatra, an opera by W. Freudenberg, is to be brought out next month at the Ducal Theatre, Wiesbaden.

After an interval of nearly thirty years, Spontini's Vestale has been revived at the Stadttheater, Hamburgh.

Desirée Artôt and her husband, Padilla, have gone to Baden, to sing at a concert before the Empress of Russia.

Mr Wilhelm Ganz has arrived in town from his tour in Germany, returning viâ Frankfort, Mayence, and Cologne.

It is said that Friedrich-Materna, accompanied by a full German operatic company, will revisit America next season.

The season at the Teatro Lirico, Barcelona, was inaugurated with Rigoletto, to be followed shortly by Die Zauberflöte.

Gisela Koppmayer, a pupil of Mad. Marchesi's, has made her début as Amneris, in Aïda, at the Stadttheater, Hamburgh.

After the conclusion of the Italian opera season at Athens, the company left to fulfil an engagement in Constantinople.

Hector Berlioz's Damnation de Faust is to be performed, under the direction of Theodore Thomas, this winter at Chicago.

Among the novelties announced for the approaching Italian season in Cadiz are Boïto's Mefistofele and Donizetti's Duca d'Alba.

The first theatres in Germany lighted by electricity will probably be the Court, Residence, and Gärtnerplatz Theatre, Munich.

A buffo opera, La bella Portoghese, music by La Monaca and Rispetto, has been produced at the Teatro Metastasio, Rome.

Davidoff, the Russian violoncellist, will play in November and December at the concerts of the Rhenish Musical Association.

The principal characters in Boïto's Mefistofele at the Teatro Real, Madrid, will be sustained by Teodorini, Masini, and Nannetti.

Aglaja Orgeni (once a prima donna under the late Mr Frederick Gye), is fulfilling an engagement at the Theatre Royal, Munich.

Coleridge was not a member of the Blue Ribbon Army. Did he not say: "Water, water, everywhere, and not a drop to drink"?

Sangiorgi, the composer, already a Knight of the Order of Saints Maurice and Lazarus, has been decorated with the Cross of Italy.

An opera, from the pen of a young composer, English by birth, but educated in Paris, is promised at the Teatro Brunetti, Bologna.

A fire broke out on the 25th ult. in the Theatre at Oerebro, Sweden, and left only the bare walls standing. No lives were lost.

Hofmann's opera, Aennchen von Tharau, will shortly be given, under the direction of Arno Kleffel, at the Stadttheater, Magdeburgh.

Amalie Tellini (von Thelen), formerly prima donna at the Stadttheater, Bremen, is engaged—to Lieut. Col. von Walthoffen, Vienna.

David Popper is in Lisbon, whence the violoncellist (husband of Sophie Menter, the pianist), starts on a six months' tour in Spain and Portugal.

Several managers in Italy have announced their intention of giving performances for the benefit of sufferers through the inundations there.

Two new compositions, a Mass, and an "Ave, Maris Stellæ," by Ciro Pinsuti, were recently performed at a church festival in Sinalunga, (Italy).

Léo Delibes spent two or three days in Brussels lately, to superintend the initiatory rehearsals of his Jean de Nivelle, at the Théâtre de la Monnaie.

Abbey intends giving three "Christine Nilsson Concerts" at Steinway Hall, New York, on the 28th and 30th November, and the 2nd December.

A three-act buffo opera, Die Jungfrau von Belleville, music by Millöcker, has been produced at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater, Berlin.

Carmen will be played this autumn at Treviso, Vicenza, Ancona, and Palermo; Mignon, at Florence, Genoa, Vicenza, Cagliari, Madrid, and St Petersburg.

Mdme Leslino, formerly of the Grand Opera, Paris, has completed a very successful twelve nights' engagement with the Italian opera company, Warsaw.

Emil Paur, Capellmeister at Mannheim, has written a Violin Concerto, which E. Sauret, the violinist, will include in his reportory for the coming season.

The "Florentine Orchestra," consisting of 70 performers, 12 of whom are soloists, will shortly make a concert tour through Austro-Hungary and Germany.

Teresina Tua, the young violinist, has played by special invitation at the Imperial Palace, Potsdam. The Crown Prince was profuse in his compliments.

In setting up the "costly trousseau of the bride," the compositor of course got it "trousers," and it was some time before the editor could pacify the angry bridegroom.

Nothing positive is yet known concerning Gayarre's reported engagement at the Teatro Apollo, Rome.—(This would, to untutored intelligence, seem more or less credible.—Dr Blidge.)

Aida is being performed at Genoa for the sixth time. On the first occasion it ran 32 nights; on the second, 16; on the third (with Adelina Patti), 2; on the fourth, 8; and on the fifth, 18; making a total of 76.

The Municipality of Verona have determined to hand over, for the benefit of the sufferers by the inundations, the sum intended for the Teatro Filarmonico, which will consequently remain closed during the Carnival.

New Novel.—Charles Quentin's new novel, published by Richard Bentley & Son, is entitled A Fearless Life. We look forward with lively curiosity to the perusal of another work from the pen that wrote Through the Storm.

At the exhibition held at Christchurch, New Zealand, a gold medal was awarded to Messrs P. J. Smith & Co., of Bristol and Princes Street, London, for their iron-strutted pianofortes, all of which found purchasers in the colony.

La Primavera, a "Symphonic Poem," by Sig. Nodoreda, was performed at a recent concert of the Euterpe Vocal Association, Barcelona. ("Symphonic Poem" is a convenient name for those who, like Liszt, cannot compose a symphony.—Dr Blidge.)

CHANGE.

When the autumn leaves are falling,
Blown o'er hill and dale apace,
Tell me, can I but remember
That sad look in that sad face?

When the springtime, with its freshness,
Brought back brightness to those eyes,
I forgot the autumn sadness
When I saw the orbs I prize.

Yes! I prize them summer, winter,
Autumn, springtime, and a look
Tells me there is no more sadness,
And I read them—as a book!

Boulogne-sur-Mer, September, 1882. X. T. R.

Catania.—The unveiling of the Bellini Monument has again been put off—this time for a year. The principal reason assigned for the postponement is a wish that the new Theatre, which will bear the composer's name, and is still in an incomplete state, may be inaugurated simultaneously with the Monument.

The Royal Albert Hall was filled "to the roof" on Thursday night, the occasion being Mdme Christine Nilsson's and Mr Sims Reeves' "Benefit Concert" and the last appearance this year of Mdme Nilsson, who leaves England for a lengthened concert-tour in America. Particulars in our next.

An Extinct Race.—From the Trovatore we learn that Velluti was the last "man-soprano" who sang at the Milan Scala. He did so in 1814. It was chiefly owing to Rossini that such male sopranos made way for female contraltos.* In 1798, on the other hand, a woman, Gazzotti, assumed male attire and sang the soprano part in Zingarelli's Pirro, and in 1806, Schmalz, followed her example, in Nicolini's Abenamet e Zoraide and Federici's Idomeneo.

* Bravissimo, Rossini! Twenty Wagners in one—or rather, no Wagners in twenty.—Dr Blidge.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs, giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

JULES BRISSAC.

Price 3s.

London: C. JEFFERYS, 67, Berners Street, W.

"What musical amateur does not know the delightful sonata in G, Op. 30, for violin and pianoforte, with its brilliant and dashing first movement, its tender and tuneful menuetto, and its hilarious presto? But a violinist is not always at hand, and the transcriber comes to our aid with the legitimate exercise of his art. This exquisite little movement in E flat, with its captivating melody, has received perfect treatment at the hands of M. Jules Brissac, who has thereby rendered its beauties available even in the absence of the violin."—"Queen," July 30, 1882.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. BRISTOL MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

Bristol, Tuesday.

It is now possible to congratulate this ancient city upon having taken a permanent place among festival towns. Not that the triennial music meeting at Bristol has passed beyond the period of youth. It was born only nine years ago, and the present solemnity, therefore, is but fourth in what we all hope and trust may be a long list. What the institution lacks in age, however, seems made up in earnestness, and in the widely-expressed sympathy of influential persons. As regards this last feature, the current programme deserves to rank among curiosities. Its opening pages look like a "Court Guide," so great is the array of impressive names. After the patron, her Majesty the Queen, and the president, his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, come 148 vice-presidents, including nearly all the titled and untitled aristocracy of the Western shires, to say nothing of a group of Mayors, the rear being brought up by 500 members of the "Musical Festival Society," who are not chorus singers, be it observed, but guarantors of £10 each. Obviously, the Festival managers believe, with Napoleon, that Providence is on the side of big battalions, while it is not less clear that public opinion in the district goes heart and soul with them. This is well, but something which would be better if results could be greater than their cause remains to note. The familiar locution, "ship-shape and Bristol fashion," stands for every form of constructive good, and the Musical Festival Society is one of the local institutions which justify Bristol in accepting the compliment that form of words conveys. Kindred societies elsewhere let their light shine before men only once in three years, or are satisfied with keeping up their organization by means of an occasional performance. Here, on the other hand, work of a most practical kind is always being done, the festival body having established itself as a teaching body also. In what manner this has been done, and with what results, let the following extract from the prospectus show:

"The diffusion of sound musical education amongst the people being one of the objects of the society, self-supporting singing classes, under experienced and well-qualified teachers, were established in every district of the city of Bristol, where a sufficient number of pupils offered themselves. The fee charged in order to place these classes within the reach of all was fixed at 3d. per lesson. The committee are happy to be able to report that the experiment was in every respect highly encouraging. During the winter seasons of 1880-81, 1881-82 the classes included 794 pupils, of whom 260 successfully passed examination, and obtained certificates for efficiency in singing at sight, in time and tune."

Carrying on further the mission with which the society thus charged itself, the profits of the present Festival will assist in endowing a permanent scholarship at the Royal College of Music, the medical charities of the city benefitting only by collections made at the doors after each performance. So much zeal for musical education by the leaders of a great community should have fitting acknowledgment. It is a sign of the times and also a precedent which might advantageously be followed elsewhere. Reference to the society's labours outside the triennial meeting would lack completeness if nothing were said about the concerts regularly given each winter. In nine years there have been publicly performed here six works by Handel, three by Beethoven, two by Spohr, eight by Mendelssohn, and one each by Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Weber, Berlioz, Rossini, Verdi, Schumann, Goetz, Macfarren, Brahms, Gounod, and Gade—in all thirty-two, mostly of large proportions. These are results to which the proverb "Good wine needs no bush" specially applies. They are honourable to the Western city as a place of culture, and indicative of as much "sweetness and light" as we can reasonably expect in a busy town of trade and commerce.

The resources of the present Festival are considerable, if not quite satisfactory. Mr Charles Hallé, besides acting as conductor, provides the orchestra, which is, of course, that located, with himself, at Manchester. It includes fifty-eight "strings," headed by Herr Straus, and the usual proportion of "wind," making in all eighty performers; with whom are associated the 385 voices of the Festival Choral Society. At Birmingham, where fewer voices were employed, the instruments exceeded a hundred, and, as the Midland Hall is better for sound than the Western, it follows that the proportion of singers to instruments must be wrong in one case or the other. The error, in my opinion, is certainly not at Birmingham, since the great power of Sir M. Costa's band, judiciously employed, produced a splendour of effect impossible here. There remains the consideration that, good as is the ensemble of Mr Hallé's orchestra, there are qualities in which it necessarily falls short of one picked from the best performers in London. The solo vocalists engaged on this occasion are mostly those about whose Festival doings I have had to speak once or twice of late. Mdme Albani and Miss Anna Williams, Mdme Patey and Mdme Trebelli, Mr Lloyd and Mr Maas, Mr Hilton and Mr Santley, with Mr Harper Kearton and Mr Montague Worlock, make up a force sufficiently strong for the work in hand. Mr Riseley, the Cathedral organist, presides at the fine instrument in the Colston Hall, and Mr D. W. Rootham, who won his spurs as chorus-master three years ago, has again done excellent service in that capacity. Concerning the selection of works for performance, little can be said in disparagement, the committee having taken a common-sense, not a fantastic, view of the situation, and discovered that the road to success lies in pleasing legitimate tastes according to the measure of their prevalence. For those who love standard classical works, there are Elijah and The Messiah—twin pillars upon which the possibilities of nearly every English festival rest. For the admirers of absolute novelty, a cantata, Jason, by Messrs W. Grist and A. C. Mackenzie, is provided, while demand for the merely unfamiliar cannot fail to be met either by Rossini's Moses in Egypt on the one hand, or Beethoven's great Mass in D on the other. For the rest there are Haydn's Spring, and a number of important orchestral pieces. In the programme, also, is Gounod's Redemption, but this occupies a place apart, since it appeals to all by exciting a common curiosity, and I may here add, has appealed so powerfully that tickets now command a fancy price. The foregoing works speak for themselves; and, though it may be possible to prove that others are as worthy, it would be hard indeed to demonstrate that the programme's influence for good falls short of completeness. It remains to state that the Royal President of the Festival, with the Duchess of Edinburgh, will attend the performance of Moses in Egypt on Thursday morning, and that the Mayor has requested the citizens to decorate the streets through which the illustrious visitors will pass. There was need for such a request, since Bristol, however proud of its Festival, contrives to hide the feeling with singular success. A few weeks ago, I saw the large city of Hamburg resplendent with colour in honour of a gathering of singers. That is the German way of doing such things; we have a rule of our own, which consists in leaving them undone, and saves expense and trouble at the cost of the outward and visible poetry so lamentably absent from English common life.

The performance of Elijah this morning was attended by a very large audience, who filled nearly every seat in the hall—proof thus accumulating upon proof that Mendelssohn's oratorio is a matter of public demand. A healthy interest in the proceedings seemed to be taken by all present. The principal artists were cheered as they came upon the platform; Mr Hallé was loudly applauded in turn, and the proper Festival spirit evidently pervaded the throng. As usual on such occasions, the National Anthem served as prelude, the solo verses being sung by Miss Williams and Mr Maas, after which the audience settled down to hear the oratorio in silence, according to the committee's request. A detailed notice of the performance would be superfluous, and comment might with propriety limit itself to such evidence of the quality of band and chorus as was afforded. The Bristol chorus is undoubtedly a good one, the contraltos and tenors deserving especial mention for an admirable blending of sweetness and strength: while, if the basses seem deficient in volume, no other fault can be found with them, nor any at all with the sopranos. In point of fact, these singers sustain the excellent character so quickly won under the late regretted Alfred Stone. An occasional want of simultaneous "attack" in the Elijah choruses was doubtless attributable to unfamiliarity with Mr Hallé's beat, as I understand there had been no previous rehearsal. This, however, and certain other shortcomings in matters of detail, hardly amounted to sensible, and assuredly escaped being prominent, disfigurements. The solos were not divided, as usual, amongst a double set of artists; each part remaining in the same hands throughout. Thus Miss Anna Williams sang all the soprano music, and Mdme Patey all that for contralto; Mr Maas taking the tenor airs, and Mr Santley once more, as grandly as ever, impersonating the Prophet. At least one advantage resulted from this arrangement. Under ordinary circumstances the contralto air, "Woe unto them," is in the hands of an artist who feels that she ought to have been entrusted with, "O, rest in the Lord," and is not in the mood to bestow great pains upon the less popular though much finer song. To-day no such conditions prevailed, and "Woe unto them" was given with all the effect of which it is capable. Rarely has it made a greater impression, or more powerfully vindicated the judgment of the composer. How the solo music generally was sung can be imagined. Enough, that all the artists concerned sustained their reputation, and it is only requisite to add that Mr Santley's reading of the Prophet's part was more remarkable than ever for powerful and elaborate dramatic expression.

The hall was by no means as well attended this evening as in the morning, for the reason, perhaps, that many "weak-kneed" amateurs knew just enough about Beethoven's Second Mass to make them evade further difficulty with the problems it presents. Still, the gathering was more than respectable in point of numbers, and even those who were not connoisseurs heard the work, which must have been to them quite enigmatical, with exemplary patience and attention. The Mass in D, like the Choral Symphony, is no longer considered an impossibility even where moderate resources are available. It has been performed at a Festival of the Three Choirs, and we hear of it from time to time in other unexpected places. Nevertheless, its impossibility remains. At the best only an approximation to that which was in the mind of the composer can be made. Neither human skill nor human voices are equal to the demands of this music, and it follows that the best performance leaves behind a sense of dissatisfaction. The interpretation which the work received to-night was distinctly not the best, yet I know not how to blame those engaged in it, for certainly the chorus may claim immunity from censure. They had studied the music well, and had mastered it as far as the idea of masterhood enters into the matter at all; while it can readily be granted that Mr Hallé's instrumentalists are individually competent to the task they had in hand, and that artists like Mdme Albani, Mdme Patey, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Hilton leave little to be desired. As, however, every effect must have a cause, blame is fairly due somewhere or other, and may, perhaps, be justly laid at the door of those who neglected to provide for sufficient preparation. It will hardly be credited that the week's programme was supposed to be rehearsed yesterday between one o'clock p.m. and midnight. The arrangements, it is true, contemplated a special trial of Mr Mackenzie's cantata on Thursday morning, but, allowing for this, how much time could be devoted on Monday to Beethoven's gigantic work? Obviously not half enough, and hence the shortcomings of this evening, some of which were made serious by the omission or muddling of whole phrases in the instrumental score of the "Et vitam venturis." In such a case it is the unfairest thing in the world to rate the performers—they are fellow-victims with the composer to the wretched perfunctoriness which disgraces so many of our English festivals, and, in order to save the penny of a little extra cost, sacrifices the pound of artistic efficiency. Another time Bristol must follow in the steps of Birmingham, whose Festival managers have at length learned wisdom and mastered the lesson that George Eliot put into few words, "God loves good carpentry." The miscellaneous selection which followed the Mass, was, it may be presumed, much more to the taste of a majority among the audience. Its instrumental numbers included the overtures to Rienzi and Ruy Blas, together with the Sylph Ballet and Hungarian March from Berlioz's Faust. The vocal pieces were contributed by Mdme Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Mdme Patey, Mr Hilton, and Mr Lloyd, who may be congratulated upon the addition to his repertory of the beautiful prize song from Die Meistersinger. This charming example of the Proteus among composers suits him, and he secures for the music more than ordinary effect.

Wednesday.

Gounod's Redemption was performed this morning for the third time in England, and for the first time apart from the festival at which it was produced. Bristol rapidly caught the excitement regarding this work which prevailed at Birmingham, for no sooner had the committee here announced an intention to give it a place in their programme than applications for seats began to pour in. As in the midland town, the less affluent classes of amateurs found themselves out of the running. I am told that of the vast crowd in Colston Hall this morning less than two score occupied unreserved seats. The fact betokens a genuine curiosity, not less notable than rare, in connection with musical things. As a rule, our public, firmly attaching themselves to excellence which is familiar, are comparatively indifferent about prospecting for excellence that has to be discovered. I wish this were not so; but the fact remains, and it would be ridiculous to fly in its face. The fact remains, notwithstanding a universal desire to know Gounod's work. This apparent phenomenon, indeed, is no phenomenon at all, in the sense of being unexpected and surprising. We may rightly look upon it as only a varied manifestation of the instinct which attaches the English public to whatever they have learned to admire. Precisely the same thing happened thirty-six years ago, when Mendelssohn's Elijah was produced. The name of Mendelssohn was a power, and the force of it, rather than an abstract desire to make acquaintance with novelty, caused the work to run like wildfire through the land. In the matter of Redemption history is repeating itself, though Gounod be not Mendelssohn and his oratorio not Elijah. I suppose the audience assembled this morning deserved the title of "distinguished." At any rate, the Vice-Presidents' gallery was crowded, instead of being half empty as on previous occasions. It is pleasant to record this fact, because appearances had begotten an idea that the imposing array of titled names in the prospectus was only so much Dutch metal and cheap splendour. Since one vice-president in the flesh is better than a whole row of names, the serried ranks of this morning were good to look upon.

Redemption having been so largely discussed a few weeks ago, the public memory needs no present help towards recalling its scope and character. The real question for consideration now is how far first impressions are confirmed, modified, or removed by closer acquaintance. On this head, my own task is easy, as must, I imagine, be that of all who entered at first into the mind of the composer; recognizing his indisputable claim to be judged according to his purpose, and upon the basis of those canons of art which exist distinct from the teachings of individuals or of schools. There are two considerations all should have in mind who would form an intelligent opinion upon the new oratorio. One of these recognizes in Redemption a feature common to works of the kind, namely, the musical treatment of distinctly lyrical passages, such as abound in the third part of the work. No question of principle, but rather of method and expression, is involved here. M. Gounod has approached the lyrical text in his own way, and the only thing for an audience to do is to determine whether the way suits them. The more important consideration remains. M. Gounod, departing from all previous forms, has produced an oratorio that, as to the bulk of it, is a musical setting of narrative. Generally speaking, such works employ narrative as a means to the end of lyrical or abstractedly musical expression. Here it is itself the end, and not only so, but the idea of the composer has evidently been to keep his art subordinate—in attendance, so to speak, upon the verbal text, and taking therefrom its "cue" as to form and colour. If we admit his right to do this, we must judge the result with reference to the design, and then the question stands: Is the narrative made impressive by appropriate musical surroundings? If we are conscious, as the "wondrous tale" goes on, that it touches the heart and excites the emotions, that the events seem brought nearer to us, and made clearer to that inner perception which an old writer has called the "eye of the soul"—this, I take it, constitutes M. Gounod's justification, and, more, his success. The favour of the public turns, of course, upon the perception of this fact, and as to that I have very slight misgiving. M. Gounod's art is assisted by the overwhelming interest of the story he has chosen to illustrate, so much assisted that it is a moot point whether the composer is not more indebted to the subject than the subject to the composer. The question so raised need not be considered, because when the one and the other stand so nearly on a level there can hardly be a question of disparagement on either side. It would, perhaps, be rash to prophesy as to the future of Redemption, but I venture to record an impression that the work will hold its ground, not by comparison with oratorios constructed on a different model, but because of its own distinctive features, which are in all essential respects those of a masterpiece.

The performance to-day cannot be compared with that given at Birmingham, under the composer's direction. It lacked completeness, nothing short of which, however, could be set down against the chorus, who were obviously prepared to do the work all possible justice; nor could the solo vocalists be blamed save in so far as a single mishap of no particular consequence affected the result. It follows that the orchestra were most at fault, and here I take the earliest opportunity of inviting those who may know better than myself to correct a report which, if untrue, should at once be set right. It is said that Mr Hallé's band had not rehearsed the Redemption music till they were called upon to do so late on Monday night, after having left Manchester at a very early hour in the morning. If this be a fact, it is no wonder that slips occurred here and there, the wonder being, indeed, that the oratorio was gone through at all in anything like decent fashion. Nor can it amount to a marvel that the Redemption suffered generally from a reading which was not that of the composer's at Birmingham. Mr Hallé took many of the important numbers perceptibly faster than did M. Gounod. Among these were the "March to Calvary," which became almost trivial, and the triumphal chorus, "Unfold ye portals everlasting," which lost much of its dignity. It is the old English story, not to be told in different fashion even by a German conductor, and the old story says, "Do not be particular; get through the work somehow. Possibly no one will be any the wiser." Against this I protest, and shall protest. Better do nothing than not do the best possible. The world groans under the infliction of that which is merely tolerable. As far, however, as the principal vocalists were concerned, there was not much occasion for groaning. Mdme Albani, Mdme Patey, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Santley repeated their Birmingham triumphs; while Miss Williams, Mr Worlock, and Mr Hilton, in parts which were new to them, gave every reason for the most exacting to be satisfied. There is a temptation, indeed, to dwell upon the manner in which some of the solos were rendered, and to praise in detail the combined fervour and technical skill of Mdme Albani, the pathos of Mdme Patey in the touching song of "The Virgin Mother," the qualities which earned for Mr Lloyd a distinguished place among musical "narrators," and the marvellous expressive power, without the least undue emphasis, of Mr Santley as the "Redeemer." These qualities stood out prominently, and, aided by the singing of the chorus, rescued the performance from the failure which, in their absence, it must inevitably have been. That the music made a deep impression was obvious. Albeit those who heard it refrained from applause; sensation was "in the air," and the audience were inspired by it.

This evening's programme, though abounding in interest, contained nothing new and very little that the average amateur would regard as unfamiliar. It was clear, however, that the average amateur accounted the absence of novelty no drawback. He came multiplied a thousandfold, and showed himself thoroughly satisfied with the music put before him. I am not going to complain of him on this account. The man must be very hard to please who cannot find pleasure in a programme containing Haydn's Spring, Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony, Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in G (No. 4), and a number of vocal pieces, among which figured conspicuously, "Ocean, thou mighty monster" (Miss Williams), "Pensa alla Patria" (Mdme Trebelli), Weber's "Waft me, ye Zephyrs" (Mr Maas), and Spohr's "Der Kriegeslust" (Mr Santley). The orchestra appeared at its best in the symphony and concerto. Here the performers were on ground accustomed and firm. They knew their way about, and acquitted themselves admirably, as they would have done on each previous occasion had sufficient rehearsal been allowed. The solo in the concerto was undertaken by Mr Hallé, who did it justice as a matter of course, and fairly earned the loud applause that followed each movement. Haydn's delightful Spring music made its accustomed effect, perhaps more than usual, so completely were all the executants in harmony with its spirit. Miss Williams, Mr Maas, and Mr Hilton left nothing undone for the solos that skill and sympathy could achieve.

"THE ORGANISTS QUARTERLY JOURNAL OF ORIGINAL COMPOSITIONS."

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—Having had the pleasure to send you, through my publishers, the last part (56) of my Organist's Quarterly Journal, I desire to inform you that this October number completes the seventh volume, and the fourteenth year of its existence, a fact I believe to be unparalleled in the history of organ publications. No less than 336 original compositions for the organ have been expressly written for and published in this work, a large number of which bear the honoured names of eminent European organists. When I first started the work in 1868, very little organ music by English writers was sold in England—certainly very little that paid the cost of publication; but matters are very different now, and I hope you will not only regard my work as having had much to do with this happy change, but will give me encouragement to continue my labours with a view to still greater efficiency and usefulness.—I am, yours faithfully, WM. SPARK.

Leeds, October 15, 1882.

MUSICAL COMPOSITIONS.

"Here's a coil!"

—Old Play.

One of the Acts lately passed was to amend the Law of Copyright relating to musical compositions, and to protect the public from vexatious proceedings for the recovery of penalties for the unauthorized performance of the same. On and after the passing of this Act the proprietor of the copyright in any musical composition first published after the passing of the statute, or his assignee, who shall be entitled to and desirous of retaining in his own hands exclusively the right of public representation or performance of the same, shall print or cause to be printed upon the title-page of every published copy of such musical composition a notice to the effect that the right of public representation or performance is reserved.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—At the students' rehearsal last Tuesday, Mr Woods played the slow movement, and Mr Robinson the last movement (with orchestra), of Brahms's new pianoforte concerto in B flat (performed, for the first time in its complete form at last Saturday's Crystal Palace Concert by Mr Oscar Beringer). Both students, who are pupils of Mr W. H. Holmes, went through their difficult task with remarkable ability, reflecting credit on themselves and on their accomplished instructor.

ARTHUR SULLIVAN BOUGHT A CARPET.

(From the "Boston Herald," U. S.)

He bought a carpet in Alexandria, and the purchase took him three months. One morning, so runs Dr Sullivan's narrative, he was passing by one of the bazaars where tapestries and such things are sold, when a particularly handsome and rich fabric caught his eye. He went in, and, after pretending to look over a lot of things which in reality he did not want, he said to the man who solemnly presided over the place, "And what is the price of that carpet?" "That," responded the dealer, "is not for sale. I purchased that particular carpet at a great cost to feast my eyes upon. It is magnificent—superb. I could not part with that. No, by Allah!" or words to that effect. "Will the English gentleman have a cup of coffee?" The English gentleman would. He would also have a cigarette. After that he went away. In a day or two he came around again, and once more made the pretence of looking through Macdallah's stock. He had obviously failed to fool the sly Egyptian before as to the article he really wanted, so he took more time to it upon this occasion. As he expected, the sedate owner of the bazaar finally approached him. "I have concluded, after several sleepless nights," said the merchant, "to part with that carpet. It grieves me very much to do so, for I have become very fond of it. I had hoped that it would be the light of my eyes in my old age. But the Prophet has counselled unselfishness among his people, and I will sell to the English gentleman." "How much?" "One hundred pounds." "Nonsense. I'll give you £5."

The Egyptian's dignity was obviously wounded. An expression of absolute pain crossed his face. But he forgave Dr Sullivan, and they had another cup of coffee and a cigarette together. Then Dr Sullivan went away, as before. In a week or so he dropped around again. After going through the regular business of looking over the stock, he was again approached by Macdallah. "I have concluded, after much thought," said that worthy, "that I asked you too much for the carpet the other day. When Macdallah feels he is in the wrong, he is quick to acknowledge it. The English gentleman can have the beautiful carpet for £90." "Now you acknowledge your error," replied Mr Sullivan, "I will confess that I was wrong in offering you only £5 for your carpet the other day. I did that in joke, of course. I didn't mean it. Bless you, no. And since you are prepared to make concessions, I will do the same. Instead of £5, I will give you £6." More coffee and another cigarette. The next time Dr Sullivan went around, the merchant took off £5 more, and the purchaser added £1. So it went on, with haggling and coffee, until Dr Sullivan had finally agreed to give £12, at which price he took away the carpet. It would have cost about 250 dols. in London. He says that the kind of business mentioned is considered the strictly proper thing in Egypt and Turkey. But Americans, he adds, are spoiling the trade in this direction. While he was in Alexandria a gentleman named Morgan, from New York, came along and visited the bazaar of Macdallah. Three carpets struck his fancy and he priced them. "Three hundred pounds," said Macdallah. "Well," replied Mr Morgan, "that seems a fair price, and I'll take them. Here's your money." The next time Dr Sullivan saw the merchant he was almost tearing his hair with rage against the "dog of a Christian." He explained the matter in an injured tone to the sympathizing Englishman, adding that Mr Morgan's method was not "business."

—Very Old Play.

Of the various localities in town and country which have been mentioned as the probable scene of the first performance of Mr Gilbert and Mr Sullivan's new comic opera, no one is, we believe, the correct one. For obvious reasons, the management of the Savoy Theatre, where the first serious production in this country—if seriousness may be associated with such an event—is to be given, are not desirous of assembling any very critical audience on an occasion which has no object but that of a formal compliance with the absurd condition of our law requiring that every piece shall be first produced—if it is produced at all—in Great Britain. In what way English audiences could be injured by Perola being represented in America before it is represented here, or what harm could be done by preferring to postpone the withdrawal of Patience so long as the latter piece continues to attract, are questions which the most patriotic admirers of this provision of our copyright laws would certainly find it hard to answer. As will have been perceived, so loosely is the principle applied that for aught that appears a single performance in one of the remotest of the Western Isles of Scotland would be quite sufficient for the present purpose. Perola will then, in the eye of the law, have been given to the world; and the authors will receive a limited protection in the place of the perpetual protection accorded to unpublished works, in return for which the bargain is that when the copyright shall have expired the public are to enjoy the free use both of Mr Gilbert's work and Mr Sullivan's music. It would naturally be supposed from this that some provision is taken for recording the precise nature of the work, which seems destined to waste its maiden freshness upon the desert air of Stoke Pogis or the Isle of Lewis, but there is nothing of the kind. The protection accorded to a patentee is on the strict condition that he shall fully and unreservedly describe his invention and deposit his description in an appointed place. But the dramatist and composer are under no such obligations. If Messrs Gilbert and Sullivan should elect not to print their work—and there are strong reasons of self-interest both for and against that course—it is quite conceivable that the only record of its existence forty-two years hence may be the descriptions in the newspapers or the register of the bare title and authors' names at Stationers' Hall.—*D. VIENNA.—Theresia Schubert, widow of Ferdinand Schubert, School Director, and brother of Franz Schubert, the composer, was buried on the 2nd inst. in the Central Cemetery, a portion of the service having been previously celebrated in the parish church of Währing. She was the only one who performed the last kind offices for Franz Schubert when dying, and was intimately acquainted with his circumstances, concerning which she has left a large number of interesting data. (Good news for Mr George Grove.)

VINCENZO BELLINI.

Tardily recognizing an obligation near upon half a century old, Catania has paid the honour of a statue to Vincenzo Bellini. Better late than never, and better now, perhaps, than earlier. The Catanians were, doubtless, single-minded in the matter, having no idea save the gratification of their pride in an illustrious fellow-citizen; but those who stand afar off can take a wider view of their action, and see in it homage paid to the genius of melody. Bellini was, beyond question, a favourite child of melody. Born under its star, he lived as, in some sort, its incarnation. Few men divinely endowed with the gift of song sang more sweetly and artlessly than he, and his name will stand for ever in musical record as a potent wielder of the mysterious charm which was that of Orpheus, when "to his music-plants and flowers Ever sprung, as sun and showers There had made a lasting spring." Fortune, save in a too early death, was always kind to the fascinating Sicilian. She sent him, for example, to the Conservatorium of Naples, where Tritto, his first master in counterpoint, did not greatly trouble him, and Zingarelli, his second, let him severely alone. He was thus allowed to "form" himself, much as a still greater genius, Rossini, did before him, and the circumstance can be regarded as no other than lucky. It is easy to imagine what sort of influence Zingarelli—who once forbade his pupils to look at the scores of Rossini—would have had upon the delicate wild flower of Bellini's song, which, unmeddled with, budded and blossomed at its own sweet will. Like his famous predecessor, Bellini studied the masterpieces of the schools, but followed his own instinct. No musician did so more completely, and that, as we all know, led him away from scholasticism. He was not a musician in the ordinary sense of the term. An average student in any of our Conservatories probably knows more about the rules of his art than the Catanian composer ever acquired. Yet learned doctors, with fugue at their fingers' ends, plod wearily through long lives, and reap not a tithe of the fame that Bellini gained with a single effort of his inborn genius. It is a story that has often been told. You may, in this subtle art of music, build up elaborate structures, based upon profound ideas, and with tops that seem to reach heaven; but the world sees more charm in the simple flower that has bloomed by the wayside, with the sun shining upon it, and the free air fanning it. Yet scholasticism in music is not superfluous, even where the highest natural gifts exist, provided always that instinct does not reject it. Bellini's instinct did reject it, and when, towards the close of his life, he followed the advice of Rossini and others to aim at a more "musicianly" expression, the result was I Puritani. Nevertheless, who would exchange the Paris opera for La Sonnambula?

Bellini's good fortune was conspicuous in that, at the time he wrote, great singers were ready to be his interpreters. Rubini appeared in his third opera, the Pirata; Meric-Lalande and Tamburini in his fourth, the Straniera; Pasta sang in La Sonnambula, and Malibran in Norma, while the marvellous Puritani quartet—Grisi, Rubini, Tamburini, and Lablache—is still fresh in the memory of veteran amateurs. It has been said that much of Bellini's reputation was due to the exceptional merit of artists who could touch nothing without adorning it; and that he gained by their co-operation is, of course, true. On the other hand, it is no less a fact that the most gifted performers are unable to endow a lifeless work with vitality. They may dress the corpse in beautiful garments, and adorn it with flowers, but it remains a corpse, and, in the inexorable order of nature, will return to dust. Unhappily, the matter is just now difficult to put to proof under every needful condition. There are plenty of composers able to produce lifeless works; but where are the great singers? We have one or two amongst us, and of these the most renowned has vainly tried, over and over again, to cover with the gold of her genius the base metal of inferior compositions. Bellini owed something, doubtless, to his expositors, but most to his own marvellous gift of melody, from the power of which even an inferior performance can take but little. With this weapon he conquered everywhere; the cold public of the North submitting as readily as his impassioned countrymen. It is said that the advent of his best-known operas in England stirred our undemonstrative public to its depths. Nothing was heard but the idyllic strains of La Sonnambula, while of I Puritani we are told that London was "steeped" in its music—"organs ground it; adventurous amateurs dared it; the singers themselves sang it to such satiety as to lose all consciousness of what they were engaged in, and, when once launched, to go on mechanically." Not less than the sensation caused by the very different themes of Der Freyschütz did all this prove mastery of that element in music which makes it a universal language. Weber, in the one case, and Bellini in the other, spoke with the accent of their respective countries, but were understood in all the fulness of their utterance by people who were foreign to both. This is the more to be noted as regards the Italian, because his themes frequently received no aid from dramatic situations and poetic ideas, with which they were at variance. Take, for example, the tenor air in the closing scene of I Puritani, or the second part of "Casta Diva," and mark how completely the musical effect is produced in the absence of congenial association rather than by its help. Furthermore, Bellini's melodies are unconnected with the musicianship which so often disguises the poverty of a theme, and, in an artistic sense, makes "the worse appear the better reason." The Sicilian composer's later operas, no doubt, show signs of improvement, and we know from one of his published letters—which, by the way, speaks the very language of modesty—that he had a genuine desire to enlarge his acquirements and to afford his ideas greater scope. But the best of his works is, in point of technique, as crude as might be expected in the case of a man whose vocation was not scholarship, and who, as a matter of fact, cramped his melodic genius in proportion as he endeavoured to make its utterances conform to that of the schools. A severe but not unjust critic has said that, in point of science, Bellini was "little more than an amateur, promising an artist. His power of construction was a mere nothing. His modulations might be pronounced awkward and hampered, had not we lived to see crudities cruder than his set forth, in the case of German writers, as discoveries belonging to an era of emancipation." Yet this unformed musician, with no science, no power of construction, and only an undeveloped idea of truth in dramatic expression, has held our operatic stage for fifty years and still enchants the world.

A great truth underlies the fact just stated, and gives us cause to ask whether the tendency of modern music is not to underrate the most potent resource at its command. This question is sometimes met by an arithmetical argument. We are told that as the tones of the scale are limited in number their combinations and permutations are limited also, and that the composers fortunate enough to live earlier actually exhausted them. The melodist, argue these reasoners according to Coker, must needs plagiarise, and scope for original work can only be found in the region of harmony, tone colour, and so on. It must be allowed that the deeds achieved in his domain are often very original indeed, but the man who turns away from melody because creation is no longer possible has only invented a theory and transferred thereto the flame of his own impotence. Of all the arts, perhaps, music most fully exemplifies the cunning which invents principles to suit conditions. There are composers now before the world who, better than any one else, appreciate the obligations they are under never to desert laws dictated by their own weakness. It is impossible to deny the cogency of their reasoning from the point of view they have taken up. If a man be no melodist the best course is to invent a system of music wherein the smallest modicum of tune can, under some high-sounding name or other, be made to do the greatest amount of service. The economy of certain modern "lights" is, in this respect wonderful. They will take a few notes and hammer them out to cover an area that would astonish a gold-beater. We can understand their action and make allowance for it, but the danger is lest a few blatant men mislead the mass, and a system be established which reduces melody to a minimum. That this danger exists no intelligent observer can fail to see, and should the end shape itself as perfectly excusable fears suggest, the Catania statue to Bellini may be looked upon as the memorial of a lost art. Yet, not a lost art; or, rather, not a lost gift. The fountains of melody no man's hand can close. They bubble up and stream forth independent of his volition, and the course of Nature remains unaffected by fashion. We may, therefore, take heart of grace. The next child of melody born to us will sing as his instinct prompts him. Like Mozart, he may strengthen himself by study, but the voice given him by Heaven will be used in Heaven's own way. J. B.

DRESDEN.—Mdlle Marie Krebs gave a concert on the 20th inst., when she played pieces by Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Kirchner, Liszt, and Joseph Rubinstein.

BRUNSWICK.—A grand farewell concert was given in honour of Franz Abt, who leaves for Wiesbaden, where he proposes spending the remainder of his days. It was got up by the four leading Vocal Associations of the town, and the orchestra of the Ducal Theatre, Mdme Tamm-Lammert and Herr Bulss, both members of the operatic company, giving their services. The programme consisted for the most part of compositions by Abt himself, who officiated, probably for the last time, as conductor. The feelings animating all present found appropriate expression in a valedictory address spoken by a former member of the company, alluding in a touching manner to the line, "Scheiden thut Weh!" ("How painful to part!") in Abt's well-known ballad: "Wenn die Schwalben heimwärts zieh'n" ("When the Swallows homewards fly").

Our Gracious Queen.*

PART-SONG.

No longer now the fiery cross
Speeds on its warning way,
When eager clansmen buckled on
Their armour for the fray;
The piping times of peace are ours,
And, in their radiant smile,
The Thistle and the Rose have joined
To bless our little isle.

Then give three cheers, three hearty cheers,
For Britain's gracious Queen,
The noblest of her royal race
Our island yet hath seen.

The days have fled when feudal claims
Bound vassals to their lord,
When serfs would quail beneath his glance,
And tremble at his word.
A higher law now binds our hearts
To Britain's royal line,
'Tis sealed in love, and ratified
At Freedom's holy shrine.

Then give three cheers, &c.

Long may our Queen's unspotted life
Her diadem adorn,
And may her hours at eventide
Be blest as those at morn.
Abroad, at home, by land and sea,
Where'er her rule is known,
May Britain's sons reflect with pride
The lustre of her throne.

Then give three cheers, &c.

BRAHMS'S NEW CONCERTO.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Ever since I made acquaintance with Brahms's new Concerto, some six months ago, I have from time to time been haunted by the opening phrase of the first movement, strangely mixed up, however, with the march in Le Prophète. I have tried to account for this, but have only succeeded in doing so since hearing the work played (and splendidly played, too) by Mr Oscar Beringer, at the Crystal Palace, on Saturday last. The two themes are virtually identical.

Voilà.

MEYERBEER.

BRAHMS.

Strange that Brahms—inadvertently, of course—should have gone to Meyerbeer for an idea!

Little as I care for the "noble sport" of hunting "fifths" and "reminiscences," the fact of his apparently having done so seems worth making a note of.—Yours, &c., C. A. B.

Sydenham, Oct. 15, 1882.

[Tweedledum and Tweedledee! It would be well if Brahms had a sackful of Meyerbeer's ideas, and Meyerbeer a sackful of Brahms's counterpoint.—Dr Blidge.]

DURING his summer sojourn at Ischl, Johannes Brahms composed a Pianoforte Trio and a String Quartet, besides setting for chorus and orchestra, in the style of a "Schicksalslied," the song of the Fates from Goethe's Iphigenie.

A NEW BALLET IN VIENNA.*

Melusina, the beauteous water fairy, after fascinating and ensnaring Count Raimund, has long exercised the same magic spell, though happily without the same disastrous result, on poets, painters, and musicians. And, strange enough, it is on German artists that she has done so. Though originally French, the legend of the Beautiful Melusina, the foundress of the Lusignan family, struck far deeper root in German soil than in the South, whence it did not find its way till subsequently. German popular belief has always been fond of busying itself with mysterious spirits of nature, good or bad, and thus Melusina soon became a familiar figure with it. The nation which has artistically immortalized a "Freischütz,"† Undine, Hanns Heiling, and the Flying Dutchman, could not, poetically unmoved, pass by so touching a being as Melusina. Felix Mendelssohn first glorified her in his most celebrated overture; a younger Vienna composer, Julius Zellner, followed with a "Melusina Symphony," which spread out, as it were, into four acts what Mendelssohn had compressed into one. We possess an opera of Melusina by Conradin Kreutzer,‡ and another by L. Schindelmeisser; in modern times, absolutely three operatic composers, C. Gramann, of Wiesbaden; Karl Mayerberger, of Pressburg; and Baron Perfall, of Munich, brought Melusina out almost simultaneously on the stage. But in her native land there has been no glorification for her in opera; she has not even served as subject for a ballet. After people there had had enough of mythological ballet subjects or those borrowed from ancient history, the Parisian ballet took a happy turn to fairy lore. The public greeted with enthusiasm a dancing version of The Sleeping Beauty (La Belle au Bois dormant) of Cinderella, of the Willis (Giselle), and of similar tales, which flung a breath of poetry over French ballet in the thirties and forties. But as yet no French dance-poet has thought of the Beautiful Melusina. Here in Vienna, moreover, it is not a "dance-poet" (as ballet-masters like to be called), but a literary poet with experience of the stage and of dancing, who has now come to the aid of our starving ballet repertory with the legend of Melusina. The play-bill designates this thankworthy collaborator extra statum by a mysterious asterisk, which, we hear, is pronounced "Friedrich Uhl." What first prompted him to take up the subject was Schwind's celebrated pictorial series in the Belvedere. Moritz von Schwind, the poet of fairydom among German painters, has, in this series, represented as a connected whole the history of the Beautiful Melusina, from its dreamy commencement to its tragically expiatory termination. These pictures, as charming for their pure beauty as for their musical magic of tone, possess almost the plainness of a spoken narrative. Nay, for a stage-experienced eye, they form, what they really are, a complete scenarium for a plot to be filled up with pantomime, dancing, and music. The author of the new ballet has, indeed, adhered truly to Schwind's illustrations, which, in the shape of pretty little photographs, are actually, like so many guide-maps, printed with the libretto. By adopting this plan, he has cut himself off from all approach to Grillparzer's operatic poem, Melusina, of which we at first thought, only he has retained, names and all, the jolly squire, Troll, and Melusina's two sisters, Plantina and Meliora, associating with the two latter, from a due appreciation of the interests of artistic grouping, a third sister. Grillparzer, who, as we know, wrote—though to no purpose—his libretto for Beethoven, altered the popular legend in many essential points—not always, it strikes me, advantageously. In his version, the Knight, Raimund, does not take Melusina home to his castle as his wife, but, intoxicated with love, lives with her in her magic palace, like Tannhäuser in the Venusberg. A gradually awakening and ardent desire for home, for human intercourse, and for an active life at last impels him to go forth. Melusina willingly gives him leave, and adds a ring, by means of which he can summon her to him when he chooses. Only he is told that on one certain day of the week he must not do so, if he would not bring about his own destruction as well as hers. He swears to observe this condition, and returns home. His relations and friends retain him there and endeavour to rescue him from magic influence. He is persuaded to marry his cousin, Bertha, and throw away Melusina's ring. A figure with fluttering hair, and covered with scales, rises out of the ground before him and makes a snatch at the ring. Raimund, suddenly seized with regret and re-awakening love, wants the ring back again, and follows the apparition till both reach Melusina's well. "The ring, my ring!" "Here, take it; see!" The well collapses, and a tomb, with "Raimund" inscribed on it, is visible. The earth opens before it, and the apparition throws the ring into the opening. "I will seek it even in the grave!" exclaims Raimund, and, seized by another black figure, sinks dead on the ground. This horrible scene is immediately followed by a kind of apotheosis. Borne aloft on clouds which rise from out the tomb, Melusina, richly adorned, appears with Raimund kneeling at her feet. "Tod versöhnt! Treue gekrönt!" sing the Sisters, and a chorus of Spirits terminate the whole with the genuine Grillparzerian lines:

* From the Vienna Neue Freie Presse.

† A marksman who, according to German popular superstition, employed Freikugeln, i.e., enchanted bullets, endowed with especial virtue by the Evil One, and possessing, among other gifts, the gift of sight. It is upon this superstition that, as we know, the book of Weber's masterpiece is founded. —TRANSLATOR.

‡ One of Mendelssohn's letters from Düsseldorf explains clearly why he also (pace Conradin Kreutzer) found it absolutely necessary that another Melusina overture should be written.—D. T.

" Wenn sich höh're Mächte künden,
Muss auf ewig sich verbinden,
Oder nahen mög' er nie:
Halben Dienst verschmähen sie."

For the sake of the dramatic action Grillparzer suppressed what to my mind constitutes the greatest charm of the story: Melusina's marriage with Raimund, and their long and happy home life—the whole middle period illumined by earthly happiness, between the weird-like magic of the beginning and end. A ballet could scarcely have been possible according to Grillparzer's libretto, but it is possible according to Schwind's pictures, and has, with most charming success, become a reality. A certain monotony can certainly not be avoided in the scenic expansion of a thoroughly tender and simply constructed fairy tale. Notwithstanding this, we saw the ballet of Melusina with sincere satisfaction; it is a genuinely poetical production, standing out in delicate and noble relief from the commonplace gaudiness and display of most modern ballets. The scenes, faithfully arranged after Schwind, please the eye and heart—the marriage feast, the family scene, Melusina with her water-nymphs in the bath, being probably the most beautiful. At least equal praise is due, however, to one scene which affords no opportunity for material splendour: "Evil Tongues." It is a kind of "Calumny chorus," pantomimically carried out, admirably executed, and provided by Doppler with most charming music. On Melusina's first appearance, and also subsequently, Doppler introduces the principal motive of Mendelssohn's overture; this is at one and the same time a happy interpolation and a piece of delicate homage. A very graceful waltz of flower-girls in the first act, and a fresh peasant dance in the second will, likewise, be remarked in Doppler's music. The motiveless and stopgap character of many dances necessarily brought in to fill up voids in the action is unavoidable in any ballet, and, consequently, was so in Melusina. Without the systematized grand pas de deux, that unalienable right attached to the crown of the prima ballerina, the latter (Mdlle Cerale) would retain but little of her supremacy in a ballet where Melusina towers above every one else. The well-bred Countess Blaniferte plays by the side of the water-nymph Melusina about the same subordinate part that Bertalda plays beside Undine; Kunigunde beside Loreley; Erik beside the Flying Dutchman, and all respectable young ladies who figure as eligible matches in operas with water-nymphs and gnomes. For the poetical figure of Melusina the Operahouse possesses in Mdlle Abel an absolutely incomparable representative. The less thankful characters of the Knight, Raimund, and his Squire, were played by Herren Frappart and Price with their accustomed care and skill.

EDUARD HANSLICK.

MR CHARLES HALLÉ and Mdme Norman-Néruda give an afternoon "Recital" at Mr Haynes's Concert Room, Great Malvern, on Wednesday next.

MEININGEN.—Dr Hans von Bülow is seriously ill and unable to perform his professional duties. He will probably have to abandon all idea of the concerts he was to give this winter with the Ducal Orchestra.

BAYREUTH.—According to the last number of the Bayreuther Blätter, the repetition of Parsifal here is assured not for 1883 alone but for "the following years" as well. We are, however, not informed what is the exact number of which "following" is the equivalent.

GREAT MALVERN.—Mdme Albani passed the interval between the Festivals of Hereford and Bristol here. It is stated by the local papers that Mdme Goldschmidt-Lind has purchased the house, near Windsor Point, South-east Malvern, which was built by the late eccentric Mr Johnson. It is superbly situated. We believe the statement to be correct. Mdme Goldschmidt has been at Malvern for some time.

MESSRS GILBERT AND SULLIVAN'S new opera, we are informed, will be played for the first time at the Greenwich Theatre on the 19th of November. Its title was originally Iolanthe, but that being the name of a drama played a few years ago in London, it has been changed to Perola. The Misses Jessie Bond, Alice Barnet, and Leonora Braham; Messrs Temple, Lely, and Thornton will have leading parts assigned to them. The new opera will be given on the same date (to secure the American copyright) simultaneously at two theatres in the United States. And at a future period it will be produced in London at the Savoy.

CONCERTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.—The programme of the season, 1882–83, is interesting in several respects, and suggestive of comment in most. It brings English music, and, marvellous to say, English instrumental soloists, to the front. Thus we are to have a new symphony by Mr Thomas Wingham; the orchestral works lately produced at Birmingham by Mr Villiers Stanford and Mr Hubert Parry; the "Scandinavian" symphony of Mr F. H. Cowen, and that which figures so conspicuously among the artistic remains of Sterndale Bennett. The "unmusical country," therefore, is not badly represented in the scheme; but more reason for astonishment may be found in the engagement as soloists of Mr Carrodus and Mr Edward Howell. What does this portend? Is the Crystal Palace to be no longer the happy and well-nigh exclusive hunting-ground of foreigners—especially of second-rate Germans? If so, there will be fright among the legions of the Fatherland, and a firm conviction that nothing less extraordinary than the comet could have wrought such a change. For ourselves, we leave divination of the cause to the legions; take the effect and rejoice therein. The prospectus promises a fair allowance of classical music, including four symphonies—all the odd numbers save No. 1—by Beethoven; Mendelssohn's A minor; Nos. 2 and 4 of Schumann; No. 2 of Brahms; Mozart's "Concertante Symphonie" in E flat, for violin and viola; and Haydn's "Le Midi." In addition we are told to look for Schubert's Symphony in E (No. 7) left unfinished by the master, but now completed by Mr John Francis Barnett. Poor Schubert! Why will they not let thee alone? However, Mr Barnett is not a musical ghoul like the Abbé Liszt, and it may be assumed that, serenely bold as he has proved himself on many occasions, he undertook this job with reluctance and has done it with modesty. We only wish that his reluctance had been absolute and his modesty invincible. In a little while we may hear of somebody repairing the Medicean Venus. The modern school of orchestral music is abundantly represented in the Crystal Palace list, which contains, for example, Rubinstein's "Russian" Symphony, Raff's No. 6—performed "in memoriam" this day (Saturday)—Bizet's suite, L'Arlésienne, and works by Dvôrák, Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner. Besides all this, a number of choral compositions are set down; amongst them Gounod's Redemption, Handel's Acis and Galatea, Mendelssohn's Lobgesang, and, by way of absolute novelty, the Requiem of Berlioz—one of those gigantic structures under the ruins of which Wagner declares that the French composer lies buried. With such a programme before him, Mr Manns will not have a leisurely season; nor will frequenters of the Crystal Palace complain of a dull one. The opening concert was well attended, and its programme could boast a singularly representative character. Thus, for the school which brought modern romanticism into graceful alliance with classic forms stood Bennett's overture, The Wood Nymphs; Beethoven's Symphony in A was sponsor for Beethoven; while the "Waldweben" from Siegfried, and the "Preislied," from Die Meistersinger, showed the more intelligible and graceful side of Wagner. To complete the list, Berlioz had a charming representative in the "Hymn to Happiness," from Lelio, and the latest development of Brahms's laborious art was illustrated by his new Pianoforte Concerto in B flat (No. 2), performed for the first time in England. With regard to this work, the official analyst—who should be complimented upon a clear and succinct exposition of its structure—declares that two "generally accepted statements of the school books" are by it conclusively refuted. The statements in question are that "a concerto is an instrumental composition designed to show off the skill of an executant," and that it "consists of only three movements." Argal, Brahms did not here intend to show off executive skill. Mr Oscar Beringer, who was the soloist on Saturday, would doubtless argue that he has done so nevertheless, and thus we have a striking exemplification of the by no means rare fact that a man going about to refute "school books," which only formulate the wisdom of ages, may unintentionally justify them. If the analyst had said that in this work Brahms has not considered the genius of the pianoforte, but written music which sounds like an arrangement from an orchestral score, and that, therefore, the highest qualities of a pianist cannot appear, he would have been nearer the truth. Regarding the second statement of the "school books"—a concerto has three movements—that is as true in the accepted order of art as that man is a biped is true in the accepted order of nature. Of course a composer may, like Brahms, produce a concerto in four movements and nature may endow a man with three legs, but there is no more refutation in the one case than in the other. It would be almost criminally presumptuous to give judgment upon a work so elaborate and, in some respects, so new as this concerto after a single hearing, and before its text has been studied. The charge of such rashness we are not disposed to incur, but may record an impression that the first movement belongs to the great things of symphonic writing. It may turn out to be over-elaborated, in the frequent manner of the master, but it fastens upon the attention and impresses the mind. The second movement, which Brahms very properly does not call a scherzo, is worthy of the first, and contains an unusual proportion of music grateful to the soloist; while the slow movement, though here and there more curious than beautiful, is often beautiful without being curious. Recognizing that he has made sufficient demands upon his audience, Brahms winds up with a genial allegretto, full of tune, and as little scholastic as may be. Altogether, the concerto bespeaks the sympathetic hearing and respectful discussion which it will doubtless receive time and again during the approaching season. The performance, though not faultless, was praiseworthy—the epithet applying with force to Mr Beringer's solo playing. Always conscientious and skilful, if seldom inspired, Mr Beringer acquitted himself well of a prodigiously exacting task. The honour deservedly paid to Mr Manns needs no mention, nor is it requisite to insist upon the fact that Mr Edward Lloyd did perfect justice to the vocal music of Berlioz and Wagner.—D. T.

After the concert came the re-opening of the grand organ (in the Handel orchestra), which has just been reconstructed by the builders, Messrs Gray & Davison. The instrument has cost about £6,000, and is now of exceptional power and capacity. It has four manuals (or key-boards)—and a set of pedals, with independent stops, and a compass of thirty notes; the total number of stops (including those of combination) being 80. The wind is supplied by three of Joy's hydraulic engines, and the motive power is taken from the water of one of the great towers. The machinery for this purpose is under the organ, and is shown to visitors who desire to inspect it. The opening performance on Saturday evening was given by Mr A. J. Eyre (appointed organist to the Crystal Palace Company), who played a varied selection of music—sacred and secular—affording proofs of his own skill and of the good qualities of the instrument. Weekly performances by other eminent organists will be given on successive Saturdays up to December 16, inclusive.—D. N.

THE POPULAR CONCERTS.—Time deals gently with these concerts. They entered last night upon their twenty-fifth year, which is almost old age in the short-lived family of musical institutions, yet there does not appear the smallest sign of waning vigour. The public are attracted by them as much as heretofore; the old activity in building up an enormous repertory is yet shown, and the accomplished artists who have been associated with their fortunes so long remain faithful. Mr S. Arthur Chappell, who has managed the concerts from their beginning, is entitled to be proud of such good fortune and to identify himself with its cause in no slight measure, for assuredly tact, skill, and knowledge in the director were required to bring it about. Mr Chappell's prospectus is never eloquent nor ostentatiously confidential regarding the arrangements of the season. Of this nobody complains. His patrons are willing to trust him where he gives no opportunity of tracing him, and do not ask to know more than the manager chooses to tell. What he has revealed just now can be put into a very small compass, but it is all satisfactory. For example, we are to have Herr Joachim at two different periods of the season—that is to say, during December, and from the end of Feburary to the close of the series. The change is good, since it tends to raise the interest of the pre-Christmas performances, and thus to equalize attraction. Mdme Norman-Néruda will be more often heard than usual. She is engaged to lead the quartet during the whole of three months and part of a fourth—a conclusive evidence, by the way, of her great popularity, though whether a variety of talent in so important a position might not be desirable remains an open question. The pianists announced to appear are Mdlle Janotha, who entered upon her share of work yesterday; Mr Charles Hallé; and Herr Pachmann, the Russian débutant of last season. Nothing is said of Miss Marie Krebs, but this, in the absence of proof to the contrary, must be regarded as an oversight. Surely so accomplished an artist, and one so familiar at these concerts, has not been left out in the cold. Herr Ries again takes the second violin, Messrs Straus, Holländer, and Zerbini will play the viola as heretofore, and the useful artist last named continues in his place as accompanist. Finally, "Signor Piatti will hold the post of first violoncello on all occasions"—an announcement which conveys much in few words. Monday night's programme contained a varied and, in all respects, admirable selection of works, ranging from Haydn to Brahms. The old composer came last, of course, because in that position he is more than ever welcome, with his unfailing tunefulness and his clear, because masterly, art. Clouds and darkness may precede Haydn, but when he comes the sun shines and puts everybody in good spirits. On this occasion the Austrian musician was represented by his quartet in D Minor—not the often played Op. 76, but the seldom heard Op. 42. Mr Chappell did well to produce this beautiful work three years ago, since when it has not been neglected, nor ever will be while true connoisseurs survive. The performance by Mdme Néruda, MM. Ries, Hollander, and Piatti, was thoroughly sympathetic. That it was also able goes without saying. Mendelssohn contributed to the programme his Variations Sérieuses—undoubtedly the most striking exemplification of the mastery he had acquired over a form now neglected, but in which all the great composers of the past took delight. The distinctiveness of this work lies in the happy success of an endeavour to treat the variation form in a graver spirit than that which usually makes it a mere plaything of fancy. Mendelssohn has shown how this can be done without sacrifice of dignity, and his composition occupies a special place by right thereof. The Variations were entrusted to Mdlle Janotha, who proved herself mistress of their letter, if not an obviously ardent sympathiser with their spirit. Brahms's Sextet in G for strings was associated with the foregoing examples of masters who have left us. Though not so well known as the companion work in B flat, owing to its introduction as recently as 1879, the Sextet in G ranks among favourites, and holds an assured place in the working repertory of these concerts. It would be idle to contest the justice of this, or to enter upon comparisons in a case where each and everything must be judged for itself. Certain it is that we should rejoice in the continued life of a composer able to write a piece that even its worst detractors must credit with nearly classic importance. In the hands of Mdme Néruda MM. Ries, Holländer, Zerbini, Pezze, and Piatti, the Sextet, difficult though it be, was of course quite safe. Mdme Néruda chose for her solo, Franz Ries's prelude, Romance and Scherzo (Op. 27), playing each movement not only with consummate skill but perfect charm; and the vocalist, Miss Carlotta Elliot, sang acceptable songs by Handel, Schumann, and Mendelssohn, to the judicious accompaniment of Mr Zerbini.—D. T.

A CONCERT was given at St James's Hall on Saturday evening with the laudable object of aiding the fund for educating the slave children in Cuba. The movement is under the patronage of the Spanish Minister, the Marquis de Casa Laiglesia, &c., and the concert was organized by Signor Vergara, who is giving similar performances in the provinces. But little need be said of Saturday's concert beyond recommending the purpose for which it was given. The programme consisted of a varied selection of vocal and instrumental pieces. Mdme Carlotta Patti, eminent sister of an eminent prima donna, contributed some successful performances, and Mdme Selika (a Creole lady) was favourably received in airs of different styles. The other vocalists were Mdme Evans-Warwick, Messrs Vergara, P. Blandford, and J. Lynde. Solos were performed by De Munck (violoncello), Papini (violin), and Tito Mattei (pianoforte).

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.—If it may be said that the programme of the "benefit" concert given on Thursday evening by Mdme Christine Nilsson and Mr Sims Reeves was drawn up rather to attract a crowd than to exemplify art, there can be no question of the further fact that its object was attained. The crowd gathered, and, what is more, were pleased to the extent of enthusiasm, if by that name we may call a sensation of never having had enough of the good things going. Encores prevailed throughout the evening; with reference, at any rate, to the work done by the principal artists, who often accepted them in the Hibernian sense—as demands for something else. Thus Mdme Trebelli, asked to repeat "Voi che sapete," substituted Mr Carter's "What the waves said," and later on, preferred her favourite air from Carmen to a repetition of Offenbach's "C'est l'Espagne." In like manner Mr Santley replaced "O! ruddier than the cherry" by "To Anthea," and Mdme Nilsson gave a new ballad in lieu of Sullivan's familiar "Let me dream again." This latitude did not, however, always prevail. Mr Santley sang Tosti's "For ever and for ever" twice; Mr Sims Reeves, after a prolonged struggle against an unreasoning audience, did the same with the "Bay of Biscay;" Mdme Nilsson and her co-beneficiary consented to repeat the duet, "Da quel dì," from Linda di Chamouni; and the Swedish songstress, with Mdme Trebelli, gave a second time, "La luna immobile," from Boïto's Mefistofele. It would be as superfluous to tell how the artists acquitted themselves in such well-known pieces as to account for the favour they received. Nevertheless, under the special circumstances of the case, we may state that Mdme Nilsson—whose reception the audience emphasized in a fashion distinctly marked—did all her work so as to encourage high hopes of forthcoming Transatlantic success. She is well known and liked in the States, where, however, she will not be under the necessity of depending in any measure upon repute gained in the past. The Swedish artist showed herself on Thursday night not less able than heretofore to fascinate an audience by the charm of her voice and manner. In addition to the performers already mentioned, Miss Clements, Mr Herbert Reeves, and Mr Barrington Foote took part, with more success than is usual when great names and long-recognized talent overshadow comparative beginners. The band of the 2nd Life Guards, under Mr Winterbottom, contributed a number of well chosen pieces, and played them tastefully.—D. T.

Bow and Bromley Institute.—The Organ Recitals continue their successful career—and deservedly so, considering the excellence of the programmes. The organists include some of our best players, assisted by well-known vocalists. Last Saturday a crowded audience assembled to hear Mr Wrigley (of High Wycombe) play, and Mdme Enriquez sing. To-night (Saturday) Mr Frank J. Sawyer (of Brighton) will play, and the vocalist will be Mdme Marie Klauwell. Engagements, we understand, include Mr W. T. Best, on Nov. 11; and M. Alex. Guilmant, on Dec. 9.

PROVINCIAL.

Birmingham.—There ought to be no room for doubt now as to the popular attractiveness of Beethoven's Fidelio when adequately presented—at all events in Birmingham. Time was when Beethoven, like Shakspere, spelt ruin in the managerial lexicon; but Mdme Roze, like Sganarelle, has changé tout cela, and by the inexorable logic of facts Fidelio is shown to be the most attractive work in Mr Carl Rosa's repertory. The first performance of the opera last week brought together a large and brilliant audience, but that which assembled to witness the second performance was even larger, the dress circle in particular being crowded to overflowing. Public interest, of course, continues to centre in the Leonora of Mdme Marie Roze, which improves, not merely "upon acquaintance"—to use the conventional phrase—but as a matter of fact, and as a necessity, apparently, of that in-born process of development which is the surest note of an original and living creation. The Marcellina of Miss Clara Perry, with its graceful simplicity and naïvete, supplies the needful foil to the sombre grandeur and intensity of Leonora; and the Florestan of Mr McGuckin is, in regard to vocalization, a most effective and gratifying performance. Mr Ludwig's Pizarro is not his best character, but it was more satisfactory last night than on the previous occasion. Mr Snazelle acquitted himself creditably as Rocco; but the substitution of Mr Stilliard for Mr Leslie Crotty in the part of the Minister cannot be considered an improvement. The choruses, and especially the famous Prisoners' Chorus, were admirably executed, and the playing of the band under Mr Pew's conductorship left little to be desired.—B. P.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The remarkably successful series of operatic performances at the Tyne Theatre came to a conclusion on Saturday night, when Sir Julius Benedict's Lily of Killarney was given, with Mdlle Philippine Siedl as the Colleen Bawn, Miss Helen Armstrong as Mrs Cregan, Mr Faulkner Leigh as Hardress, Mr Charles Lyall as Myles, and Mr Richard Temple as Danny Mann. The performance, especially as regards the artist above-mentioned, was a very successful one. Miss Siedl gave a very charming delineation of the innocent Eily, and Mr Faulkner Leigh did full justice to the part of Hardress Cregan. This gentleman possesses a very fine tenor voice, which has been well trained, and his singing evoked hearty applause. The most popular character of the opera, however, was the Myles of Mr Charles Lyall. It is many years since we first saw Mr Lyall in this character, but it has lost none of its freshness. We know of no operatic artist who could equal Mr Lyall in the part of Myles, so thoroughly has he identified himself with it. Mr Richard Temple was Danny Mann, and Mr A. Howell made an excellent Father Tom. The sisters Elliot again appeared in the ballet scene with quite as much success as on former occasions. The band and chorus, as usual, contributed materially to the success of the performance, and deserve much praise.—N. O. T.

Truro.—A "Grand County Musical Festival" is announced to take place at the Market Hall on Tuesday morning and evening next, October 24, in aid of the hospitals of West Cornwall, under the patronage of a host of noble county families, including the Right Hon. the Earl of Mount Edgcumbe, the Right Hon. the Earl of St. Germains, the Right Hon. Viscount Falmouth, the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Truro, the Right Hon. Lord Robartes, and the Right Worshipful the Mayor of Truro, &c. The principal singers are Miss Annie Marriott, Mr Edward Lloyd, and Signor Foli; the pianist, Mrs R. H. Carter; organist, Mr Richard White, jun.; and the musical director and conductor, Mr J. H. Nunn, M.R.A.M. The band and chorus will consist of members of the Choral Societies of Truro, Penzance, and Camborne, numbering about 400 performers. Mr M. G. Rice will be leader of the first and Miss L. M. Nunn of the second violins. The Creation will be performed in the morning, and in the evening there will be a miscellaneous selection from the works of Handel, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Sterndale Bennett, Gounod, &c. The programme is quite worthy the occasion, and we have no doubt of the festival being brought to a successful issue—it must artistically, and ought to be pecuniarily.

MUCH ADO AT THE LYCEUM.

Much has been said of the now famous revival of Much Ado about Nothing at the Lyceum. Much has been said of the performance as a whole. The beautiful scenery and the excellent stage-management has been eulogized in every possible way. But far too little, in our humble opinion, has been said of the individual acting of the two most prominent characters; and we venture to prophesy that many a day will pass before we see again two such ideal representatives of Beatrice and Benedick as Miss Terry and Mr Irving. To be sure the former has a much less difficult task than the latter, for she has only to be her own charming self, and there stands Shakspere's merry heroine ready made. Up to a certain point, therefore, success was a foregone conclusion as far as the Beatrice was concerned. That point is the "Chapel scene;" and no one, with all the advantages of person and manner in the world, but a great actress, could play that scene as Ellen Terry plays it, with such tenderness, such brilliancy, and, above all, such inspiration. Divided by three passions—sorrow, love, and anger—the actress throws herself into these varying emotions with utmost abandonment. She gives no thought then to picturesque attitude or arrangement of drapery—and yet she has never posed more finely than when she stands in the centre of the stage, and cries: "Oh, God, that I were a man!" All through this scene her tears, her smiles, and her frowns follow one upon the other in the most bewildering and captivating manner. Who could resist this woman? And this is as it should be. For it is here Benedick falls genuinely in love, where before he was only playing at it. For the rest, Miss Terry has but to be her merry self again: and what can be more delightful? A little more dryness might be given to some of her smart sayings. For instance, in the speech beginning "Why, he is the Prince's jester"—and the other—"Do! do! he'll but break a comparison or two on me." But, taking her all in all, we could not possibly see a better Beatrice.

Now for Benedick. We have said Miss Terry had the easier task to perform. This is so, because, to begin with, Benedick is the more difficult part; also, Mr Irving's usual appearance and manner, though admirably suited to Hamlet and all weird and poetical parts, is not one with which we generally connect Benedick. How does Mr Irving make Benedick fit him and his idiosyncrasies, or does he fit Benedick, and mould himself to the part as Shakspere drew it? Why, the latter, to be sure! He is as bluff and soldierly a Benedick as anyone could desire when in the first scene he follows Don Pedro with an easy, self-possessed gait, a good humoured smile of superiority lighting up his face as he catches sight of Beatrice, who is longing to cross words with him. His tone, as he delivers the line, "'Tis certain I am loved of all ladies," denotes at once what a fine opinion Benedick has of himself. His manner is that of a thorough gentleman, but not too highly polished. His voice is firm, and not one of his "good things" misses fire. Never did a scene go so well as did that where Don Pedro and his companions trick Benedick into falling into love. It is splendidly played by all. But we must confess most of the merriment was caused by Mr Irving's ever expressive countenance; for even when left alone, and he stands, looking funny things and saying none, the house roared again and again. Rich in humour, too, is the soliloquy following, in which, out of the generosity of his heart, he resolves to requite Beatrice's love. Then, again, his sheep-faced look, as he stands before his friends, confessed a lover, in his gay costume, with his chin close shaven, is irresistibly diverting. It is later on, however, that the hand of a master shows itself. A subtle change has come upon this Benedick by the time he is left alone with Beatrice in the chapel, when the reality of his love for her dawns upon him. With what consummate art does Mr Irving mark this change. It is a different man from the earlier Benedick. His ways are more gentle, his voice softer, his bearing more chivalrous. How full of meaning is his gesture as he ventures timidly to touch her hand. Shall we ever forget the fascination of his manner as he says, "I do love nothing in the world so well as you:—Is not that strange?" or the rapture expressed as he exclaims, "And do it—with all thy heart!" to her, "I was about to protest I loved you." He is thoroughly in love, and so happy in his love, we are obliged to rejoice with him. Mr Irving's acting here is beautiful—manly, natural, and perfectly true to the poet's creation. He carries this spirit through to the very end of the play, until, as Benedick himself says, no one was ever so "truly turned over and over with love." He ends at last in a very ecstasy of joy as he catches Beatrice in his arms and stops her mouth with kisses. Truly theirs is no made up marriage, as it has so often seemed before, but a real love match. We should delight to dwell further on the many other beauties, and the high finish of the performance of the play generally; but space is scarce, so we will content ourselves by saying—should any one be suffering from the "blues," let them pay the Lyceum a visit, and they will find a complete cure, unless they belong to the great unappreciated—there is no cure for them.

ROSA KENNEY.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

ORATORIO.

In point of musical idea, the oratorio follows the same plan as the opera. It is the musical expression of a complete poem, whether in prose or verse; this expression being conveyed in balanced alternation of changeful and restful ideas, in recitative, solos, and chorus.

In point of verbal idea, oratorios belong to three kinds—the sacred drama, the narrative, and the didactic, which we may call the great anthem. The first aims at the representation of the subject to the eye by action and scenery, as well as by words to the other senses; the second relates the story of the subject; and the third is the devotion or worship called forth by contemplation of the subject.

The first kind, or sacred drama, has its origin in the mysteries and miracle-plays which were used all over Europe about the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries, for the instruction of the unlearned, and which consisted of dramatic representations of sacred themes joined to the singing of hymns and carols. Though these plays were in use in all parts of Europe, the development from them of the sacred drama with music belongs to Italy. S. Filippo Neri instituted performances in his church in Rome, the music of which was at first composed by Giovanni Annimuccia; some of these were of a kind similar to the mysteries or miracle-plays, while others were selections of hymns or Lauds. These performances were kept up long after the death of S. Filippo Neri, in 1595; and from the oratory in which they were performed they derived the name of oratorio. Cavalieri wrote an oratorio for these performances, called The Soul and the Body, which was produced in 1600; and this was in precisely the same style as that which was adopted or invented simultaneously in Florence by Caccini and Peri for the opera. From this time onwards the oratorio in Italy has been written in the same form and has had the same development as the opera. Though also performed without acting, there were seasons in Italy—Lent, for instance—when secular operas were forbidden to be performed in the theatres, and at such times the sacred operas were performed in their place, with scenery and action. This was the origin of Cimarosa's Sacrifice of Abraham, Rossini's Moses in Egypt, Verdi's Nebuchadnezzar, &c. With the exception of The Messiah and Israel in Egypt, Handel's English oratorios were written with a feeling for this stage use, though they were never performed with acting; and the oratorio use in England was distinctly understood to be without acting and character costumes. Thus, while Belshazzar and others of his oratorios had stage directions in them, Esther, adapted from Racine's play, was advertised for its first performance as "without clothes." The secular Acis and Galatea, first performed with acting, was afterwards done "after the manner of an oratorio," i.e., in concert fashion.

The second kind, or narrative oratorio, originated in the recitations of the sacred story of Passion week in the churches, both Roman and Lutheran, in which the narrative portions, or words of the Evangelist, were all allotted to one person among the several performing ministers, while the spoken words of the characters in the story were given to one or more different persons. This kind received its highest development in J. S. Bach's different settings of the story of the Passion, for use in the Lutheran churches.

The third kind of oratorio is the natural development of the anthem, the descendant of the little hymn or music worship of the church. This received its first aggrandisement in S. Filippo Neri's selections of hymns; and it has increased in power and extent with the increase of the capabilities and knowledge of its inventors and performers. Still it remains, as of old, the music of devotion, the expression of sacred meditation, the devotional feeling roused by contemplation of the holy subject selected by the composer; and still, as of old, it will find its friends wherever Christianity and music are friends. Handel's Messiah must be considered the greatest example of this kind.

Though the general bent of the different kinds is very clear, they often approach to one another in the course of the work. Thus Bach's Passion according to St. Matthew, a narrative oratorio in its main principle, has some dramatic effects in it. For instance, the chorus for the disciples, "Lord, is it I?" with the anxious re-iteration of the words as from the mouths of each in turn and together; the cry of the people with the single word "Barabbas;" the repeated cry, "Let Him be crucified;" and other passages of the same kind. Bach's Passion has also a considerable amount of meditation in the choruses and solos, as well as in the more decidedly devotional chorals or hymns which were to be sung by the congregation of the church in which the work was to be performed. The Messiah, though in the main a great anthem on the great subject, has a portion of narrative which forms what has been happily styled a Raffaelesque picture of the nativity. This closes with the angel's song, "Glory to God," which is a dramatic effect. Israel in Egypt is equally divided between narrative and anthem. The first half is the story from the Psalms of David of the sorrow of the Israelites while in Egypt, and of the wonders worked at their deliverance; the latter half is the song of Moses and the people after their release, and is the expression of the adoration drawn from their hearts by those wonders worked for them.

Ex. 228.

OLIVERIA PRESCOTT.

STUTTGART.—Wanda Bogdani, who has been singing at the Theatre Royal with a view to succeed Mdme Hanfstängl, has made a good impression as Rosina in Il Barbiere. She is a Pole, wife of the Belgian Count Vandameere, and may be remembered playing a conspicuous part in the celebrated trial in 1876 at Vienna.

GRATZ.—Plankensteiner-Wilt, determined to embrace the career in which her mother, Marie Wilt, has distinguished herself, made her first appearance on any stage at the National Theatre, as Marguerite, in Gounod's Faust. Her second appearance was in the character of Aïda. She was favourably received on each occasion.

MANNHEIM.—Jean Becker, founder and director of the Florentine Quartet, has determined to establish a Violin School in this town, which has long been his home. His daughter, Jeanne, and two sons, Hanns and Hugo, already known to the artistic world, have formed themselves into a Trio, and will shortly start on their first concert-tour.

CASSEL.—Mdlle Kolderupp, formerly prima donna at the Theatre Royal, is dead. Last season she had an apoplectic fit on the stage. As soon as she was sufficiently recovered she went to Norway, the land of her birth, in the hope that her native air would restore her to perfect health—a hope not destined to be fulfilled.

LEIPSIC.—The first Gewandhaus Concert went off splendidly. The programme was thus constituted:—Symphony in E flat major (No. 1 of Breitkopf and Härtel's Edition); "Violin Concerto in the Form of a Vocal Scene," Spohr; Toccata (scored by Heinrich Esser), J. S. Bach; Adagio and Rondo from first Violin Concerto, Vieuxtemps; Symphony in F major, No. 8, Beethoven. The violinist was Norman-Néruda, who more than realized the expectations of her legion of admirers here.

CHERUBINI.

This work, written for a particular occasion, was necessarily of an ephemeral nature, and not destined to survive the event calling it into existence; I shall, therefore, merely register the following notice which I find of it in a collection of that time:

"A sort of pantomime; a nullity as regards dramatic merit; it was played simultaneously at two theatres, but did not draw at either."*

As, however, small causes often produce great effects, I will venture on a remark which may have some importance. We know what little sympathy Napoleon always manifested for Cherubini, the sharpness with which he treated him, and the perseverance with which he unjustly kept him in the shade as long as the Empire lasted. Now it has frequently struck me that the conqueror at Arcole, who was not much suspected of admiring those who might have become his rivals, must have felt but a moderate amount of affection for the memory of the noble soldier who pacified La Vendée, and that the remembrance of this hero, a genuine worshipper of liberty, must have been somewhat unwelcome to the great captain who wanted to establish his throne on its ruins. From this fact to supposing him capable of bearing great ill-will against the musician imprudent enough to sing Hoche's glory and virtues is but a step, for great men have often singular pettinesses of mind. I attributed, however, only the value of a conjecture to this possible cause of Napoleon's antipathy to Cherubini, when I had occasion to read for the first time the notice Raoul-Rochette wrote on the latter. Now Raoul-Rochette enounces precisely the same opinion, and supports it by a singular fact, which lends it additional strength, and we shall, by the fragment of his notice, see what a direct cause he assigns to the kind of ostracism Napoleon always inflicted on Cherubini:

"The man who then presided over the destinies of France and the world always made a point of showing M. Cherubini the aversion he entertained for him personally as well as for his music. Several causes have been assigned for this unjust sentiment, which weighed on M. Cherubini's fortunes and will always weigh upon Napoleon's memory. It has been said that the too haughty freedom of certain replies had estranged the man who achieved despotism only by the aid of freedom, and was already so intoxicated with his power as not to be able to allow a musician to have an opinion in music. But Napoleon's antipathy for M. Cherubini had, to all appearance, another reason and another origin. The conqueror of Arcole brought back from his visit to Italy a march of Paisiello's, which he wished to hear at the Conservatory. The director, M. Sarette, thought he ought to profit by the opportunity and show the young hero, on whom the eyes of all Europe were fixed, the entire resources of the new institution, by employing them on a more important composition; so he selected a cantata and funeral march written, to words by Chénier, by M. Cherubini for the funeral of General Hoche. It is a strikingly expressive piece, containing beauties of the highest order, and had made a prodigious impression on the people of Paris, but failed to do so on the conqueror of Italy. The General felt offended that the performance was not limited to what he had said he should like to hear; he thought there was an intention of giving him a lesson by showing that France could do without foreign talent. Perhaps, too, he was wounded at hearing Hoche's praises sung; perhaps, in a word, he already desired hymns for no one but himself. Be this as it may, he appeared displeased. Scarcely was the performance over, when he went up to M. Cherubini, and, without saying a word to him about his march, spoke only in praise of Paisiello, whom he looked upon as the first of all composers, while after him he would hear of no one but Zingarelli, which deprived our composer of the hope of occupying even the second rank. 'I say nothing about Paisiello,' murmured Cherubini, in a low voice, 'but Zingarelli ——.' And that was his only answer."†

We shall see, further on, what was the effect of this hostile feeling of Napoleon's towards Cherubini, and how heavily it weighed upon the illustrious artist's existence.

Soon afterwards, Cherubini again thought of doing something for the stage. Unfortunately, he hit on the ill-advised notion of working with an obscure author, who deceived his confidence. The name of this author was Saint-Aignan, and the book of L'Hôtellerie Portugaise, his first work, was far from proving lucky to the musician, who bore all the weight of his colleague's faults. The work, in one act, was brought out on the 7th Thermidor, Year VI. (25th July, 1798), the artists being Réziçourt, Jausserand, Dérubelle, Raffile, Mdmes Lesage, Augustine Lesage, and Dessaules, and was an almost total failure.‡ The composer, as we shall see, was not confounded in the librettist's bad fortune, and the public meted out justice to both. Giving an account of the performance, the Courier des Spectacles expressed itself as follows:

"The opera performed yesterday achieved only half a success, or rather, was received, to a certain extent, with disfavour, the cause of which will be evident from the following facts. . ."

After analysing the book, the writer adds:

"The music was very good; the hand of a skilful master was apparent from the very overture, which, like many of the numbers, bore the stamp of Citizen Cherubini, for whom there was a loud call, but he did not respond to it."

* Vérités à l'ordre du jour (Year VII.), p. 183.

† Raoul-Rochette: Notice sur Cherubini, pp. 46, 47.

‡ The other pieces on the first night were La Famille indigente, by Gaveaux, and Jean-Baptiste, by Cousin-Jacques.

MONTE-CARLO.—The Italian operatic season, which will last from the middle of January to the middle of March, is to be inaugurated by Les Huguenots. The other works will be Faust, Le Nozze, Mignon, Galatea, La Figlia del Reggimento, Le Domino Noir, Les Dragons de Villars, and La Traviata.

BRUSSELS.—After an interval of twelve years, Halévy's Eclair has been performed at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Mdlle Angèle Legault playing the leading character. A one-act comic opera, Frasquita, by Laurent de Billé, Selvay, and Dubosch, has been produced at the Théâtre des Galeries Saint-Hubert.

PRAGUE.—Herr Angelo Neumann has abandoned the idea of coming here with his Nibelungen company. The Neustädter Theater, where the performances were to be given, cannot be heated, the artists have scruples about singing there at the end of October, and the town lies much out of the route of the tour.

BASLE.—The peerless Norman-Néruda took part in the first concert of the General Musical Society, enchanting all hearers by the manner in which she executed Spohr's Gesangscene and the last two movements from Vieuxtemps' E major Concerto. The orchestral works were Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Gade's overture to Hamlet, and Schumann's to Genoveva.

NEW YORK (from a Correspondent).—It was announced in some of the papers that Gounod's Redemption would be produced by the Oratorio Society, under Dr Damrosch, in December, but Theodore Thomas had already arranged with Messrs Ditson, representatives of Novello & Co., for the exclusive right to use their manuscript copy of the orchestral score. They have only one, and it is the only one here; so it is probably Mr Thomas who will first introduce the new work to the public of the Empire City. "Certainly," observes Music and the Drama, "the Piano and Vocal Score is published, and Dr Damrosch is at perfect liberty to orchestrate it for himself, there being no actual property in the performing right; but, although Faust was first given in America under similar conditions, we hardly imagine the Doctor will act on so equivocal a precedent."—I am informed that, as the time approached for commencing his New York season, Mr Mapleson reduced the prices of the boxes left on his hands: 1,000 dollar boxes were to be had for 800 dollars, and 180 dollar seats for 150.—After fulfilling an engagement at Waterbury, Connecticut, Aline Osgood goes to Ohio, Michigan, and Indiana.

A PUPIL OF MR HAYNES'S.—We have frequently had the pleasure of calling attention to the successes of Mr Haynes's pupils, and now we see by the Hampshire Telegraph and Sussex Chronicle of last Saturday that Mr C. Blissett, organist of St Mark's, Portsea, and formerly organist of Cowleigh Church and pupil of Mr Haynes, has been giving a successful organ recital. We extract the following from the above-named paper:—"An organ recital was given by Mr A. Blissett, organist of St Mark's Church, North End, in that sacred building on Wednesday evening. Mr Blissett played a series of varied selections, which displayed to the full his ability as an organist. He opened with Best's 'Fantasia and Fugue' on an ancient psalm-melody, the next number being a fine performance of Lemmens' fantasia in E minor, 'The Storm.' He also gave admirably an 'Offertoire in F' by Wély. But his finest performance was Haynes's 'Grand Fantasia' on a French air, an 'Andante in D' and 'Adagio with Finale in C,' by Haydn, and an 'Allegro Moderato' from Handel were the other pieces."—Malvern News, October 14.

WAIFS.

Mdme Christine Nilsson was a passenger by the Cunard steamer, "Gallia," which sailed from Queenstown last Saturday. She goes out to fulfil an engagement of fifty nights.

Mdme Adelina Patti leaves for New York to-day by the "Servia" steamer.

Mrs Langtry was a passenger by the Guion steamer "Arizona," which touched at Queenstown last Saturday. Among the passengers who also embarked at that port were Mr Charles Wyndham and the members of his Criterion comedy company, who had been fulfilling a short engagement in Cork. They will appear at the Union Square Theatre on their arrival in New York.

Carolina Dory is at Nice.

Gayarre, the Spanish tenor, is in Lisbon.

Mr Isidore de Lara has returned from his visit to Marienbad.

Emil Naudin, the Franco-Italian tenor, was recently at Milan.

Etelka Gerster intends giving concerts in Breslau and Dresden.

The Spanish violinist, Sarasate, is expected at Milan in the spring.

Johann Strauss will make a concert-tour with his orchestra in Italy.

Schuch-Proska is re-engaged at the Theatre Royal Dresden, for ten years.

It is reported that Caroline Salla will sing in Françoise de Rimini at Madrid.

A new theatrical and art journal, Il Telefono, has been published at Florence.

Salvatore Anastasi, the tenor, has been seriously ill, but is now convalescent.

It is proposed erecting at Milan a new theatre to be called the Teatro d'Estate.

A society has been formed at Valparaiso for the cultivation and extension of classical music.

Turolla's benefit at Lugo went off brilliantly. After the performance, she was serenaded.

Mr J. P. Goldberg has returned to London to resume his duties at the Royal Academy of Music.

Francois Planté, the pianist, and Lasserre, the violoncellist, lately gave a concert at Biarritz.

Reichel, Precentor and Organist at St John's Church, Dresden, has been created "Musikdirector."

A gold medal was awarded at Arezzo to Ricordi, of Milan, for his splendid editions of musical works.

There is some talk of a performance of The Redemption, under Gounod himself, next Easter in Vienna.

Marie Wieck has returned from her tour in Scandinavia and resumed her pianoforte lessons in Dresden.

Angelo Neumann, with his Nibelungen company, failed to achieve a pecuniary success in Hanover and Bremen.

Maria Prasini, who has returned from America, is studying with Ambroise Thomas the part of the Queen in Hamlet.

The King of Saxony has conferred the Cross of the Albert Order, first class, on Dr Wüllner, Royal Saxon Capellmeister.

On leaving Royat, the barytone, Maurel, proceeds to Monte Carlo. In March, he will appear as Hamlet at the Milan Scala.

Franz Liszt will, by this time, according to his annual custom, have left Weimar for Italy, where he will spend the winter.

Marianne Brandt has been singing at the Theatre Royal, Stuttgart, her first character being Ortrud; her second, Azucena.

Sontheim gave a "Jubilee Concert" in Stuttgart on the 18th inst., that being the fortieth anniversary of his going on the stage.

Mdlle Meisslinger, contralto, from the Ducal Theatre, Wiesbaden, will play a short engagement at the Imperial Operahouse, Berlin.

Witt, for many years chorus-inspector at the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, and the "right hand" of von Strantz, the director, is dead.

Massenet's Hérodiade, with Elena Hermann, of the Theatre, Warsaw, in the leading character, is to be performed at St Petersburgh.

The Municipality of Rome have ordered, at a cost of 40,000 francs, two iron curtains, one for the Teatro Apollo and one for the Teatro Argentina.

The Italian season at the San Carlos, Lisbon, opened with Aida, principal characters by Pasqua, De Reszké, Barbaccini and Aldighieri.

Friedrich Woltereck, Director of the Grand-Ducal Theatre, Oldenburg, celebrated on the 15th inst. his fortieth professional anniversary.

A two-act romantically-comic opera, Muzzedin, book by J. Schnitzer, music by C. Bachrich, is accepted at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna.

The lessee and manager of the National-Theater, Berlin, having suddenly disappeared, the company are carrying on the business as a commonwealth.

It is now said that Pauline Lucca will fulfil in December her much talked-of and frequently-deferred engagement at the Royal Operahouse, Berlin.

Another composer, this time a Dutchman, named Bocks, has set a version of Paradise Lost, which will be performed in the course of the winter at Antwerp.

We learn, from the fourth annual report of the Hoch Conservatory, Frankfort-on-the-Maine, that the average number of pupils, male and female, for the year, was 216.

The Theatre Royal, Hanover, re-decorated and provided with extra means of egress and other precautionary arrangements against fire, re-opened with Gluck's Iphigenia in Aulis.

Anton Rubinstein has engaged some of the most eminent living artists for the ten Symphonic Concerts of the Russian Society of Music, St Petersburg, at which he will conduct.

The Italian season at the Teatro Real, Madrid, was inaugurated with Les Huguenots, the cast including Borghi-Mamò, Theodorini, and Rodriguez, Nannetti, Dufriche, Pandolfini, and Masini.

Heinrich Barth, of the Royal High School of Music, Berlin, has accepted the invitation of Anton Rubinstein to play at one of the grand concerts given under the latter's direction in St Petersburg.

A new opera, Despo, l'Eroina di Suli, will be produced this winter at Patrasso. The music is by Carrer, composer of La Redivira and Dante e Beatrice, both brought out some years since at the Carcano, Milan.

An entertainment, in which the great tragedian, Tomaso Salvini, and Ernesto Rossi took part, at the Teatro Pagliano, Florence, for the benefit of the sufferers by the inundations, produced upwards of 6,000 francs.

Franz Schubert's romantic opera, Alfonso und Estrella, as "arranged" by Fuchs, Capellmeister at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, was recently performed for the first time at at the Stadttheater, Cologne.

At their first winter concert, the Male Choral Association, Vienna, will give Wagner's Liebesmahl der Apostel, for soloists, chorus, and orchestra. (The Birmingham Festival of 1876 still resounds with echoes of this.—Dr Blüge.)

Mdme Pappenheim has returned to Milan from Buenos Ayres, having sung with much success, at the National Theatre, in seven operas: Lucrezia Borgia, Un Ballo in Maschera, Il Trovatore, Ernani, Norma, Les Huguenots, and Nabucco.

The first three Philharmonie Subscription Concerts, Berlin, under the direction of Dr Wüllner of Dresden, are fixed for the 23rd inst., the 13th November, and the 4th December. The soloists announced are Sophie Menter, Hans von Bülow, and Marsick, the violinist.

Mdlle Antoinette Badia, one of the charming young "Sisters Badia," whose duet-singing has long been the rage at fashionable concerts, was married on Monday last, at the Italian Catholic Church of St Peter's, Hatton Garden, to Signor Angelo Carminati.

Mr and Mrs German Reed's Entertainment.—On Monday next, Oct. 23rd, Messrs Alfred Reed and Corney Grain will revive The Turquoise Ring of G. W. Godfrey and Lionel Benson, and Mr Corney Grain will produce, on the same evening, his new musical sketch, En Route.

Leeds Triennial Musical Festival.—At a meeting of the Festival Committee last week, Mr Frederick R. Spark (hon. sec.) reported that he had received subscriptions to the guarantee fund for the Festival next year in less than three weeks amounting to over £10,000. This amount is double the sum subscribed during the same period for the Festival of 1880.

The Birmingham Festival.—Mr Jaffray (Chairman of the Orchestral Committee) and Mr G. Heaton, at the meeting of the General Hospital Committee paid over a cheque for £4,000, part proceeds of the late festival. Mr Jaffray stated that the accounts had not been finally made up, but enough was known of the expenditure to justify that payment, and his expectation was that a considerable sum beyond that amount would be available for the purposes of the charity. A vote of thanks to the Orchestral Committee for their energetic management of the festival was unanimously passed.

Berlin.—About an hour before Tannhäuser should have commenced at the Royal Operahouse on the 5th inst., the iron curtain, in consequence of the defective way in which it was hung, fell with a loud crash, creating great alarm, besides doing much damage to the stage. Fortunately no one was hurt, but, of course, there was no performance, and the theatre had to be closed for a week. When the necessary repairs had been effected in the stage and the masonry connected with it, the performances were, by special permission of the Emperor, resumed without the iron curtain.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Labiache, Santley, &c. BRISTOL MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

Bristol, Thursday.

The first public business of the Festival this morning was the reception of his Royal Highness the president and the Duchess of Edinburgh, who arrived from London shortly before noon. Although the visit of the illustrious couple amounted to no more than a "look in" on their way to Plymouth, and was timed to last but five hours, the mayor and the Festival Committee did their best to surround the event with all possible honour. I have already referred to his worship's suggestion that the streets included in the Royal route should be decorated. The citizens, let me now add, made a fairly favourable response, considering that the time was short, and that the occurrence of a fine Wednesday inspired serious misgivings as to the probable temper of the weather office on Thursday. Flags were freely displayed in places, and Bristol Bridge, which, I suppose, the corporation took in hand, was gay with Venetian masts and banneroles. It is, perhaps, not a matter for regret that such demonstrations of rejoicing stopped short where they did, considering that the weather transformed them into a saddening mockery of gladness. The brilliant yesterday proved nothing but a delusion and a snare as an indication of the morrow; for, when the citizens awoke this morning, the rain beat and the wind blew, and the hopes of those who had looked for a gala day had a great fall. What is more, the rain went on beating, and the wind continued blowing with a persistence worthy of the malignant fates that control our climate. Both literally and in a figure this damped the proceedings. The streets were not half as crowded as they would have been had the sun shone; enthusiasm seemed no less out of place than fun at a funeral, and the old city, conscious of looking its worst, hid behind a curtain of mist. Nevertheless, the fore-arranged programme was carried out, and, of course, the military display, resting with men who are not allowed to bear umbrellas, went on independent of climatic considerations. Bristol is strong in auxiliary soldiers of all arms, and these turned out in surprising force, considering the certainty of a wet skin and the graver fact that most of the men had to suspend their ordinary avocations for the day. The Royal Naval Artillery Corps, with whom the Duke of Edinburgh, as Inspector of Naval Reserves, is officially connected, mounted a guard of honour at the railway station; a second guard was furnished at Colston Hall by the Artillery, who also posted two gun detachments, with nine-pounders, at the Drawbridge, where the cadets of the Grammar School were drawn up. As for the Engineers and Infantry, who turned out four or five fairly strong companies, they lined some portion of the route along which the illustrious visitors passed. Their Royal Highnesses were received at the station by the mayor and corporation, who, I scarcely need add, presented an address of welcome, only one paragraph of which calls for notice as referring to the special object of the day. In that paragraph the municipality spoke of the duke's coming as affording peculiar pleasure, because indicating "cordial approval of the efforts being made in this city and throughout the country to promote the establishment of the Royal College of Music, in the objects of which—and of all other institutions conducive to the advancement of art and the welfare of the country—the Royal family have always taken so deep an interest." The address having been appropriately acknowledged by the duke, their Royal Highnesses took their places in an open landau, drawn by four horses, and preceded by the mayor in his state-carriage, a number of police acting as escort, drove at once to Colston Hall, where the Festival Committee, headed by the chairman, Mr W. Smith, awaited them. The appearance of the modest cortége was greeted with frequent cheering along the line of route, and as just at this time the rain temporarily suspended operations, the Royal progress was more satisfactory than could have been looked for. Meanwhile, the hall filled with an audience certainly not less curious to see the president of the Festival and his wife than to assist at the performance of Rossini's Moses in Egypt, greater stranger though the musical work undoubtedly was.

The Duke and Duchess had every cause to be satisfied with their reception on appearing in the Vice-President's Gallery. Cheers broke forth from all parts of the hall, and were continued for some time, being followed in turn by "God Save the Queen" (Mdme Albani taking the solo), and the Russian National Anthem, arranged for chorus and orchestra. The performance of Rossini's music then began, and continued steadily to the end, amid, short of audible applause, every sign that the Italian master, with his unfailing melodic genius, had taken a firm hold upon public attention and sympathy. The audience, it is to be hoped, were fully aware of the fact that they had come to hear a work composed for an Italian stage during the period of Lent, and never intended by the author of the book or of the music to be given as a concert-room oratorio. It was, however, still more important for them to bear in mind that there is no absolute standard of sacred music, one country differing from another in its ideal of this thing, and each consulting, as is but natural and right, its own taste and temperament. Nothing can be more illogical and absurd, or, in one aspect, more arrogant, than sneers at Italian sacred music because it is more flowery and sensuous than our own. That music has a raison d'être no less than the measured and sombre strains which suit our own colder natures; and he is indeed to be pitied who, on account of prejudice, shuts himself out from a great national school of art. In every such school there is something to admire and to profit by, the benefit of which comes to those who will not limit their range, but are prepared to recognize good wherever it may be seen. In the form of Italian art which Moses in Egypt represents, we meet with the supremacy of melody and an order of expression prepared to sacrifice much for the sake of symmetrical structure and graceful utterance. Rossini's music may not often be such as, having regard to the verbal text, we should prefer, but at the worst it is a form of the "varied good," in its essence of infinite value to the universal art, and even necessary to all branches thereof as a healthy influence. German music, which, in its classic masterpieces, shows a blending of Italian tune and Teutonic ideality, is now degenerating in proportion as the first-named element is set aside. For ourselves, we cannot afford to neglect the influence of Italian art, unless, indeed, we are prepared to be, musically speaking, mere "fleshless bones and ribs"—the débris of what should have life and soul. Quite apart from this consideration, and yet not without the significance in regard to it, was the pleasure obviously given to the audience by Rossini's beautiful themes as they came on in never ending procession. Once again melody asserted its individual power as that element in music which finds universal response, and as the soul of the art existing independent of scholasticism, which often like a gross body so enwraps it that to the perception there is gross body and little else. I, for one, therefore, am not going to find fault with the committee for selecting an "old-fashioned" Italian opera. Their choice pleased the people, and asserted an eternal and essential truth, of which, more is the pity, many of us are losing sight. The performance though by no means free from blemish, owing to insufficiency of rehearsal, was among the best of the week, and, as regards the solo vocalists, had quite an exceptional value. This will at once be understood when I state that the part of the Jewish maiden, Anais, was taken by Mdme Albani, and that of her mother, Zillah, by Mdme Trebelli; while Mr Lloyd (Amenophis) and Mr Santley (Pharaoh) represented the characters in which they made so great an impression when the work was revived by the late Sacred Harmonic Society. Mdme Albani was never heard in concert-room to greater advantage—her singing challenged unqualified admiration. Its vocal perfectness and its intense expression belonged to the great things of executive art, surely convincing fervent laudatores temporis acti that we have yet a great soprano amongst us. On her side, Mdme Trebelli was not wanting. The music suited her alike in form and character, and she rendered it with the ease and finish of an artist whose Rossinian studies began years ago, and have since been brought to a point not much short of perfection. What I have to say about Mr Lloyd is easily anticipated by those who remember his previous success in the same work. Our popular tenor is never happier than with the delightfully vocal phrases of the Italian master. They inspire him, and he in turn gives to them all the meaning that was in Rossini's mind, and all the finish which the connoisseur of singing can desire. As much will be taken for granted with regard to Mr Santley, who had this week a series of triumphs, possibly equalled, but not surpassed, in his record. There remains to speak of Miss Williams, who gave prominence to the part of the Egyptian Queen; of Mr Harper Kearton, an excellent Aaron; of Mr Wortley, whose intelligent singing as Moses should be praised; and of Mr Hilton, by whom the priest Osiris was effectively represented. In short, this performance was an unqualified triumph for the soloists. It gave them a superb opportunity, and they made the best of it, one and all.

At the close of the oratorio the Royal visitors left Colston Hall for the railway station, in order to resume their journey, the arrangements being as before, save that the Volunteer infantry mounted one guard of honour at the Hall and the Engineers another at the terminus. That the visit of the Duke and Duchess gave much satisfaction, not only to the promoters of the festival, but to the citizens generally, is a matter about which no doubt can exist.

This evening's concert was not so well attended as those given on previous days, despite the presence in the programme of Mr Mackenzie's Jason, the one absolute novelty of the week. I shall reserve my comments upon this work till to-morrow, content to state now that the audience received it well, liberally applauded many of the numbers, and "called" the composer with genuine enthusiasm. The solos were safe in the hands of Miss Anna Williams, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Santley. At the close of the cantata a miscellaneous selection was performed, including Dvorak's Sclavonian Rhapsody in D, Dr Wesley's chorus, "The Praise of Music," conducted by Mr Rootham, the overture to Preciosa, and a number of songs that do not require comment.

Friday.

Reverting to Mr A. C. Mackenzie's cantata, Jason, the first performance of which I briefly noted yesterday, attention is primarily called to the fact that neither the author of the libretto, Mr W. Grist, nor the composer of the music was especially aided by the nature of his subject. Affected by a distinguished example, persons in the position of these gentlemen are inclined just now to run after myths and legends, without looking carefully to the existence of human interest, apart from which works of art must ever be more or less sterile. Human interest in the story of Jason's expedition is of a diluted kind. We cannot be expected to care much about the capture of the Golden Fleece, while the hero's adventures before laying hands on his prize appertain to an impossible life, with which the conditions of the life that is real have nothing in common. Humanity enters only through the loves of Jason and Medea, and even here outflow of sympathy is checked by knowledge that the woman's nature is that of a monster only awaiting provocation to commit bloody and brutal deeds. As to the character of its story, therefore, the new cantata runs handicapped. It will be coldly judged as a work of art; deriving no benefit from the generous impulses which particular manifestations of human nature can awaken in the common breast. Art, however, can do much unassisted, and Jason, I am happy to say, supplies an exemplification of the fact.

Mr Grist has divided his book into six dramatic scenes, of which the first is entitled "Building of the Ship." Men are felling trees for Argo; women are lamenting the departure of husband and lover; Orpheus sings the story of Ares and Aphrodite, with its moral: "In vain, in vain, for love to implore, When battle claims the god of war." Here is variety, at any rate, and the composer rushes to it without stopping to make a formal introduction. His opening chorus for male voices, "Ply the axe," is full of vigour and well wrought out. Already we see that Mr Mackenzie does not favour fragmentary treatment, and we see, too, that his bright and picturesque orchestration is intended to have a representative character. The leit-motive crops up with Argo, and enters likewise into the structure of the female chorus, "Matrons, weep your sad estate," Here the example is particularly appropriate, though its repeated enunciation by the bass instruments alone too obviously imitates Wagner. The emotion of the women's chorus wants force and entirely lacks abandon. Its grief is measured, and not free from a suspicion of the artificial. None the less must clever treatment of the theme and many happy effects be admired. The song of Orpheus (tenor) follows, paying more regard to dramatic propriety than musical "form," of which, in a scholastic sense, it has none at all. In some respects this number is quite distinctive, and in all it shows power of a high order. The scene ends with a return to the subject of the male chorus, now arranged for all the voices, and continued by a massive and extended coda. By this time Mr Mackenzie has made his mark. He may not have demonstrated a spontaneous flow of tenderness and sympathy, but there is no mistake as to his mastery in other respects. This is a man to be further heard. The second scene, "Invocation and Departure," contains Jason's prayer to Zeus for success, and the rejoicing of the Greeks in the god's answering thunder. Of these, the first is brief; the second, well developed; the first, a disappointment, looking, not at what it is, but what it might have been; the second, a satisfaction looked at anyhow. Frequent recurrence throughout the chorus of the leading phrase in Jason's invocation happily connects cause and effect, and is one among many instances of thoughtfulness. The music, I may add, is here somewhat less changeful in tonality than in many other parts of the cantata. An orchestral intermezzo, "On the waters," represents the voyage from Hellas to Colchis. This is a charming number, orthodox as to form, and as poetic in spirit as though the composer of Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage had written it. Indeed, Mendelssohn could not have been far from Mr Mackenzie when he conceived this fresh and breezy music. The movement has an associated as well as an independent significance, since themes previously heard call up the connected ideas. The motive of the Women's chorus, for example, is prominently used; to suggest, perhaps, that the crew have thoughts of home and loved ones as they sail onwards. This movement closes the first part. Hellas is done with; Colchis lies ahead, and we go in advance of the Argonauts, to where Medea stands on the sea-shore looking westward for the hero whose coming she feels with a supernatural sense. An extended monologue for the Royal enchantress opens the third scene, entitled "Medea's Vision." Of course the heroine has a theme of her own—a shifty utterance made conspicuous by frequent repetition during the course of a number much broken up by the exigencies of dramatic expression. The music, however, has other and better sources of interest than its employment of representative themes. Its force will not be denied; nor the powerful flight which carries it safely through a prolonged and always strenuous situation. Objection may, nevertheless, be made to its restless—I had almost written reckless—coursing from key to key. It is true that Mr Mackenzie goes dangerously near the border of licence in this respect, and it is no less true that Medea's scena, elaborate though it be, is not grateful to the singer, who will never make with it a vocal effect satisfying to herself. Much modern music belongs to the same category. It is thought out for the orchestra, not for the voice, save in so far as the latter supplies an additional instrument. Scene the fourth, "Welcome and Love," opening with a chorus of Colchians, "Welcome Jason and thy band," which presents a decided contrast to much that has gone before, since there is in it hardly a case of "advanced" characteristics apart from the treatment of a single phrase. This number, with its symmetrical recurring passages, belongs to an order of composition long familiar, and, as it is here proved, not yet abandoned. At the same time, I am not enamoured of the effect produced by such short, jerky phrases as those with which the chorus opens. The love-music now begins, taking, in the first instance, the form of a duet, "Hero of Hellas." Medea opens with a melodious solo, and is answered by Jason to the same theme in an expanded form. This is beautiful and graceful, as well as according to an accepted model; but its continuation, in which choral passages are combined with the solo voices, achieves a less decided success. Against the structure of the ensemble, I have nothing to say; but the utterance of the lovers is not that of passion. The phrases rarely flow; they lack spontaneity, and are in many cases awkwardly constructed for vocal effect. Mr Mackenzie, I am informed, resides in Italy, and he will act as a sensible man if he drink "the wine of the country"—in other words, study the Italian masters of vocal expression who, unhampered by theories which "darken counsel," went straight to the mark, and made their lovers sing strains full of the very soul of love. Less musical elaboration and more verve and rhythmical swing is what Mr Mackenzie's duet requires. The fifth scene, "Conflict," begins with a chorus, "Still is all, save breeze of evening," descriptive of Jason's encounter with the oxen. Its opening section takes the form of a canon on the octave at half-bar interval for soprano and tenor; the theme—a simple and melodious one—soon re-appearing in the same form with an added counterpoint for alto. The fight is then briefly pictured with a vigorous pencil, and a repetition of the canon, followed by a coda, ends the episode. Medea next takes up the story, her solo describing the rise of the armed men, direful product of the dragon teeth. Though set very low for the soprano voice, this solo is highly effective because instinct with the spirit of the situation. The chorus of armed men, "Weapons slashing," deserves like praise, as does the solo in which Orpheus, looking on the discomfiture of the sudden host, narrates its incidents. Briefly, all this scene is powerful through the use of legitimate means, so far victorious. Jason in the scena, "Now my firm soul," encourages himself to the final struggle with the guardian dragon, first recalling past events, which gives the composer an opportunity to bring in his representative themes. The hero offers up a solemn prayer to Zeus, then invokes the aid of Medea, and, beginning the fight, makes record proceed simultaneously with deed. Mr Mackenzie may be complimented here upon avoiding several dangers. He does not recall the lugubriously comic ending of the "Nibelungen" beast, nor does he crave to be musical in the utmost stress of his realism. A song of triumph follows, and is marked by great intensity. Again, however, it is clear that the composer might improve upon his treatment of the words, with a view to greater declamatory force and the increased ease of the singer. Though quite at home with the orchestra he has yet something to learn in writing for the voice. By way of ending the scene, Jason is acclaimed in a short passage of choral unison such as might be looked for in an opera of Verdi or Meyerbeer. The closing section, "Triumph," is announced by a trio, "Rouse again, lyre," for Medea, Jason, and Orpheus. This leads to a chorus for male voices, "Haul up the anchor," and a fugue for full chorus, "Argo's fame will never die." The trio is melodious and pleasing, but much the most notable feature here is the fugue on a plain diatonic subject. Mr Mackenzie handles the scholastic form easily, and in it brings the work to an orthodox as well as an effective end.

Little need be added to the foregoing remarks, which, as far as my judgment goes, indicate the merits and shortcomings of the cantata. Merits predominate; above all, that of strong resource and the skilful employment of means. In time, no doubt, Mr Mackenzie will free himself from reminiscences such as in Jason, recall Mendelssohn, Beethoven, and Wagner. He will also show himself more decided as to an artistic method. At present he is in that respect a little mixed—old and new, orthodox and heterodox, good and bad, mingling in strange companionship. The sooner these changes come the better. Every year of the life of so able a man is precious.

I shall not speak of the performance in detail. The soloists did their best, and the chorus were prepared to win success, but so inadequate had been the general rehearsals that the result was as I have said. It avails little to rate a single manifestation of the incompetence which has so dangerously signalized this festival. The system which makes it possible must be attacked and swept away. Critics may marvel that Mr Hallé conducted the performance under such conditions, but the committee are the responsible persons, and, as at Birmingham three years ago, they should either mend their ways or make room for better men—above all, let them never again undertake to produce a new work and limit its rehearsal to the fag end of a long Monday and an hour snatched on Thursday. Novelties, however desirable, are not essential. The public do not call for them—the attendance at Jason being the smallest since 1873—and there are plenty of old masterpieces of which amateurs can never hear enough. But whether new compositions be brought forward or not, the management of the Bristol Festival must be reformed, or it is surely doomed. The Birmingham people were wise in time. Shall I, three years hence, be able to say as much concerning the Bristolians? The Festival closed to-day with Handel's Messiah, according to the good old custom, which I, for one, trust may never be broken through. As a matter of course, the hall was crowded. It is understood that the week's doings have resulted in a considerable financial success; but at what a cost has the surplus been gained! The committee had far better have spent it, and risked a deficit in winning the crowning glory of an artistic triumph.—D. T.

HEBREW VERSION OF "GOD SAVE THE QUEEN."

It is announced that a movement has been set on foot to introduce "God save the Queen" among the native tribes in India. The movement has been anticipated by the Beni Israel community. In the Hebrew Grammar ("Reshith Hallimud") prepared for their use at the expense of Messrs Sassoon by Mr Steinschneider, there is given a Hebrew version of the National Anthem which (unlike the version published fifty years ago by Professor Hurwitz in his Hebrew Grammar) can be sung to the traditional tune. Our readers will be interested in reading the first verse of Mr Steinschneider's paraphrase:—

מלכת חן שמור נא אל
מלכת הוד נצור האל
שמרה האל
המשילה בגבורה
נצח ותפארה
הארך ימי גבירה
שמרה האל

—Jewish Chronicle, 20th Oct., 1882.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—Wilhelm Hill's opera, Alona, which recently carried off the second prize offered by the Corporation, will be produced next month at the Stadttheater, under the direction of Goltermann. The principal parts will be sustained by Schröder-Hanfstängl, Candidus, Fessler, Niering, and Weber.

MUNICH.—The Vogls, man and wife, though bound to Angelo Neumann by a seven months' engagement for his Wagnerian operatic tour, will appear a few nights in December at the Theatre Royal, where they are still members of the regular company.

DARMSTADT.—Marianne Schönberger (previously Mdlle Marçoni), a once popular singer, has died, nearly ninety-seven years old. She was one of the first members of the Grand-Ducal Theatre, established in 1810 by the Grand-Duke, Ludwig II., and at the inaugural performance sang the title-part in Mozart's Titus.

LEIPSIC.—The programme of the second Gewandhaus Concert comprised: part 1. Overture to Der Wasserträger (Les Deux Journées) Cherubini; "Dem Unendlichen" (scored by Grimm), Franz Schubert; Violoncello Concerto, Molique; Songs, Johannes Brahms; Three Violoncello Solos, Schumann, C. Reinecke, and Klengel. Part II. Symphony (No. 3), Im Walde, Johannes Brahms. The singer was Mad. Amalie Joachim; the violoncellist, Herr Alwin Schröder (a member of the orchestra).

ST PETERSBURGH.

(Correspondence.)

The following regulations for the payment of dramatic authors and composers have been adopted: For every performance of an original work in verse or prose at any of the Imperial Theatres here or in Moscow, the author will receive 2 per cent. on the gross receipts if the work is in one act; 4 per cent., if in two; 6 per cent., if in three; and 10 per cent., if in four or more acts. The honorarium for operas will be paid to the composer, who makes his own terms with the librettist. If, however, he wishes to cede part of his per-centage to the latter, he must come to a definite arrangement and submit it to the management, the management not undertaking the settlement of difficulties arising between the two. Translations, or adaptations of foreign pieces, to be paid for by one sum, agreed upon mutually between the management and author, or by a per-centage of not more than one per cent. on the gross receipts for each act, the number of acts in the original being the standard of calculation.

THE GRAND ORGAN,

Swell Organ.—Bourdon, 16 feet; open diapason, 8; keraulophon, 8; concert flute, 8; octave, 4; flute octaviante, 4; twelfth, 3; super-octave, 2; flageolet harmonique, 2; mixture, 4 ranks; furniture, 3; contra fagotto, 16 feet; cornopean, 8; oboe, 8; echo tromba, 8; vox humana, 8; clarion, 4; tremulant.

Solo Organ.—Grand open diapason, 8 feet; flute harmonique, 8; flute octaviante, 4; grand tromba, 8; corno di bassetto, 8; carillons (in a swell box).

Couplers.—Swell to great; swell to octave; swell to sub-octave; swell to choir; solo to great; great to swell (sforzando); choir to great; great octave (on own manual); solo to pedal; swell to pedal; great to pedal; choir to pedal.

Recapitulation.—Pedal organ, 14 stops, 510 pipes; choir organ, 12, 696; great organ, 19, 1,624; swell organ, 17, 1,264; solo organ, 6, 290, and 37 bells; couplers, 12. Total, 80 stops; 4,384 pipes. Besides 15 combination and other pedals for various movements.

The actions of all the manuals and pedal organ are pneumatic. The combination pedals† act on ventils. The wind is supplied by 12 double French vertical feeders acted on by 3 of Joy's hydraulic engines, the motive power being taken from the water of one of the great towers at a minimum pressure of 100 lb. to the square inch. These feeders supply the wind to four large reservoirs or bellows, which again supply smaller reservoirs placed near the various wind-chests and weighted to different pressures. The engines, feeders, and principal reservoirs are arranged under the organ, and can be seen at work by the visitors who are desirous of inspecting them. The space occupied by the organ is 51 feet wide by 29 feet deep, and the height from the floor on which the engines are fixed to the top of the instrument is 70 feet. The total cost has been £6,000.

* Just completed by Messrs Gray & Davison.

† Instead of the usual English system of composition pedals for drawing out and putting in groups of stops to produce different combinations, the French ventil system has been adopted as on the whole the best for so large an instrument. Thus the stops of the great organ are placed on four separate wind-chests, each containing its own group of stops, to which, by means of four pedals, the wind is either cut off or admitted, according to the desire of the organist. The stops on the other manuals are similarly treated.

* The surpluses derived from the Festivals of 1867 and 1876 are mainly attributable to the engagement respectively of Mdme Lind Goldschmidt and Mr Sims Reeves, and are, therefore, quite exceptional as regards average results. The moneys collected on behalf of the charity are placed to a separate account in no way identified with the Festival management expenses.

From this statement may be seen the importance of securing a large number of stewards, so that when a deficit arises it may not be so onerous as in former years; and as of late it has become so proportionately small, it is confidently believed that, with an increased number of stewards, the amount of liability may be reduced, on average, to a very trifling sum. It is most desirable that each retiring steward should nominate a successor, and thus place the continuance of the Hereford Festivals beyond a matter of doubt. Each steward, by virtue of his office and its responsibilities, has the privilege of selecting his own seat or seats before the ticket office is open to the public; applications being met according to priority of date, and, failing that, by ballot. The collections for the charity have steadily increased during the last thirty years, except upon the occasion of the last Festival, when the amount showed a falling off; this, however, may be explained by the serious depression in trade which existed at the time. The liability of each steward is confined to the financial result, and in no case is it obligatory to contribute to the charity. It may, however, be stated, that a large number of stewards are invariably found among the contributors.

BERKELEY L. S. STANHOPE,

* For the benefit of the Widows and orphans of the clergy in the three dioceses of Hereford, Gloucester, and Worcester.

Here is, or ought to be, a convincing answer to such critics as, having no sympathy for the Three-Choir Festivals, or for the objects, social and artistic, to which they owe their origin, and by adherence to which they are likely to maintain their position, desire to abolish them. Can no event in Britain that chances away from London possibly interest London readers? and are etceteras (Hereford, Worcester, and Gloucester) "nothing?" Perish the thought! Let the Wagner centenary and the Liszt centenary come in due course, and then Messiah and Elijah—requiescant in pace!

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The following is the programme of music given at the students Chamber Concert in the concert room of the institution on Saturday evening, October 21:—

Anthem, "Sing, O heavens" (C. Lucas)—the choir; Prelude, from Suite Anglaise, No. 4 (J. S. Bach) and Kreisleriana, No. 1 (Schumann), pianoforte—Miss Devey, pupil of Sir Julius Benedict; Recitative, "At last the bounteous sun," and Air, "With joy the impatient husbandman," Seasons (Haydn)—Mr Musgrove Tufnail; Nocturne (MS.), (German Jones, student), violin—Mr German Jones, pianoforte—Mr T. B. Knott; Postlude, in E flat (Henry Smart)—organ, Mr H. C. Tonking; Song, "The Young Nun" (Schubert)—Miss Hilda Wilson, Westmoreland scholar; Suite Moderne, in G sharp minor, Op. 144 (Ferdinand Hiller)—pianoforte, Miss Cantelo, Lady Goldsmid scholar, pupil of Mr Walter Macfarren; Bolero, in D minor (Bazzini)—violin, Mr Richardson; Solo and Chorus, "He in tears that soweth," A Song of Victory, (F. Hiller), female voices—Solo, Miss Margaret Hoare; Allegro Risoluto, from trio in E minor, MS., (W. G. Wood, Potter Exhibitioner)—(The Charles Lucas Silver Medal was awarded for this piece in July, 1882)—pianoforte—Mr W. G. Wood, violin, Mr Frank Arnold, violoncello—Mr Hambleton; Siciliana, "Ogni Pena" (Pergolese)—Miss Charlotte Thudichum; Nachtstucke, Op. 23 (Schumann)—pianoforte, Mr Charles Reddie, pupil of Mr Westlake; Scena, "Eppur sento d'amarla," and Romanza, "Bella del tuo sorriso," Reginella (Braga)—Mr David Lewis; Prelude, from Suite Anglaise, No. 6 (J. S. Bach)—pianoforte, Mr Samuel S. Wiggins, pupil of F. B. Jewson; Quartet (MS.), "They that wait upon the Lord" (F. K. Hattersley, Balfe scholar)—Miss Charlotte Thudichum, Miss Ada Rose, Mr Hulbert L. Fulkerson, and Mr Grimshaw; Ballade, in G minor, Op. 23 (Chopin)—pianoforte, Miss Frances Smith, pupil of Mr O'Leary; Part-songs, "They whom we loved on earth," and "Arise, my love" (F. Westlake)—the choir.

Mr William Shakespeare conducted.

MR ADVOCATE DAVISON.—We hear with great pleasure that this gentleman is about to resume his practice in Kimberly. He is expected to arrive from Cape Town by the fast coach leaving to-day. He will receive a hearty welcome from his many old friends, and his presence at the Bar will materially add to its strength, as Mr Davison has long been known as an able and fearless advocate.—Diamond News, Sept. 12.

PRAGUE.—A new opera, Dimitri, by Dvorák, the Czec composer, has been produced at the National Theatre and well received. The libretto, by Mdme Czervinka, is founded on the story of the false Czaar Demetrius. The authoress has taken part of it from Schiller's Demetrius fragment and part from a drama by Micovek. The music, especially that of the first and last acts, was much admired.

DRESDEN.—Grammann's Andreasfest is to be given in November at the Theatre Royal, followed by Gounod's Philémon et Baucis and Verdi's Simon Boccanegra. In January will come Anton Rubinstein's Maccabäer, with Mdlle Marianne Brandt as Lea. Norma, Idomeneus, and Iphigenia will be revived, and Le Prophète performed for the first time in the present house. Another novelty will be Smetana's comic opera, Der verkaufte Braut.—Professor Rappoldi will introdue at his soirées several interesting works not previously heard here; among them are Pianoforte Trio in G minor, Smetana; Quintet, E flat major, Anton Dvorák; and Trio, F minor, Marschner.

BALFE.

Michael William Balfe, composer of the Bohemian Girl, a man of genius fortunate in his lifetime and deservedly famous after death, lies buried in Kensal Green Cemetery, close to the graves of Bishop, Goss, Wallace, Lover, and other distinguished musicians. He died on October 20th, 1870, since which time his statue has been set up in the vestibule of Drury Lane Theatre, a bust of him has been placed in the National Gallery at Dublin, a memorial window in his honour inserted at St Patrick's Cathedral, a mural tablet let into the front of the house where he was born, and a scholarship associated with his name founded at the Royal Academy of Music. And now, to crown all, a marble monument to his memory, situated in the north-west aisle of Westminster Abbey, was unveiled by Canon Duckworth in presence of many members of the family of the illustrious dead, including his widow, and a distinguished company.

Not long after Balfe's death a memorial, signed by the Duke of Edinburgh and many other high and influential personages, was presented to the late Dean Stanley, asking him to find a place for a monumental tablet to the composer in the Abbey. Beyond a formal acknowledgment, nothing came of the memorial until four years later, when, in reply to a second communication from the same source, the Dean wrote that, while anxious to "render honour to a gifted native of the sister island," he could not, for the time being, undertake to "increase" the existing number of cenotaphs. The committee engaged in that fruitless undertaking expended the sum of £800. At length, and when Dr Bradley was appointed to the deanery of Westminster, another and equally distinguished committee was formed—owing to the exertions of Mr William Alexander Barrett, whose interesting "Life of Balfe" has just been published—and, their petition having been favourably received, a place was found for the tablet in what hereafter may be called Musicians' Corner, among a group of monuments to the memory of William Sterndale Bennett, Purcell, Arnold, Blow, and Croft.

The monument is set in the wall on a level with the eye of the spectator. It is in the form of a tomb-like tablet made throughout of white Carrara marble and surmounted by a bust of Balfe in basso relievo, a good likeness, the work of M. Malempré, the same Belgian sculptor who modelled the statue at Drury Lane Theatre. From the sides of the oval tablet upon which the portrait is raised spring musical emblems, and in the panel below is the following inscription: "Michael William Balfe, born in Dublin, 15th May, 1808; died at Rowney Abbey, Hertfordshire, 20th October, 1870. Knight of the Legion of Honour of France, Commander of the Order of Charles III. of Spain." At the afternoon choral service, under the lantern, which preceded the unveiling of the monument, prayers were intoned by the Rev. H. A. Cotton, minor canon, and the lessons read by Canon Duckworth. Turle's Chant in A, for the 104th Psalm, was finely given; Dr Bridges, organist of the Abbey, played the "Magnificat" and "Nunc Dimittis," written for the Caxton Celebration, 1877. There was also a splendid rendering of the anthem, "Save me, O God," composed by Balfe for Mdme Adelaide, sister of King Louis Phillipe, in 1846.

At the conclusion of the impressive religious service, Canon Duckworth led the way to the north-west aisle, and having withdrawn the veil from the tablet, proceeded, contrary to precedent, to recite a speech in praise of one of the greatest of our native composers, one whose memory all present yesterday delighted to honour. The Rev. Canon said: "The monument which I have had the honour of unveiling heightens the interest of this aisle, already crowded with illustrious memories. It is twelve years to-day since the brillant and successful Irishman, whose features are before us, passed away, and for more than half a century the name of Balfe has been a household word wherever the English tongue is spoken. It may be thought that the present tribute to his genius has been somewhat tardily paid; but, if so, it is a satisfaction to reflect that it is now paid with enhanced honour, for it may be safely said to embody the mature verdict of the musical world. Memorials hastily erected are apt to be the offering of admiration so mixed with personal grief that it may overrate the loss it commemorates. But when we accord to the founder of the modern English musical drama a place by the side of Purcell and Sterndale Bennett, we ratify the deliberate judgment of all the living authorities on his art in this country. We do more; we award to him a distinction which would be unanimously sanctioned, I believe, by the musicians of Europe. Still more significant is that distinction when it is borne in mind that the characteristic quality of Balfe's music was never so little esteemed, or at least so scantily exhibited, by composers as at the present hour. Whatever may be the merits of those laborious innovators who are building up the music of the future, it is certain that the mantle of his abounding melodiousness has fallen upon none of them. But while educated opinion claims for Balfe his niche among the worthies of Westminster Abbey, we cannot forget the right which he derives from his immense and well-earned popularity. Like his great contemporary, Charles Dickens, also enshrined here, he has been a minister of purest delight and recreation to the masses of his countrymen. Sterling artist though he was, he had those popular gifts which appeal to all. We require no 'Balfe Society' to interpret him. It is that inexhaustible tunefulness of his, that fund of bright spontaneous song, which has endeared his works to hearers of every class; and his simple flowing ballads, with their mingled sunshine and pathos, will be the delight of 'other hearts and other lips' than those of this generation. They have found their place in the affections of the English people as 'things of beauty,' and will remain a 'joy for ever.'"

After lingering awhile to take a parting view of the memorial, the company gradually dispersed.—D. T.

[Among those who took part in the ceremony—besides Mdme Balfe (the widow), accompanied by Count de Haros, son of the Duke of Frias, and members of the Behrend family, connected by blood and marriage with the composer—were Mdme Puzzi, Sir Julius Benedict, Mr George Macfarren, Mr John Hullah, Signor Garcia, Mr Barnby, Mr Lazarus, Mr John Thomas (Harpist to the Queen), Mr John Gill (Secretary, Royal Academy of Music), Mr Duncan Davison, Mr Felix Weiss, Mr Ella, Mr George Osborne, Dr Wylde, Signor Piatti, Mr Weist Hill, Signor Schira, Mr W. A. Barrett, Rev. Dr. Cox, Mr W. G. Cusins, Mr Sutherland Edwards, Mr Gwyllym Crowe, Mr T. Knox Holmes, and others. But there were missing from the assemblage many familiar faces whose presence swelled the troops of friends that attended the funeral of the author of The Bohemian Girl a dozen years ago.]

THE OLD PILOT.*

"The sea is moaning hard, my son,
The wild north-easter raves,
Hark! to the distant signal gun,
Across the angry waves,
Climb up the seaward slope and fire
The beacon's warning light,
I'll launch the boat, and you and I
Will face the storm to-night.
A Providence aye guides the helm
When Mercy's at the oar;
We'll safely ride the surging tide,
And bring the crew ashore."

The light ablaze upon the hill,
Is seen with joy afar,
While gallantly the little boat
Has cleared the harbour bar.
Above the blast again they hear
The distant signal gun,
And through the jaws of death they ride,
The pilot and his son.
But Providence now guides the helm,
And Mercy's at the oar,
Though lost to sight, they bravely fight
To bring the crew ashore.

They sail thrice round the sinking ship,
That hardy sire and son,
From skipper down to cabin boy,
They save them one by one.
Then, steering for the beacon light
That gleams across the wave,
They glide within the harbour bar,
Victorious o'er the grave.
With Providence to guide the helm,
And Mercy at the oar,
The noble pilot and his son
Have brought the crew ashore.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1882.

A MINGLING OF CONGENIAL SPIRITS.

IN one of his exquisite "olla podridas" contributed to the Illustrated London News, that (in a Pickwickian sense) polytheistic worshipper of genius in all its divergent phases, Dr Sala, thus invites attention to the approaching inauguration of a monumental tablet in memory of Michael William Balfe, since erected in the Abbey Church of St Peter, Westminster:—

"That permission should have been granted to raise this tribute to the most tuneful of modern English composers reflects the highest credit on the Dean of Westminster; and to that Very Reverend cleric and the Chapter of the Abbey the warmest thanks of all friends of Balfe and all lovers of our national music are due. I have seen a photograph of the tablet, which is surmounted by an oval medallion portrait of the composer in high relief. The inscription simply recites the dates and places of Balfe's birth and death, and that he was a Knight of the Legion of Honour of France and a Commander of the Order of Charles III. of Spain. In his own country he was not even a 'Mus. Doc.'"

No more, by the way, was Handel, in his adopted country—Handel would none of it. The doctorate of Sala, like the reading and writing of Dogberry, came "by nature." Nature, precognizant of his varied faculties, doctored him in the cradle from which he issued, grew, and waxed. Hence "the dædal Pan" of our time and clime; hence our own perennial George Augustus.

MUSIC, &c., IN THE STATES.

(From our New York Correspondent.)

The indomitable Mr Mapleson, who finds profit and pleasure in giving our benighted city a yearly season of Italian opera upon so gorgeous a scale that, according to his own account, he loses thousands of dollars by every performance, has returned to us with promises of the most wonderful character. We are at last, he says, to have opera after his own heart. When Mapleson left us in May he talked vaguely of having contracts with Nilsson, Patti, Lucca, Trebelli, Faure, Maurel, and a few others, whom he intended adding to his regular company. The public doubted and waited, and it really seems now that Adelina Patti is coming to sing twice a week for five months, for which we are thankful. The season will begin next Monday night, and the company comprises Patti, who will not sing until the first week in November, Mdlles Filomena Savio, Paolina Rossini, Dotti, Olga Berghi, Emma Juch, and Laura Zagury (Laura Harris); Mdmes Galassi and Lablache; Signori Ravelli, Clodio, Mierzwinski, Nicolini, Lhérie, Galassi, Ronconi, Monti, and Durat. Arditi will conduct the orchestra as usual, and the charming Mdme Cavalazzi (Mrs Charles Mapleson) will lead the dancing. Lucrezia Borgia, Semiramide, L'Étoile du Nord, and Le Prophète are to be mounted at once. Some dissatisfaction has been manifested among early subscribers upon finding that, notwithstanding the high prices, Patti will not sing until November. In view of her engagement, the prices have been about doubled, which is not objected to so far as the Patti nights are concerned, but makes the price rather high upon the off-nights, that is, those upon which Patti does not sing. Campanini refused to come back solely because he would have been expected to bear the weight of these off-nights. The price for the best seats in the house, orchestra and balcony, is £30 for thirty nights, twenty-four shillings being asked for single seats on Patti nights, and half that price when Patti does not sing. Judging by the advance sale of seats, the season will be a fairly prosperous one.

Mdme Christine Nilsson is expected here on the 20th of this month, and will sing soon after in concert. Her friends in this country are sorry that she is not to appear in opera because of the singular disfavour into which concerts have fallen in this part of the world since Nilsson left us in 1874. Besides which it is believed that in neglecting the opportunity for dramatic effect she throws away an important element in her successes here ten years ago. On the other hand, Abbey's career as an operatic manager, judged by Patti's tour last spring, has not been such as to inspire confidence. Certainly no one wishes to see the Swedish nightingale, as she was commonly called here years ago, subjected to the trials under which Patti almost broke down, suffering so severely that she declares that no gold would ever tempt her to go through another concert tour with Abbey. Del Puente, the baritone, formerly with Mapleson's troop, is the only member of the Nilsson concert company known here.

Mrs Langtry is also expected on the 20th, Mr Abbey having both stars on his hands. The curiosity to see Mrs. Langtry is so intense that fabulous prices are offered for first night tickets—so fabulous that the critics of the leading newspapers have been asked by circular whether they would not content themselves with one ticket apiece on the first night of the season, instead of the customary two. This is an unheard of request and has created no little amusement in the newspaper world. So far no tickets have been sold, but an auction sale for choice of seats will be held next week.

Aside from the English opera companies devoted to Gilbert and Sullivan and their* imitators, there has been no music, as yet, this autumn, unless Mdme Théo's performances are allowed to appear under that head. According to the opera-bouffe stars, whom we have had in New York during the last ten years, there seem to be two methods by which the chief young woman in the extravaganzas of Meilhac and Halévy produce an effect. One method consists in singing and saying the most terrible things with the innocence of an angel, an air of outward purity and inward devilry, which, to people who like the sort of thing, must be very delightful; while the other method reverses this order, and consists in singing the most innocent rhymes in a manner suggestive of every sin prescribed by the calendar—and many more, in the bargain. Théo, who made her first bow before an American audience, in our Fifth Avenue Theatre, some weeks ago in Madame L'Archiduc, is supposed to follow this last method to the complete satisfaction of her countrymen. She has no voice to speak of, but the bald-headed rakes of Paris grow wild over her "expression." The "expression" Théo managed to impart to the French equivalents of "Mary had a Little Lamb," with other pieces of that suggestive and insidious character, threw the aforesaid senile occupants of the front row into spasms of paralytic rapture—seeing, or fancying they saw, whole chapters of delightful iniquity in every shrug, wink, kick, and wriggle; and thus her "expression" at once made Théo famous.*

She has scarcely fulfiled in New York, however, the great expectations to which her engagement, at a reported salary of £100 a night, gave rise. She is pretty after the fashion of a china shepherdess, and, moreover, vivacity incarnate; she is admirable as an actress, and as complete a mistress of the repertoire of much-meaning winks, grimaces, kicks, cuffs, buttings, wriggles, &c., as any of her predecessors, perhaps excelling them all (even Mad. Schroeder) in effective stage bustle. But she cannot sing, having a voice, which even in talking assails the ear with a shrill intonation that, in one less strangely endowed, would soon be found monotonous. It may also be said that, lacking experience in singing before an American audience, she does not know exactly what may be safely uttered in the plainest way and what may as safely be left to the imagination. The accomplished Mdlle Aimée knew exactly how much colour could be laid on with impunity, and did not hesitate to say or act whatever she deemed necessary to the plain understanding of her audience.† Before Parisian audiences not a few of Théo's gestures doubtless convey something very questionable; but the suggestions pass harmlessly over the heads of our own ingenuous congregations. TEMPORA MUTANTUR, NOS ET, &c.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—At a recent sale of autographs in Berlin, a letter written by Wagner in 1873 with reference to a projected concert in Dresden, was one of the lots. It is interesting because it contains the following passage respecting the composition of the programme by the concertgiver, whose name, unfortunately, is not known: "I am sorry to find that Herr N. N. is still resolved on having 'The Ride of the Walkyres,' a piece in every respect displeasing to me."

The Signale hopes that no Wagnerite may come across the above, as the Master might, in such a contingency, "have a queer time of it." R. J. K.

Leipsic, Oct. 17.

HERR JOSEPH JOACHIM is to make his first appearance this season at the Popular Concerts on the 3rd of December.

SARAH BERNHARDT, it is said, will play in November at the Politeama, Buenos Ayres.

THE original MS of Verdi's Don Carlos has been purchased for the library of the Paris Conservatory.

GOUNOD intends visiting Granada for the purpose of examining some curious specimens of Spanish music preserved in the Cathedral.

THE LATE M. W. BALFE.—Mr Albert Young, of 16, Torriano Avenue, N. W., has published an excellent photographic portrait of Balfe, which will doubtless find a place in every album, dedicated to musical celebrities.

THE orchestral prelude to Wagner's Parsifal is in the programme of to-day's Crystal Palace Concert. Thus Mr Manns brushes off the novelty that would otherwise attract at the concerts of Herr Richter, who, by Wagner's own request, includes it in his first programme. Pasdeloup and Colonne have already introduced it to the Parisians, who received it with decorous indifference.

* "Expression"—according to those who have heard her expound Wagerism—is Théo's equivalent for "Leit-motive."—Dr Blunge.

† The most scrupulous audience under the moon.—Dr Blunge.

PARSIFALIANA.

IV.

The Rev. Dr. A. Portig, of Bremen, well-known in Germany as an eminent preacher and divine, has recorded his impressions of Parsifal in the Deutsche Protestantenblatt—one of the organs of the German Protestant Church. Touching the religious side of the work, he writes:—

"In Bayreuth art does homage to religion upon the stage which represents the world, and the assembled multitude reverentially feel her consecrative power as they join in solemnizing Prayer, the Last Supper, Baptism, Tears of Repentance, and the Redemption. I feel convinced that with his Parsifal Wagner has attained the highest aim and exercised the highest influence, but it is only by the actual co-operation of religion and religious symbols that he has been able to effect this. Not a trace of pessimism* is to be found in Parsifal, nor in general is any attempt made to preach philosophy and a fixed philosophical view of the world, but only the longing for redemption and the sway of the powers which alone can redeem mankind—Faith and Love. Is it right then that, perhaps for this very reason, certain critics and literates—whose works will assuredly be forgotten, whilst Wagner's will survive—should direct their violent attacks against Parsifal? I have closely examined my feelings in order to determine whether this frequent and at the same time natural and unaffected introduction of Prayer upon the stage, the Supper of the Knights of the Grail, the foot-washing and anointing of Parsifal by Kundry, Parsifal's simple Baptism of Kundry, the observance of Good Friday, and similar Biblical and religious matters, would not prove offensive to a Christian mind. I believe I have strong feelings on this point, but never for a moment were they hurt. The introduction of the religious element and of biblical matter, carried out, as it was, upon the Bayreuth stage without a hitch, and in a manner thoroughly noble, dignified, and truly reverential, had nothing offensive about it. As theologians and churchmen, we have no reason whatever to protest against the admission of the religious element in Parsifal upon the stage; we have only to demand that in every theatre where Parsifal will be performed it shall be brought to as æsthetically perfect a performance as at Bayreuth. There the stage fulfils the task which it ought to fulfil. In God's name, then, let Religion, with her symbols and ceremonies, speak and preach to the people even upon the stage, provided only that the same protection be accorded her as at Bayreuth; there would then be good hope of their being weaned from a taste for operas à la Offenbach, with their French glorification of broken marriage vows. I maintain that the baptism of the penitent Kundry by Parsifal, their tears (a scene thoroughly free from conventional theatrical display), the words, "Be baptized and believe on the Redeemer," which accompany it, together with the immediately following picture of Nature kindly and tenderly blossoming forth, as if made fruitful by the sinner's tears and with her thanking God, belong to the most beautiful, the purest, the most affecting that can be represented, or ever has been represented, upon the stage. The holy awe of religion, with all its heavenly enlightening inspiration, overpowers the devout heart—even in the theatre."

It is to be regretted that Dr Portig has not spoken of the "Temptation" scene, or, at least, if he has done so, that his utterance thereon has not come to hand. Fully agreeing, as I do, with all that he has stated above, I feel sure that he would bear me out in the statement, which, in complement of his, I may be allowed to make, that in this scene, as represented at Bayreuth, there was not the slightest approach to that indelicacy, which a reading of the stage directions may have led some to expect, and which in the hands of inferior artists might be infused into it.

Exception has been taken by some critics to this scene on the ground of the incongruity of admitting one so thoroughly "of the earth, earthy" into a work avowedly religious, and of the repulsiveness of Kundry's attacking Parsifal through love for his mother, and on failing in this, her trying to excite his sympathy for herself by recounting her own woes. In opposition to this view it may be asked, therefore, is it not one of the exigencies of the drama generally that the best side of human nature cannot be set forth in its fullest light unless the bad be contrasted with it?

* In allusion probably to the disease which infects Germany at the present day, and results from Schopenhauer's Philosophy, and the writings of Eduard von Hartmann, the chief exponent of pessimism.—TRANSLATOR.

Further, admitting the repulsiveness of Kundry's line of action, could anything testify more strongly to Wagner's powers as a poet and a dramatist than his conception of Kundry's conduct while under the ban of the magician, Klingsor? Could anything be more natural or more pointed than her attempt to win over the "guileless fool" through love for his mother and sympathy for herself?

After the above remarks I ought not, perhaps, to stop short without saying what was the effect of Parsifal (after four performances) upon myself. Briefly stated, and allowing for the introduction of Klingsor's "Flower-maidens" as necessary to the course of the action, it was precisely the same as that of the Ammergau Passion Play plus music by Wagner. The feelings it gave rise to were totally different from any one had ever experienced before in a theatre. There was none of the intense emotion "akin to pain" which Tristan und Isolde evokes, none of the fun and caustic humour of the Meistersinger. One felt that one was assisting at some grand national religious ceremonial. On two other occasions only in my life can I recall experiencing somewhat similar emotions: one was when, as a boy, I witnessed the procession accompanying the Duke of Wellington's funeral and listened to the military bands playing the Dead March in Saul; the other, when, to the still more solemn strains of Croft's Burial Service, we accompanied the remains of our dear friend Sterndale Bennett to his last resting-place in Westminster Abbey. So far from proving an offence to religious people, I believe it will turn out in the end that (as in the case of the Ammergau Passion Play) Parsifal will be the best appreciated by those who are most familiar with and set the highest value upon the teaching, the formularies and symbols of the Catholic Church—I mean Roman Catholics and the so-called Ritualistic section of the Church of England.

In regard to the music of Parsifal—a point which Wagner critics generally leave till last, if they touch upon it at all—I feel that—taking into consideration the unique and generally sacred character of the subject-matter, and the solemn, sombre, and apparently simpler, but really not less profound, treatment which this often necessitates—it is, on the whole, by no means inferior to, or less impressive than that of any of Wagner's previous works.

C. A. B.

Sydenham, 22nd Oct., 1882.

The Welsh are ever sticklers for antiquity. Their language is the oldest, their hills are the oldest, and, of all people, they themselves are the oldest. A Welshman is rarely disposed to admit that anything relating to Wales can be of later origin than that assigned to it by the Welsh historians. It is gratifying, therefore,—says the Globe—to find Mr Brinley Richards, at Swansea, making formal recantation of the errors as to the age of Welsh music into which they had led him. Who but a Welshman could ever have believed that the Welsh had a musical notation in the eleventh century?

VIENNA.—Johann Strauss's new buffo-opera, Eine Nacht in Venedig, will, after all, be produced at the Carltheater. Herr Doppler, who composed the music of the ballet Melusina, at the Imperial Operahouse, has been commissioned to write a comic opera for the Theater an der Wien.

HAMBURGH.—During the last eight years, from September, 1874 to September, 1882, there have been 268 representations of Wagner's "Music Dramas"—Lohengrin has been performed 76 times; Tannhäuser, 56; Die Walküre, 31; Der fliegender Holländer, 29; Rienzi, 23; Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg, 21; Das Rheingold, 13; Die Götterdämmerung, 11; and Siegfried, 9; in other words, one-eighth of the theatrical year has been devoted to Wagner-worship. Thus, the Stadttheater here, and that at Leipsic, head the list as more especially Wagnerian Institutes, eclipsing in this respect even the Theatre Royal, Munich, where Wagner is certainly not neglected, but where, during the first decennium of Herr von Perfall's Intendancy—from 1867 to 1877—there were only 191 Wagner-Nights.

MADRID.—Mdme Sembrich made her first appearance at the Teatro Real as the heroine of Donizetti's Lucia, achieving merited success. The other operas in which she will sing are La Traviata, Il Barbiere, Mignon, and Hamlet. Lestellier was Edgardo, and Dufriche, Asthon. Ricci conducted. Il Trovatore introduced three new-comers: Fursch-Madi, Leonore; Tremelli, Azucena; and Giannini, Manrico—all well received. Pandolfini was the Conte di Luna, and Goula conducted.

"THE ACTOR'S ART."*

(From The Echo.)

In Signor Gustave Garcia's work—miracle of miracles!—there is but one fault, and that is the title. The error in this respect proceeds from the authors' modesty in not adopting a caption sufficiently comprehensive to express the full sum of the valuable information his book contains, it being one just as necessary to the vocalist, whether in the concert-room or on the operatic boards, as to the dramatist.

The experiences of the past operatic season in London have sufficiently demonstrated to the English public the superiority of the Germans, in a purely dramatic point of view, over the Italians, however justly the latter may claim precedence for systems of vocal culture.

Erroneous methods are generally fully realized long before their needed reform is inaugurated. So has it been with the Italian and English operatic schools. The conventionalities of their stage deportment and general methods have been tolerated rather than accepted for many past years; but when the Germans showed, as they unquestionably have done recently, how thoroughly possible it is to combine high dramatic excellence with fine vocalization, the best vocalists of every school cannot be too grateful when an experienced and capable author points out the better way which all good artists should tread, to render them as perfect in the dramatic as in the vocal department of their profession. Meantime, let it not be supposed that "The Actor's Art," to which Signor Garcia, in his nomenclature, devotes his admirable treatise, needs any aid from the charms of music to make it applicable to everyone who comes before the public to appeal for the world's suffrage and applause. There is not an artist of any eminence who now "treads the boards," but must endorse every word that Signor Garcia has written. Actors and vocalists alike must acknowledge that he or she has had to acquire by years of hard study, discipline, and some painful failures, much that this all-comprehensive work teaches in full detail. Our author has written of the voice, the best methods of its production in every part of the register, and the means of developing, modifying, and increasing tone, both in speaking and singing; also of articulation, accent, inflexion, and all the various requisites for effect in enunciation. He gives rules for the concert-room which, if carefully studied, will substitute grace for awkwardness, and add the nameless charms of manner to those of vocalization. Signor Garcia also elaborates a perfect system of instruction for walking the stage; for the modes of entrance, exit, crossing, &c.; for the use of eyes, head, limbs, even of every finger; for "up-rising and down-sitting," as well as for the expression of every emotion, passion, situation, and lack of situation. The whole forms an exhaustive vade mecum for all that is required by every artist who comes before the public. And these directions are not only made plain and practical by reference to well-known plays, operas, and striking situations, but they are admirably illustrated by Forestier's graphic vignettes. Thus the clumsy actor may study pictures of his own ungainliness, whilst the graceful one may judge of the effect he produces on others when he recognizes his own deportment in a picture of corresponding excellence. Elocutionists, readers, actors, singers, and amateurs, all should study this valuable work, and not an aspirant for public favour and distinction should be unskilled in the directions it contains. The public who are interested in the progress of high art, no less than artists themselves, owe Signor Garcia a debt of gratitude for his useful literary achievement; and its dedication to Henry Irving forms a fit tribute to the worth of one who is himself a living illustration of the good lessons Signor Garcia imparts.

BRISTOL MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—At the close of the week's festival, the Mayor of Bristol, Mr Joseph D. Weston, invited the 400 members of the choir and festival committee to a conversazione at the Mansion House, where Mr W. Smith, chairman of the festival society, in a statement as to the results of the week's proceedings, announced that his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh had consented again to become the president of the society. With regard to their financial resources, the committee had received at this festival £6,263, as compared with £6,158 in 1879; and with regard to the charities, the largest collection at the doors on record. The Mayor stated that the financial result might be regarded as a success, and trusted they would be able to realize the £3,000 for the local scholarships of the Royal College of Music, towards which, before the opening of the festival, they had raised between £600 and £700. How then about the charities, the ostensible ground upon which these festivals are presumed to stand?

JOACHIM IN BERLIN.

(From a Correspondent.)

The "Violin-King," as Joachim has been so justly designated, and his worthy associates in art, Herren de Ahna, Wirth and Hausmann, have commenced their Quartet Soirées for the season to the intense delight of lovers of what is highest and best in music. The programme of the first soirée included Mozart's Quartet in C major, Haydn's in G minor, and Beethoven's Op. 59 in E minor. To say that these compositions were executed in a manner which if general would reduce musical critics to the state of frozen-out gardeners "who've got no work to do" is simply to state a fact which will in no way surprise those who know Joachim and his talented fellow quartettists. The applause which rolled and surged within the hall of the Singakademie was, like the playing which evoked it, something to be remembered.

Another series of concerts which has been resumed for the season is that of the Winter Concerts of the Berliner Handwerker Verein (Berlin Mechanics' Association). Here again was Joachim to the fore, playing, if possible, even better than usual, and absolutely transfixing with wrapt amaze the immense audience consisting for the most part of members of the Associations, with their wives and families. Poor people! It is not often they have a chance of such an artistic treat. As already observed, Joachim appeared to surpass himself. Lest you may accuse me of exaggeration, I will conclude with what the critic of one of the leading papers says:

". . . . . They were, indeed, wonderful tones which the Master Joachim drew from his violin, and even those who frequently hear him and had heard him the very evening before, fancied that a special inspiration sanctified his play on the occasion. Was this owing to his own inward frame of mind, or the genius loci, or the echo of what filled and moved the souls of his hearers! Whatever the cause, the tones which issued this evening from Joachim's violin were entrancingly beautiful. He began with Beethoven's 'Kreutzer Sonata,' after which he played Spohr's 'Gesangscene,' throwing in as an extra piece, and to express, probably, his thanks for the indescribably jubilant applause of his hearers, Bach's Sarabande."

"Jubilant applause," like the "mobled queen" of Polonius, "is good," so is "unbridled enthusiasm," so is "breathless excitement," so is "model quietness," all phrases used by the writer quoted to express the effect produced by this marvellous artist on the members of the Berlin Mechanics' Association, their wives and daughters, sons, uncles, aunts, and nieces. HOSPADAR.

A DISCOVERY.

"Jennius" of the Paris Liberté (who must not be confounded with Junius, real author of the "Letters of Junius"), gives the subjoined in a recent issue of the paper which subjoins him:—

"L'opinion de Schumann sur Meyerbeer:

"'Lors du Crociato, je rangeai Meyerbeer au nombre des musiciens; à l'apparition de Robert le Diable, il m'est venu un scrupule; mais à compter des Huguenots, je l'engage tout uniment dans la troupe de Franconi.'

"Pas de commentaire, n'est-ce pas?

"JENNIUS."

Schumann wrote some such nonsense in his own less flippant tongue, nearly half a century ago,* and the mighty Jennius has just unearthed it. Oh, "Jennius!"

THE LIGHT DIVISION POLKA.—This admired polka, played with such great success at the Promenade Concert, Covent Garden, on Wednesday evening, will be repeated this (Saturday) evening under the direction of A. Gwyllym Crowe.

SEVERAL alterations will be made in next year's performances of Parsifal at Bayreuth. The moving panorama in the first act will be considerably shortened, so that it will not be necessary to repeat the incidental music; while the panorama in the third act, omitted this year, will be so far restored as to show Parsifal, Gurnemanz, and Kundry on their way to the Temple of the Holy Graal, the curtain closing forthwith.

CONCERTS.

AT Mr M. St John Robinson's Musical Academy, Blomfield Crescent, a concert (the first of a series) was given by the students on Thursday evening, Oct. 19, which gave perfect satisfaction to the friends and parents of the future artists. We can give especial praise to Misses Burton, Ella Turley, Emily Kelly, and Mrs Ross, for the style in which they rendered the songs allotted to them, which included Tosti's "For ever and ever," Compton's "In the twilight hours," Sullivan's "Better land," and Cowen's "Never again." Credit is also due to Miss Marie Power for her performance of a "Ballade Dramatique," for the pianoforte, by Buhl, and for the effective way in which Misses Carlton and Pator, Messrs Perkins and Tallantyre rendered Ascher's popular romance, "Alice, where art thou," cleverly arranged as a vocal quartet by Mr G. B. Allen. Indeed we can bestow the same praise on the other part songs and choruses, which included Pinsuti's "Tell me Flora," Barnby's "Sweet and low," Mendelssohn's "As the hart pants," Gaul's "The silent land," and Pinsuti's "Good night, beloved," rendered by the members of the Paddington Choral Society (President—Sir Robert Stewart, Mus. D.), and most ably conducted by Mr M. St. John Robinson. We note that the Paddington Choral Society will give their first public concert this season early in November.

The Ballad Concert given by Miss Nellie Chaplin at the Royal Victoria Hall, on the 12th inst., gave evident satisfaction to a numerous audience. Several vocalists assisted, and Miss Chaplin's pianoforte solos were much appreciated, also the violin performances of her youthful sister, Miss Kate Chaplin, as well as a pianoforte fantasia on Gounod's Faust, arranged and played by Mr George Gear. Encores were numerous, including "Pack clouds away," well sung by Miss Clara Leighton, Mr F. H. Cowen's "The old and the young Marie," (Miss Ellen Marchant, who substituted "Caller Herrin',") "A Winter Story," (Mr Frank Connery), and "Sweet Visions," a very pretty contralto song by Mr George Gear, well rendered by Miss Fanny Smith. Misses Woodhatch, Rose Moss, and Selina Hall were also successful. The addition of a tenor to the list of artists would have been acceptable. Some interesting "recitations" were given by Mr H. C. Renouf. Miss Nellie Chaplin and Mr George Gear officiated as accompanists.

AT the Harvest Festival, celebrated on Tuesday evening, October 17th, in St James's Church, Clerkenwell, Haydn's Creation was given, the principal singers being Miss Emily Paget, Mr Paget, and Mr Millward, assisted by the choir of the church, augmented to forty voices. Miss Emily Paget rendered "With verdure clad" with taste and expression, Mr Paget making his mark in "Now Heaven in fullest glory shone," Mr Millward giving due expression to "In native worth," and the three blending their voices admirably in the trio, "On Thee each living soul awaits." The choir's best performance was "The Heavens are telling." Mr James Robinson presided at the organ, and the church was crowded in every part.

PROVINCIAL.

BIRMINGHAM.—On Wednesday night (October 18) the Carl Rosa Opera Company gave Verdi's Il Trovatore at the Theatre Royal. As it was the last appearance during the present engagement of Mdme Valleria it was a foregone conclusion that the house would be well filled. Mr Rosa's gifted prima donna in her acting is unfailingly graceful, and her vocalization is distinguished by refinement and a depth of expression which imparts a charm to everything she undertakes. The air, "To tell of love so glowing." furnished an opportunity for a remarkable display of brilliancy, and "Breeze of the night," and the whole of the subsequent music, for the exhibition of the tenderest and deepest pathos. Mdme Valleria is distinguished by perfection of intonation, and every phrase receives from her the most appropriate expression. Hence the concerted movements in which she took part were really as triumphant as were her solos. Miss Josephine Yorke was impressive in her impersonation of Azucena. Mr Barton McGuckin, as Manrico, sang all his music admirably, more especially "Ah! yes, thou art mine," and in the duets with Mdme Valleria and Miss Yorke. Mr Leslie Crotty, both as a singer and as an actor, won honour as the Count di Luna, rendering the air, "The tempest of the heart" ("Il balen del suo sorriso"), grandly, and also helping in a masterly manner in the concerted pieces. There were re-demands of "To tell of love," of the duet for Leonora and Manrico in the second act, of the air "Relentless fiend," of "The tempest of the heart," of "Breeze of the night," and of the "Miserere" scene, but the last named alone was repeated. The largest audience of the week, or, indeed, of the series, assembled to witness the second performance of Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia, with Mdme Marie Roze in the part of the Duchess. As the cast was identical with that of the first performance of the work it must suffice to remark that it was throughout spirited and effective, and repeatedly evoked the enthusiastic applause of the audience. The work—says the Daily Post—is more within the compass of the executive resources than some other of the operas attempted by Mr Rosa's company, and the general musical results are proportionately more satisfactory. Mdme Roze's assumption is naturally the great feature of the performance, and on the fall of the curtain she was recalled, together with the other principal performers, Mr Ludwig and Mr McGuckin, and presented through the hands of the conductor with a handsome corbeille of flowers. Miss Josephine Yorke, as Maffeo Orsini, also acquitted herself very creditably, scoring her customary success in the brindisi in the third act. The operatic series was brought to a close with a second performance of The Bohemian Girl.

BIRMINGHAM.—The Royal English Opera Company have given us, at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, Lortzing's Czar und Zimmermann, under the English title of Peter the Shipwright, an opera in which Santley made a "hit" some few years back at the Gaiety Theatre, London. The principal characters were sustained by Mdlle Philippine Siedle (the Burgomaster's niece), Mrs Oliver Summers (Widow Browne), Mr R. Temple (the Czar), Mr Faulkner Leigh (the French Ambassador), who sang "I will be true" so well that he was called upon to repeat it; Mr Aynsley Cook (the Burgomaster), whose conception of the part—writes the Daily Post—was wonderfully droll, brimming over with genuine burlesque humour, and no less satisfactory in a vocal than in a histrionic sense. Mr Cook, indeed, always sings like an artist, and with a truth of intonation which more pretentious and agile vocalists might usefully emulate. He was irresistibly comic in his opening solo, "Oh, I'm a perfect wonder," and still more so in the great scene at the wedding festivity (where he successively arrests and releases the two ambassadors and the two Peters in his eagerness to comply with the orders of the Government). Mr Charles Lyall was artistic and drily humorous in the part of Peter Ivanhoff, and his singing throughout was excellent. The choruses in general were satisfactorily rendered, but an additional rehearsal would not have been superfluous either for chorus or band.

BANBURY.—Miss Fortescue's concert at the Town Hall, given in aid of St Mary's National Schools, was not so well attended as it would have been had not the weather been so inclement. The concert was under the patronage of the Right Hon. and Ven. Lord Saye and Sele (High Steward of the Borough), the Mayor (W. Johnson, Esq.), and many of the heads of the aristocratic families of the county. The singers were Mdme Lita Jarratt, R.A.M., and Mr R. Grice, of New College, Oxford. The instrumentalists were Miss Jessie Davis (pianoforte), Herr Carl Henkel (violin), Mr Brousil (violoncello), Miss Florence Fortescue and Mr Charles Oberthür (harp). Among the successful pieces were the cavatina, "Robert, toi que j'aime" (Meyerbeer), sung by Miss Lita Jarratt, with harp accompaniment by Mr Oberthür; Sterndale Bennett's Rondo in C minor, played by Miss Davis (encored); Servais' melody for the violoncello, "Le Desir" (Mr Brousil); Tosti's "For ever and for ever" (Mr Grice—encored, but Stephen Adams's "Little Midshipmite" substituted); and two harp solos, composed by Mr Oberthür, namely, "Mélodie Mazurke," characteristically rendered by Miss Fortescue, and "Clouds and Sunshine," played by the composer in his own inimitable style. The concerted piece with which the concert began was Mr Oberthür's trio, "Mon Séjour à Darmstadt," for piano, violin, and harp (Messrs Henkel, Brousil, and Oberthür); his duets for two harps, "Moslem March" (Miss Fortescue and the composer); his duet for violin and harp, "Hommage à Weber" (Miss Fortescue and Herr Henkel); and Sir Julius Benedict's Serenade, for violin, pianoforte, and harp (Herr Henkel, Miss Davis, and Mr Oberthur). The concert, which gave general satisfaction, concluded with the National Anthem.

SWANSEA.—At the Albert Hall on Thursday evening October 19th, Mr Brinley Richards delivered a lecture on National Music, with selections illustrative of the progress of music from the 16th to the 19th century. There was a good attendance of the most distinguished families of the district, and the chair was taken by Sir H. Hussey Vivian, Bart., M.P., who said, there was no man more capable of instructing them in the art of music than the eminent lecturer of this evening. Mr Brinley Richards was now distinguished not only for his acquirements in music, but because he had composed what might be called our second National Anthem, and his name would go down "the stream of time" associated with "God bless the Prince of Wales." Mr Richards, in the illustration of his remarks on the progress of Music, played in a masterly manner compositions ranging from the date of Queen Elizabeth's Virginal Book (A.D. 1593) to the present century including his own Tarantella and his arrangement of "The Men of Harlech" which were received with enthusiastic applause. The illustrators of vocal music were Miss Margery Lewis (soprano), winner of the prize for solo singing at the Abergavenny Eisteddfod, Miss H. M. Jones (contralto), prize winner at the Denbigh National Eisteddfod, and Mr Ivor Morris (Basso). Mr W. B. Broad, the Local Examiner of the Royal Academy of Music, London, acted as accompanist both on the pianoforte and organ. The lecture and concert were a great success. At the close, Sir Hussey Vivian rose to propose a hearty vote of thanks to Mr Brinley Richards for the great treat they had enjoyed in his lecture and in his performance. Mr Brinley Richards, in gracefully acknowledging the thanks, said he would be glad to meet Sir Hussey in public debate on this subject of music (laughter). In conclusion, Miss Lewis, Miss Jones, and Mr Ivor Morris sang the solo, and the audience enthusiastically sang the chorus of "God bless the Prince of Wales."

READING.—The first recital of the Michaelmas term in connection with the Royal Berks Academy of Music was given on Thursday afternoon, Oct. 5. There was a large attendance. Miss Emma Barnett (pianoforte) and Mons. Albert (violoncello) were the performers. Miss Barnett is well known at the Saturday popular and other classical concerts in London, and she has played before in Reading and was, therefore, not unknown to Reading audiences. A capital programme was provided. Chopin's introduction and polonaise for pianoforte and violoncello was played with brilliant execution and was enthusiastically received. Miss Barnett's performances were much admired, especially the concluding one, a brilliant and melodious fantasia on The Ancient Mariner arranged by her brother, Mr J. F. Barnett.

LEEDS.—The Carl Rosa Opera Company gave Beethoven's Fidelio, with Mdme Marie Roze as the heroic wife, at the Grand Theatre, on Monday evening, Oct. 23. The house was crowded in every part, and the prima donna not only received a hearty welcome on her first appearance on the stage, but excited general enthusiasm by the manner in which she acquitted herself in a very laborious and difficult part. The characters of Rocco, Pizarro, and Marcello were ably represented by Messrs Snazelle, Ludwig, and Miss Clara Perry; that of Florestan being entrusted to Mr McGuckin, who sang the fine air at the beginning of the second act with pathos and effect. The band (conducted by Mr Pew) and chorus were excellent, and the opera met with complete success.

GLASGOW.—The celebrated Kennedy family gave another of their attractive entertainments of Scottish song in the St Andrew's Halls, on Saturday evening, to an audience who filled every part of the immense building. And it says a good deal, not so much for the power of national music, as for the really admirable manner in which it was rendered on this occasion, that the fashionable gathering was from first to last unmistakably interested, and frequently stirred to the manifestation of an enthusiasm such as is seldom witnessed in St Andrew's Halls. This, too, not solely in the irrepressible merriment which was excited by the elder Mr Kennedy's impersonations or the unstinted applause awarded to the younger Mr Kennedy for the more heroic and declamatory songs on the programme—to which his powerful, well-trained voice did justice—but also in a marked degree in the strong feeling awakened by the touchingly pathetic melodies sung by the Misses Kennedy. The entertainment entitled "A Nicht wi' the Jacobites," had the advantage of a kind of dramatic unity in its arrangement, being designed to "tell the story of the rebellions in favour of the Stuarts in song;" and as the songs were merely incidental to a running narrative of fact and racy anecdote told by the elder Mr Kennedy, the purpose of the entertainment was never for a moment lost sight of. It is hardly necessary to say that Mr Kennedy is himself the life and spirit of the entertainment. His versatility is wonderful and his pawky humour simply delicious. His "douce Provost" scarcely rising above the levity of a profound "wink," as he dismisses that "de'il o' Dundee" with a snort and sudden snap of his teeth; the exquisite contempt of the Hielander who kicks the "wee, wee Sherman lairdie" round the platform; the easy going goodman pestered out of all patience by the inexplicable conduct of his women "a' gane wud" with the new enthusiasm; and the mocking accent of the other gudeman who comes "hame at e'en" to discover evidence of a rebel in his house, which his goodwife would fain explain away—were all received with unbounded delight by the audience, who insisted on a repetition of the "Wee, wee German lairdie." The audience were indeed a trifle too exacting, and it was manifestly only by a special physical effort that Mr Robert Kennedy was able to answer the re-calls thrust upon him. The Misses Kennedy were also more than once encored, with greater compliment to the singer than justice to the lady, though this remark ought not perhaps to extend to the encoring of the brilliant pianoforte performance of reels and strathspeys by Misses Marjory and Helen. The entertainment concluded appropriately with the singing of "Auld lang syne."—North British Daily Mail.

CHERUBINI.

The result, however, was so unsatisfactory that it was deemed advisable not to play the piece again till it had been completely remodelled, and three weeks were not considered too much for this indispensable process. The librettist re-wrote his piece almost entirely, shortening it considerably, and cutting out a character, whose disappearance brought with it the suppression of an important trio. Thus reduced and corrected, L'Hôtellerie portugaise was, on the 1st Fructidor, offered for the second time to the public. It was hardly more fortunate than at first; it dragged itself languidly along up to the fourth night (the third on the 3rd, the fourth on the 5th), and that was all. The Théâtre Feydeau closed on the 21st Fructidor for repairs, and nothing more was heard of the opera. This was a great pity, for the overture is still justly celebrated and the whole score was charming from beginning to end, as the Courier des spectacles again stated in these terms after the second performance:

"Were it necessary for us again to speak of the music, it would be that we might add fresh and merited praise to that it has already obtained; learned and simple, touching and animated, at one and the same time, it commands our attention by beauty after beauty, and excites our admiration even by its slightest effects. We should be obliged to mention all the numbers one after the other were we to enter into a detailed account of those which possess the merit of pleasing the public. There is not one which fails to justify the reputation Cherubini has acquired by his other productions."

It is a somewhat singular fact that Cherubini, who possessed in so remarkable a degree a theoretical feeling of what was required and fitting on the stage, was never particular in the choice of the books he accepted and set to music. The consequence was that he wrote admirable scores to the most wretched books, and that, while his genius commanded by its power the admiration of the public, most of his works had only an ephemeral existence on the stage, in consequence of the slight interest of the dramatic action, which ought to have supported him. Elisa, ou le Mont Saint-Bernard, and still more, L'Hôtellerie Portuguise, are two striking instances of the justice of this remark, and we shall have another proof of it in the work the master undertook to write after the last of the two just named, and for the same theatre. The new book, entitled La Punition, was furnished by Desfaucherets, author of an agreeable comedy, Le Mariage secret, but was nothing the better on that account. The little one-act trifle, interpreted by Lesage, Juliet, Rézicourt, Dérubelle, Fay, Mdmes Lesage and Augustine Lesage, was produced on the 5th Ventôse, Year VII. (23rd February, 1799), and very roughly handled on the first night, as we learn from the Courier des Spectacles:

"The public," says the paper, "both applauded and hissed the opera given under the title of La Punition last night at this theatre. The applause was for the music, and the hisses for the book, which has not much in it, is uninteresting, and contains striking improbabilities."

Once more it was necessary to correct, cut down, and remodel the work before again presenting it to the public. But the alterations were executed with rapidity, so that the management were able to give the second performance two days after the first. The result was, we must say, far more satisfactory than in the preceding instance, and the fact is thus stated by the same paper:

"The second performance of the opera entitled La Punition achieved yesterday a very great success. Numerous cuts, by rendering the action closer, imparted much more life to it, and brought out the really comic touches it contains. The work now strikes us as worthy the estimable author of Le Mariage secret; we do not doubt that it will be long witnessed with pleasure, and procure the public the double advantage of seeing an agreeable piece and hearing Cherubini's learned music. The overture and the various accompaniments excited the warmest applause. But, we repeat with pleasure, the author of the words has, this time, a well deserved share in it."

I am ignorant what were the circumstances which now induced Cherubini, in partnership with Boieldieu, to give a short opera at what was, from a musical point of view, a secondary theatre, the Théâtre Montansier. At any rate, the two composers, united by mutual affection, set to music a one act book, the authors of which were Jouy, Longchamp, and Saint-Just, and the work, which had for its title Emma, ou la Prisonnière, was brought out at the Théâtre Montansier, on the 12th December, 1799. The book was not much better than the books Cherubini had previously taken in hand, but the music was charming and the acting splendid, Brunet, the excellent comic actor, then the favourite of all Paris, being included in the cast. The piece achieved a very great and very prolonged success.

"La Prisonnière," says one writer, "still draws large numbers to the Théâtre Montansier, not that it is very good, but it contains some comic situations and some touches of wit by the authors of the pretty vaudeville, Comment faire? The public hear music by Cherubini and Boieldieu, and see Brunet, the inimitable Brunet."*

WAIFS.

Mdme Pauline Lucca is in Paris.

Vergnet, the tenor, has gone to Italy.

Jules Vizentini, uncle of Albert Vizentini, has died, aged 72.

Mdme Pappenheim is fulfilling an engagement at Buenos Ayres.

Venanzi is appointed conductor of ballet music at the Milan Scala.

Emilio Ricordi has been decorated with the Order of the Crown of Italy.

A new opera, Nella, by Ricci, will be produced next month at Ravenna.

Albert Dietrich's opera, Robin Hood, has been favourably received in Dessau.

Smetana's new opera, Die Teufelswand, was produced on the 15th inst., at Prague.

Friedman, artistic director of the National Theatre, Bucharest, was lately in Milan.

Anton Rubinstein's Maccabäer is in preparation at the Royal Operahouse, Dresden.

A new operahouse is to be erected at Athens. The architect is Girard, a Frenchman.

Mdlle Nordica is engaged to a Mr Gower, and the marriage will be celebrated shortly.

Carl Heymann is resting in Switzerland, and will not play again in public till January.

Goldmark's Königin von Saba has been given with success at the Stadttheater, Königsberg.

The robust soprano, Teresa Singer, is engaged for the approaching season at the San Carlo, Naples.

Amleto, with Donadio as Ophelia, and Lhérie as the Prince, has been produced at Barcelona.

The publication of Scaramuccia has been resumed at Florence after an interval of some 30 years.

Eugène d'Albert, a pianist and pupil of Franz Liszt's, has been playing at the Stadttheater, Cologne.

Carlo Gomes, the composer, has joined Morella in the management of the Dom Pedro II. Theatre, Rio Janeiro.

Ercole Tinti, formerly operatic manager, afterwards theatrical agent, has died, aged sixty-nine, at Florence.

Arthur Pougin has retired from the editorship of La Musique Populaire, and is succeeded by Alphonse Baralle.

After the present season, the Theater an der Wien, Vienna, will be illuminated exclusively by the electric light.

The concerts given at Stuttgart by Herr Eduard Strauss and his band from Vienna have been very well attended.

Talazac, the tenor, has been elected a member of the Committee of the Association des Artistes dramatiques, Paris.

Teresina Tua, the girl violinist, has been playing at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, with her accustomed success.

Mdlle de Vère will sing with the baritone Kaschmann, in Lucia and Simon Boccanegra at the Teatro Costanzi, Rome.

Marianne Eissler, violinist, of Vienna, has created a favourable impression at Frankfort-on-the-Maine and Carlsruhe.

Lohengrin, with Nouvelli (once in Mr Gye's company) in the title part, is announced at the Teatro Comunale, Bologna.

Byron's Manfred, with Schumann's music, has, after an interval of many years, been performed at the Leipsic, Stadttheater.

Varesi is now singing at the Theatre, Warsaw; next month she will take part in some concerts at the Philharmonie, Berlin.

* Les Spectacles de Paris for Year VIII.—I do not think the music of La Prisonnière was ever published; but the library of the Paris Conservatory possesses a very complete copy of the orchestral score of the little work.

Albert Niemann has returned after his holiday to the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, re-appearing as John of Leyden in Le Prophète.

After belonging to the Grand Opera, Paris, for nearly twenty years, Villaret, the tenor, will take his farewell on the 1st November.

The tenor Prévost, formerly of the Théâtre du Château-d'Eau, Paris, has been well received in Ernani at the Teatro Costanzi, Rome.

Dr Paul Klengel is again conductor at the concerts of the Euterpe Society, Leipsic. The first concert of the season came off on the 24th inst.

Sommer is re-engaged for ten years at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna.—(Sommer, Sommerer, Sommemerinus. Who's Sommer?—Dr Blidge.)

After remaining closed for some days in consequence of the fall of the iron curtain, the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, re-opened with Tannhäuser.

During her concert tour, which began at Breslau, Etelka Gerster will visit Berlin, Nice, and Moscow, afterwards performing at the Milan Scala.

Synnerberg is engaged at the Teatro Costanzi, Rome, in place of Beloff, indisposed at Madrid. Both ladies are favourites and marriageable.

Anton Urspruch succeeds the late Joachim Raff as professor of counterpoint and composition at the Hoch Conservatory, Frankfort-on-the-Maine.

It is said that the Teatro de Jovellanos, Madrid, will be opened in the spring for Italian opera, and that Gayarre will be a member of the company.

The Prelude to Parsifal has been arranged for the organ by Carl Rheinthaler, and played by him at a recent concert given by the Cathedral Choir, Bremen.

The first Museum Concert of the season at Frankfort-on-the-Maine took place on the 14th inst. Mdme Norman-Néruda, the "Violin Fairy," took part in it.

A new opera, from the pen of Victor Nessler, composer of Der Rattenfänger von Hameln, will be produced before the end of the year at the Stadttheater, Leipsic.

Mr Hutchinson, composer of "Ehren on the Rhine" and "Dream Faces," is writing a cantata (founded on one of the "Idylls of the King"), entitled The Story of Elaine.

A concert given at the Politeama, Genoa, for the benefit of sufferers by the inundations, produced 7,000 francs. Camillo Sivori, prince of Italian violinists, was the chief attraction.

The Philharmonic Society announce their intention of giving a prize of Ten Guineas for the best overture by a British musician, the judges being Sir Julius Benedict and Sir Michael Costa.

Etelka Gerster, assisted by the pianist, von Pachmann, and the violinist, Waldemar Meyer, gave a concert on the 15th in Dresden, and sang on the 19th at the 3rd Gewandhaus Concert, Leipsic.

The fugitive manager of the National-Theater, Berlin, has been arrested in Hamburgh, and a large part—13,700 marks—of the money, with which he was making off, taken from him.

Bernhard Scholz, of Breslau, who has been selected to succeed Joachim Raff as director of the Conservatory, Frankfort-on-the-Maine, enters on his duties at the commencement of the new year.

The Italian season at the Maria Theatre, St Petersburgh, was inaugurated with Robert le Diable, Durand, Sylva, Uetam, and Repetto sustaining the principal characters, and Bevignani, as usual, being the conductor.

Emma Nevada (Mr Gye's "mignonne" prima donna that was) will fulfil an engagement, extending from the 25th December to the middle of January, at the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, singing in La Sonnambula, Il Barbiere, Lucia, Dinorah, Amleto, and La Traviata.

London Church Choir Association.—This association will hold its tenth annual festival in St. Paul's Cathedral on the evening of Thursday, November 2, when the anthem, "Sing to the Lord," by Henry Smart, a service by Berthold Tours, and a new prize Te Deum by A. H. D. Prendergast will be sung.

Two Richter Concerts are to be given at St. James's Hall during next month, instead of the six performances originally announced. The dates are November 9 and 14. Herr Richter has organized these concerts in hope that the profits will re-imburse the members of the orchestra for the losses sustained during the season of German opera at Drury Lane Theatre in May and June last. There is a substantial guarantee fund towards meeting the expenses of the concerts, the full purpose of which, however, requires the support of the public. This is due, apart from the ultimate object, to the interest of the programmes and the assurance of excellent performances under the direction of Herr Richter.

Mr and Mrs German Reed's Entertainment.—The Turquoise Ring, originally produced here two years ago, written by Messrs G. W. Godfrey and E. W. Craigie, and set to music by Mr Lionel Benson, was revived at St. George's Hall on Monday evening. Mr Corney Grain, as the cunning French landlord, Thibant; his excitable waiter Jacques, characteristically portrayed by Mr North Home; the pretty Pauline and the romantic Lady Turtle, so appropriately illustrated by Miss Edith Brandon and Miss Fanny Holland; and the portly ex-Lord Mayor, so humorously depicted by Mr Alfred Reed, are all personages with whom acquaintance may be gladly renewed. An important novelty was also brought out in the shape of a musical sketch by Mr Corney Grain, entitled En Route, which exhibits to advantage his ability as a musician, and as a delineator of social peculiarities.

At a representative county meeting in support of the Royal College of Music held at Wimborne, Dorset, on the 19th inst., the chair was taken by Lord Shaftesbury, who said the Prince of Wales, who had asked him to preside, preferred that the sum required should be raised by small contributions from sympathizers among the middle and poorer classes rather than by large donations from the rich. Of £300,000 wanted, over £100,000 had been promised. The remainder ought not to be difficult to get, especially as it was to confer benefits on the people of the country generally. Were it a private speculative enterprise, such, for instance, as the Channel Tunnel scheme—the most abnormal and strange thing that ever entered the mind of man—millions of money could be easily obtained.* Dr. Grove explained the aims and objects of the proposed College, of which he was director. Resolutions were passed pledging the support of the meeting, and a fund was started.

"'Fantaisie Marziale' is a brilliant pianoforte piece by Lillie Albrecht, the accomplished young pianist, who knows how to write effectively for, as well as to play well on, the instrument. The principal theme is spirited and is well contrasted by an episode or trio, of a more cantabile character."—The Illustrated London News.

GRASP THE FLAG!

Patriotic Song.

Words by CARLEON.

Music by

HUGH CLENDON.

"Grasp the flag! We fight for England!
Grasp the flag and clear the way;
English men will English honour
Keep untarnished as the day.
Though opposing foes a barrier
Wall of Iron should oppose;
English pluck and English daring
Front the steel, nor failure knows!"

Price 4s.

London: Duncan Davison & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"The victory of our arms in Egypt gives some actualité to this spirited song. As its title announces, it is decidedly martial. The words, by Carleon, are simple and vigorous, and easily singable, while the music is stirring and melodious enough to make 'Grasp the Flag' a popular patriotic song."—Lloyd's Newspaper.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs, giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

TRANSCRIBED FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO BY JULES BRISSAC.
Price 3s.
London: C. JEFFERYS, 67, Berners Street, W.
"What musical amateur does not know the delightful sonata in G, Op. 30, for violin and pianoforte, with its brilliant and dashing first movement, its tender and tuneful menuetto, and its hilarious presto? But a violinist is not always at hand, and the transcriber comes to our aid with the legitimate exercise of his art. This exquisite little movement in E flat, with its captivating melody, has received perfect treatment at the hands of M. Jules Brissac, who has thereby rendered its beauties available even in the absence of the violin."—"Queen," July 30, 1882.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

DVORAK'S OPERA, DIMITRIJ.*

A grand Czeckish opera, at the first performance of which in Prague I had an opportunity of being present, is exciting in no ordinary degree the interest of musical circles. The work in question is a four-act opera, Dimitrij (Demetrius) by Anton Dvorak, a composer of Prague, who broke through, a considerable time ago, the ban of national and local Czeckish celebrity, and, with his orchestral and chamber music, his "Legends" and "Moravian Duets," has made himself a name respected in all Germany, and now, even in England. Of his dramatic efforts we were acquainted with only two small comic operas (Der Bauer ein Schelm, and Dickschädel), from the fact of their having found a German translator and a German publisher; merry, unpretending pieces interspersed with music, in which healthy melodious talent is fortunate enough to get the upper hand of somewhat old-fashioned comedy subjects. In his new grand opera, Dimitrij, Dvorak has set himself a far higher task. The libretto, which treats of the story of the "false Demetrius," is by a young and talented lady, Mdme Marie Cervinka, daughter of the well-known Czeckish leader, Rieger, who, moreover, in an exhaustive preface, gives proof of her intimate acquaintance with Russian history. She appears to have been especially guided by a desire to be as historically correct as possible; she has hardly made any use of Schiller's fragment, and has availed herself only very sparingly of Heinrich Laube's theatrically effective continuation of it. Like myself, many may have expected Schiller's magnificent exposition, the Polish Diet, as an imposing introduction to the opera. It is true that, on account of the long but altogether indispensable narrative of Demetrius, this scene presents great difficulties in the way of musical treatment. On the other hand, the strongly marked contrasts, with the gradually increasing and stormy agitation among the masses, must excite the composer to a task calculated amply to repay his efforts. There might have been an exposition similar to that in Meyerbeer's Africaine, where also the hero, Vasco de Gama, explains and defends his cause before a large and excited tribunal. It was evidently for the sake of closer and more homogeneous action that the Czeckish authoress made the opera commence in Moscow and kept to that locality until the last.

The people of Moscow, boyards, priests, and soldiers, who fill the square in front of the Kremlin, are lamenting the sudden death of the Czaar, Boris Godunow, and their country's danger. The victorious Poles are before the city gates, and at their head is the pretender, Demetrius, who is put forward as the son, long supposed dead, of the Czaar, Ivan. Despite the warning of the Boyard Schuisky, the people hasten joyfully to meet Demetrius, and determine to crown him forthwith, provided Marfa, the widowed Czarina, publicly recognizes him as her son, who has been supposed dead. She at first responds with coldness and repugnance to his heartfelt greeting, but, moved by the young man's noble and mild nature, and impelled by feelings of revenge towards the family of her persecutor, Boris Godunow, at last embraces Demetrius with the exclamation: "My son!" The people shout with joy, the gates, hitherto closed, of the holy Kremlin, are thrown open, and Demetrius, with Marfa, makes his solemn entry into it. The second act commences with a dialogue between Demetrius and his newly married wife, Marina, daughter of the Polish Prince Mnischek. Demetrius greets her affectionately, yet not without some gentle reproaches for the Polish manners and dress she had obstinately retained. From her haughty reply he perceives only too plainly that it is not love but only greed of power and ambition which have bound her to him. The noble Poles appear; Marina seizes a goblet and sings a song in praise of Poland, while a mazurka is danced in the hall. The discontent among the Russians grows louder and louder, but Demetrius at length allays the gathering storm. The scene now changes to a hall leading to the tomb of the Czaars. Demetrius has just entered, when Xenia (Axinia) daughter of the deceased Boris, rushes affrightedly in, followed by a number of profligate Polish nobles. Demetrius drives out the intruders. Xenia thanks her unknown preserver, and the duet between them reveals the sudden bursting into life of mutual inclination. Hereupon Demetrius conceals himself behind a funereal monument on seeing his opponent Schuisky enter with the Conspirators. Schuisky exhorts his confederates to overthrow the Usurper, and is about to swear at Ivan's tomb that Demetrius is not Ivan's son, when with the words: "Swear not!" Demetrius comes forward. The Conspirators, taken by surprise, beg for pardon, and Schuisky is bound and delivered over to justice. The third act plays in the Coronation Hall. Demetrius, with Marfa and Marina at his side, receives the Boyards, who assure him of their fidelity. Xenia rushes in, and begs that Schuisky, who is being conducted at the back of the stage to the scaffold, may be spared. Demetrius pardons him, and Xenia, recognizing in the Czaar her preserver, whom she secretly loves, sinks fainting to the ground. A grand, passionately agitated duet between Demetrius and Marina concludes the act. Marina accuses her husband with having pardoned the traitor to please Xenia, and, when Demetrius refers to his divine right, hurls in his teeth the mocking words: "And do you think you are the Czaar? You are Otrepnev, a serf!" She then reveals to him with passionately malignant satisfaction the secret hitherto kept from him, of his lowly origin. Demetrius begins to lose faith in his right, and declares that henceforward all bonds of love and gratitude between Marina and himself are severed for ever. Startled at the unexpected effect of her words, Marina is crushed, and vows that she had previously only simulated love for him, but that now, conquered by his manly courage, she loves him really. She is willing to sacrifice to him her faith and nationality. But it is all in vain—Demetrius contemptuously repels the suppliant. The fourth and last act plays in a courtyard with garden before Schuisky's house. Here Demetrius meets Xenia and confesses to her his love, which she returns, but immediately to bid him farewell for ever. Two murderers, hired by Marina, steal after her, and despatch her in the garden. Mortally wounded, she staggers in and dies on the stage. A scene of tumult ensues; Demetrius, surrounded by the people, hastens to the spot, and swears by Xenia's corpse to be revenged on the murderer, no matter who it may be. Schuisky hereupon brings forward Marina, veiled, from where she has been concealed; she is accused of having contrived the murder, and, without hesitation, acknowledges the fact. She sees her life is forfeited, and resolves that Demetrius, who has thrust her from him, shall also perish. She cries loudly to the people: "Your Czaar is an imposter; he is an Otrepnev!" Demetrius asks for proofs. Once more must Marfa swear, and this time on the cross held up to her by the Patriarch, that Demetrius is her son. She at first vacillates, but, impelled by affection and compassion, at length resolves to take the false oath. She has already laid her hand on the cross, when Demetrius exclaims: "Swear not! I will not hold the throne by deceit!" Herewith he pronounces his own death-warrant: a bullet from Schuisky brings him to the ground.

As the reader will himself have seen from this meagre narrative, the opera of Dimitrij contains powerful dramatic situations. If we strip the story of its purely political and national surroundings, there remains an imperishable dramatic residuum which absolutely challenges theatrical treatment, and consequently only asks to be worked up into operatic shape by a composer whose speciality is rooted in natural and acquired familiarity with Sclavonic music. In the execution of her task the highly accomplished authoress of the libretto has undoubtedly displayed talent and skill. This acknowledgment of her merit does not, however, exclude numerous objections to her libretto. In the first place, the continual psychological wavering of the three principal personages seems hazardous. We see Marfa in the first and the fourth act engaged in precisely the same conflict of feeling as to whether she shall or shall not acknowledge the hero of the piece as her son. From contempt and repugnance for Demetrius, Marina suddenly passes to ardent love and then again to deadly hate. There is no sufficient motive for the murder committed on Xenia, which produces a most hateful impression. In the opera, Marina knows nothing about Xenia, except that to please her Demetrius pardoned Schuisky. This may be enough for jealous emotion but certainly not for murder. If Marina had at least surprised the two in each other's arms, and, carried away by passionate jealousy, herself plunged a dagger—but no, not even a dagger would here be appropriate; it would have sufficed, had the revengeful Marina, on beholding the two, immediately summoned the people and publicly proclaimed the secret of the false Demetrius who had betrayed her. Xenia's murder, a revolting and unnecessary act, has this undesirable result: all our sympathy is directed to the beauteous and innocent victim, and the fall of Demetrius, which is really the tragic catastrophe, leaves us comparatively unmoved. As regards the hero himself, we cannot, it is true, conceive him without psychological vacillation, for the tragic element of the character consists in the fact that he is at first firmly convinced of his right and his high descent while his belief in them is subsequently shaken. In an opera, which cannot enter into dialectic niceties and does not possess so delicate a standard as spoken drama for weighing motives and counter-motives, these two opposite phases of feeling in Demetrius' soul ought to have been kept more sharply and more palpably distinct. Nor can we suppress many technical objections. In parts of the libretto where the story imperatively demands rapid progress, we find long reflections, dialogues, or monologues, which naturally seduce the composer into long pauses and disquisitions. By its very nature, music requires more time than spoken language. Such objectionable stoppage of the action impairs, for instance, the scene where Xenia is pursued into the tomb and Demetrius, instead of driving away the fellows at once, sings with them a considerable time, to let Xenia finish her prayers in the foreground. In each of the last three acts we meet with more or less fatiguing instances of overlength. The most objectionable example occurs immediately before the catastrophe: the Patriarch is holding up the cross to Marfa for her to swear on; everyone is awaiting in breathless suspense the decisive moment, when the Patriarch lowers the cross, as a marksman lowers the gun with which he is taking aim, and—an imposing vocal concerted piece is built up broadly and calmly before us; it is a valuable composition, but we have not the patience to enjoy it in the position it occupies. Another fact which strikes us as sinning against the due balance of the opera is that, while Demetrius has four duets, two with Marina and two with Xenia, there is not a single one for women alone. Considerations of this kind are often overlooked by the cleverest authors, when the latter are not yet thoroughly familiar with the requirements of the stage. The artistic modesty and penetration with which the fair librettist as well as the composer of Dimitrij are credited, are guarantees that both will readily consent to many additional cuts and alterations, which the vivid impression of the performance has probably convinced them are desirable.* The work would thereby gain exceptionally in success and popularity.

Dvorak's Dimitrij is rich in beautiful and original music, the production of genuine and eminent talent. The composer eschews triviality as much as he does sterile subtlety; he does not avoid strong effects, and obtains them principally in the grand concerted pieces and choruses. Polish and Russian musical character prevails in the latter, and is in its proper place. The Sclavonian element is the natural breath of the score, and not mere artificial inhalation. Yet we have no coquetting with national Sclavonic music, which is not so predominant in this Czechish opera as Magyar music in Erkel's operas. With its vigorous, fresh appeals to the senses, Dvorak's opera sometimes reminds us of Italian music of the description of Verdi's Aida. Guiding-Motives, as they are called, are to be found in it as little as direct Wagnerian touches. We will mention only a few of the most effective numbers. Full of dash and sharply marked dramatic character are the choruses at the very beginning of the first act, and the imposing March is magnificent in colour. In the second act, the more prominent features are Dimitrij's dreamily soft cantilena, and, effectively contrasted with it, the mazurka-like dance of the Poles; lastly, in the scene of the tomb, we have the touching song sung by Xenia after her rescue. In the concerted piece following Schuisky's pardon, the third act reaches an imposing climax, after which the concluding duet between Marina and Dimitrij, which is far too long, falls, despite numerous beautiful details, somewhat flat. Dimitrij's duet with Xenia in the fourth act owes its effect to passages full of the tenderest charm, while the finale impresses us by its unusually beautiful sonorousness and grandiose structure. How far Dvorak's music, the dramatic power of which is convincingly manifested in the leading portions of the action, corresponds to the separate words and turns of the text, is something on which, owing to my imperfect knowledge of the language, I am not competent to give an opinion, and, indeed, this account must be received merely as the record of my first impression, and not as criticism properly speaking.

The performance of the new opera in the temporary Czechish Theatre (a spacious wooden building before the Ross-Thor) was highly successful, especially on the part of the ladies; the orchestra, too, under the excellent direction of their conductor, Anger, exerted themselves to the utmost. The public exhibited exemplary attention; packed closely together, they reverently heard the long opera out to the last note, though the heat in the theatre (where a short time previously there had been a most numerously attended afternoon's performance) had increased to such a pitch as to be absolutely insupportable. That after every act they broke out into deafening applause and were never tired of calling for Herr Dvorak, pleased me extremely on his account, for he is as modest as he is talented. As regards the absolute value of his opera as a work of art, such a success in the Czechish Theatre signifies the same as the furore created by a national Hungarian opera in Pesth. What struck me as of more weight was the unanimously favourable opinion of numerous German musical amateurs, who at once took a liking to the opera, and foretold the most gratifying success for it at our great theatres.

EDUARD HANSLICK.

* We have just heard that the opera has been performed a second and a third time in Prague with considerable cuts and even more brilliant success than on the first night.

THE PARSIFAL PRELUDE AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

(From the "Daily News," Oct. 30.)

Last Saturday's concert brought forward for the first time here an instalment (a very small one) of Wagner's latest opera-drama, Parsifal, produced at Bayreuth in July last. The whole work is to be withheld for an indefinite period from the public otherwise than such visitors as will make the pilgrimage to Germany to hear its repetitions, which are to begin there next year. As the arbitrary and despotic, but capricious and vacillating, Richard Wagner made similar resolves with regard to his Nibelungen "opera-dramas," but afterwards consented to enlighten the ignorant English musical public by permitting their performance at Her Majesty's Theatre in May last—an event never to be forgotten by those who sat them out—possibly a similar concession may be made in the case of Parsifal. It is to be hoped, however, that this event may not be too hastily promoted. Such favours should not occur otherwise than at somewhat long intervals, or they may be undervalued by the many who are not yet prepared to repudiate all that has hitherto been considered as great and good in the music of the anti-Wagner periods. Following the precedent of most of his other stage works, Wagner has prefaced his Parsifal with a prelude instead of an overture. The latter term implies coherent thought and artistic form and structure, whereas the name of prelude has the vaguest possible signification, and allows of any capricious use of Leit-motiven, or themes used in the opera as labels to identify certain characters and incidents; their frequent recurrence in Wagner's dramatic music having the effect of a clumsy expedient to make clear what ought to be so without such labelling. The general mistiness of Wagner's style, and his intense affectation of metaphysical profundity, may perhaps justify these frequent aids to the uninitiated who expect the drama to tell its own story, and the music to produce corresponding emotions without the use, at every turn, of intrusive phrases which Wagner introduces with a result which becomes tiresome by reiteration. In the prelude to Parsifal (given on Saturday) we have several of these indicating themes. There are the sacramental theme, the theme of the Holy Grail, the theme of the Song of Faith, &c.—all tacked together in the most promiscuous manner, forming an unconnected whole that is sombre to the extreme of dulness, is devoid of any intrinsic musical interest, and owes its entire effect to the orchestral colouring; or (with some) to that profound metaphysical significance ostentatiously claimed by the composer and recognized by his devotees, but not yet apparent to the many cultivated musicians who are as yet outside that circle. The prelude has the negative merit—not possessed by the work to which it belongs—of being brief, and its introduction into Saturday's programme was quite justifiable as affording a specimen of the most recent product of Wagner's latest style.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

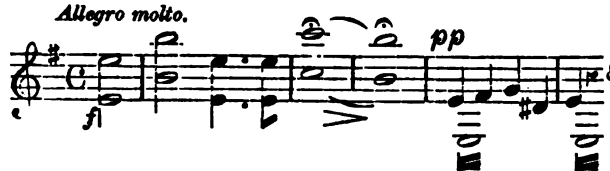
Later composers have drawn the three kinds still closer, and have woven the anthem element on a dramatic basis, using the narrative form to supply those parts of the story which were unadvisable or impossible in a dramatic form, whether with or without acting. By this means, some great effects have been obtained, which were not possible in the simple dramatic form.

Thus, in Elijah, most of the story is told in dramatic form by the words of the characters—Elijah, Obadiah, Ahab, the Widow, the Servant, the People of Israel, and the Prophets of Baal. At certain points, however, there is matter to be told which cannot be put into the mouths of any of the characters. Here the narrative form comes in, and most effectively. An example of this is the grand chorus, "Behold, God the Lord passed by." Elijah has been summoned by the angel to take his stand on the mountain, his face wrapped in his mantle, that he may not see the glory pass by. There is no human eye to see and describe it; it cannot be put into the mouths of a chorus of people who might even be at a distance to witness it. It must be told as from the mouth of the inspired writer of the book—a true narrative form.

Ex. 229.

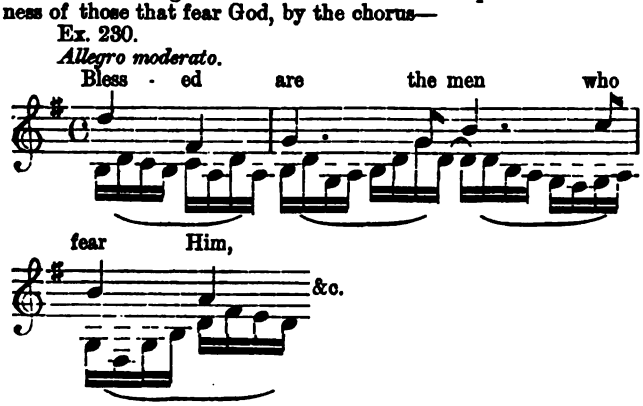


Be - hold, God the Lord passed by, and a mighty wind

The movement is in a broad sonata form, with tonic, dominant, fantasia, and return to the key by a coda in the major. Each division corresponds to a section of the verbal idea—the mighty wind, the earthquake, the fire, and the still small voice. Other narrative pieces in Elijah are the recitative, "See now, he sleepeth beneath a juniper tree in the wilderness, and there the angels of the Lord encamp round about all them that fear Him"; the recitative, "Above Him stood the seraphim, and one cried to another"; and the chorus, "Then did Elijah, the prophet, break forth like a fire," &c., and its continuation, "And when the Lord would take him away to Heaven, lo! there came a fiery chariot, and he went by a whirlwind to Heaven."

In Elijah, besides the dramatic and the narrative portions, there are parts which are of the nature of anthem. Some belong to the characters and are, like the meditative portions of an opera, the expression of their feelings, and are, therefore, partly dramatic. Such is the chorus, "Help, Lord;" the duet, "Zion spreadeth her hands;" the song, "If with all your hearts," and many others. Others belong more closely to the anthem nature, and are, perhaps, more truly like the chorals in the Bach narrative oratorios—the words of the audience, or rather, the thoughts which the composer wishes to suggest to them as bearing upon the subject. Such is the chorus which follows the raising of the widow's son, and her expression of thankfulness and conviction that she has been blessed because she feared God. The composer amplifies the thought suggested by that point in the story, and so leads the thoughts of the audience to dwell upon the blessedness of those that fear God, by the chorus—

Ex. 230.



Another anthem occurs later in the oratorio, when the priests of Baal have called again and again to Baal and "there was neither voice nor any to answer"; and Elijah has come forward, called the people round, and made his prayer, "Lord God of Abraham . . . . shew this people that Thou art God." At this point Elijah is there alone, he knows not of the seven thousand faithful still in Israel, and thinks there is not a man left who will join him in taking God's part. He has need of great faith to support him, and may it not well come into the minds of the audience then to think that a man should in such a position look to God for help? Therefore, the composer brings forward the quartet to sing "Cast thy burden on the Lord and He shall sustain thee: He is at thy right hand and will never suffer the righteous to fall." Other anthems in Elijah are the solo, "Hear ye, Israel," with the chorus immediately succeeding it, "Be not afraid"; the chorus, "He watching over Israel"; the chorus "He that shall endure to the end," and the whole of the epilogue succeeding the chorus of the going up of Elijah, including the song, "Then shall the righteous shine forth"; the recitative, "Behold God hath sent Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord"; the chorus, "But the Lord from the north hath raised one"; the quartet, "O come every one that thirsteth"; and the final chorus, "And then shall your light break forth," with its second movement, "Lord our Creator, how excellent Thy Name is."

It is not difficult to multiply situations in which an anthem could be introduced in such wise. Imagine the subject of the oratorio to be the life of a good man, who, in the course of his generally good life, has fallen into some great sin. The fall of a good man is something so sad and so terrible that we must give it as simple a relation as possible; let us, therefore, suppose it allotted to a narrative solo, such as the little recitative already named from Elijah, or the description in St Paul of the death of Stephen.

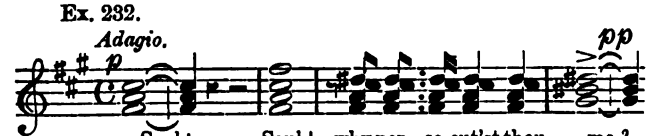
Ex. 231.

After this, what could be more appropriate and fit than that the audience should point the moral to themselves. They, perhaps, think themselves good in the main, but this good man has fallen, and why should they be secure? So let the chorus think for them, "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall," or, perhaps, as a prayer, "Remember not, O Lord, our offences, deliver us from the machinations of the evil one."

The solo narrator, or meditator, in the oratorio is the counterpart of the choragus of the ancient Greek plays. He was the leader of the chorus, and spoke sometimes by himself and not as an actor in the drama. The three-fold use of the chorus in the oratorio is also a counterpart of the Greek use. With the Greeks, the chorus might personify the people of the drama; and so in Elijah we have the cry of the people of Israel, "Help, Lord," and the cry of the priests of Baal, "Baal, hear us." With the Greeks, also, it might be used impersonally in two ways; the narrative, as in the chorus lately described, "Behold, God the Lord passed by," and the meditation that should be in the minds of the audience, as "Blessed are the men."

It is with the feeling of the impersonality of the numberless voices of a choir that Mendelssohn has allotted the call of St Paul by the Lord to the women's chorus.

Ex. 232.



With a true reverence Mendelssohn shrank from the association of an individual singer with the Divine Person; but he felt that the number of persons in the choir made individuality impossible. The application to this one chorus of the quality of tone obtained by the sole use of women's voices puts this also on a different level to that of all the other choruses.

BALFE.

(From the "Morning Post.")

A tribute to the memory of an English musician has been solemnly paid at Westminster Abbey. The tablet bearing the honoured name of Michael Balfe, unveiled in presence of a numerous company of composers, professors, and others closely interested in the progress and well-being of music, will serve to remind future generations of a man who, in his day, maintained the credit of the native school, not only here, but in foreign countries. An industrious and active life that closed twelve years ago, and a career shaped and followed out with a reverential feeling for art, are entitled to remembrance by survivors. It is not enough that a man of genius should find his reward in popularity and competence, or even affluence, for the time being. Upon posterity devolves the duty of arranging that some memorial of his usefulness shall be erected; that his name shall be inscribed upon the glorious roll that tells of the enlightenment of a nation, and his worth find some record over and above that which his works supply. Recognition may be tardy, but it is a satisfaction to find it at last conceded; and few, even among those who profess no sympathy with music written for the stage, would be narrow-minded enough to deny that Balfe's name should be perpetuated in monumental marble on the Abbey walls. Poets, patriots, philosophers, warriors, men of science and letters, statesmen, and divines have their places there. In its aisles and cloisters lie illustrious musicians who have worked and died in London. Is it fit, therefore, that one whose natural and flowing melodies for years stirred the hearts of the people, and still live among them, should be kept in remembrance and admitted to the highest honour the nation can give to the dead. The act was as warrantable as it was gracefully undertaken; homage rendered where due; and no one present at the ceremony will view it otherwise than as an expression of regard, and a tribute of admiration for which ample justification can be found. The position of English musicians in their own country has, unhappily, never been so clearly defined and honourable as it should be. Composers have laboured and won distinction, but have not been recognized according to their deserts among the art-workers who help to make a country great. This is a reproach to us; and, although their claims have been more generously admitted of late years, much remains to be done ere we can emulate foreign nations in the respect awarded to musical men. As a people, we are not demonstrative. An illustrious composer abroad is more frequently honoured by "counterfeit presentment" set up in stone, imperishable marble, or bronze. In France, for example, Boieldieu has his statue erected in the city of his birth; but in England where do we find a monument to Henry Purcell, or, to come to later times, William Sterndale Bennett? To this last-named genius has been accorded the honour of burial in the Abbey, but that is all. We content ourselves with placing a tablet on the house in which this or that great man was born, and there ends all outward indication of respect for his memory. Had Michael Balfe lived long enough he would assuredly have been knighted—and no man better entitled to the compliment. A composer for the people, he had the faculty of appealing, irresistibly, to the popular ear; his gift of spontaneous melody enshrined him in the hearts of his countrymen; his music easy of comprehension, but never vulgar, was of that quality which compelled general acceptance. There was never a doubt as to his meaning; he did not set musical problems before his hearers, but wrote naturally and unaffectedly; his genius made itself readily understood, and came upon the world opportunely. Before Balfe's time, taste in English opera had become vitiated. The musical drama of our school was a patchy, disjointed thing. He brought his own individuality to bear upon it, and raised its character; he liberated it from the narrow grooves in which it was content to run, and gave it a dignity it had not previously achieved.* We are speaking, of course, of English opera in its integrity, and not of adaptations, or of the "burletta," in which music was made to take a second place. Balfe was essentially a vocal writer. No one knew better than he of what the human voice is capable, or how to combine the different kinds more skilfully. An excellent singer himself, he understood the requirements of the artist, and to interest the vocalist, under certain conditions, is a step towards interesting the public. Although chiefly prized as a melodist, Balfe, in his scores, invariably proved himself a master of musical resource, familiar with every device that could give to his thoughts the most agreeable expression.

The tone of thought in opera of the present day inclines more to the serious, or, as we should perhaps say, the profound, but Balfe could, when occasion required, write music, as Rossini said, "to satisfy the pedants." His name will be associated more with light than with grand opera, but one gift beyond that of fluent melody he possessed in an eminent degree. The dramatic quality was always present in his music. He invariably grasped the situation—whether by intuition, or from laborious consideration, is immaterial. The dramatic grip was there, and is nowhere more evident than in his most popular opera, The Bohemian Girl. An actor of no mean ability, he felt the value of the dramatic element. This perception is not given to every composer. Many a man can write good abstract music, but, wanting the dramatic instinct, that music cannot live. No composer of any nationality ever enjoyed greater popularity in his day than Balfe. From the night he produced the Siege of Rochelle at Drury Lane, in October, 1835, he took the London public by storm. In most of his operas there was some particular song that became quickly known through the length and breadth of the town. In the Siege of Rochelle it was "When I beheld the anchor weighed"; in the Maid of Artois, "The light of other days"; in the Maid of Honour, "In this old chair" (sung by Sims Reeves in his young days); and in Satanella, produced during the Pyne and Harrison management, "The power of love." The Bohemian Girl was full of these captivating melodies, and this opera stands almost alone as having been translated into Italian and French, under the titles of La Zingara and La Bohémienne.† The first version was done at Her Majesty's, where for a term of years, ending in 1852, Balfe had officiated as conductor, and the second was brought out at the Lyrique in 1869.

Another circumstance is worth mentioning in connexion with Balfe. He was the first Englishman since the time of Dr Arne commissioned to write an opera for Her Majesty's, one of the most conservative theatres in Europe. At this period no such innovations as "cheap nights" were known. The subscribers and the public would have taken fright at the idea of reduced prices, as profanity. Everything went on in a stately, conventional fashion, and it spoke volumes for the genius of Michael Balfe, that he should have been deemed worthy of writing for such an established old house in the Haymarket. The opera composed for Her Majesty's was Falstaff, and the score contains much charming music, now most undeservedly lost sight of. In Paris Rossini, the man who called Sir Henry Bishop the "English Mozart,"‡ and who seems to have been above the petty jealousies of some composers, was a firm friend of Balfe's. Here he wrote a delightful work, Le Puits d'Amour, and another, Les Quatre Fils d'Aymon, for the Opéra Comique.§ We have alluded to Balfe as an English composer. As a matter of fact, he was an Irishman. He studied under Rooke, the composer of Amélie. C. F. Horn, organist of St George's Chapel, Windsor, was one of his masters. Subsequently, Frederici, of the Milan Conservatorio, and Filippo Galli gave him lessons in counterpoint and singing. Balfe tried his hand at other forms of composition than opera. A trio of his was performed a few seasons ago at the Monday Popular Concerts,‖ and only but now an example of his church music was given at Westminster Abbey. On such an occasion as the unveiling of a memorial to a gifted man it is worth recalling some of the principal events of his artistic life. No musician ever worked more conscientiously, more industriously, or with more enthusiasm than the genial and kindly-natured Michael Balfe.

NEW YORK.—Abbey's Park Theatre, in which Mrs Langtry was to have made her first appearance in this city on Monday night, was totally destroyed by fire, which broke out an hour or two before the house would have been opened for business.

KÖNIGSBERG.—Three young members of the professional staff at the School of Music have hit upon the notion of giving "International Folk's-Songs Concerts," in which a careful selection of the folk's melodies of the whole world will be performed. Thus the programmes will comprise folk's-songs of Mexico, Japan, China, Hindostan, Persia, Arabia, Armenia, Egypt, Roumania, Wallachia, Greece, &c. Altogether, 40 different nations will be thus songfully represented.

* Then, of course, Edward Loder, with his Nourjahad, John Barnett, with his Mountain Sylph, and G. A. Macfarren, with his Devil's Opera, all preceding the advent of Balfe, and all produced at Mr Irving's now celebrated theatre, count for nothing.—Dr Blitge.

† German also, please.—Dr Blitge.

‡ Rossini never did anything of the kind. He recognized Bishop as the composer of "When the wind blows."—Dr Blitge.

§ And the Etoile de Seville, please, for the Grand Opera.—Dr Blitge.

ANCIENT WELSH MUSIC.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—If there is one single and particular attribute of his race and country dearer to a Welshman than another it is, look you, that of antiquity. When I see in last Saturday's Musical World the extract from the Globe casting of a doubt, of a perplexity, and of a sneer at the age and the numbers of years of our mountains, our hills, and our song, then, look you, was my ire, my wrath, my rage and my indignations jump the pounds and the limits. Know and understand you, sir, the fact is sure as anything you can see in the 'orld, that Snowdon preasted the siege of the Glacial period for millions of years, and a long time, whilst the valleys, and hills, and forests of England, look you, lay crushed under the conquering ice, like the fabled plackpirds paked peneath thick, hard, frozen pasty? Snowdon had then much the same face, look you, as it is tomorrow. Put England's face, mark you now, has changed may pe a thousand times, and perhaps a hundred! Snowdon, look you, is a fine old gentleman with a pedigree, indeet to gootness, and no upstart either. So of the peoples. The Celts, look you, was entertaining the Romans, studying his directions and disciplines when the Saxons, mark you, was a wandering, cruel savage. So of the languages. Did not Arthur and his round-tabled knights speak it before the Saxon's hissing, spitting tongue was heard in Pritain? So of the song, the music, the melody, the harmony. Mr Prinley Richards, a goot man, pless him, is said our song is not older than mushroom England's. Very well. I shall like Mr Prinley Richards (as our old guests the Romans was said in their cups and their rages Et tu Brute) I shall like him for to come North Wales and speak that our music is not ancient. I do think yesterday Mr Prinley Richards was goot Welshman, put to-morrow I think him not—not reasonably goot. This I will verify, look you, in his peard. If he shall look, look you, in the chronicles of that middle age Welshman, Geoffrey of Monmouth (what goot men is porn at Monmouth!) shall he not find that "Codiad yr Hedydd" was sung to Arthur by the famous pard "Lleffdyrdd"? and shall he not find that Modred did sing "Hob y deri Danno" in making love to Queen Gunivere? It is goot for Mr Prinley Richards to go to Swansea, look you. Why the peoples of the south coast are put the flotson and the jetsam cast there by the huge, pig Saxon flood. What an ark, look you, our mountains, pless and preserve them, did puild and make for us!!—Mr Editor your humble servant I am, FLUELLEN.

THE ITALIAN OPERA QUESTION.

(To the Editor of the "Times.")

SIR,—Allow me to suggest that all your correspondents on this subject seem to have missed one very important point—viz., the close connection which exists, in all vocal compositions of a high class, between the character and accent of the language, and of the music which is set to it. As long as a composer is bent on really giving expression to the character of the words, and not merely on musical display apart from that character, the character and ictus of his musical phraseology will naturally arise out of those of the language he is setting, and much of its point must be lost when it is associated with a language entirely different in style and character from the original one. It may be true, for instance, that French is a very bad language for singing; but it is equally true that it is a language of very marked character and accent which impresses itself indelibly on the music composed to it. This is amply illustrated in the operas of Gluck and Meyerbeer, Germans by birth, who composed in French, and whose musical style is influenced throughout by the language. Let any one take the short chorus in Gluck's Iphigenie, "Il nous fallait du sang," and try to give the same fierce point to the musical phrases with any other words, and he will probably acknowledge how impossible it is to do so. An equally striking example is the pretty bridal chorus at the close of the third act of Les Huguenots, which is French to the backbone, and could have been inspired by no other language. Take, as an instance by a native French composer, Gounod's capital song for the character of Vulcan, which Mr Santley has popularized in our concert-rooms, with its scoffing "aside"—

"Venus n'a pas tort, Il mérite son sort."

Set words in any other language to it, and the point of the music will be completely lost. So with Gounod's finer and more serious song to Lamartine's words, "Mon cœur lassé du tout," which loses greatly in translation. The case is the same with music that is distinctly German in character. Sing the drinking-song from Der Freischütz to Italian words and it falls comparatively flat; while such operas as Euryanthe, Tannhäuser, and Lohengrin are half ruined in effect by being given in Italian. Even in Rossini's Guillaume Tell the effect of the French language on the style of that very Italian composer is apparent. Mozart's operas, with the exception of Die Zauberflöte, lose less by translation into Italian than most other German operas, because he had imported into his rounded and polished style so much of the Italian musical element; but in general, if German operas are to be translated for us, they are much better translated into the cognate English language than into one so foreign to their genius as the Italian.

We have now, however, a number of vocalists of various nationalities before the public, most of whom have acquired, at least, one other language besides their own, and what we ought to aim at is the performance of all high class operas in the language in which they were originally written. In that way only can the expression and character intended by the composer be fully realized. The indiscriminate translation of all such works into Italian for English audiences is a mere stupidity of fashion.—Yours respectfully,

H. H. STATHAM.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

The pieces at the Theatre since last I wrote have been Le Jour et la Nuit, Madame Favart, Les Mousquetaires au Couvent, &c., in all of which the acting and singing of Mdlle Coralie Geoffroy have met with well-deserved approval. The spirit she throws into the character of Manola in the Jour et la Nuit is highly appreciated; particularly in the song

"Pour être Ministre de la Guerre
Il ne faut pas être militaire."

In which she is well seconded by Mdlle Desnoyers (Beatrix), who also ably supported her in the chanson de la nuit, "Le Rossignol," as well as in the unaccompanied trio (with the tenor, M. Fromant), which had to be repeated. As regards Madame Favart, and the Mousquetaires au Couvent, they were both well played, especially the first named, in which Mdlle Geoffroy undertook the character of Simonne. Le Parisien, like Le Poudre d'escampette, and Nos députés en robe de chambre, died "natural deaths." Un Lycée de jeunes filles and Le Pompon are in rehearsal. So M. Berard not only gives his audiences good things of the past, but promises them for the future.

The Philharmonic Concerts are to begin again shortly, probably commencing with a Concert Intime. Reichardt (the indefatigable) has already had two rehearsals (but of what? encore de mysterè!!!). Time will show.

The pretty kioske in which the three weekly evening concerts took place in the garden of the Etablissement des Bains was completely wrecked last week by the wind, which blew a hurricane.

There is a grand talk about "farming" out the Etablissement, a scheme I have long ago advocated in the columns of the Musical World. Why not? Instead of being under the thumb of the Town Council, who know as much about music as a conductor's bâton, an "enterprising impresario" would probably make a success of it.

FOR AYE.*

The moon was shining brightly
Far over hill and dale;
The waves were dancing lightly,
Yet look'd so bright and pale.

As I was gasing, dreaming,
O'er earth, o'er sea, o'er sky,
I heard a voice repeating
"For weal, for woe, for aye."

'Twas at those silent hours
When fairies work their charms;
I look'd, and lo! two lovers
Stood there with twinèd arms.

Their troth they just had plighted
Till when they both should die;
Love had their hearts united
For weal, for woe, for aye.

CARL ROSA'S COMPANY AT LEEDS.

The Yorkshire Post prefaces an article on the recent performance of Wagner's Flying Dutchman at Leeds with the subjoined criticism by the late Henry Fothergill Chorley, written after a perusal of the score. (Chorley's "perusal of the score" was a great matter—as Berlioz afterwards knew to his disparagement):

"Herr Wagner's Fliegende Holländer was produced complete at Dresden; and there, in spite of direct royal patronage, in spite of a certain novelty of style, in spite of the acceptance of Rienzi, and the vogue brought to every theatre by fitting up a genius of its own, the opera, I am assured, failed on its representation. Such immediate failure we know to be no criterion of ultimate success, or intrinsic merit; but it seems to me explained since I have perused the music. A spinning song and chorus is to be remembered as pleasing; a wild sea-tune, too, as being audaciously broken in rhythm, and built on a phrase of the most desperate platitude; but the rest of the work produced on me merely an impression of grim violence and dreary vagueness, which, till then at least, had never been produced in such a fulness of ugliness by the music of a clever man."

"Thus wrote"—says the Yorkshire Post—"the late Henry F. Chorley, England's ablest critic in his lifetime."* Upon this follows a disquisition upon Wagner's opera, in which the opinions of Chorley are weighed in the balance with those of the Yorkshire Post. Naturally (between you and me and the Post), the Yorkshire sheet comes from the ordeal triumphant (in its own opinion). But that is neither here nor there.† After floundering in æsthetics, the Post finally lights upon dry earth, and thus proclaims its opinion of the performance. We quote in extenso:—

"The thought struck us while we were in the 'Grand' that Mr Carl Rosa intended to honour Leeds by playing all his 'trump cards,' for unless this had been the case the amount of enthusiasm shown would be really altogether unaccountable. That Mdme Alwina Valleria is his prima donna par excellence there can be no question. We state this fact advisedly, and without the slightest intention to wound the feelings of the other artists in this the strongest company, we should imagine, he has ever taken through the provinces. To say that her Senta is remarkable for power and beauty would be doing her only the barest justice. It was more than this—it was a revelation for which we were not all prepared. Her impersonation of the loving, self-sacrificing maiden was one of the most sympathetic in our recollection. We need not tell our readers what her voice is like, as they know as well as we do that it is of the most charming and sympathetic quality. But Wagner is exacting, and requires more than this. An artist in his estimation must also be an actress in the truest sense of the word. That the lady proved herself such we have only to instance her grand efforts in the second act; but even these were not her greatest, for in the final catastrophe she certainly rose to the highest summit of the situation. The audience were of this opinion, for they applauded her to the echo. She is—and we sincerely hope will long remain—an ornament to the English-speaking lyric profession. Mr Ludwig is no stranger amongst us. One and all must have been gratified with his representation of the Dutchman, musicians particularly so. Last night he excelled himself. It is very doubtful whether a more weird, gloomy Vanderdecken has ever appeared on any stage. He is dignified and impressive, or he could not have held the audience spell-bound as he did last nigh. If at times he indulges a little too freely in the tremolo it is pardonable, especially in the character of the Hollander. Mr Ludwig's grand voice and correct intonation throughout the trying scene in the first act, and in the still more exacting duet with Senta in the second, were perhaps never more conspicuous than they were last evening. He had the warmest sympathy of one of the largest audiences ever yet assembled at the 'Grand.' Mr J. W. Turner enacted the part of the disappointed lover, Erik the Forester, in a manner deserving the warmest commendation, as did that much esteemed basso, Mr Henry Pope, the ungrateful task of Daland. We have never heard these gentlemen sing much better. That most promising of English tenors, Mr B. Davies—and we are convinced that our own men are at present the best on the lyric stage—was the Steersman, and both sang and acted remarkably well. Miss M. Walsh was Mary, and very well did she acquit herself. Mr John Pew—who has thoroughly mastered the intricacies of the elaborate 'score'—conducted, and to the honour of Leeds be it said—for we are all proud of him as a Leeds man—most admirably. We were not sure but that a great many mistakes might have occurred, and although the instrumental portion of the work may not have been entirely perfect, it was more than passable, which is saying a great deal in the case of Wagner's music. The scenic effects were simply superb, and the audience—at times somewhat too demonstrative—expressed their delight by vociferously recalling the artists before the curtain. Never has the 'Grand' presented such a magnificent appearance. Hundreds were disappointed in not gaining admission. To-night Gounod's Faust is on the bills, with Miss Georgina Burns as Margarita, and another crowded house is anticipated."

JOACHIM sent the girl-violinist, Teresa Tua, during her recent visit to Berlin, his photograph, with the inscription: "A Mademoiselle Teresina Tua. Souvenir amical d'un admirateur sincère de son grand talent.—JOSEPH JOACHIM."

WE are happy to be able to state that the illness which has for the last nine weeks prevented Mdme Rose Hersee from fulfilling her engagements as prima donna of the Royal English Opera Company appears likely to terminate ere long, and her medical advisers state that she may make her re-appearance in public on Saturday next, at Mr George Watt's Concert in the Dome, Brighton, when she will appear as Marguerite in Act III. of Gounod's Faust. The other characters will be impersonated by Mdme Trebelli (Siebel), Mdme De Vaney (Marta), Mr Vernon Rigby (Faust), and Mr Barrington Foote (Mefistofele). Conductor, Mr Sidney Naylor. Mdme Rose Hersee will join the Royal English Opera Company at Leeds on the following Tuesday.—Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News.

BRAHMS AND SARAH BERNHARDT.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Being at Leipsic, I went, as a matter of course, to the last Gewandhaus concert. There was no third symphony by Brahms, as stated, but there was a third symphony by Raff—"Im Walde," well-known at the Crystal Palace, Sydenham. Being now in Paris, I can also testify that Sarah Bernhardt is neither at Buenos Ayres nor Rio Janeiro. Only yesterday I saw the famous actress step out of her carriage to greet a friend.—Yours obediently, Paris, Hotel de Bristol, Oct. 31. J. R. M.

PAUCA VERBA.

DEAR BEARD,—You have fallen among thieves. The ingenious (though hardly ingenuous) R. J. K., of "Leipsic, Oct. 17," who introduces us to Wagner complaining of his own Walkyrie's Ride, should peruse the letters of Mendelssohn to the late Mr Bartholomew. There he will find that in speaking of the air "O rest in the Lord," Mendelssohn calls it "A song to which I always had an objection." What Philistine inference will R. J. K. draw from that? I hope he in his turn will have "a queer time of it." If he does, let him visit me on the Yorkshire coast, and I will prescribe a drastic remedy.

Oct. 28. FLAMBOROUGH HEAD, Bart.

DEPARTURE OF ADELINA PATTI FOR AMERICA.

(From a Correspondent.)

Madame Patti left Liverpool for New York on Saturday, Oct. 21st, by the Cunard ship "Servia." A special tender conveyed the distinguished artist from the landing-stage to the vessel. Accompanying her were several personal friends, amongst whom Mr Josiah Pittman and Mr Edward Hall (of the Royal Italian Opera), Herr Ganz (of Herr Ganz's Concerts), and MM. Mortier and Johnson, both of the Paris Figaro. A heap of telegrams, letters, and messages, expressive of kind and warm wishes, was received by Madame Patti on the morning of her departure. These wishes will follow her and, assuredly, similar indications of respect and good feeling will accompany her return.

Liverpool, Oct. 30.

ANNETTE ESSIPOFF.

After taking part in a concert at Chemnitz on the 3rd inst., Mdme Annette Essipoff was to start on a long tour in Germany and Russia. She will play in some fifteen German towns, and then proceed, by way of Lodz and Warsaw, to Moscow, where she is to receive 4,000 roubles for two concerts. Then, with appearances at intermediate places, she will play thrice in Bucharest.* In the second half of January, she again visits Germany, and, subsequently, the principal towns of France, Spain, and Italy are to follow in due course. May she everywhere be triumphant!

BALFE'S ANTHEM.—The anthem, "Save me, O God," which excited so much interest and admiration when it was performed at Westminster Abbey on the occasion of the unveiling of the Balfe memorial tablet, has just been published by Messrs Novello & Co. It is admirably written and well arranged, and ought to find a place in the repertory of every one of those "choirs and places where they sing."

ELBING.—A performance of Handel's Judas Maccabæus was recently given under the direction of Odenwald, previously to his departure for Hamburgh, where he is appointed professor of singing both at the Realschule of the Johanneum and the new Gelehrtenschule.

CARLSRUHE.—In the course of the winter the members of the Philharmonic Society will give performances of Handel's Alexander's Feast, Liszt's Gran Festival Mass, and, at Easter, in conjunction with other societies, J. S. Bach's Matthäuspassion.

* Where she will meet (not for the first time, Mdme Jonnescu) one of our fairest and most talented pianists.—Dr Bilge.

CONCERTS.

THE POPULAR CONCERTS.—Despite very unfavourable weather, a large audience attended the concert given last Saturday afternoon, when the programme contained some choice and favourite examples of music, both classical and modern. As regards the first named, it would almost suffice to mention Schubert's Quartet in A minor, by way of accounting for amateur enthusiasm. Mr Chappell's patrons are never tired of hearing this delightful work, especially when Mdme Norman-Néruda is its chief interpreter. There are some masters much more congenial than others to the accomplished lady violinist. Haydn is one of them; and decidedly Schubert is another. The tender grace of the Viennese composer, as shown in the A minor quartet, seems to excite all her sympathy, and evoke her fullest powers. Amateurs know this, and were prepared on Saturday for the exceptional pleasure to which they gave marked expression. How well Mdme Néruda was supported by MM. Ries, Holländer, and Piatti there is no need to say. Rubinstein's Sonata in D, for piano and violin, was the next important concerted piece, and again made an impression far deeper than does anything else from the same pen in Mr Chappell's repertory. It was admirably played by Mdme Néruda and Mdlle Janotha, each of whom further contributed a solo to the programme; that of the violinist being Corelli's Sonata in D, with pianoforte accompaniment. Mdme Néruda's choice could not have been happier. She endowed the old Roman master's strains with as much life as they had when no charge of antiquity could be brought against them; exhibiting at the same time a perfect mastery of her instrument, in combination with a grace of style approached by few, surpassed by none. The audience seemed beyond measure pleased, and with reason. On her part, Mdlle Janotha gave Beethoven's variations on a theme in C minor, playing them with her usual facility and power, and earning warm acknowledgments. The vocalist was Miss Cravino, a young lady gifted with a mezzo-soprano voice of much sweetness and evenness. She sang "Verdi prati" and Gounod's "There is a green hill" with taste and expression, and obtained the favourable verdict of her audience. M. Zerbini accompanied, and also played the pianoforte part in Corelli's sonata. The programme of last Monday contained Mendelssohn's Quintet in B flat and Schumann's Trio in D minor, these respectively beginning and ending the concert, which had much of interest apart from them. Mdlle Janotha, for example, introduced Beethoven's Variations in C major, with which she associated a Nocturne by Henschel, and a valse bearing her own name. Comparative trifles as these were compared with the great and serious works she often performs, Mdlle Janotha made with them a lively effect, and elicited, perhaps, more applause than would have followed her rendering of an abstruse sonata. A novelty followed in the form of a Hebrew melody, "Kol Nidrei," arranged for violoncello, with pianoforte accompaniment, by Herr Max Bruch. The performer was, of course, Signor Piatti, whose rare talent invested the piece, in itself unimportant, with all possible charm. Quite apart from the merit of the music, it becomes matter for congratulation when this consummate artist finds a work which suits him. Connoisseurs cannot hear his solos too often. Miss Marian Mackenzie was the vocalist, and distinguished herself in Handel's "Barbaro, o Traditor."—D. T.

POPULAR BALLAD CONCERTS.—A brilliant programme is announced for the concert to be given this evening by the Committee at the Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell. Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mdme Osborne Williams, and Mr Prenton are among the vocalists. M. Victor Buziau will play solos on the violin. The programme includes the ballads, "Kathleen Mavourneen," "Caller Herrin'," and "Oh, Nanny wilt thou gang wi' me;" as well as the songs, "The Lost Chord," the "Toreador" song from Carmen, and Rossini's "Una voce poco fa." The prices of admission place the concert within the reach of all classes of music lovers.

THE London Literary and Artistic Institution held a conversazione on Tuesday evening in the banquetting room of St. James's Hall. The evening was devoted to music, under the direction of Herr Immanuel Liebich, the singers being Misses F. Bernani, Emily Dashwood, E. Ellice, and Mdme Heaketh; Signor Ria and Mr Frank Quatremayne. The instrumentalists were Misses Dinelli and Chaplin (violin), Herren Liebich and Bonawitz (pianoforte).

THE COVENT GARDEN CONCERTS.—The Promenade Concerts of the present autumn—says the St. James's Gazette—seem to be arranged in acts like a drama, or in movements like a symphony. The first section came to an end a few weeks ago. The second terminated on Saturday night. The third, which began on Monday evening, will be carried on until Christmas; and there can be no reason why the concerts should not be still further prolonged, for it is understood that no pantomime will be produced this winter at Covent Garden. Mdlle Warnots, who has sung at the Covent Garden Concerts since the opening night, early in August, shows in the selection of her music a taste worthy of her refined style as an executant; and her singing of the air from the Pré aux Clercs, with the obbligato violin accompaniment as played by Mr. Carrodus, would be a noticeable feature at concerts of the very highest pretensions. Miss Florence Waud, too, among the numerous pianists whom Mr Crowe has introduced to the public, deserves special thanks for having presented, as she did on Friday night, the largo and scherzo of Litolff's "symphonic concerto." It is not more "symphonic" than any other work for a solo instrument and orchestra, but it has the intrinsic merit of being beautiful, and the incidental one of being, to English audiences, new; and the light and graceful scherzo—lightly and gracefully rendered as it was by Miss Waud, with perfect accent—cannot, once heard, be easily forgotten.

PROVINCIAL.

LEEDS.—It would be an insult to the memory of Balfe—says The Yorkshire Post—at this particular time, when his name is so prominently before the public, were we to omit noticing a performance of the Bohemian Girl (his chef d'œuvre) at the Grand Theatre last evening. Important alterations have been made in the cast since the Carl Rosa Company last visited Leeds. Mr B. Davies has replaced Mr J. W. Turner in the character of Thaddeus, and a new Florestine, in the person of Mr Wilfred Esmond, has succeeded the inimitable Mr Charles Lyall. In other respects, however, the parts are sustained by well-known members of the company, including Miss Georgina Burns as Arline, Miss Josephine Yorke as the Queen, and Messrs Leslie Crotty and Snazelle as Count Arnheim and Devilshoof respectively. We have not much to add to our former notices—which have always been of a laudatory character—of the manner in which this opera is performed by the Carl Rosa Company, unless it be to state that its high reputation is still maintained. We might perhaps take exception to the Florestine of Mr Wilfred Esmond, who sadly lacks the rich humour of Mr Lyall. His voice is superior to his predecessor's; but at present he does not appear to enter into the foppish character of the Count's nephew which for many years has been so splendidly portrayed by the elder lyric-comedian. All the familiar and beautiful airs with which the work abounds were received by a very large audience with the accustomed applause. Miss Burns was honoured with a re-call in "I dreamt that I dwelt in marble halls," and Mr B. Davies was encored in "When other lips and other hearts," and "When the fair land of Poland." There was also the usual re-demand for the quartet, "From the valleys and hills;" but, singular to state, the most pathetic of all the songs in the opera, "The heart bow'd down"—although beautifully rendered by Mr Leslie Crotty—failed to arouse any enthusiasm.

LIVERPOOL.—The fifth annual distribution of prizes and honour certificates gained by the pupils in the Liverpool centre of the Trinity College of Music, London, took place on Saturday afternoon, Oct. 28th, in the hall of the Liverpool Institute, Mount Street. The Mayor (Mr J. Hughes), who was accompanied by the Mayoress, presided, and there was a large attendance of the parents and friends of the pupils. Mr J. J. Monk, the honorary local secretary, read the annual report, in which it was stated that there had been held four examinations in the Liverpool centre since the last report, viz., two in elementary musical knowledge and two in instrumental and vocal music. The Mayor said he had felt considerable diffidence in coming there to preside, because he thought that someone better acquainted with music would have filled the position with greater éclat; but, having been appealed to by Mr Monk, he felt that it was an educational movement deserving of great encouragement—for he knew of nothing which tended so much to elevate and refine as a thorough education in music—(hear, hear)—and he therefore came there with very great pleasure—(applause). His worship concluded an able speech by calling upon Mr Humphrey J. Stark (registrar of Trinity College), who gave an outline of the work which the college was attempting to do in the cause of musical education throughout the country; and, in conclusion, remarked that it was very difficult to say whether Trinity College would be advantaged or injured by the proposed Royal College of Music, because no one knew at present what was to be the scope of the proposed institution; but he might say that, so far as the authorities of Trinity College were concerned, they were perfectly prepared to work with it in the most harmonious way. (Applause.) If the effect of the proposed college was to be that every other existing institution—whether it was the Royal Academy of Music or Trinity College, or any institution already in existence—was to be exterminated, they might depend upon it that the establishment of the Royal College of Music in this country would be about the worst day's work the art of music had ever sustained. ("Hear, hear," and applause.) But he did not for a moment anticipate that such would be the result. He could not imagine that in a free country this could be possible. On the contrary, he was thankful that the Prince of Wales and his Royal brother had taken up the scheme and shown an interest in the art of music, and he was sure that nothing but good could result. (Applause.) Several songs having been sung by students, the Mayoress distributed the prizes. After which, on the motion of Mr Malcolm Guthrie, seconded by Major Stewart, thanks were voted to the Mayoress for distributing the prizes, and the Mayor having been thanked, on the motion of Mr Rensburg, seconded by Dr Johnson, for presiding, the proceedings terminated.

BIRMINGHAM.—The second of Mr S. S. Stratton's "Popular Concerts" was given at the Masonic Hall on Monday evening, Oct. 30. The concert began with the late Mr Charles Lucas' String Quartet in G major, followed by Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 31, No. 3) for pianoforte alone, played by Miss Hargreave so well that she was called back to the platform to be heartily applauded. Subsequently, Mr Abbot gave Tartini's "Trillo del Diavolo" so effectively that he was also unanimously re-called. Mendelssohn's Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello was then capitally played by Miss Hargreave, Messrs T. M. Abbott, and J. Owen, the concert terminating with Mozart's Quintet in D major, for two violins, two violas, and violoncello. There was a large audience, so that Mr Stratton's endeavour to make the best music popular is likely to bring forth good fruit. The next concert is to take place on December 4th, when compositions by Beethoven, Schumann, Sterndale Bennett, and Ebenezer Prout, will be included in the programme.

MARGATE.—A most destructive fire broke out last Saturday morning by which the Assembly Rooms, Royal Hotel, and the whole south side of Cecil Square have been nearly destroyed. A fireman was seriously injured, but no lives were lost.

WREXHAM.—On Sunday, October 15, an organ, erected in St Mary's Church, Bersham, at the expense of T. Ll. Fitz-Hugh, Esq., by Messrs T. and H. Hewens, of Stratford-on-Avon, was opened by Mr Edwin Harriss. This was also the occasion of the harvest festival, the sermons being preached by Canon Hornby. The instrument is enclosed in a handsome oak case, and the front pipes present a very rich appearance. The following is the specification of the organ, built from the designs and specifications of Mr Edwin Harriss, who we congratulate on having a fine instrument worthy of his talents. Of Mr Harriss's playing it is needless to say much, for every one who has had the privilege of listening to his delightful performances agrees that he has earned for himself a reputation which places him amongst those of the foremost rank of organists:—

GREAT ORGAN—CC TO G.—Open diapason 8 feet, 56 pipes; clarabella, 8, 56; stopped diapason, 8, 56; dulciana, 8, 56; principal, 4, 56; harmonic flute, 4, 56; fifteenth, 2, 56. Total, 392 pipes.

SWELL ORGAN—CC TO G.—Open diapason, 8 feet, 56 pipes; principal, 4, 56; salicional, 8, 56; Voix céleste to tenor, 8, 44; Piccolo, 2, 56; mixture, 2 ranks, 112 pipes; hautboy, 8 feet, 56 pipes; lieblich gedact, 8, 56. Total, 488 pipes.

CHOIR ORGAN—CC TO G.—Keraulophon, 8 feet, 56 pipes; gamba, 8, 56; spitz flute, 4, 56; cremona, 8, 44; stopped diapason, 8, 56. Total, 268 pipes.

PEDAL ORGAN—CCC TO F.—Open diapason, 16 feet, 30 pipes; Bourdon, 16, 30. Total, 60 pipes.

COUPLERS.—Swell to great; swell to choir; swell to pedal; great to pedal; choir to pedal.

Four composition pedals to great organ acting also on pedal; three composition pedals to swell organ, one to throw on or off; great to pedal coupler.

The Bach Association, Hanover, recently gave a performance of Max Bruch's Odysseus, under the direction of Herr Grosscurth.

Mr Kuhe's "Brighton Festival," (so called), commences on Tuesday next, with Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony, followed by Sullivan's Martyr of Antioch, each work to be conducted by the composer. Elijah, conducted by Mr Kuhe, is to be given on Thursday, and Gounod's Redemption, conducted by Mr Randegger on Saturday. The singers are to be Mdme Albani, Miss Ella Lemmens, and Mdme Trebelli; Messrs Lloyd, McGuckin, King, and Santley.

Miss Margaret Gyde (pupil of Mr Walter Macfarren) played Brahms' new Pianoforte Concerto at the Crystal Palace Friday concert, last week, when her success was acknowledged by hearty applause and a re-call. Miss Margaret Gyde (who has carried off all the highest honours at the Royal Academy of Music), it will be remembered, made her début in the spring at one of her master's Orchestral Concerts, when she gave, with marked effect Mr Walter Macfarren's Concertstück in E.

CHERUBINI.

IX.

We now come to the epoch of Cherubini's greatest theatrical success, such a success as he had never achieved with any of his previous works and such as he was never destined to achieve again. Les deux Journées, to which I allude, marked the apogee of his talent in this branch of art, and put the finishing stroke to the reputation he had conquered by so much labour. On this occasion he had for colleague Bouilly, the upright and virtuous Bouilly, the friend of Grétry, whose son-in-law he had become, the author of Contes à ma fille, Pierre le Grand, and L'Abbé de l'Epée, the wishy-washy and pompous author, whose pretentious and turgid style might serve as a model for all Prudhommes, past, present, and future. As a matter of course, Bouilly himself, in the Memoirs published by him under the title of Mes Récapitulations, gives a complete historical account of the birth and apparition of Les deux Journées, and I shall borrow from him a few interesting and little-known facts:

"Among the celebrated artists," he says, "whom I had the happiness of meeting at Joséphine's (the future Empress), I remarked Cherubini, who was united to Méhul by true friendship, which was never diminished, despite of all the little rivalries which nearly always spring up between two men of great talent pursuing the same career. Cherubini had just produced on our lyric stage the two fine scores of Médée and Lodoïska, in which the public admired at one and the same time richness of harmony, profound science, and dramatic expression. But these learned productions were set to books which did not offer what was required at that period, that is to say, sustained interest combined with new and pleasing situations, such as Sedaine had created; consequently, while applauding Cherubini's beautiful music, every one remained cold and did not experience the attraction exerted by the works of Marsollier and Dalayrac, of Dejaure and Berton, of Hoffmann and Méhul. The fact is that between these men, associated with each other in so many brilliant successes, there existed the sympathy of talent and experience; the author of the book enjoyed half the credit of the piece which obtained the favour of the public; lastly, the public demanded in a lyrical work that as much should be done by the author as by the composer; from a musical number possessing true expression they liked to pass to well conducted scenes, correct dialogue, interesting action, and, as old Sedaine said, 'To something satisfying simultaneously the ears and the heart.' Cherubini, who up to that time had never had a book in which he could introduce popular songs, applied to all the literary men for such a one, and I was happy enough to realize his wish. I had already produced at the Théâtre Feydeau Léonore ou L'Amour conjugal, with music by Gaveaux, whose natural melodies had assured our success, and under the auspices of the celebrated Mdme Scio, then become the modern Saint-Huberti, by the beauty of her voice as well as by her warmth of soul and the dignity of her whole person. There shone near her at the same theatre a spirited and natural artist, who imparted to all his characters a stamp of truth, the charm of which was irresistible; this was the inimitable Juliet, who cultivated his art instinctively, and from the stoves of a restaurateur had taken his place on our lyric stage, where he rendered Le Club des bonnes gens, L'Amour filial, and especially Les Visitandines, so much the vogue. An act of admirable devotion on the part of a water-carrier for the benefit of a friend of mine, a magistrate, who was saved under the Terror as though by a miracle, inspired me with the idea of giving the people a lesson in humanity. In a very short time, then, I wrote my piece entitled Les deux Journées, and hastened to entrust it to Cherubini. He thought he saw in it something which might afford his rich and fertile imagination all the stimulus he required, and set to work uninterruptedly at composing one of the finest scores of modern times."

The reader may judge of Bouilly's dramatic writing by this specimen of his literary style. We will, however, with his assistance, continue the history of how Les Deux Journées was born. Bouilly had just given at the Comédie-Française a work which, thanks to the subject—a very interesting one—had obtained a genuine success. It was entitled L'Abbé de l'Epée, and we shall see with what fears the way in which it had been received inspired the author of Les Deux Journées:—

"Meanwhile," he says, "Cherubini completed his score, and the management of the Théâtre Feydeau strained every nerve to hasten on its production. I could not help feeling anxious at their eagerness. 'A man,' I said to myself, 'has not two great successes in so short a time; and I fear very much that the fate of my second work will tarnish the success of the first.' The actors laughed at my timidity; Juliet and Mdme Scio reassured me by the admirable talent they displayed at rehearsals, and never left off predicting that my *Porteur d'eau would make the round of France. We are easily induced to yield to what flatters our self-love, and I consented to my piece being played twenty-seven days after the production of L'Abbé de l'Epée. This great event in my dramatic career occupied uninterruptedly my imagination. 'Oh! if I could gather in one month a second crop of laurel!' I said to myself. 'My place among dramatic authors would be secured, and I should navigate in full sail on the frail vessel which I have embarked. . . . Vain illusion!' I added immediately afterwards, 'No, no! I dare not flatter myself I shall obtain so promptly a double crown.'"

All this is childish; still, after an interval of eighty years, it is not without interest for us. Let us, therefore, allow Bouilly to proceed and describe the incidents marking the first performance of Les Deux Journées;—

"At length the important day arrived destined to decide the fate of the Two which I was bold enough to bring out on the stage. I do not think I ever before experienced such fear as that which then seized on my whole being. I recollect that, on my reaching the theatre, Juliet, a man of instinct and truthfulness, said, when he saw my agitated face: 'When I have made you drink a glass of water from my cart, you will be all right again, take my word for it.' So the overture began and met with general approbation. The first act appeared full of matter, well planned and characterised by absorbing interest. Then came the finale, that admirable septet cited as a masterpiece of our modern school. Enthusiasm had reached its highest pitch. Scarcely had the curtain fallen at the end of this act, ere a large number of pupils of the Conservatory, climbing up over the orchestra, surrounded their master, who wanted to make me share the congratulations showered on him . . But all my attention was taken up by my water-cart; the whole fate of the piece depended on that; and on more than one occasion the public have been known to pass from the enthusiasm produced by a first act to great severity towards the others. I relied, with justice, on the irresistible spirit of my actor; everything had been regulated and measured in order that the scene of the water-cart containing an illustrious personage proscribed by law might produce all the effect we expected; but a mere nothing might destroy all our hopes; it was necessary that the interest and the comic element in the situation should hit the public at the minute, the second, indicated. The vigilance of a sentinel whose steps were counted had to be eluded. In a word, Count Armand had only a single instant for escape. . . Everything concurred to render that instant decisive and favourable to the piece. Juliet, after misleading the public by drawing, with the natural free and easy manner of a good Auvergnat, two pails of real water from his cart, suddenly opened the fore part, and he on whose head a price was fixed issued from it and made safely off; the delirious joy experienced by the worthy son of the people, the words especially which fell from him as he followed with his eye the proscribed fugitive: 'He is saved, yon man with the cloak! Never, no, never, wert thou so profitable to me before, my dear cart!' the actor's charming features, the vibrating accents of his agitated voice, and more especially the inexpressible effect of the orchestra, produced on the whole audience one of those outbursts of emotion which cannot be withstood and which are followed by lasting success. I felt certain of it from that moment, and, in my turn, pressing Cherubini in my arms, said, with the eager utterance of fear and deep emotion: 'Pardon me, great master! I trembled and should never have been consoled, had I compromised your fine talent.' 'Never,' he answered, returning my embrace, 'no, never, perhaps, shall I have a better occasion for developing it, and I owe you my grandest triumph.'"

We here see Bouilly, with thoroughly paternal complacency, expatiating on the book of his Deux Journées. Whatever may be the defects of a form now naïve to childishness and now the acme of fustian, it is certain that a book so full of incident, and deficient neither in action or warmth, was not without interest, and that the feebleness of the dénouement was counterbalanced by instances of real excellence scattered here and there. Some critics of the time, and among them Sauvo, theatrical critic of the Moniteur Universel, were seized with a sort of enthusiasm for the book, which, however, could hardly be performed at the present day, unless re-touched in some important details and almost completely re-modelled, at least as regards the form of language employed.† Nevertheless, the public were moved by the interesting situations, and, with the help of Cherubini's music, as well as that of the clever acting, the new work achieved a genuine and irresistible success. The principal lines of the story are simple. The action is laid at the period of the Fronde, under the ministry of Mazarin. An important personage, Count Armand, President of the Parliament of Paris, opposes the Cardinal, and, in conjunction with two of his friends, Presidents Brossel and Novion, endeavours to prevent the registration of several edicts which they consider disastrous. This is quite sufficient to draw down on him the Cardinal's hatred, for Mazarin, as we know, entertained only moderate esteem for contradiction, especially when the latter was manifested by acte. Mazarin has, therefore, sworn to be revenged on the Count and put a price on his head. The Count is thus in danger of death, when an honest Water-Carrier, not without danger to himself, volunteers to save him, and succeeds in snatching him from the fatal doom in store for him. Such is the story of Les Deux Journées. It is tolerably varied, and in it the author has managed to intermingle, not without a certain skill, comic incidents with touching dramatic situations.

* The title which the work was at first meant to bear, and under which it has always been performed in Germany.

WAGNER AND GOUNOD.

However it may fare with politics and business, music is in perpetual session. London has been flooded with music since the early spring. At the end of the season it simply adjourns in a mass into the provinces. From external and public appearances it might be argued that there is no great difference between the musical past and present. Formerly the metropolis had its operas and concerts from Easter to August. As good music was performed for the delight of the subjects of George III. as for the pleasure of the subjects of Queen Victoria. To read the diary of Thomas Moore, it would be thought the English public two-thirds of a century ago was as musically enlightened as in these days. When society migrated into the country, Birmingham and the three cathedrals held their musical celebrations as now. These were as enthusiastically and almost as numerously attended. The difference is that music until within a very brief period was a monopoly. There was a musical public thoroughly and learnedly instructed. Outside was black pitch, ignorance, and insensibility. Dinners and balls were needed to allure popular audiences in the shires. In London the public did not pretend to understand or sympathize. A crowded house to listen to the compositions of Herr Wagner now implies an enormous multitude as curious and as intelligent waiting for its turn and share afterwards. The thousands who hung absorbed last Wednesday upon M. Gounod's setting of the mysteries of Christianity represented a hundredfold the numbers which have been training themselves by musical habituation and practice to appreciate its merits. Imposters may be detected in abundance, as at all times, and in reference to all subjects, who repeat commonplaces of musical criticism while perceiving much less of their meaning than the Cambridge pretenders to familiarity with thermodynamics denounced by Mr G. H. Darwin. Enthusiasm for music is often affected when none is felt. At present the hypocrisy is at all events the homage rendered by the few to the musical taste of the many rather than the reverse. It is a mere accident of place and opportunity where music plants its standard and summons its votaries. In June it may be at Her Majesty's Theatre, with dogmas imported direct from Bayreuth to discipline the audience. In August Birmingham may be the locality, and the composer of Faust the mark for adoration. When the holiday is over and the echoes of the applause resound from a different quarter, neither London nor Birmingham closes its music-books and its ears. The musical sensation of the moment, it is apparent, comes hither, not to awaken untaught instincts, but to be judged as well as crowned by a population of educated students.

Indiscriminating and unmethodical as in some respects the British musical public may be, a musical public exists in much the same sense as a literary public exists. There are hundreds of thousands of Englishmen and Englishwomen for whom music has become a necessity. Commonly, when nature implants an appetite, or suffers it to grow, it develops in the same situation sources for its indulgence and satisfaction. With an active popular English taste for poetry there would be sure to be a school of English poets, as there are schools of English historians and orators. A peculiarity of the English taste for music is that, being capable of gratification from without, it has not in these latter days insisted upon forcing into vitality a commensurate school of native composition. Music speaks in a voice which has to a certain extent escaped the doom of Babel. While rejoicing in their musical debts to Dr Sullivan, or Mr Cowen, or Mr Villiers Stanford, English audiences are as prepared to be charmed by the inspirations of M. Gounod as if they had been fasting from music for years. Music, and plenty of music, the English nation must have; and it is ready to import it from every market. Its old treasures it counts over without ceasing. It continually insists upon supplementing them by novelties wherever they are to be acquired. They may be of various degrees of merit and of various dissimilar powers of fascination. Whatever their rank, the English musical public has a throng of hungering ears to fill, and they must be filled. Birmingham reckons among its historic glories that, before the kingdom at large was alive to the existence of a national musical faculty and its claims, it sat at the feet of Mendelssohn, and gave his Elijah to the world of sweet sound. By a fair right it was entitled to enjoy the first fruits of a work designed to stir the same class of emotions, though by ways and on principles of its own. Birmingham is to be congratulated that it has associated its name with what, it may be trusted, is a real addition to the musical possessions of the age. Lovers of music in general are to be congratulated infinitely more. Frequenters of the Birmingham Festival must, in any event, have had their curiosity gratified. A failure for bystanders is not without its compensations. For the musical public a failure by M. Gounod would have been more than the loss of an anticipated prize. An oratorio by a composer of that rank is no musical bubble which can, if its colours do not please, be simply let burst. Learning like his and force of character like his condemn even failures to a kind of involuntary immortality. They are of a bulk which does not permit musical mariners to pass over them without recognizing where they lie blocking up the entrance of channels and harbours. The master might have missed his mark, as has happened to masters before him. The world of art would have been the poorer by the waste of years of genius on an ineffectual experiment. Worse still, it would have been encumbered by a work it could neither have accepted nor forgotten. Some graceful theme or airy melody would have perpetually been floating up from the dark depths to remind posterity of the sunk hulk with its perplexing possibility of buried riches.

While it is too soon to pronounce for certain that a composition of the ambition and scope of The Redemption is a positive augmentation of musical wealth, it has at least excited a desire in its hearers to examine and analyse it. What are its intrinsic and individual characteristics and powers of touching the heart cannot be fully determined as yet. Its general tendency and class in the musical hierarchy are more easily seen. M. Gounod and Herr Wagner have very little in common. Both, however, agree in expecting from music at once more and less than their great predecessors demanded. Music was disembodied formerly, Bach, and Handel, and Mozart, and Beethoven might be inspired by occurrences outside them; their lofty creations were reared on no other foundation than the builder's sense of harmony and melody? he obeyed and expressed his own mood; the material words and plot to which he happened to attach it were the merest afterthought. The music of the present, as of the future, whether it be dramatic or epic, aims at commenting upon themes formally and deliberately compelling or praying its assistance to illustrate them. It has consented to be a servant that it may help to guide and govern where before it claimed to be independent, abiding by its own laws and flowering in accordance with none beside them. The disciple of Herr Wagner has to see and read as well as hear. Hearers of M. Gounod are invited to come with minds attuned to particular emotions and ideas to which The Redemption will give a brighter meaning, a more gracious significance. Herr Wagner bids the world listen and learn to think and feel as he acts the minstrel before it. M. Gounod asks his admirers to bring hearts and minds charged with pious awe and he will surround them with the atmosphere in which they can most fitly breathe. Herr Wagner requires a surrender. M. Gounod desires to co-operate and accompany. Each exacts an attendance of thoughts and feelings beyond those in which music was content once to lap itself. Music has been brought down from the realm in which it dwelt apart to be the companion and minister of the dramatist and poet. It is to be hoped that what it loses by ceasing to be its own sole interpreter other fields of art may gain in which it agrees to serve as interpreter for them. But that for itself there is some diminution in freedom and spontaneity it would be difficult to deny.—Times.

† With respect to this, we may mention that M. Jules Barbier has undertaken the task of touching-up Bouilly's text when requisite, and has even transformed all the prose into verse. We may add that a superb soprano air (unpublished), composed for Mdme Toddi, and agreeing admirably with the fine dramatic pages of the work, has been introduced into the re-modelled Deux Journées. We know, also, that M. Carvalho intends reviving the opera thus completed.

THE FEMININE IN MUSIC.

(From the "Musical Times.")

When noticing the production of Mrs Meadows White's cantata, The Passions, at Hereford, the correspondent of a daily contemporary touched upon an interesting question, which it may be worth while to discuss more fully. The writer clearly indicated an opinion that masculine genius has by no means exhausted the capacity of music, and never can do so, because what remains calls for feminine perception and expression. The assumption here is that, while music is the language of emotion, the emotion of woman is distinct, if not in degree, at least in character from that of man—that in the region of sentiment she perceives and feels things which elude him, or recognizes them in a peculiar light emanating from her own individuality. About this there is nothing that can be called purely speculative. All art work is personal to the worker, and, as no two artists see with the same eyes, the general result presents infinite points of difference. Sometimes those points are far asunder. Thus we have long been familiar with the classification which assigns to the music of certain composers a masculine character, and to that of others an approximation towards feminine traits. For this reason Porpora was called the "wife of Haydn," and Schubert is sometimes spoken of as a feminine Beethoven. Such phraseology, however, must be considered as figurative merely. Under no circumstances can the most womanish of men approximate save remotely to the individualism of the opposite sex, least of all within the domain of feeling. In this respect the man and the woman are as distinct as their physical organization makes them. There is no confounding the two. A recognition of the wide differences obtaining amongst men becomes, nevertheless, important to the present argument, because if such variations exist under conditions fundamentally the same, we may reasonably infer that much greater ones are discoverable on the other side of the gulf dividing the sexes. The curious thing is that, with regard to music, we neither know the extent nor the nature of those variations. Listen as we will, no sound crosses the gulf save faint echoes. Woman, as a creative musician, can hardly be said to exist.

This brings us face to face with one of the most remarkable phenomena connected with the psychology of art. In not a few vocations demanding the exercise of fancy, sentiment, and delicate expression, woman has gained the laurels due to successful creative effort. Mrs Hemans and Mrs Browning among poets; Angelica Kaufmann and Rosa Bonheur among painters; George Eliot, George Sand, and Charlotte Brontë among writers of fiction, to mention no others, hold a rank equal to that attained by all save the greatest men. Yet in the field of music these distinguished ladies can hardly be said to have colleagues. There woman does not originate, she only interprets or reproduces. The full extent of the truth of this appears, without the writer intending it, in a brochure entitled Woman as a Musician, the work of Mrs Fanny Raymond Ritter. So long as the American authoress deals with performers she has a right to pride in woman's achievements. She can speak of Catalani, Malibran, Devrient, Sontag, Patti, Lind, Nilsson, Néruda, Clara Schumann, Viardot-Garcia, and a host of others whose genius has shed lustre upon their sex and adorned their art. Beyond the range of executive work Mrs Ritter's position as the champion of musical woman becomes quite pathetic in its hopelessness. She is driven to all manner of assumptions and inferences, more or less unsupported, in order to obtain even a moderate show of facts upon which to base a conclusion. We are asked, for example, to accept as an impossibility that woman passed through certain periods in the development of civilization without giving voice to her emotions; while "as national and peasant folk-songs are traditionally said to have been nearly always composed by the persons who first sung them, and as women have always been their most zealous performers, it is only fair to suppose that they have also had something to do with their composition as well as with their poetry." Mrs Ritter continues in the same vein:—

"It would be unnatural to think that the beautiful lullabies and cradle-songs, of which hundreds exist in different languages and nationalities, were composed by martial barons, rough serving-men, or rougher peasants, and not by their wives or daughters. . . . And the melancholy life of the serf, watching her flocks on the green hills, or gathering wood for her hearth amid the implacable brambles, and the lonely lady of the castle, spinning or embroidering her cunning tapestries while she waited, sometimes for years, the return of father, husband, brother, lover—and then the anxious women of the fisher people—did they indeed endure their sorrows voicelessly? I cannot believe it; I have no doubt but that many of those simple, touching, heart-breaking melodies and poems were of women's creation."

All this may be interesting speculation, but it is worthless in an inquiry after hard facts; nor has Mrs Ritter much more firm ground to go upon when she emerges from the region of inference into that of record. She tells of the half-mythical Saint Cecilia and of Miriam, the prophetess, on whose behalf we are dared to say that her song of triumph was not her own composition. After this, with a mighty leap, the enthusiastic advocate brings us down to Josephine Lang, Fanny Hensel, Virginia Gabriel, and Elise Polko—of Mrs Meadows White and Mrs Bartholomew she does not seem to know anything. Having heard all that can be said by Mrs Ritter, there is no need to discuss further the question of woman's musical barrenness. A few gifted members of the sex have been more or less fortunate in their emulation of men, and that is all. Not a single great work can be traced to a feminine pen.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

Gounod's Redemption was introduced to London amateurs on Wednesday night under circumstances of fitting dignity. The composer's powerful name, the impressiveness and all-absorbing interest of his theme, and the prominence lately given to discussion of his work had the remarkable effect of filling the Albert Hall to its last seat. There could be no more imposing spectacle of the kind than that vast interior as then seen, and no more striking proof of genuine curiosity excited by an artistic occasion. M. Gounod may well take pride both in the scene and in the testimony—accepting them as a unique tribute to his genius. The performance, given by the Albert Hall Choral Society, under Mr Barnby's direction, had been carefully prepared; rehearsals, sectional and general, following each other to the limits of reasonable precaution. Imperative under any circumstances, this course was an obligation in a special sense, because the public had once been promised M. Gounod himself in the conductor's place, and it was felt that all possible atonement was due for the unavoidable loss of that supreme advantage. Mr Barnby thoroughly met the exigencies of the case, and gave to his ten thousand auditors a performance almost, if not quite, as good as that for which the composer made himself responsible at Birmingham. If the effect was less striking, no blame attaches to the executants. Music, of whatever kind, and however given, is necessarily heard at a disadvantage in the Albert Hall. It reaches the ear much as objects seen through the wrong end of an opera-glass reach the eye, and there is ever a feeling that the theme and its exponents are, so to speak, in the next county. We missed on Wednesday night, therefore, the sympathy that contiguity stirs up between performers and hearers, and also the effect which a full band and chorus make when majestic sonority thrills every nerve to its utmost tension. For the rest, there was nothing to complain of. Though its outlines were fainter and its colours paler than at Birmingham, the oratorio was revealed in the measure of perfectness which saves a composer from misrepresentation and an audience from being misled. It is pleasant to say this after some recent experiences, and to recognize in Mr Barnby a conductor who, not for the first time, has asserted the continued presence amongst us of an artistic conscience.

Three of the vocalists who sang at Birmingham took part in the Albert Hall performance, namely, Mdme Albani, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Santley. With these tried and experienced artists were associated Miss Santley, Mdme Fassett, and Mr Pyatt, upon whom devolved the task discharged at Birmingham by Mdme Marie Roze, Mdme Patey, and Mr King respectively. The cast was, on the whole, a strong one, and made more so by the arrangement which gave to Mr Santley the part of the bass Narrator, and to Mr Lloyd that of the Penitent Thief. Details are hardly called for with regard to the three vocalists first named. It will at once be taken for granted that nothing was left to desire. The very beautiful manner in which the solo, "From thy love as a father," was sung by Mdme Albani deserves, however, special mention. It so moved the audience that a regulation against applause—theretofore observed—was unanimously set aside. Mdme Fassett delivered the contralto solos weakly; but the services of Miss Santley and Mr Pyatt called for acknowledgment, as carrying efficiency into quite subordinate work. The chorus—always a good one—did better than usual with Gounod's music, and ran that at Birmingham very hard for supremacy in the more delicate and refined numbers. Objection might, perhaps, be raised to the singing of the chorale, "Forth the Royal banners go," as too measured and mechanical; but true dramatic expression was obvious in the mocking choruses of the priests and people, while the beautiful concerted music in the Third Part and the triumphal outburst, "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," were given in a style of which all concerned had a right to be proud. In short, the choral music was successful almost beyond precedent in the experience of London amateurs. Mr Barnby's orchestra proved worthy of his well-trained singers, playing the elaborate and delicately-tinted accompaniments with rare skill and effect. When we add that Mr Barnby conducted in his best manner there is nothing more to be said. As to the reception of the work by its multitudinous audience, we may assert, without misgiving, that it was sympathetic if not enthusiastic. The deep religious feeling of the oratorio as a whole, and the manifest beauty of many portions, made a deep impression. This was enough, since after so much the rest—that is to say, entire appreciation of a very remarkable and original artistic thing—will follow.—D. T.

WAIFS.

The house at Malvern said to have been purchased by Mdme Jenny Lind Goldschmidt is situated near Wynd's Point (at the foot of the Camp Hill, or Herefordshire Beacon), not, as was stated, at "Windsor" Point—no such point being within the range of the magnificent hills that separate Worcestershire from Herefordshire. —(A hint for Morris of the Malvern News.—Dr Blinge.)

The Teatro Español, Madrid, is lighted by electricity.

The old Société de Musique, Brussels, has been dissolved.

Galliera has written an opera, entitled Le ultime Ore di Richelieu.

Mdme Théo does not return from America to Paris till the Spring.

Manoury, the barytone, has been well received at the Théâtre des Arts, Rouen.

Anna Lankow is engaged as professor of singing at Scharwenka's Conservatory, Berlin.

A Choral Society, El Orfeon Mondoniense, has been established at Mondonedo, Spain.

Richard Wagner is said to be writing his Autobiography.—(Ominous?—Dr Blinge.)

The flautist, De Vroye, contemplates a tour this month and next in Holland and Germany.

Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet has been given in Mannheim as the first novelty of the season.

Peter Benoit will conduct a performance of some of his compositions at Angers this winter.

The Italian operatic season in Constantinople was opened with Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia.

Dvoràk's opera, Der Bauer ein Schelm, has been favourably received at the Theatre Royal, Dresden.

Mr Carl Rosa has returned from the continent, and will remain in London during the ensuing week.

Mdlle Novàk, a pupil of Mdme Marchesi's, has made her début at Florence as Norina in Don Pasquale.

Jehin-Prume is expected shortly to leave Canada for Paris, where he has been offered a musical appointment.

Gounod has declined having his oratorio, The Redemption, performed at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna.

The Temporary Theatre, a handsome wooden structure, Schwerin, was inaugurated with Wagner's Tannhäuser.

Etelka Gerster was announced to sing yesterday and to-day in the Winter Garden of the Central Hotel, Berlin.

Sophie Menter, the Amazon-pianist, will shortly fulfil a series of engagements in Germany, Holland, and Belgium.

Joseph Kotek, the violinist, has gone to Moscow, to play in a concert of the Imperial Russian Society of Music.

Negotiations for an engagement at the Grand Opera, Paris, are pending between Mad. Sembrich and M. Vaucorbeil.

The number of new students this year at the Conservatory, Valencia, is 123 of the male and 171 of the female sex.

Ponchielli's Gioconda has been given at the Teatro Comunale, Bologna, with the success invariably attending its performance in Italy.

Bimboni has completed an opera, Haidouk, ordered by the management of the Theatre Royal, Bucharest, where it will be played next season.

Mr Luke, late of St John's Episcopal Church, Edinburgh, is appointed organist and choirmaster of Weybridge Parish Church, Surrey.

Gustav Walter, Imperial Austrian Chamber-Singer, has announced a Schubert Cyclus of four evenings at the Börsendorf Rooms, Vienna.

A tablet in memory of the Court-Organist, Johann Schneider, who died in 1864, is to be affixed to the house in Dresden where he was born.

Varette Stepanoff, the pianist, will revisit Germany this year and take part in concerts at Wiesbaden, Halle, Dresden, Görlitz, and other places.

The tenor Nouvelli, having returned from Buenos Ayres, will shortly sing at the Teatro Comunale, Bologna, and then at the San Carlo, Naples.

Lauterbach, the violinist, will shortly give concerts in Nuremberg and Stuttgart, and play, among other things, a new Violin Concerto by Ignaz Brüll.

Johann Strauss, who has no children, has made a will in which he bequeathes 250,000 florins (£25,000) for the foundation of a Musical Institute.

Mr Bradley is appointed organist to St George's Church, Edinburgh, Mr Carl Hamilton continuing to conduct the choir, which now numbers twenty-four voices.

The casting of the bronze statue of Goldoni, modelled by Del Zotto, and weighing 1,500 kilogrammes, has been successfully accomplished at the Arquati foundry, Venice.

The first concert of the Brussels Conservatory will take place in December, the programme being devoted to Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," and J. S. Bach Weinachtscantata.

A new ballad, Roland's Horn, for vocal soloists, male chorus, and orchestra, by F. W. Markull, will shortly be given at a concert of the Leipsic Arion Society, and in January at Dantzic.

François Arnouts, professor of the violin in the Conservatory, Port Louis, is dead. Born at Antwerp on the 16th May, 1857, he was still in 1876 a student at the Conservatory, Brussels.

A new Quartet Society, consisting of MM. Colyns, Jeno Hubay, Van Stynvoort, and Joseph Servais, has been formed in Brussels, and will give its first concert about the end of the month.

Angelo Neumann has been selected by the Senate as manager of the Stadttheater, Bremen. His Nibelungen Company, which lately visited that city, opened on the 21st ult., in Berlin, with Rheingold.

The King of the Belgians has conferred the Cross of the Order of Leopold on M. Ed. Elkan, chairman of the Nouvelle Société de Musique, Brussels, and organizer of the Musical Festival there last August.

After attending the first Philharmonie Concert, Berlin, Anton Rubinstein left for Leipsic in order to direct the performance of his Maccabäer, which was to take place to-day, the 4th inst., at the Stadttheater.

The Quartet Society of Milan have offered one prize of 1,000 francs and another of 500 for the best two instrumental Trios (piano, violin, and violoncello). Competitors can send in their works up to the end of March.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society (U.S.) has announced its intention of giving, under the direction of Theodor Thomas, selections from the third act of Wagner's Parsifal. (What has Brooklyn done?—Dr Blinge.)

On the 22nd October Franz Liszt kept his 72nd birthday at Weimar amid great rejoicings, congratulations, and festivities, musical and otherwise.—(The "great old man"! May his shadow spread.—Dr Blinge.)

Mr Walter Macfarren's brilliant overture to King Henry V. was capitally played at the Covent Garden Promenade Concerts last week, the composer (who himself conducted) being re-called and warmly applauded at its conclusion.

Mozart's Don Juan has been performed at the Leipsic Stadttheater with a new version of the text by Grandaur, and a new stage arrangement by Wolzogen, the scenery being all painted expressly by Lütkemeyer, of Coburg. Mad. Prophaska, of the Theatre Royal, Dresden, was Donna Anna.

Miss Jessica O'Brien, the intelligent young vocalist, has been dangerously ill in Paris for the last seven weeks from a serious attack of the prevailing epidemic. She is now, we are happy to state, out of danger, and was able, on Saturday, to leave Paris for Dresden, for the purpose of resuming (with her sister Alice) her studies with Signor Lamperti, who has left Milan and taken up his residence in the Saxon capital.

Miss Dora Bright, a young pianist, pupil of Mr Walter Macfarren at the Royal Academy of Music, made a very successful début at the Promenade Concerts, Covent Garden, last week, playing on that occasion Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, as well as some elegant compositions by her master. On her second appearance at the same locale Miss Dora Bright rendered, with marked effect, Mr Walter Macfarren's Concertstück, and some characteristic pieces by Chopin.

"Out of Town is the comprehensive title of a set of eight humorous part-songs, for mixed voices, with optional accompaniment, composed by Walter Maynard, and published by Duncan Davison & Co., Regent Street. They all have a spice of the pastoral element, but are not so easy as to incur the risk of being despised by practised part-singers. No. 4, 'Beware of the Bull,' is a lively trifle, and another of the more taking numbers is 7, 'The Picnic,' descriptive of the opening of the hamper, the spreading of the banquet beneath the trees, and the incursion of wasps, the male voices imitating the buzz of the objectionable insect by repeating the word 'Zum.'"—Daily Chronicle.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

THE FEMININE IN MUSIC.

The reason why half the human race—and that half the one most susceptible to the impressions from which music springs and to which it gives birth—should be thus non-productive, offers a very interesting subject for investigation. Pursuing it, we first ask—Is woman incapable of taking high rank as a composer?—To reply in the affirmative demands more boldness and less regard for the force of analogical reasoning than we pretend to possess. The position of woman as an executant of the highest class—a position which distinctly implies a measure of independent creative power—her actual achievements in composition, as far as they go, and her prominence in connection with arts of a kindred nature, all forbid the belief that her natural musical endowments can carry their possessor no farther than she has gone. How, then, is the unused capacity to be developed? If there be in woman's nature a stored force upon which no demand has yet been made, how can we reach it and turn it to account? Mrs Ritter, unable to deny the raison d'être of the question, answers it thus:—

"But women have only lately realized the depth and strength of the science of music, and what long years of severe mental discipline and scientific training are necessary in order to master the art of composition. . . . Mathematics, acoustics, psychology, languages, as well as general literary acquirements, the practice and technicalities of several instruments, and the science of music, must all be mastered by the aspirant in composition, and gradually, through the application and assimilation of long years of study, become the 'second nature' of his mind. . . . And why should not women of sufficient intellectual and especial ability to warrant the possibility of their attaining honourable distinction make an effort, and, discarding the absurd idea that composition is an affair of instinct, study to compose for immortality also? There is surely a feminine side of composition, as of every other art. And I would suggest the adoption of the science of composition as an elective, if not obligatory, branch of the higher course of study in ladies' colleges."

Mrs Ritter clearly holds the opinion that composers, unlike poets, are made, not born; but it will prove unfortunate for woman's aspirations after higher musical honours if the advice of the American authoress be taken. Admitting that great composers are the outcome of long years of study devoted to mathematics, acoustics, psychology, and all the rest of it, then the "weaker sex" have little chance against men. Happily, the facts are not as Mrs Ritter puts them. A man, or woman, may be a great composer without crossing the pons asinorum, or making the smallest acquaintance with the "ologies." All knowledge is good, truly, and worthy to be desired; but the greatest masters of music contrived to do with singularly little, outside the range of their own art. Wherefore, let the pernicious theory that ladies' colleges can manufacture lady composers be put aside once and for all. The musical instinct—apart from which musical studies are no more useful than clothes on a skeleton—comes as a gift of God. It is a fire no man can kindle; and the function of the teacher with regard to it is simply that of direction and control.

Curiously enough, one short sentence in the extract from Mrs Ritter's pamphlet, given above, touches the root of the matter, though the writer does not seem to have perceived it. "There is surely a feminine side of composition, as of every other art." Thus our authoress exclaims, and we agree with her; further, we strongly incline to believe that woman has failed as a creative musician because she has approached composition from the masculine side. Taught by men, looking at models fashioned by men, and always emulous of the art-work which men have produced, there is more than a possibility that her energies have been misdirected. In the analogous art of poetry the case is different. Poetic utterance is more spontaneous, less elaborate, and nothing like so heavily weighted with scientific incumbrance. Here the master with his rules and the classic with its commanding influence have less scope, the result being that feminine poetry has a distinct existence. There are passages in it which no man would think of writing, and could not write if he would. Take, as example, Mrs Browning's description of a sleeping infant, in which occur these lines:—

"There he lay upon his back,
The yearling creature, warm and moist with life
To the bottom of his dimples—to the ends
Of the lovely tumbled curls about his face;
For since he had been covered overmuch,
To keep him from the light-glare, both his cheeks
Were hot, and scarlet as the first live rose
The Shepherd's heart-blood ebb'd away into
The faster for his love. And love was here.
An instant, and the pretty baby mouth
Shut close, as if for dreaming that it suck'd;
The little naked feet, drawn up the way
Of nestling birdlings: everything so soft
And tender—to the little hold-fast hands,
Which, closing on a finger into sleep,
Had kept the mould of't."

This exquisite sketch is true feminine poetry, only possible to a woman. Surely female musicians might attain a corresponding distinctiveness by approaching their art as women and not as men.

"The distinctions" (says M. Scudo, in his essay on Teresa Milanollo), "which nature has established between the two sexes should display themselves in works of art, which are but the manifestation of the harmonies of creation. A woman who, when taking a pencil, pen, or music-sheet, forgets what are the character and the obligations of her sex is a monster who excites disgust and repulsion. For one or two who succeed in gaining a masculine celebrity which robs them of the mystery of grace and enchantment that forms their appanage, there are thousands who remain mutilated and become objects of general scoffing. They are neither men nor women, but something which has no name and no part in life. . . . . No one debars the woman from enlightening her spirit and purifying her heart by solid instruction and by the culture of arts which open up infinite horizons, provided she remains within the limits God has imposed upon her. . . . A singer, an actress, a painter, a pianiste, ought to carry into the art they profess the distinctive qualities of their sex. Forgetfulness of this fundamental rule not only wounds decency, which is their prestige, but troubles the economy of God's work. In the human duality, the woman expresses the eternal sentiments of the soul, and her heart is a fountain full of tenderness and poetry. If she abandon the sweet empire of grace to look to other destinies . . . . . she disturbs the equilibrium of life, and her fall is inevitable."

Underlying these vehement and, no doubt, exaggerated utterances, is much pertinent truth, which may be summed up in the axiom—The woman artist should always regard her art from a woman's point of view. Were this done distinctiveness would follow. The result may not compare with the works of men for strength and comprehensiveness, but that is neither necessary nor desired. What we regard as both necessary and desirable, is the emancipation of woman within her own musical domain. It goes beyond reason to imagine that she has nothing to say there, and no power of speech. A witty French writer once remarked that whenever he climbed a difficult hill, he always found a woman on the summit before him, but she could never tell how she got up. The only thing certain was, that had she started with him, in his fashion, he would have left her far behind. It will be of good augury for the sex and for music when some pioneer woman arises, who, having mastered the power of musical expression, consults her own nature and not the productions of men, when determining what to say and how to speak.

[A subject worth still further discussion.—Dr Bridge.]

THE SACRED HARMONIC LIBRARY.—"P. B." writes to us,—"You commented in The Times of Saturday on the news that the Hamilton MSS. had gone to Berlin. May I, while there is yet time, direct attention to the fact that another valuable collection, the celebrated library of the Sacred Harmonic Society, may not improbably be sent out of this country? The Sacred Harmonic Library contains the finest collection extant of madrigals by the English writers of the 16th and 17th centuries, besides a large assemblage of old English operas, of ecclesiastical music, and of early specimens of type music printing, together with the Cooke Library, and MSS. by Haydn, Purcell, Mendelssohn, Blow, Croft, Green, Boyce, Arne, and others. The society, it is said, do not wish to divide this almost unique library; while the British Museum authorities will not purchase it in its entirety. The consequence is that if certain present negotiations fail, the famous Sacred Harmonic collection may after all be sold to a Musical Society in Boston, United States, for the comparatively trifling sum of a little over £3,000. I may add that my information is derived from a leading member of the committee, who would doubtless consent to a sacrifice if there should be any chance of retaining the library intact in this country.—Times.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

There is yet another side to be looked at. Truth is like a cut crystal ball. If we look too long at one facet we forget that there may be others; we are blinded by the brilliance of the one flashing side, and when we turn away we see nothing but a dark spot, and cannot see the many other sides. But if we turn the ball round about, look at each facet in turn, we realize the perfection of its form, and of its rainbow colours. So is music. Of its many sides we have looked at those of tonal form, of rhythmic form, and poetical idea, but there is yet one more towards which we may turn before quitting the subject of musical form.

What is the meaning of sacred music? What is the difference between sacred and secular music? For hitherto we have placed sacred and secular music side by side in this account of musical forms, and have described operas and oratorios as of the same form. And justly so, for the Scarlatti form is as appropriate to the sacred song "He was despised" as to the secular "Revenge, Timotheus cries," and the sonata form to the chorus in St Paul as to the songs of Ilia and the Queen of Night. In style, too, the two kinds are similar, though with some exceptions. Purcell and Gluck wrote secular music in the diatonic style that we associate with Handel's sacred music, and the Italians of later times write for their religious services in the same florid style as for their operas. No, the real difference between sacred and secular music is deeper than outward forms. Let us look at the original purpose of the oratorio, and that will give us the key to the whole matter. It was a service in a church,—whether in the mysteries and miracle plays of the dark ages, or at the oratory of S. Filippo Neri, or at the Lutheran churches. The same purpose is now revived in our own use of the oratorio in cathedrals and churches, and the services of song in places of smaller capabilities.

Granting, then, that an oratorio is a service, let us see what a service is, and how an oratorio corresponds with it. A service in its completest form combines instruction, praise, and prayer; and by the force of the example of devoted actions draws forth the devotional thoughts of those present. For instance, in the Christmas-tide and Easter-tide services we have the example laid before us of the active devotion of God who became man, and rose from the dead for the sake of men, to shew them what a man's life and resurrection might be. The canticles and prayers are the devotional thoughts that should be drawn from the hearers by the telling of that story.

The bent of an oratorio corresponds exactly to this. In the Messiah we have the great example held up before us, the story of which is so well known that little needs to be told, save by the sequence of the meditation of praise and prayer that is built upon it. In Elijah there is the life-devotion of the great prophet told, and the wonders wrought by God; and the passages of praise and prayer in meditation on the subject. In the Bach Passion music there is the example of the Passion story, and the meditation of praise and prayer by chorus or congregation.

Now we come closer to the distinction between sacred and secular music. A service must be true, whether it is a life service of active deeds, or a meditative service of good thoughts and resolutions; if it is not true, it is hypocrisy and a bitter sin. So it must be in sacred music. As romance gathers its beauty from its likeness to life, and history from its actual life; so also secular music must be like truth, while sacred music gains its greatest beauty from its actual truth. This must rise from deep within the composer's heart, and a subtle thread will come from his sacred music and connect itself with his audience, making them feel that he is speaking the truth, and not merely telling a beautiful romance that is very like truth. I would even dare to say that no composer writing sacred music will touch his hearers' hearts unless he writes from his own, and says what he believes or longs to be true. He may set sacred words to music, make theatrical scenes out of Bible narratives, and he may write music for a religious service, but if he is without religious hopes or longings the whole thing is a lie of the worst kind, a lie to God, and the music will fall as short of its aim as a sermon from a Mohammedan in praise of the Lord Christ.

When we listen to the last chorus in the Passion music we know that Bach is telling us his thoughts of the Saviour's rest in the garden after the pains and agonies that are now past, and that he feels those agonies and that rest to be as real as if he had actually witnessed them; and the very reality of the man's thoughts gives them a strength of emotion that carries the music straight into our own hearts, and makes us feel it almost as much as he did himself. When we listen to "I know that my Redeemer liveth" we feel that Handel is saying what he knows and feels to be a fact, and that he himself hopes for that Redeemer's help. When we hear Mozart's Requiem we think with a man to whom the terrors of the Dies Iræ were a reality, and the comforts of the Agnus Dei equally real. Mendelssohn's "Lift thine eyes" speaks to us of a man of whom his letters seem to tell us that whatever he did, he did as to God, and our hearts are touched by thoughts and music as they only can be by sympathy with reality. Those who were present in Westminster Abbey, on an occasion a few years ago, will not have forgotten the eloquent sermon in music that was preached, when all that was mortal of the preacher was resting, covered with loving flowers, before the altar on the way to its last home; and the highest and most touching eloquence was in the fact that the preacher meant what he said, "God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him, must worship Him in spirit and in truth."

To my master, G. A. Macfarren, whose wisdom and experience has been as the great hill out of which the little spring of my own knowledge has risen, and whose unvarying kindness and help have enabled me to write the foregoing series of papers on Form or Design in Music, I dedicate them.

OLIVERIA PRESCOTT.

April 10th, 1882.

A REMONSTRANCE.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—In a republication of Bach's organ works, now progressing at intervals, the second book is accompanied by an editorial comment. Thus, one fugue is commended as being "a great favourite of Mendelssohn," another invites consideration as being a "giant's fugue," a third is vouched for as being "exceedingly effective," while "a convenient and effective mode of performance is everywhere indicated." What is now to be feared is that the next number may contain one of Bach's "preludes," approved by one editor, while the "fugue" passes muster with the other. Surely this is not the way to approach the works of a great master?—I am, sir, yours obediently, SOLOMON PIPES.

Not having seen the "republication" in question, we know nothing about it, and can only ask, who shall decide when organists disagree?—D. T.

TRINITY COLLEGE, LONDON.—The inaugural address of the Session was delivered to the musical students by the Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt, Mus.B., F.R.A.S., Warden of the College, after the prizes had been distributed to the successful candidates. He said the gathering was a cheering evidence of the rapid spread in this country of an earnest devotion to musical culture. Amongst them there were some who had but newly entered on the pursuit of this divine art with the ardour of a first love, and, perhaps, too, with the headstrong impatience which often characterizes youthful passion; whilst there were many more who had gone beyond this early phase of their attachment, and had discovered that the Goddess was not easily wooed and won. It might be that a little of their self-confidence had been drilled out of them by the salutary discipline of months and years of drudgery, relieved by the occasional excitement of competitive trials of skill. The Warden then proceeded to deal with the value, educational and otherwise, of examinations. Systems of examinations or public tests, he showed, had been in vogue in some form or other from the earliest times, and in the case of music they could be traced back to the infancy of the art itself. After a glance at the life and progress of Mendelssohn, the speaker proceeded to deal with the question of musical study in several spheres. Summing up his arguments, he concluded by saying:—The germ of the examination system has existed from the earliest times. The need of a disinterested judgment has always been, and must continue to be felt by those who desire to know the truth concerning themselves or the claims of others; the interest of every art demands that those who profess to teach should be tested and guaranteed—the principle of honest dealing between man and man, and that the public ought to be protected against quackery. Having regard to responsibilities, examining bodies are bound to make their tests practically useful, and entirely free from the intrusion of idiosyncrasies.

SCRAPS FROM PARIS.

At the Grand Opera, Mdme Krauss selected the part of Marguerite in Ch. Gounod's Faust for her re-appearance after her holiday. There was a crowded house, who gave her a most hearty welcome. Then came the turn of Aida and Le Tribut de Zamora, in both of which she was much applauded. Speaking of Aida, there has been a new Amnéris, Mdme Engally, formerly of the Opéra-Comique and the defunct Théâtre-Lyrique. On the first night she was somewhat exaggerated both vocally and histrionically. But this was probably the result of nervousness. At her second appearance she was more mistress of her powers, and consequently more competent to do justice to the part and to herself. She had every reason to congratulate herself on the result. After a career of nearly twenty years—he made his first appearance there on the 20th March, 1863—Villaret has retired from the Opera. He took his leave as Eléazar in La Juive, Mdme Krauss being the Rachel. Since he has belonged to what is here termed "the first lyric theatre in the world," Villaret has sung the part of Arnold in Guillaume Tell—the part he chose for his début—130 times; he has sung 203 times in Les Huguenots; 144 in La Juive; 123 in L'Africaine; 106 in Le Prophète; 88 in La Muette de Portici; 46 in Don Juan; 44 in Il Trovatore; 39 in Robert; 19 in La Reine de Chypre; 15 in Alceste; 14 in Der Freischütz; 12 in La Favorite; and 11 in Les Vêpres Siciliennes; making a grand total of 1,051 performances, exclusive of his "farewell nights." It is worthy of remark that during all the twenty years he was before the public he never "created"—in other words, never was the original representative of—a single character.—The rehearsals of M. Camille Saint-Saëns' Henri VIII. are being energetically carried on, and the work will probably be produced in January. The new ballet also, by MM. Th. Dubois, Gille, Mortier, and Mérante, is in active preparation.—There has been some talk of Mdme Sembrich's appearing at the "Palais Garnier" in Hamlet, after she shall have concluded her St Petersburgh engagement, but as yet nothing has been decided positively, or rather the chances are that the talk will not be realized.

Affairs are in a prosperous condition at the Opéra-Comique. Mdlle Marie Vanzandt has returned, and is more popular than ever. It was reported that she would shortly leave M. Carvalho. Such is not the case. At the termination of her Monte Carlo engagement she will return for the production of M. Léo Delibes' Lackmé, which she is now rehearsing, and in which she will again sing here during the winter 1883-4, after having introduced it to the public of St. Petersburgh on her visit to that capital in the autumn. Another strong attraction, alternating with Mignon, at this now popular theatre continues to be Ch. Gounod's Roméo et Juliette, with Mdlle Isaac and M. Talazac as the pair of ill-starred lovers. Two promising young recruits have been added to the company. They are Mdlle Frandin and M. Labis, who made their first appearance in Les Dragons de Villars. The young lady perfectly justified the reputation which had preceded her from Cairo, where she was a great favourite. M. Labis, who played Sergeant Bellamy, comes direct from the Conservatory, and vocally, as well as histrionically, promises to make his mark.—With a view of increasing still more the effectiveness of the orchestra under M. Danbé, M. Carvalho has addressed to the proper authority—the Minister of Fine Arts—a request that he may be allowed to cut off twelve orchestra stalls and add the space thus gained to the orchestra, so that he may reinforce the latter by a double string quartet, which would bring his first violins up to a maximum of fourteen on grand nights, and a minimum of twelve on ordinary occasions.

By his latest work, Le Cœur et la Main, produced at the Nouveautés-Brasseur, Ch. Lecocq has added another success to the long list of those previously achieved by him. The book, in three acts, supplied by those practised writers, MM. Nuitter and Beaumont, is amusing. The story is something to the following effect:—Micaëla, daughter of the King of Aragon, is about to be married to Prince Gaëtan, the son of another King, reigning over some neighbouring portion of the Iberian peninsula. Not that Gaëtan loves the Princess; he weds her simply in conformity with his father's commands. But he gives her his "hand" alone; his "heart" he has bestowed on a young peasant girl, Josefa. When he learns that Josefa is the Princess disguised, the reader will scarcely require to be told that Prince Gaëtan is only too delighted to bestow on his betrothed not only his "hand," as he first intended, but his "heart" as well. Hence the title: Le Cœur et la Main. The music is delicate, graceful, and in the composer's best style. It would occupy too much space to give a list of all the telling numbers in the score, but here are a few:—A chorus: "C'est sous les Gardes du Palais;" a rondo: "Ah, que de mal on a;" the air: "Ma fille, c'est un Mari," and the finale of the first act. In the second, we have the opening chorus; the "Chanson du Casque," which hit the house hard, and, to all appearance, is destined to become very popular; and a delicious Bolero, admirably sung by Mdme Vaillant-Couturier. The best things in the third act are a romance: "Ah! j'enviais les hirondelles;" Gaëtan's air: "Depuis notre Hymen;" and the finale. Mdme Vaillant-Couturier, who carried off, two or three years since, the first prize for singing at the Conservatory, made her début before a Parisian public as the Princess, and scored a great success. The other leading characters were well sustained by Mdmes Elise Clary, Felcourt, MM. Berthelier, Vauthier, and E. Montaubry.

Another successful novelty is the comic opera, in 3 acts and 4 tableaux, entitled Fanfan la Tulipe, with book by MM. Paul Ferrier and Jules Prével, music by M. Varney. The hero, Fanfan, is a wonderful creature: a dragoon of the period of Louis XVI., occupied invariably in a double career of gallantry; at one moment performing the most marvellous feats of bravery, and at another subduing female hearts in the easiest and most captivating manner. The music, though not equal to that of Les Mousquetaires au Couvent by the same composer, is well adapted to the libretto. It is full of sparkle and dash, and will apparently long retain its place in the bills. The seductive dragoon was played by M. Bouvin, a young barytone from the provinces, who at once made his mark. The other artists included in the cast were Mdmes Simon-Girard, Faivre, Vernon, MM. Simon-Max, Gobin, and Darman, all of whom acquitted themselves admirably, and, like M. Bouvin, were loudly applauded.

Another success is that achieved at the Théâtre de la Renaissance by the latest buffo opera due to the pen of M. Emile Jonas, and called La Bonne Aventure. The principal figures in the libretto, provided by MM. de Najac and Bocage, are Fabio, a toreador; Gambardillo, the chief of the police; Ramires and Rocador; Bianca, a danseuse; Beppa, her aunt, a gipsy and fortune teller; and Carmen, the niece of a smuggler; all of whom, after passing through the series of absurd—not to say, impossible—adventures usual in pieces of this description, are finally rewarded respectfully according to the code of poetical justice also usual in such productions. The music must be reckoned as among the best the composer has written. It is light, graceful, and full of melody. Mdlle Landau was a fascinating Bianca; Mdlle Milly Meyer, a clever Carmen; and Mdme Desclauzas, an incomparable Beppa. They were well supported by their colleagues of the rougher sex.

M. Pasdeloup's Concerts Populaires; M. Colonne's Concerts du Châtelet; and those of the Société of Nouveaux Concerts, directed by M. Ch. Lamoureux at the Théâtre du Château-d'Eau, are in full swing. The prelude to Wagner's Parsifal has already been played at all of them.

Mdme Tastet, Félicien David's residuary legatee, has presented the lamented composer's violin to the Museum of the Conservatory. It is enclosed in a case, with two bows used by him as violinist and conductor. Several other valuable and curious presents have been received from various donors, so that the collection is becoming more and more interesting every day.—Mdme Pauline Lucca has been studying the part of the heroine in Auber's Ambassadrice with Mdme Pauline Viardot, but left some time since for Vienna. Mdlle Emma Nevada is studying under M. Ambroise Thomas himself, Mignon and Ophelia. She will sing these characters in Italian next month at the Royal Opera-house, Berlin, but the other artists will sing in German. "This abnormal arrangement," observes the Ménestrel, "is not unusual in Germany, Denmark, and Poland. At Warsaw lately, Mdlle Lealino sang in French and the other members of the company in Italian, an order of things reversed in Brussels, where Mdme Adelina Patti sang in Italian and the rest in French."

Wagner's Meistersinger was recently produced, for the first time, at the Stadttheater, Cologne, the occasion being the benefit of the conductor, Mühldörfer.

BERLIN.

(Special Correspondence.)

The first "cycle" of Nibelung Performances by Angelo Neumann's peripatetic company brought crowded houses to the Wilhelmstädtisches Theater, and the second is progressing under equally favourable auspices. Nevertheless, you should hear outside opinions.—The annual report, from the 1st October, 1881, to the same date in the present year, on the musical educational establishments connected with the Royal Academy of Fine Arts contains, with reference to the Royal High School of Music, the following facts: 1. The Section for Composition, the professional staff of which includes Eduard Grell, Wilhelm Taubert, Friedrich Kiel, and Woldemar Bargiel, was attended by 25 students. 2. The Section for Practical Music, at the head of which is Joseph Joachim, possesses a professorial staff of 35 regular members (male and female) and 2 assistants. In the winter session three certificates of proficiency were awarded—one to a female student for the violin, one to a male student for the organ, and one to another male student for the pianoforte. There were 3 public and 12 private concerts. The number of students was 262, to whom must be added 18 attending the Choral School. 3. The Institute for Sacred Music, with A. Haupt, Jul. Schneider, A. Löschhorn, and J. W. Ressel as professors, was attended by 16 students.—The work performed at the first of the three Singakademie Subscription Concerts was Martin Blumner's oratorio, Der Fall Jerusalems, which went off very satisfactorily.—The first Subscription Concert at the Philharmonie, under the direction of Dr Wüllner, Royal Saxon Capellmeister from Dresden, was a success, promising well for the future. The programme included Overture, Leonore, No. III., Beethoven; Pianoforte Concerto, G major, Rubinstein; Prelude to Parsifal, Wagner; "Hungarian Fantasia for Pianoforte and Orchestra," Liszt; and Symphony, C major, Schumann. Sophie Menter, who never played better, was the pianist.—The Quartet Association, consisting of Kotek, Exner, Moser, and Decbert, inaugurated their season on the 27th ult., Kruser, however, obligingly taking the place of Moser, who had hurt his arm. Raff's Quartet in D minor, Op. 77, a novelty here, headed the programme, which ended with Beethoven's Quartet in E flat, Op. 74. The vocalist was Mdlle Augusta Hohenschild, who sang the "Laudamus," with obbligato violin accompaniment, from J. S. Bach's Mass in B minor; Romance, No. 8, from Johannes Brahms' Magelone; a Song by C. M. von Weber, and one by Zuccalmaglio.

Advice to those Studying Music.*

By ROBERT SCHUMANN.

Love your instrument, but do not look upon it with conceit, as the only one, or superior to, any other. Think that there are many others producing the same beautiful effects; remember that there are singers, choristers, orchestras, all called upon to interpret that which is most sublime in music.

If you compose, meditate, arrange, and adjust all in your head; never play anything on the piano before having it well established in your mind. If the music proceeds from an inward sentiment, if you feel it, it will be sure to make an impression upon others. Some one has said that a good musician, upon hearing an orchestral piece for the first time, no matter how complicated it may be, should be able to see the score as it were in his mind's eye. This is the greatest perfection imaginable.

It is necessary that you not only know how to play your pieces, but also to read them without the piano; so that your imagination may become cultivated to an extent so as to enable you to keep in mind the harmony of a melody, as well as the melody itself.

Work and perseverance will assist one more and more in elevating oneself.

Rest frequently from your musical studies, reading the best poets.

Often walk in the open country and in the fields.

Never miss an occasion of practising the organ: there is no better instrument to correct the errors of a bad musical education.

Respect the antique, but interest yourself warmly in all that is modern.

Do not be prejudiced against any name because unknown to fame.

In art, nothing great is accomplished without enthusiasm.

Listen with the greatest attention to the national airs; they possess an inexhaustible mine in which are the most beautiful melodies, and that gives one an idea of the different nations.

In judging compositions first distinguish if they are artistic, or if the only object is to amuse amateurs; defend the former, but do not irritate yourself about the latter.

The study of music and practice of the masterworks of different epochs will teach you to avoid vanity and presumption.

Begin early to make yourself acquainted with the human voice and its four principal registers.

Study it especially in choruses; examine in what intervals its strongest power is placed, and in what others it is necessary to seek the effects of sweet and tender expression.

Never neglect hearing good works.

ANCIENT WELSH MUSIC.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—The age of the many beautiful Welsh melodies, made familiar to us through the research, taste, and skill of Mr John Thomas (Pencerdd Gwalia), Mr Brinley Richards, and other musical professors of Cambrian origin residing amongst us, is a problem, deemed by many, not altogether unworthy of attention. The letter in last week's Musical World, by Fluellen, without throwing the least light upon the subject, is calculated rather to lower its importance, for, if not written in jest, it shows the writer to be so utterly innocent of history, logic, and grammar as to render interference on his part perilous to the controversy. Passing by such inconsequent observations without further comment, I would venture to make a suggestion to the earnest enquirer. It may be taken for granted that the age of a national tune cannot be conjectured, much less fixed, by the date assigned to any print or manuscript upon which it may be found. The melody, in some form or other, might have been in use for ages, and handed down the generations solely by oral tradition; each succeeding generation learning it without the help of artificial signs denoting the relative pitch of the consecutive sounds, and the rhythm of their motion. Mr Brinley Richards is reported to have said recently at Swansea, in "making a formal recantation of the errors as to the age of Welsh music," that the Welsh had no musical notation in the eleventh century. Granted. But that does not prove that some of the tunes now heard were at that remote period unknown. Words were spoken before written, and songs were sung before the scale was invented; musical characters did not precede melody, but followed in due course, not as the master, but as the servant of sounds prompted by the tuneful heart of man. Is it likely that the emotional Celt, least of all, would wait the birth of musical science to enable him to express vocally the joy and sorrow, the love and hate that kindle and burn within his impassioned breast? Besides, may not the very tunes, which Mr Brinley Richards reckons comparatively modern, contain, at least, germs which were vocal utterances in ages past? Are not national tunes peculiarly subject to the law of evolution? From a mere germ of musical life, the perfected people's song, in fulness of time, might become evolved. Moreover, it is suggested by the late Darwin, and not without some degree of probability, that simple vocal sounds were the primary means of communication between man and man—that men sang, in some form or other, to express their feelings and affections before the artifice of words was discovered and adopted. I will not, however, be so presumptuous as to follow, even in imagination, the lead of the ever-to-be-renowned philosopher by enquiring whether the tonal inflections of the speechless progenitors of the Celts contained germs of those melodies of Gambria that have for ages charmed all lovers of national music.—I am, sir, yours, &c.,

MOSCOW.

(Correspondence.)

A diabolical attempt, happily frustrated, was made a short time since to blow up the Bolschoj Teatr, or Grand Imperial Theatre. During rehearsal, a man made his way unperceived into the cellars of the building, and there deposited a number of rocket-shaped cases filled with dynamite, intending, doubtless, to explode them at night. As good luck would have it, they were discovered in time, but the police have not been able to arrest the would-be wholesale assassin, who still remains unknown. The Theatres have been empty ever since. Had the attempt been successfully carried out, not only the Bolschoj Teatr would have been destroyed, but, in all probability, a great number of the surrounding houses.

DUDLEY GALLERY.

Though it be difficult, in these sensational days, for unpretending art to catch the eye and entertain the public mind, the exhibition of cabinet pictures in oil, now on view at the Egyptian Hall, will certainly not be passed by with unconcern. There may not be many works in the collection which make demands upon rapturous admiration, yet there surely are some which successfully woo attentive and respectful regard, whilst the general effect is decidedly satisfactory. The visitor will not find any single, or any set of pictures, standing out so prominently in force and splendour as to eclipse the rest. The humble is not made to appear the poorer by being placed alongside the noble, nor the low of stature to be further dwarfed by being thrust into the shadow of the giant, but throughout the gallery a certain uniformity of importance in the pictorial representations is maintained; a kind of art-republic is ordered, which seems, in its way, to present an image of that state of things which advanced political talkers clamour for, under the name of Socialism or Communism. There certainly is no art-king in the Piccadilly gallery. It must not be thought, however, that variety in subject and treatment is wanting. A comparative equality of merit does not necessarily lead to a corresponding sameness of style, or monotony of theme. Is there not even a closer affinity seen in the works of different men of genius than in the productions of ordinary mortals? Genius has many roads, but one goal. At any rate, if destitute of original grandeur, the pictures in the Dudley Gallery assert a measure of individuality in their authors. Perhaps Mr W. G. Wetherbee cannot be selected as an exhibitor of distinctive character, for "Homeward on the Hurrying Tide" (No. 18) seems indebted to some extent to the Dutch painter, Israels, for the gloomy effect of clouds rolling to the shore with the evening tide. There is some degree of pathos in the representation of the two women hurrying homewards through the on-coming waters, which would have been still more impressive had the artist drawn the head of the elder in a less rigid position. Mr Stuart Lloyd, in "Our Garden" (No. 23), gives a peep of just such a delightful spot as Londoners only dream about, but which, happily, is not uncommon in out-of-the-way nooks, where well-to-do Englishmen retreat. "The Curfew Tower, Windsor" (No. 34), by Alfred de Breanski, is a pleasant work, none the less meritorious for showing a similarity of handling the brush to that in No. 5, by a gentleman with the same patronymic. Trees, meadows, and cattle, with an overhanging summer sky, are the constituent materials of the agreeable picture by Mr Frank Walton, "Ankle-deep in English Grass" (No. 49). Mr Cotman is to be congratulated upon his successful treatment of "A Village Smith" (No. 66), a subject by no means new. Of all smiths, the musical one at the forge is undoubtedly the most popular. Does not every passer-by stop to listen to his beat and roar? And do not limners, musicians, and even poets condescendingly go out of their way to celebrate him and his doings? Mr Cotman evidently has gazed at, if not lived in, the smithy until the hammer, anvil, vice, pincers, and bellows have become as familiar as palette and easel. The figure is drawn and painted with force and care. The muscles of the arm, to the rolled up sleeve, stand out in knots, as the red hot metal flattens, turns and twists just as the workman wills. A harmony of tone pervades the whole; but perhaps the colour is somewhat cold for a smithy. Just a little of the ruddy glow from the near fire would have spread that warmth previous artists, in depicting the scene, have taught us to expect. Mr Joseph Knight gives pleasant delineations of pastoral scenery in "Summer Time" (No. 74), and "With verdure clad" (No. 85); while Mr Macallum sets forth the delight of boys sporting in the briny element upon "A Summer's holiday" (No. 80). Mr J. Watson Nicol sends a "Finished sketch" (No. 150) of great excellence. An Irishman, boasting descent from antediluvian times, stretches his hulking limbs on a chair, in meditation upon wrongs inflicted upon his country and himself. Judging from the condition of the cabin, there is really something or other rotten in the state, which he is thinking required a more inflammable substance than tobacco, burning in the pipe, to displace. Mr James E. Christie finds a capital opportunity of manifesting ability as draughtsman and humourist in "A Bachelor" (No. 108). But is there enough evidence of bachelorhood in the fact of reading a newspaper? The man might be, for all that, the veritable Benedick reading the announcement of his wedding. Had a book now instead been placed in his hands, one then might surmise that the reader was free from cares of wedded life, for married men rarely have time and quiet for other reading than the ubiquitous daily journal. Mr C. Napier Hemy enriches the collection by coast pictures, "Rowing for the Port" (No. 161), and "The Morning Catch" (No. 176), two contributions of remarkable merit. Mr Edwin Ellis, in a like scene, "Whitby" (No. 233), shows grasp of equal strength, without, alas! the finish of the former. Mr Clausen's "Peasant Girl" (No. 166) some may think to be the finest work in the room. How free it is from trick or affectation! In drawing, modelling, and colour it is as honest and healthy as the country maiden, looking out of the canvas with eyes untroubled by care or passion. Few will pass No. 239 without expressing approval, for Mr Howard Helmick, in "The Contented Mind," gives another proof of the rare capacity he possesses for blending humour with pathos. The old man, with cheeks that indicate hunger to be no stranger, is toasting a herring, the odour of which makes his pinched-up nostrils to dilate, and sends anticipatory joys to organs not too often exercised upon such a dainty. Neither will Mr G. W. Barrable's admirable contribution, "Paresseux" (No. 285), escape observation. Indeed, a lengthened perusal will repay the visitor; for the finely formed girl, reclining on a marble seat, is drawn with delicate skill, and posed with free, yet modest grace. Mr Haynes King is represented by only one, and that a small canvas, but "The Mussel Gatherer" (No. 338) is of sufficient value to emphasize the acknowledged merits of this widely-known artist. Further notice of many excellent works in the collection must be postponed to a future opportunity.

WHAT THE WAVES SAID.*

Upon the sad sea-shore
A lonely maiden sighs:
His ship returns no more,
And love that lingers dies.
"O cruel, cruel sea,
To take my love from me."
Amid her falling tears,
She hears the wild waves say:
Through weary waiting years
True love will watch and pray.

Upon the glad sea-shore,
When years have come and gone,
The maiden weeps no more;
She sings, but not alone:
"O kindly, kindly sea,
That brings my love to me."
His ship once more appears;
Two hearts are joined for aye;
Through weary, waiting years
She learned to watch and pray.

Massenet's opera, Le Roi de Lahore, has been given—for the first time in German—at Prague.

VIENNA.—At the Imperial Operahouse, Meyerbeer's Huguenots was performed on the 29th October for the four-hundredth time. It is surpassed in the number of representations only by Mozart's Don Juan, which has been given 445 times, and by Weber's Der Freischütz, which has reached 408. When it is remembered, however, that Don Juan was played at the Imperial Operahouse in 1788 and Der Freischütz in 1821, it will be seen that Meyerbeer's work yields in popularity to neither of the other masterpieces above named. Two more of Meyerbeer's operas, also, are exceptional favourites here, Robert le Diable having been given, since 1833, 308 times and Le Prophète, 272.—There is no truth in the report that Johann Strauss intends leaving this capital and settling in Paris. With regard to his new buffo-opera, Eine Nacht in Venedig, it will probably be given in the course of the winter, but at which theatre is not yet decided.

THE LATEST PARSIFAL LITERATURE.

Wagner's writing armada — preparatory, explanatory, and eulogistic—did so much for Parsifal before its production, that "They scarcely aught more now have left to do." The flood of pamphlets on the "Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play," solemnly represented three months since at Bayreuth, is by no means so great as might have been expected; in number and bulk the pamphlets are, at the present time, far beneath the inundation level of the Nibelungen year, 1876. However, they contain a good deal, either serious or amusing, which may interest our readers. Let us begin with the more amusing specimens. Proudly pre-eminent in this department is an essay by Edmund von Hagen on The Significance of the Morning Summons to Awake in R. Wagner's "Parsifal." The "significance" of this first introductory scene—where the sleeping knights and squires are awoke—struck Herr von Hagen as something so incalculably deep and great that, with his researches on it, he fills sixty-two octavo pages, enough, assuredly, to send all those who have so happily awakened, to sleep again. In the face of this prolixity, it is diverting to find the author, in the preface, begging us to excuse "the scant form of his work" "as the result of a superabundant intellectual purport." The quality of this intellectual superabundance may be gathered from the following passages of the preface:—"We feel on the day of the first performance of Parsifal that we are on the eve of the morning of a new Folk's-cultus, as was the case fifty-two years ago in Paris. We feel with Parsifal that the paths of humanity are rendered more secure, and that new paths of enlightenment have been found. Herewith we feel the night of mankind becoming bright, and the approach of a light which shall bring men an end to their sufferings, and eternal joy of the mind, as in the pure air of the morning of the Resurrection."* Any one unacquainted with the sanctified oracular tone of the true Wagnerian priest, especially with the previous writings of Herr von Hagen, might easily take the essay on the "Morning Summons to Awake" as a parodistical joke. "A sad trade," it is called by one of our most capable and courageous young musical critics, Gustav Doempke, who thus continues: "A sad trade, this incredible false coinage of philosophical thoughts in the heat of enthusiastic aestheticising excitement—lamentable, ridiculous, and also odious, when we reflect that a school able to produce such apostles dares to strive after intellectual sway, and actually exerts such a sway over many weak minds and empty heads." Herr von Hagen had previously written a separate book on The poetical Composition of the "first Scene" of "Das Rheingold," giving with it, so to speak, the signal for those special criticisms now starting up, the authors of which, considering an entire Wagnerian opera an immeasurable world, beyond the comprehension of one individual, fling themselves on the microscopical investigation of some small section or other. There is something touching in the embarrassment displayed by the young generation of Wagner-enthusiasts, who, tormented by the craving to write, find the best pastures completely cropped by those who went before them. They get over the difficulty by placing under their magnifying admiration-glass a separate scene or figure, the "significance" of which has not yet been duly appreciated. What more, for instance, can be adduced concerning the character of Tristan or that of Isolde? But King Marke! He has not yet been placed on the altar befitting him. It is true that even sincere admirers of Wagner's Tristan und Isolde have been unable to deny that the old King plays in it a sorry and secondary, nay, even a sorrily-comic part, like the cuckold, who, completely ignored by his wife and her lover, bears his fate with humble resignation. This view of the case is attacked by Herr Moritz Wirth, in a special pamphlet On King Marke, in which he proves that "Marke is by no means a subordinate personage in Wagner's drama, but rather, in a certain sense, the principal personage;" nay, that in his mild resignation he presents an example of the highest human capability in the domain of morals. This Marke, we are informed, "must be ranked intellectually far higher than the King of Thule and King Lear." But he must appear on the stage as a man of seventy, with a white beard and white hair. This, says Herr Wirth, decides the matter, for the fundamental trait in his character is "passion calmed by comprehension." We should feel inclined rather to give the good King a pitiful ten years extra; passion is calmed down still more in a man of eighty and "the highest human capability in the domain of morals" is certainly at his age even more clear-sighted than before. About Senta, too, and her Dutchman, ink has flowed plentifully; but a separate treatise on Erik in his Relation to Senta and the Dutchman was still wanting. That want has now been supplied. So, also, has the want, no less deeply felt, of a monography on The Character of Eva Pogner, which has at present been elucidated, down even to its innermost verbal recesses, by a Viennese writer on music, and is, of course, put forward as "the ideal of a German maiden." A French pamphlet by the Wagnerite, E. van der Straeten, bears the classical title of Lohengrin: Instrumentation et Philosophie. Perhaps we shall some day see a similar production called: "Parsifal," Religion and Directions to the Instrumentalist. Passing over the various thematic and historical guiding-motives to Parsifal, we will turn to the pamphlets not written in the spirit of panegyric, but earnestly and impartially with the intention of criticising the "Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play" seriously and fairly. Among these the pamphlets of Max Kalbeck and Max Goldstein are especially distinguished by earnest and clever views. The frankness with which Kalbeck in

* As especially characteristic of the "intellectual scantiness" of this essay, we will cite the remarkable headings of the chapters. These are as follows:—"I. On the Significance of the Morning. II. On Awakening. 1. On Sleep. (a) The Æsthetic Side of Sleep. (b) The Ethic Side of Sleep. (c) The Metaphysical Side of Sleep. (d) The Symbolical Side of Sleep. (e) The Historical Side of Sleep. 2. On the Act of Awaking. 3. On Waking and Wakefulness. (a) The Considering of World-History. (b) The Considering the Symbolics of Life. his preface describes the unpleasant nature of his position in Bayreuth at once enlists our sympathies for him; his words go to the very heart of many of us. "Never," he writes, "did I experience more deeply and more painfully the melancholy fact connected with my position as a critic, of my being no Wagnerite, than I did in those dog-days dedicated to the redemption of mankind. . . . . My case is pretty much that of a man who comes across a procession with banners, tapers, and pictures, incense and song. The priests and choristers swing their censers, hold up their crosses, and chaunt their prayers. How many would feel inclined to join the pious pilgrimage, to wash with holy water the gloomy dreams of earth from out their soul, and to confide to some miracle-working picture their most sacred wishes? But we, who have no belief in miracles, step on one side to the edge of the road, and are polite or cunning enough to remove our head-covering. Then we put it on again and give audience to our thoughts, which are truly not of the most friendly description. Thus the Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play shrinks up more and more before my sobered vision; I miss the consecration, I miss the festival, and only the stage play remains for me and those like me." His severe verdict on the work as a whole does not prevent Kalbeck from acknowledging—nay, even from admiring—the various instances of great beauties in the music. The lyrical poet in him then bears away the critic on his pinions. Max Goldstein treats the same subject more closely and more briefly, though agreeing with Kalbeck's views on all essential points. "Luxuriant are the brilliancy and sonority of the work, but from the perfume of its incense and its semi-obscurity there gleams forth empty artificiality. It contains only the splendour of supernatural glory or the fire of subnatural sensuality. All is exaltation. From this, however, no work of art can derive noble moderation and dignified repose." These sentences pretty well resume Goldstein's views.

Lighter and more easy reading than any other Parsifal pamphlet are Paul Lindau's Bayreuther Briefe vom reinem Thore (Bayreuth Letters from the Pure Fool), and they will probably have the largest sale. Whether they will be pronounced as amusing as his Nüchterne Briefe (Sober Letters) of the Nibelungen year, 1876, is an open question. Though musically less important, the latter work contained a rich store of witty remarks, and, in the form of harmless jokes, told the most bitter truths about the Wagnerian Tetralogy. The same irresistible spirit of laughter and mockery does not pervade the Parsifal Letters. Lindau has either intentionally abstained from his witty notions, or they, on this occasion, have abstained from him. Of isolated clever and striking remarks (such as those, for instance, on the torture of the guiding-motives), there is, of course, no lack. But our expectation that the author would sharply attack the most prominent weaknesses and absurdities of the poem is as good as unfulfilled. The fertile dramatic writer and theatrical critic, who knows how to scent out every error of a modern dramatist and spit it like game with his blade, has exhibited striking mildness towards all that is false and repulsive in Parsifal. Could he otherwise have seriously asserted that Wagner had "imparted additional profundity" to the moral conflict of Wolfram's epic? And, that he had done so, moreover, because in his work Parsifal is chosen "to wrest the holy spear from the heathen robber," and victoriously goes forth "to combat, first with Kundry and then with Klingsor." Could it escape Lindau's notice that exactly the reverse occurs; that Parsifal does not make the slightest attempt to "wrest" the spear from Klingsor, or to venture on a "combat" with him? Here, indeed, is one of the most glaring faults in the Wagnerian drama. After Parsifal has become, through Kundry's kiss, "knowing," and thus knows that only the spear possessed by Klingsor can cure the sufferings of Amfortas, he should and ought immediately to rush on Klingsor, and forcibly wrest it from him. He does nothing of the kind, but sings long monologues, and listens to still longer ones from Kundry, so that, did not Klingsor hit on the happy notion of hurling the spear at Parsifal, Amfortas would still be wailing quite as helplessly at the present moment as in the first act. For the sake of a cheap operatic effect (that of the spear remaining poised in the air), Wagner has neglected the only occasion when, by a little courage, Parsifal might at last have gained our sympathy. Instead of this, however, the "pure fool" remains here as everywhere else—a deedless and lazy fool as well.

Some admirable observations occur in Hermann Kretschmar's pertinent and impartial notice of Parsifal in the Grenzbote.

In his recently published historical exposition of Musical Æsthetics—a highly suggestive book, which we only wish had been carried out more fully and less hastily—Heinrich Ehrlich, of Berlin, has admirably demonstrated Wagner's dependence on the views of the romantic school (Schlegel, Tieck, and Adam Müller), a fact which Parsifal corroborates anew. In this instance, Ehrlich, like many other critics, takes strong exception to the representation of Christian mysteries. "Is it possible," he exclaims, "that a great artist, thoroughly imbued with Christianity, can present with such luxurious surroundings the sacred mysteries to a mixed crowd? Is there not here a refinement far removed from true Christian feeling?" Certainly there is. But from the very fact of its being presented in so undisguisedly theatrical a manner does this refinement strike me as not being seriously dangerous. I cannot believe that those who cry out against profanation undervalue true religion in its power and significance, but, to my mind, they overrate the power and significance of the playing at religion in Parsifal. As a spectator of the half-biblical scenes therein, I felt, it is true, put out at their inward untruthfulness and affectation, but in no way offended by their religious garb. Not for an instant did I feel as though I was in a church, but I felt always and thoroughly I was in a theatre. The scenes of the foot-washing, the anointing, and the Lord's Supper, which have been subjected to attack, produced on me a thoroughly operatic effect, using the term not in a spirit of censure, but in a purely technical sense. I can regard the "Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play" only as an opera, and, in the true interest of the work, it should never be regarded as aught else. Whatever they may be for Wagner, for me the white-clad Fool with his flowing locks is no Christ; the howling nondescript Kundry, no holy Magdalen; and the Graal hocus-pocus lighted up with Bengal fire, no sacrament on the altar. For this reason, I was unable at Bayreuth to share either the religious indignation of some or the religious ecstacy of others. The latter even less than the former, for I do not deny that Agatha's simple prayer, that Leonore's air, and the Chorus of Prisoners in Fidelio beget in me an incomparably more devout and more religious frame of mind than the whole of Parsifal. The Holy Ghost in that work impresses me very moderately, and much less than Wagner's own mundanely-artistic spirit which is there revealed in many new and powerful traits.†

The Wagner cultus has at present reached, if not already passed, its culminating point. Reason and experience teach us that after such unparalleled inebriation people gradually sober down extremely. Many with us in Bayreuth thought they had already perceived and remarked signs of this, and even warm adherents of Wagner became impatient over the trying game of catching the guiding-motives. Beneath the strongly dazzling charm of novelty, we see more and more plainly the falseness of this one-sided method. The fit of sobriety to which I have referred will probably become downright seediness, directly men of small talent shall begin composing in the false operatic style which Wagner's great talent created and alone can wield. At present, the greatest, or at any rate the most sensitive and most grateful part of the public: young persons, women, painters, dilettantëising poetico-musicians and music-poets, belong to Wagner. We, who demand of music that it shall fashion plastically and not merely flow crepuscularly along, and who consider the music of Don Juan, Fidelio and Der Freischütz, as not alone musically finer, but also more full of life dramatically than the uniformly declamatory music of Wagner, are in the minority. This minority will not, however, die out, but, sooner or later, grow up into a majority against the tyranny of the Wagner cultus. If the assertion that Posterity alone will estimate him correctly applies to any composer, it applies to Richard Wagner. Not because, like Mozart and Beethoven, not enough, but because too much was made of him during his life. In Wagner's importance towards opera there is a rare contradiction, first to be solved by those of a subsequent age. By his early works, he exercised a vivifying, exciting, air-purifying influence on a branch of composition which had fallen into a jog-trot and

† In the original there is a play on the words "Der heilige Geist," "The Holy Ghost," and "der weltlich-künstlerische Geist Wagner's," "Wagner's mundanely-artistic spirit," for which there is no exact equivalent in English, and which is possible in German, because in that idiom "The Holy Ghost" is rendered: "The Holy Spirit."—J. conventional manner, introducing into it a beneficial fermentation, and bringing all minds into animated contact. At the present day, his influence is injurious in its effect, and causes an absolute cessation of operatic composition. Wagner's music with the sweet poison of its stirring nature has so mingled with the blood of the present generation that it has become almost impossible for any one to create in the spirit and form of old, ante-Wagnerian opera. Every one who does not compose Wagnerianly is now-a-days as good as lost, and whoever does so compose is lost even more certainly. As the only man of brilliant and original talent who for forty years has arisen for German opera, Wagner has with coercive might imposed on us his imperspicuous system, which is adapted only to his own special endowments. He is undoubtedly a great magician, a magician like—Klingsor. Perhaps his future conqueror, a musical Parsifal, is already somewhere or other in his cradle.

AMERICA.

While all the critics of the New York press devote columns to the first appearance of Mrs Langtry in New York at Wallack's new theatre, it is easy to remark a great divergence of opinion, both as to the lady's personal charms—with which they have nothing to do, and her dramatic ability—with which they have everything to do. She made her début on Monday night, and was unanimously applauded. The London Times correspondent says that "the receipts were 6,800 dols., 1,000 dols. over Mdme Bernhardt's first night." Whether the receipts on Mrs Langtry's final appearance will sustain the equilibrium as compared with those of Sarah Bernhardt on a similar occasion remains to be proved.

Adelina Patti made her début on the same evening as the Lucia of Donizetti's famous opera, creating a veritable enthusiasm, and testing in her favour all that Europe has proclaimed about that dramatic genius which, combined with her marvellous vocal proficiency, places her at the summit of her art.

Meanwhile, Christine Nilsson (a formidable rival to either or both) has reached the new country, and in her inevitable "interview" with American reporters for the press, on board the "Gallia," gave her opinion about Mr Oscar Wilde (if the New York Herald may be credited), in the subjoined dialogue:—

"Oh, is Oscar Wilde here?" she asked. "I shall be delighted to see him. Has he cut his hair yet? What on earth is he doing over here?"

"Making money," was the response.

"What do you think of Mr Wilde, Madame?"

"Why, I think he is a —— Oh, but you musn't publish this."

"Why?"

"Well, I don't care if you do. I think he is not such a ——"

"Fool as he looks," concluded an auditor as she hesitated.

"Oh, no!" she responded, laughing, "not exactly that, you know, but something of that kind. Really, now, you know, without joking, he can be very serious and very nice to talk to when he chooses."

From the same infallible source we read of Mdme Nilsson's future intentions:—

"This is her fourth visit to this country. Her first appearance was in 1870. She returned in the winters of 1871-2 and 1873-4. Her appearance will be solely in concerts, and her engagement will last about six months. She will first appear in Boston on November 1. Two concerts will be given there, the second one being a matinée on the afternoon of November 4. From there she goes to three or four towns in New England, and then to Baltimore and Philadelphia. Her appearance in New York will be at Steinway Hall on the evening of November 28 and the afternoon of December 2, when she will proceed to Chicago and San Francisco, stopping at several points en route. It will be her first appearance in San Francisco. Signor Del Puente, who arrived on the Alaska, will be the baritone of the company, and the music will be furnished by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club of Boston."

[Amen! May good luck attend her.—D. B.]

ARRIGO BOITO, the dramatist and composer, is about to marry the well-known contralto Borghi-Mamò.

SEVERAL Madrid papers assert that Mdme Christine Nilsson will, on her return from America, be married to a Spanish gentleman resident in Paris. The Correspondencia Musical gives his name: Señor D. Angel Vallejo Miranda.

CONCERTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—On November 4th, 1847, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy died—having been born in 1809—thus adding another to the instances of premature decease recorded in the history of music, as of other arts, science, and literature. Great and numerous as are the art treasures left by Mendelssohn—the product of a brief existence—there is no doubt that a few years of prolonged life would largely have added to them; many important works having been projected, and some commenced by him, notably the grand romantic opera Loreley, which would have completed the circle of his wondrous universality. To produce a stage work of large design was a long-cherished wish of the composer, whose high dramatic faculty had been demonstrated in several smaller productions of this class, and still more in the music to A Midsummer Night's Dream, the Walpurgis Night, Antigone, Œdipus, &c. Had there not been these proofs of Mendelssohn's capacity to compose an opera that should class with the greatest masterpieces of that style, sufficient manifestation thereof is afforded by the completed finale to the first act of Loreley, which, in romantic fancy, dramatic power, and artistic structure serves to show what an irreparable loss in this respect, as in others, has been sustained in musical art. The concert of last Saturday afternoon, the fourth of the new series, was rendered partly tributary to the memory of Mendelssohn, the date having been the anniversary of his death. Worthier tributes than this have been rendered on previous similar occasions, when the programme has been entirely appropriated to works by the great composer, of whom Saturday's limited selection was insufficiently representative. The pieces named in the programme were—the fine concert overture, Fingal's Cave, so wondrously reflective of the impressions wrought on Mendelssohn's poetical temperament by the wild romanticism of the Hebridean scenery—an Adagio from one of his early symphonies for stringed instruments (works of his boyhood)—an orchestral arrangement of the pianoforte capriccio in E minor, Op. 16, and the Lobgesang (Hymn of Praise.) The symphonic piece specified in the programme was not given, another movement being substituted without explanation. The adaptation of the little pianoforte piece has been cleverly made by Herr Hofmann, but such a transformation is a mistake in principle, and was eminently out of place on an occasion of this kind. On the next recurrence of a similar celebration, it is to be hoped that a fuller and more representative programme may be offered. Saturday's concert included the orchestral intermezzo, "On the Waters," and was to have comprised the tenor air, "When Ares laid aside his arms," from Mr Mackenzie's new cantata, Jason (produced at the Bristol festival last month)—but the song was omitted, according to a printed notice, "In consequence of the exacting nature of the solo tenor music in the Hymn of Praise." As this reason might have been as well discovered before as after making out the programme, it is not easy to see the force of it, especially as the singer was Mr E. Lloyd, whose never-failing powers are equal to far more "exacting" demands. Miss M. Fenna made her first appearance at the Crystal Palace, and sung Gounod's rather dull song, "Far greater in his lowly state" (from La Reine de Saba), with considerable success; the other vocal solo being the recitative, "Thy hand, my Anna," and air (on a "ground bass"), "When I am laid in earth," from the Dido and Æneas of Purcell, England's greatest musician, who—like Mendelssohn and others—paid for the early development of genius by a premature death. The opera just named was Purcell's first stage work, produced in 1675, when he was about seventeen. The extract was sung on Saturday with much refinement by Mrs Hutchinson. The solo singers in the Hymn of Praise were those named above. The three fine symphonic movements which precede the vocal portion of the cantata were effectively rendered by the orchestra, conducted by Mr Manns, the remainder of the performance included the co-operation of the Crystal Palace choir, and of Mr A. J. Eyre at the organ. Next Saturday's programme is to comprise a "Symphonic Poem"—Visegrad—by M. Smetana, to be given for the first time in England. —H. J. L.

COVENT GARDEN PROMENADE CONCERTS.—On Friday, last week, Mr Gwyllym Crowe devoted the first part of the concert to a selection from the works of the most popular of our native composers, Michael William Balfe. The enormous attendance and the enthusiastic reception of the pieces is a proof—whatever may be said to the contrary—that Balfe's power as a musician has increased with the progress of time rather than diminished. Moreover, the increase of means for hearing his work tends most powerfully to show not only the versatility of his genius, but also brings into prominence the scientific basis of his work. Few musicians of his time knew so well as he how to employ art to augment, by a skilful setting, the beauty of his gems of melodic thought. Popular feeling, generally true in the end, recognizes his skill and his gifts, even though for a time attention may have been diverted to more fashionable though less enduring material. Music is the expression of a certain form of emotional truth. Melody is the most beautiful form of music. Balfe in his music never ignored melody. He therefore kept in view the most easily distinguishable piece of musical truth. Truth must prevail and survive, and this is the secret of Balfe's success even now when so few opportunities are presented for hearing his best works. Mr Crowe made a happy choice in offering three of Balfe's overtures, Le Puits d'Amour, The Daughter of St Mark, and The Bohemian Girl. Neither of these is devoid of either science or melody, nor are they deficient in orchestral contrivance. The Satanella selection, the only shape in which the music of the opera is now heard, has already been made familiar here by frequent repetition, and the "Reminiscences of Balfe," by Mr F. Godfrey, extended for this occasion by the addition of orchestral parts, by Mr Crowe, stand as a favourite stock piece with military bands throughout the kingdom. The ballads, "In this old chair," encored of course ("Good night, beloved," as an encore), and "When other lips," which were sung by Mr Edward Lloyd, lost no charm by his beautiful vocalization. "My bark is bounding near," from Diadeste, and "Though fortune darkly o'er me frown," from the Rose of Castille, were given by Mr Bantock Pierpoint. It should be mentioned, with honour to the player, that the cornet obbligato in the song "In this old chair" was given by Mr Howard Reynolds in his very best style. The union of the talents of singer and player, and the ever fresh delight of the melody, made an extraordinary sensation. Mdme Enriquez sang "I dreamt that I dwelt," and the spirited song, "The Cantineer." The whole of the Balfe selection was received with enthusiasm, and Mr Crowe may be congratulated upon the result. He may, if he interprets this experiment wisely, be tempted to give another Balfe Night before the end of the season, taking other works to select from. There is no likelihood of his being able to exhaust the material or tire the patience of his audiences. There were also other items of interest on the programme, not the least of which was the clever pianoforte playing of little Miss Ascher, who is only twelve years of age. The band, as good as ever, is led by Mr Carrodus, prince of English violinists, and the performance of Mr Burnett's "Mandolinata," of Mr Crowe's pretty waltz, "Ladye Mine," and of the other pieces left nothing to be desired.—Morning Post.

Mrs John Macfarren gave a Concert of pianoforte and vocal music on Tuesday, Oct. 31st, at the Streatham Lecture Hall, to the members of the Tulse Hill Institute, who with their friends met in large numbers to enjoy the musical treat provided. The vocalists were Misses Effie Clements, Spenser Jones, Messrs Dyved Lewis, and Lucas Williams, all of whom gave great pleasure to their audience—notably Miss Clements in Donizetti's Cavatina, "In questo semplice" (Betly), and Sir Julius Benedict's "My home in Cloudland," Mr Lucas Williams in Gounod's "The Valley," and Miss Spenser Jones in Walter Macfarren's "The Willow Tree." Mrs John Macfarren, whose excellence as a pianist is well known and appreciated in South London, was welcomed on her appearance and warmly applauded throughout the evening. She played an attractive selection from the works of Beethoven, Schumann, Scarlatti, Paradies, Rubinstein, Litolff, Schubert, Liszt, &c., and had to return and bow her acknowledgments after each, as well as after her performance of Jules Brissac's effective Caprice on Welsh Melodies. Professor Macfarren's admired trio, "The Troubadour," was sung at the end of the first part, and the concert ended with the Spinning Wheel Quartet from Martha, sung with great spirit by Misses Clements and Spenser Jones, Messrs Dyved Lewis and Lucas Williams.

The London Conservatoire of Music held a Soirée Musicale at the Principal's (Mr Lansdowne Cottell) residence, Tavistock Square, on Tuesday, Oct. 31st, attracting a large audience. The programme, interpreted chiefly by students, consisted principally of songs by modern composers, although, in the instrumental part, the "classic" was not entirely neglected, for Miss May Hargood, a youthful pianist of some fifteen years, played, and played remarkably well, a fantasia on Weber's Preciosa; Miss Clarissa Haslewood (rather nervously, by-the-bye), a Capriccio by Mendelssohn; and Miss Hannah Bennett, a Polonaise by Chopin ("very well, indeed,"). Among the singers who distinguished themselves were Miss L. Spraye (the possessor of a good contralto voice), Mr Alfred Shield ("a lovely tenor"), Mdme Aubrey (who distinguished herself in Gounod's "Quando a te lieta"), Mdlle D'Arbour (soprano), and Miss Emilie Conyngham, who sang, "very nicely," Bishop's "Mocking Bird," (flute obbligato, Mr Colonieu), and afterwards, with Miss May Harrison, Balfe's setting of "Trust her not, she is fooling thee." Solos on the flute and violoncello were well played by Mr Colonieu and Herr Engel (professors), and the soirée went off with éclat.

PROVINCIAL.

Brighton.—Mr George Watts' third "philharmonic concert" was given at the Dome on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 4, every seat being occupied. The artists were Mdme Cave Ashton, Miss Clements, Mdme Trebelli, Mdlle Isabelle de Varney, and Messrs Vernon Rigby, Barrington Foote, and Sims Reeves. The garden scene from Gounod's Faust was given by Mdme Cave Ashton, Mdme Trebelli, Mdlle de Varney, Messrs Vernon Rigby and Foote. Mr Sims Reeves sang Berthold Tours' "Stars of the summer night," Blumenthal's "My Queen," and Hatton's "Good-bye, sweetheart," and in response to a double call for Hatton's song he gave Dibdin's "Tom Bowling." Mr Naylor and Mons E. de Paris conducted.—Mr Kuhe's "festival" concerts began on Tuesday evening.

Worcester.—The Philharmonic concert on Tuesday, October 24th, was in every way a worthy commencement of a new period. The attendance was large, and, but for the inclement weather, would doubtless have been larger. The programme consisted of Barnett's cantata, The Ancient Mariner, and a miscellaneous selection. Mr Barnett's setting of the weird poem of Coleridge—says the Worcester Journal—strongly suggests Gade's Erl King's Daughter, which was given some time ago by the Musical Society. Both are charming works. The soli parts were taken by Misses Fenna and Hilda Wilson, Messrs Boulcott Newth and Thomas Horrex, all vocalists of acknowledged ability. The chorus was as strong as ever, and the band seemed to be unusually well disposed. The overture to Oberon, Horsley's Waltz Chorus, and Novello's arrangement of "Rule Britannia" were included in the programme. Mr Done conducted, and Mr. Quarterman was accompanist. The committee of the Amateur Instrumental Society have issued their report to the members, and state that the past season had been the most successful, as well as the most important, since the establishment of the society in 1876. "The number of effective members—it says—continues steadily to increase, and now reaches a total of fifty-two; the attendances at the practices and rehearsals have also been most satisfactory. The receipts from all sources amount to £61 7s. 7d., and the expenses to £51 6s. 2d., leaving a balance to the credit of the society (including a sum of 6s. 1d., brought forward), of £10 1s. 5d. This is the largest sum ever accumulated in one year. The expenses have been unusually heavy, on account of the large number of public performances in which the society has taken part, and the fact that all rehearsals have been held in the Guildhall, instead of, as formerly, in the rooms in Sansome Street." Regret is expressed that Mr A. J. Caldicott, who so ably discharged the duties of hon. conductor for six years, had determined to leave Worcester, and that the society in consequence "loses the valuable aid of one who was always ready to promote the cause of music in the district." The committee also desire to recognize the labours of Mr E. W. Elgar, who, as leader, has rendered valuable services to the society.

Edinburgh.—On Saturday evening, Nov. 4th, the Carl Rosa company brought to a close a very successful, but too brief, season—in the course of which they have presented examples of the French, English, later German, and Italian schools of lyric composition—with a performance of Verdi's Rigoletto, which was witnessed by a crowded and appreciative audience. The character of Gilda, the jester's daughter, was sustained by Miss Georgina Burns. In the duet with Rigoletto, "Father, in thee," her vocalization was marked by great force of expression, and thence to the close of the work her performance was one of artistic excellence. Miss Yorke was Maddalena, and Mr J. W. Turner the Duke. One of the most noteworthy features of the performance was Mr Crotty's Rigoletto. Adequately to interpret the varied and strongly-marked moods of the character—remarks the Scotsman—implies on the performer's part very exceptional dramatic resources; but Mr Crotty showed himself fully equal to the ordeal. The sardonic jocularity of the jester in the Duke's court, the wealth of love and tenderness he lavishes on his daughter, the rage and despair that convulse him when he finds that he himself has been made the instrument of her ruin, and the terrible craving for revenge that subsequently dominates him—all these phases were delineated with extraordinary realism and with a power that was none the less conspicuous for being artistically restrained. Mr Crotty sang, too, with all his wonted purity of style and musicianly finish. His Rigoletto undoubtedly entitles him to a high place amongst English lyric artists. Of the minor characters, those of Sparafucile (Mr Pope) and Monterone (Mr Snazelle) were satisfactorily supported. The choral music was sung throughout with a precision that left no room for adverse remark, and the orchestra did their work very well.

Newcastle.—Messrs Alderson and Brentnall have engaged Mr Hallé and his band for three concerts, the first of which took place in the Town Hall on Wednesday evening, Nov. 1st, when an excellent programme was gone through, with credit to the performers and satisfaction to the audience. Weber's overture to Oberon and Beethoven's Symphony in C minor were the Chevaux de Bataille of the band, and splendidly they were rendered. "Of Mr Hallé's performance," says the Journal, "of Raff's 'Suite' and of Brahms' 'Hungarian Dances' (the latter of which received a most enthusiastic encore) we have nothing but praise. His perfection of style is well known." Herr Strauss had little to do in the capacity of soloist, but what little he did proved him to be a true artist. Mr Joseph Maas, who sang airs from Verdi's Il Trovatore, Weber's Euryanthe, Flotow's Marta, and "Sound an Alarm," from Handel's Judas Maccabæus, created quite a furore. He had to repeat a portion of "Sound an Alarm" in response to a most enthusiastic encore.

Norwich.—A grand bazaar in aid of the Catholic Poor Schools, was opened in Victoria Hall on Wednesday afternoon, Oct. 25, by the Bishop of Northampton (the Very Rev. Dr Riddell). The Bazaar was under the patronage of Lord and Lady Stafford, the High Sheriff of Norfolk (Sir Henry Bedingfeld, Bart.) and Lady Bedingfeld, Lady Sausse, Hon. Mrs Trafford, Major and Mrs. Garnett, Mrs Sperling, Mrs Lyne Stephens, and others. A fine band, under Mr Walter Tuddenham, played at intervals. Mdlle Nordmann, of the Floral Hall Concerts, London, rendered some very choice pieces, which her splendid voice did ample justice to. The pianists were Mr A. E. Bunnett and Mr Alfred Whall, the last-named acting as accompanist. After the band had played the National Anthem, Mdlle Nordmann sang exquisitely an Italian Morceau, accompanied by Major Garnett (violin) and Mr A. Whall (piano). On Thursday the bazaar was continued, and in the evening a concert took place. Mr J. D. Sinclair's clarionet solo was received with much applause, and Mdlle Nordmann in an air from Auber's Fra Diavolo fairly brought down the house. Messrs A. E. Bunnett and A. Whall played a pianoforte duet, and Mr J. Sinclair sang "The Pilgrim of Love" (encored). Mr W. Tuddenham's violin solo was splendidly rendered; and after the concert Box and Cox was given, P. Garnett, Esq., (32nd Light Infantry), taking the part of Box, and Major Garnett that of Cox.

Paisley.—Mr J. Roy Fraser, "our foremost pioneer in the department of instrumental music" as the Daily Express justly entitles him, gave his first concert in the new Hall on Thursday evening, Oct. 26. The band, under the direction of Mr Fraser, consisted of amateur members of the Choro-Orchestral Society assisted by some professional players from Glasgow. The Choir of the Society also took part in the performance. The solo vocalist was Miss Anna Williams, and the pianist Miss Ross, daughter of the esteemed Burgh Chamberlain. The young lady played Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor so much to the satisfaction of the audience that at the conclusion she received a regular ovation. Miss M. Thompson accompanied the vocal music.

Dear Sir,—Since my letter kindly inserted in your impression of the 7th January last, commendable efforts to construct a National School of Music have been made in earnest by our music-loving Prince, who naturally has had no difficulty to enlist the sympathy of the upper strata of musical and non-musical society; but the masses must be moved to fully appreciate these efforts made on their behalf, and I may say for their happiness, which happiness, unlike any other, knows no reaction. The enjoyment of pure music is the enjoyment of God's gift upon earth; it is at all times and places sacred, not always by name but by its own direct influence; frivolous music is a parody of the former, and often ceases to be music at all.

We are all fond of the art it is true, but do we view it in the light we should. Dr Macfarren when addressing his Royal Academy pupils said: "you do not come here to study music as an amusement. It would degrade the wonderful subject which engrosses our life's attention to regard it for a moment as a pastime and a recreation. With the knowledge that you are studying this most intense subject, you cannot for a moment feel that there is anything trifling in the pursuit you have undertaken, and you will, I am sure, continue the pursuit with the feelings of earnestness and gravity that are due to it." When the winter evenings set in, we begin to think of concerts and musical evenings, and we appear all earnestness for the time being, but at the prospect of long summer days, we close the Concert Hall just at the time when the weather would favour musicians, particularly singers—at the advent of the next foggy season, we resume our labours. Now as regards the music that is usually provided for our entertainment at Suburban Concerts, I do not undervalue the worth of what are called pretty songs, but real music should be of that nature that appeals to our soul and mind, and this will be verified in German harmony, as in contradistinction to Italian melody. Music depicted as a concord of sweet sounds is a general expression, emanating from those who have but a very superficial idea of the grand and noble art.

It is in the province of almost every musical and theatrical caterer to substantially second the efforts of the Royal College of Music, and that quite independently of any pecuniary aid. There must be a radical change in the performance of music provided at most of the theatres. Operahouses may lack attendance, the theatres are always patronised, a mixed public finds its way to them nightly, here is the grand occasion to inculcate taste for good music. Instead of the usual common-place selections given between the acts which the public happily (though perhaps unwittingly) drown with clatter, let the managers make it known specially, that in future good music only will be performed, the progressive change in the tastes, from this step alone, would ultimately become palpable. It must be admitted that the management of the annual Covent Garden Concerts possesses all available means to perform, on certain nights during the season, the principal parts of whole operas in lieu of mutilated fragments thereof sensationally arranged, which astonish, but do not impress; this would enable the masses to have a thorough idea of operatic works at a moderate cost.

At present we cannot, with the best of intentions, expect the working classes to attend Operas, or expensive concerts, far away from their homes, but instead of concerts in the suburbs being composed of endless ballads, and oftentimes musical performances and songs, in which music is the smaller element, let operas in recital be given with piano and harmonium as ground work. In time, singers (good voices only) could take part therein; for I maintain that it is in recital that you can best appreciate operatic works from a purely musical point of view. In reference to singers for these recitals let me here incidentally call special attention to what I think necessary qualifications for each member to possess besides musical taste and ability, i.e., earnestness of purpose, the setting aside of all ideas of caste; wherever talent is let it be recognized, and lastly, the smothering of all jealousies; a good musician never shows his talent to greater advantage than when anxious to hear, and that with delight, a fellow-artist superior to himself.

It may appear invidious to make comparisons, but let us compare the English with the foreign city and town working man as to musical taste. The former has no idea of refining his mind with good and instructive music. And why? Because it is not afforded to him in his neighbourhood, except in the shape of the grotesque. The latter, for a few pence, and often for nothing, can be musically entertained and become a fair critic. Music, unlike all other means of persuasion, stands unique on its beneficial effects; it cannot produce angry arguments and strife, which the present spasmodic movements to evangelize have led to, and must yet lead to, whatever the intentions may be, so long as the basis of them is sensationalism on the one hand and on the other the caricaturing of that mysterious and wonderful language, the evident direct link between Him above us all and humanity, which is music in its original purity and grandeur.

In conclusion, let me here state that the ends of the mother establishment, the Royal Academy of Music, and the Royal College, are identical; a divergence may exist between them at present, they go apart, but in the same direction and on the same earnest errand: the furtherance of musical art. At one point they must meet, and at that point agree on a common line of action. This must be every one's unbiassed opinion and sincere hope.—I am, dear sir, your obedient servant,

O. L.

London, Nov. 8, 1882.

Herr Schuberth, the accomplished professor of the violoncello, and energetic director of the Schubert Society, has returned to London, after a highly successful tour in France, Holland, and Germany. The press is unanimous in praising his playing, especially his execution of cantabile passages.

Buenos Ayres.—It is said that Lohengrin will be produced at the Politeama, and that the Operahouse is to be pulled down.—The National School of Music will probably soon be re-opened.—Erminia Borghi-Mamò has been suffering from intermittent fever.

Leipsic.—The programme of the fourth Gewandhaus Concert was thus constituted: Part I. Overture, Nachklänge von Ossian, N. W. Gade; Violin Concerto, Beethoven (Henri Petri); Recitative and air from Jessonda, Spohr (Mad. Schröder-Hanftstängl); "Adagio," Spohr; "National Polish Dances," Xaver Scharwenka (H. Petri); Songs, Brahms, Rubinstein, Ehmant (Mad. Schröder-Hanfstängl). Part II. Symphony in B flat major, (first time at these concerts), Robert Volkmann.

CHERUBINI.

It was on this theme that Cherubini wrote a superb score, which, with its marvellous tessitura, truly admirable style, and unusually powerful expression, evoked from all his contemporaries a cry of surprise and enthusiasm. It may assuredly be asserted that the author of Médée and Lodoïska had, by those two works, already achieved a brilliant and uncontested reputation, yet the appearance of the Deux Journées was, so to speak, a new revelation of his genius as well as a second entrance into possession of public sympathy and admiration. To obtain an idea of what occurred we need only run through the newspapers and collections of the period, which are merely the echo of the general voice. The Journal de Paris expresses itself thus:

"The music of this opera is, without dispute, one of its author's masterpieces; nothing can be more new, more original, and more majestic than the overture; nothing more dramatic or more finely composed than the finale of the first act; nothing more simple and more tuneful than the elegant airs scattered throughout the piece; in a word, we have the most graceful melody wedded to the most learned harmony."

The Courier des Spectacles, while recording the brilliant success achieved by the work as a whole, praises the music in the highest terms:

"It would be difficult," it says, "to describe the enthusiasm with which the public received Les Deux Journées, a three-act opera, performed yesterday at the Théâtre-Feydeau. The subject, the situations, the music, and the playing of the actors, all interest us and deserve the unanimity of general applause which crowned the work. There was a loud call for the authors, and citizen Gaveaux, coming forward, announced for the words citizen Bouilly, to whom we owe L'Abbé de l'Epée and Cherubini for the music. . . . Citizen Cherubini's style of composition is so marked that it is impossible not to know it. Force, rapidity, learned and unexpected transitions, and an accent of deep feeling which reigns in all the passionate situations, are so many signs by which, from the very earliest numbers, we recognize the inimitable author. The principal brilliancy of this fine work lies in the concerted pieces. We promise ourselves genuine pleasure in defining the charms of some portions of this excellent composition, which must be heard, and will always be so with fresh pleasure and fresh interest."

The Année théâtrale is no less warm in its praise:—

"The events of these times of disorder," says this publication, "the perplexities and anxieties of these days, so distressing to the personages taking part in them, afforded great opportunities for the musician's talent. Cherubini, who undertook the work, displays in it all the richness of harmony which constitutes the principal merit of his compositions. His overture and first interlude paint in a striking manner the popular rumours, the movements of the troops, and everything our revolution has rendered so familiar to us. The vocal portion is more carefully treated and more tuneful than in his other works, and, at the same time, the knowledge of the stage is perfect. The septet terminating the first act is a model of its kind. All the sentiments of surprise, joy, disappointment, gratitude, and hope are, in a word, expressed in the tone adapted to them, and the accompaniment always adds to the expression with which the melody is capable of investing them. The whole is blended into a harmonic effect, which is one of the richest ever yet heard on the stage."

In a pretentious, insipid style, the Etrennes lyriques et théâtrales is no less eulogistic on the composer's work:—

"The music is harmonious, tuneful, and sublime in its strains; it is even more sublime than this, because it paints, it speaks, it imitates, and it expresses well all the passions, and says all it should say. We find in this music perfect agreement of the scores" (?), "sounds truly melodious, learned chords, transitions skilfully managed, really astounding orchestral effects, dramatic language, and pure melody, the sounds of which are always heard."

As we see, admiration is apparent in every line of this nonsensical diction. The Gazette de France, also, is very flattering to the composer. As to the Moniteur Universel, it analyses the book at such length that it cannot find room to do justice to the music.

". . . We wish," writes Sauvo, "to hear the music of this work more than once before giving an account of it; it is by Cherubini, who, already celebrated, will doubtless find in it a new title to celebrity."

But Sauvo did not find time, at least so we must believe, to return to the Théâtre-Feydeau, for he did not keep his promise and did not again speak of Les Deux Journées.

It was on the 26th Nivose, year VIII. (16 January, 1800) that the first performance of Les Deux Journées took place at the above theatre.* Bouilly has acquainted us with the result. To be just, after apportioning to the author and the composer all that was due to them, we must reserve the share of the actors who were far from being strangers to the success of this interesting evening. The principal characters were sustained by Gaveaux, Jausserand, Juliet, and Mad. Scio, and the others by, Dessaules, Georget, Darcourt, Prévost, Platel, Mad. Desmares, and Mdlle Gavaudan, the Elder. Mad. Scio was particularly touching and pathetic in the part of Constance, the wife of the proscribed Count, but we may say that he who achieved the greatest triumph as far as the interpretation went, was Juliet, the "inimitable Juliet," as he was termed, who alone would have drawn all Paris by the way in which he conceived and worked out the type of the water-carrier Mikeli, who saves Count Armand. But, while doing full justice to the talent of all these excellent artists, the public reserved all its favours and all its honours, on the night of the first performance, for the composer exclusively. At a period when recalls had not become the commonplace things we now know them to be, and when the wish to see an author appear on the stage was manifested only as an event of very rare occurrence, Cherubini found himself an object of such an ovation; it is the Journal de Paris which informs us of the fact:

"The names of the authors were asked for and given. They are Citizens Bouilly for the book and Cherubini for the music; the latter, brought on the stage by force, was enthusiastically applauded."

ROYAL ACADEMIES OF MUSIC.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—Being extremely desirous to obtain some information about the requirements and arrangements of a Royal Academy of Music, and having completely failed in obtaining any about our English Royal Academy of Music, I have taken the liberty of writing you to ask where I might obtain diagrams or information about the accommodation of it. By this favour you will greatly oblige

A READER.

MR W. A. BARRETT'S "LIFE OF BALFE."—One of the most interesting biographies I have seen for some time is that which Mr W. A. Barrett has given us of Michael William Balfe (published by Messrs Remington). Of course, Mr Barrett has had good material to work upon, as Balfe's life was of an unusually stirring and varied character, but in less competent hands this might have proved a source of danger by tempting the biographer on to over-elaboration of details, and the production of a formidable specimen of book-making. Happily in the present instance a sound judgment has been brought to bear upon the task, and no more is said than is actually necessary. The reader may not be always inclined to take quite the same estimate of Balfe and his work as Mr Barrett does, for there is a little tendency to lay on the praise with a trowel; but nobody is likely to be tired of either the writer or his theme before the end has been reached. It is very pleasant to read of the successes won by the young Irish musician, who, however, certainly had his full share of what is commonly known as good luck, and the gradual accumulation of honours at home and abroad was such as only falls to the lot of the favoured few. Perhaps his personal character had almost as much to do with this as his great varied talents; and indeed in the picture presented of him in these pages, he seems invested with almost every attribute that could tend to render him popular. The story of his life, as thus told, is extremely fascinating, and its attractiveness is enhanced by the extent of his association with many favourites of the public. Grisi, Jenny Lind, Mdme Anna Hilton, Lablache, Tom Cooke, Sir Michael Costa, Malibran, De Beriot, Horn, Professor Macfarren, Taglioni, Edward Fitzball, Gardoni, Mr Sims Reeves, Ronconi, Rossini, Mdlle Marie Roze, Miss Paton, are a few of the names occurring from time to time in the narrative, and about most of them Mr Barrett has some capital stories to tell, so that his volume is pretty sure to prove a sort of happy hunting-ground for musical lecturers, who will not be slow to avail themselves of such a capital collection of good things. Portraits of Balfe, Grisi, Malibran, and Mdme Nilsson adorn the volume.—Pictorial World.

* The entertainment was completed that evening by Les Voisins, a one-act comedy in prose of Picard's.

Mr Sims Reeves sang Balfe's melody, "When other lips," at York, on the day the tablet was unveiled in Westminster Abbey, and created a perfect furore. He has announced his intention of singing that typical English Ballad "in memory of the composer," at his concerts at Wakefield, Nottingham, and other places in the North and Midland Counties, and also at Brighton during his tour. —Musical Standard.

The Covent Garden Promenade Concerts, under the direction of Mr Gwyllym Crowe, have proved so successful that a new series has begun to be carried on indefinitely. Mr Gye will not sanction any pantomime this year at the Royal Italian, so that Mr Augustus Harris will have it all to himself in the populous vicinity of the Strand. Mr Gye is right, and we have only to congratulate his near neighbour, to whom we are indebted for The World, Truth, and Pluck, in all three of which Mr Harris is "well up."

Teresina Tua is going to America in January.

William Steinway has returned to New York.

Wilhelmj returns next season to the United States.

The Teatro Marini, Barcelona, has been burnt down.

Teresina Tua, the violinist, has been performing at Pesth.

Massenet's Hérodiade is in preparation at the National Theatre, Pesth.

The electric light is about to be adopted at the Teatro Comunale, Trieste.

Francis Planté, the pianist, is about to give a series of concerts in Madrid.

Le Educande di Sorrento is in preparation at the Teatro Principal, Barcelona.

The Cecilian Society, Philadelphia (U.S.), are studying Gounod's Redemption.

Mathilde Mallinger has fixed on Munich as her permanent place of residence.

Minnie Hauk was to open her American concert-tour in Boston on the 28th ult.

Arrigo II., by Palminteri, has been produced at Voghesa with marked success.

No operatic season this year at the Teatro Payret, Havanna, seems to be contemplated.

Mdme Sembrich has made a strong impression in La Traviata at the Teatro Real, Madrid.

The Italian company at the new theatre, Tunis, inaugurated the season with I due Foscari.

A new organ by Cavaillé-Col, of Paris, has been placed in the Cathedral at Para, (Brazil).

Dr Damrosch and his orchestra are engaged for a series of concerts in the Western States of America.

During her tour in the north of Germany, Mdme Amalie Joachim lately visited Bremen and Wismar.

Baron Vigier, husband of the famous artist once known as Sophie Cruvelli, died, a short time since, in Paris.

The Duke of Nassau has conferred on Jules de Swert, the violoncellist, the Gold Medal for Art and Science.

Mdlle Tagliana is in Berlin, but does not re-appear at the Royal Operahouse before the beginning of January.

David Popper, the violoncellist, and Emile Sauret, the violinist, have given three successful concerts in Lisbon.

On leaving Vigo, the tenor Tamberlik, with his company, proceeds to Malaga.—(Unquiet old Roman!—Dr Blitge.)

Pauline Lucca, again singing at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, was most cordially received on her re-appearance.

A commemmorative tablet, affixed to the house where Paganini was born, was unveiled in Genoa on the 27th October—his birthday.

The principal feature at the first concert, next month, of the Nouvelle Société de Musique, Brussels, is La Vierge, by Massenet.

Les Huguenots, under the direction of Marino Mancinelli, has been performed with brilliant success at the Teatro Costanzi, Rome.

Der Kleine Prinz, operetta with words by Julius Rosen and music by Müller, will shortly be produced at the Theater an der Wien, Vienna.

Tannhäuser, the first dramatic work of Wagner's ever put on the Russian stage, was lately performed at the Imperial Theatre, St Petersburgh.

A Conservatory of Music has been established at Jativa (Spain), under the auspices of the local Society of Concerts.

In commemoration of Tamberlik's having inaugurated the Teatro-Circo, Vigo, that building has been named after him.

Mr Mapleson has secured the services of Frederick Archer as organist during the present Italian opera season at the Academy, New York.

Etelka Gerster began a short engagement at Königsberg by appearing in La Sonnambula. She was called on five or six times after each act.

The mignonette prima donna, Rosa Labbanche, has been much applauded in Mignon at the Pergola, Florence.—(Another of Maurice Strakosch's discoveries.—Dr Blitge.)

Another precocious pianist, Gemma Grandi, aged ten, has made her appearance in public at Cremona, playing works by Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and other composers.

Stoumon has produced at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, where he is joint-manager with Calabresi, a ballet, Les Sorrentines, the music of which is his own manufacture.

Hillmann has petitioned the Corporation of Breslau to be allowed to retire from the management of the Stadttheater on the 1st August, 1883—a year sooner than the expiration of his lease.

Giulia Varesi has been appointed teacher of singing at the Liceo Musicale, Turin, in place of Carignani-Boccabadati, who has gone in the same capacity to the Istituto Rossini, Pesaro.

The Vogls, husband and wife, intend, on the 30th inst., to cancel their seven months' engagement with Angelo Neumann, and will again sing exclusively at the Theatre Royal, Munich.

Anna Riegl, from the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, has been engaged, at an annual salary of 12,000 marks—£600—to succeed Schröder-Hanfstängl at the Theatre Royal, Stuttgart.

Adelina Patti, according to exceptional authority, is to give 50 performances in Brazil, next year, receiving no less than 3,000,000 francs, £120,000.—(6,000,000—£240,000.—Dr Blitge.)

Wagner's Tannhäuser was performed on the 23rd October, for the 100th time, at the Theatre Royal, Cassel, the first representation having taken place on the 15th May, 1853, under the direction of Louis Spohr.

Hamlet and Le Prophète are in preparation at the Teatro Real, Madrid. In the first-named work Mdme Sembrich is to be the Ophelia, while Lhérie, as Hamlet, will make his first appearance in the Spanish capital.

The Danish composer, Siegfried Saloman, husband of the late Mdme Nissen-Saloman, is in Paris, with a view, it is said, of having his operas brought out in the French capital.—(Poor Siegfried Salomon.—Dr Blitge.)

The Mendelssohn Prize has been gained this year by Mdlle Soldat, in the opinion of her teacher, Herr Joachim, one of the most gifted among all the young violinists studying under him at the Royal High School of Music, Berlin.

Mr John E. Burgess, of Worcester, has forwarded us a copy of his song "Tubal Cain," which we have little doubt will hold its own among the numerous musical illustrations of Charles Mackay's well known words. Mr Burgess has set his version (in the key of B flat) for a bass voice of average compass. The melody is characteristic of the words and the pianoforte accompaniment easy.

THE SONGS OF SCANDINAVIA
AND NORTHERN EUROPE.
EIGHTY-THREE NATIONAL AND POPULAR SONGS.

THE SONGS OF EASTERN EUROPE.
ONE HUNDRED VOLKSLIEDER OF AUSTRIA, HUNGARY, BOHEMIA, SERVIA, &c.

WITH ENGLISH WORDS BY CLARA KAPPEY.

EDITED BY

J. A. KAPPEY.

Price 2s. 6d. each, paper covers; 4s. cloth.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs, giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

MR KUHE'S BRIGHTON CONCERTS.

Brighton, Nov. 8th.

Mr Kuhe began his twelfth "Brighton Musical Festival" last night with a compliment to native talent, the two chief works in the programme being Mr Arthur Sullivan's sacred musical drama, The Martyr of Antioch, and Mr F. H. Cowen's Scandinavian Symphony. This was well. A good deal of admirably-meant but mischievous talk goes on now-a-days about supporting English composers, and, finding a market for the novelties they are ever ready to produce. By all means let us do so when both are worthy of patronage; not else. It is needful to discriminate in this matter. An English composer is none the better for his nationality, and a new work is none the more valuable for being new. When, therefore, capital is sought to be made out of patronizing native talent sensible men will want to know what kind of talent it is. Last night there was no doubt at all on this point. Mr Arthur Sullivan, though he has his temporary home on the boards of comic opera, is a musician of whom England feels justified in boasting. He has done things very nearly akin to greatness, while in Mr Cowen we have a young artist consistent in the loftiness of his aim, and justified in his ambition by the ownership of exceptional powers. In honouring two such Englishmen, and devoting to the exposition of their music all his resources, Mr Kuhe could not possibly make a mistake. Those resources, by the way, were worthy in large measure of an occasion that made pretensions to festival rank. It is true that neither chorus nor orchestra was imposing by its magnitude. The space available forbade this; but what quantity lacked quality did a good deal to make up for. Many of our best London instrumentalists, headed by Mr Carrodus, figured in the orchestra, which was quite competent, and the chorus deserved credit as decidedly the best ever associated with Mr Kuhe's festival. Connoisseurs familiar with the resonant voices of the Midland and Yorkshire choralists are particularly struck with the comparative feebleness of these Southerners. But if the Brighton singers cannot make the noise of some others, they can do their work with taste and precision. They did so last night, thereby justifying not only themselves, but their patient and clever trainer, Mr King. As regards the soloists, it suffices to mention the names of Mdmes Albani and Trebelli, Messrs E. Lloyd and H. King, in order to show that Mr Kuhe gave Mr Sullivan every chance of gaining rather than losing in the process of interpretation.

Weather was unpropitious, wind and rain having matters all their own way, to the extreme discomfort of everybody. Nevertheless a large audience assembled in the Dome, and seemed in better spirits than it was reasonable to expect. They applauded Mr Kuhe when he came on to conduct the National Anthem, sung to Sir Michael Costa's arrangement; they applauded the patriotic hymn itself, gave the artists a cordial welcome, and reserved a specially hearty cheer for Mr Sullivan, who directed the performance of his own work. Enthusiasm, however, was not very marked while the story of the Martyr of Antioch unfolded itself. As a matter of course the principal airs were well received, but it was curious to note the small effect apparently made by the charming lyric choruses with which the work abounds, notwithstanding that they were fairly given. When an audience of Mr Sullivan's work assumes this attitude towards its best feature, the outlook is unpromising. Happily, danger was averted through the success of the solos, which, as delivered by Mdme Albani and her colleagues, would have moved to warm demonstration an audience in temperature below zero. The soprano airs, more especially that of the Martyr at the Stake, could not have been better sung, so well did Mdme Albani unite technical skill and a fervidness of expression rare amongst English-speaking artists. Mdme Trebelli did little with the peculiar and peculiarly beautiful solo, "The Love-sick Maiden," but made her mark in "Io Pœan," which was the only number encored during the evening. Mr Lloyd's success in both his songs was a matter of assurance, as it has been everywhere since he "created" the part of Olybius at Leeds, in 1880. His rendering of "Come, Margarita, come," could not easily have been surpassed for the grace and intensity demanded alike by the subject and its musical treatment on his part. Mr King sang with unwonted vigour and skill, and made interesting a character having little interest in itself. Service was also carefully rendered by Mr Albert M'Guckin, in the small part of Fabius. Thus admirably equipped as regards its solos, the performance could scarcely fall short of success, and in point of fact it did not, applause at the conclusion being loud and long. The work of band and chorus, however, was not altogether faultless. It lacked sometimes both firmness and precision, when the comparative fewness of the choral voices allowed evidence to appear that each one had not been welded into that unity with the rest which under such conditions is necessary to the best possible result. The ensemble, no doubt, deserved praise, but was capable of much improvement.

Mr Cowen's symphony gave the orchestra a splendid opportunity of showing the whole sum of its excellence. No one can say that the chance was lost, each movement under the guidance of the composer offering points of exceptional executive merit; in fact, the work was clearly set forth, as far as the strength available made that possible, and the audience could nowhere have mistaken the language of the symphony, however much, through the absence of analytical notes, they may have become confused as to its meaning. Apropos of this matter, sneer as we may at analytical notes—and they are inadequate at best, because words fail in dealing with music—it seems absurd to put a programme work before an audience and not at the same time tell them what the programme is. It would be out of place to discuss once more the merits of Mr Cowen's Scandinavian "Tone Pictures." They are by this time pretty well known, and on all hands there is agreement. The symphony belongs to that which is excellent in art. An idea to this effect pervaded last night's audience, and better rewarded the composer than could any amount of mere conventional applause. The "Hallelujah," from Beethoven's Mount of Olives, finished the concert, and there only remains to acknowledge the very able and judicious service rendered at the organ by Mr Crapps, whose playing of the solo introductory to the cemetery scene in Mr Sullivan's work was a model of good taste.

Thursday, Nov. 9th.

The work of this festival was resumed yesterday afternoon under the direction of Mr August Manns, in presence of a considerable, though by no means crowded, assemblage of amateurs. It is Mr Kuhe's rule to bring together within one programme a liberal number of classical works for orchestra, in so doing conceding as little as possible to uncultured tastes and appealing to the minority who can appreciate the highest musical good. The plan certainly commends itself much more than any which seeks to gratify all preferences, one excellent result yesterday afternoon being that the performance received from those who heard it a continuous and not a fitful attention. The selection of pieces was comprehensive as well as liberal. True it recognized the existence of no composer before Mozart, whom the overture to Die Zauberflöte represented, but after him the choice was wide enough to embrace all schools and illustrate every conspicuous teaching. The overture just named came first in order, followed by Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, an always safe item with an average audience. This work serves with such an audience by way of a link between Beethoven and a form of composition that for good or evil has come much into vogue. Public taste, less truly artistic than of yore, is disinclined to music unassociated with a programme. It demands that composers shall illustrate rather than create and go outside their art for the sake of a more intelligible interest than any it can present alone. The Pastoral was heard with the attention it always commands, notwithstanding a performance by no means worthy, nor even, looking at the individual competence of the executants, such as might have been expected. It would be interesting to know exactly how much time was spent in rehearsal, and, if we assume this as satisfactory, then it would be no less interesting to speculate whether the work suffered because of its familiarity, or because the performers were not accustomed to Mr Manns, whose mode of conducting resembles Sam Weller's knowledge of London, being "extensive and peculiar." In any case there is no escape from blame. An indifferent rendering of the Pastoral by London artists should be an absolute impossibility. Following Beethoven's work came a Nocturne for orchestra, specially composed by Mr F. Corder, who conducted its performance. In this piece Mr Corder trusts entirely to the effect of melody and colouring, since the varied forms of accompaniment cannot be called treatment in the strict sense of the term. His two principal themes are contrasted, one consisting of simple rhythmical phrases being given to the "wind," the other a long-drawn subject falling to the violins in octaves. As the colour is laid on after the most approved modern manner, a harp being used of course, there is only one reason why Mr Corder's Nocturne should not pass as a success in its modest way. That reason could hardly be more fatal, since it is based upon the fact that the melodies are quite wanting in distinction, to say nothing of originality. New themes we are not entitled to expect, but when reliance is placed upon them those employed should at least rise above commonplace. Mr Corder's subjects do not so rise, and the discerning among his audience had one more occasion to reflect that even now, when the apparatus of musical utterance has become so complicated and imposing as almost to abolish the need of ideas, it is still requisite for a composer to abjure platitude. Mr Corder is capable of better things than painting over outline drawings of familiar figures; why does he not always keep up to the level of his ability? The Nocturne, like the Symphony, was indifferently played, the honour of an effective performance being preserved for a work much more exacting and hard'y more familiar, to wit, Hiller's pianoforte Concerto in F sharp minor. In a mood of good-humoured sarcasm Mendelssohn referred to certain composers as those "who write pieces in F sharp minor."* Human nature finds a strong satisfaction in aiming oblique blows at its friends, but Mendelssohn was not likely to have his old intimate, Hiller, in view the less because the Cologne master's work is one which the shafts of satire are unable to touch. Some connoisseurs who have much to say for their view rank it as Hiller's chef d'œuvre, but however this may be, the Concerto in F sharp minor gives genuine cause for regret that its composer is not better known by such representative works. A more masterly piece in the legitimate school of pianoforte music no living writer has given to the world. It combines strength and grace in a remarkable degree, while carrying to its highest development that form of using the pianoforte which recognizes it as a distinctive instrument rather than as a sham orchestra. The solo part was taken by Miss Kuhe, who may frankly be congratulated upon her boldness, since it was justified by success. Her task was no child's play, and serious results would have followed a slip, such as, in works of the modern "'Ercles vein," signifies little or nothing. But Miss Kuhe did not slip; she had mastered what she undertook, and if now and then in passage-playing there was the slightest tendency to falter—if, also, some of the cantabile phrases in the slow movement were not touched caressingly enough, these were points rather for hyper-criticism than for ordinary notice. The broad fact is that Miss Kuhe raised her artistic rank materially by a performance upon which all present congratulated her with warmth. The orchestra, as already intimated, appeared to advantage in Hiller's work, and left a satisfactory impression upon the hearer's mind. After the concerto came the Entr'acte in G from Schubert's music to Rosamunde, and the Fandango for violin and orchestra, in which Mr Carrodus again showed with what sympathy as well as skill he plays the works of his old master, Molique. The Fandango, a charming example of its class, could have had no better recommendation than was given to it by our English violinist. The introduction to Act III.—Dance of Apprentices and Procession of Meistersingers—from Wagner's famous and beautiful Nuremberg opera, together with the Hungarian march from Berlioz's Faust, brought the long list of pieces to an end.

Only one vocalist, Miss Ella Lemmens, took part in this concert, and she sang in Brighton for the first time. Her selections were Handel's "From mighty kings" and Rode's "Air with Variations." Of these, the second was better adapted than the first to display the young artist's strength as a light soprano of the florid school. Her rendering of the difficult variations gave marked satisfaction, and rightly, since it showed careful study and excellent training, superadded to uncommon natural gifts. Miss Ella Lemmens is entitled to take courage from her début in Brighton.

The rehearsal of Gounod's Redemption, last night, was made public, in order to gratify the many amateurs who cannot, for one reason or another, attend on Saturday next. Public rehearsals are, undoubtedly, bad in principle and injurious in practice; but this one may be excused, especially as Mr Randegger, who conducted, does not allow the presence of auditors to interfere with the execution of his duty. Criticism would, of course, be out of place; but we may say that promise of a good performance was abundantly given. The area of the dome was well filled with gratified listeners.

Friday, Nov. 10th.

With Gounod's Redemption in his programme, Mr Kuhe was perhaps wise to leave The Messiah out of it, since an objection may be entertained at Brighton, if not at Birmingham, to two works upon the same subject. The masterpiece of Handel, and the "Opus Vitæ Mese" of the French composer, possess, it is true, nothing in common save their theme, and we have yet to learn whether the novelty will to any serious extent displace that which has stood the assaults of time and change for nearly a century and a half. Meanwhile, Elijah has no rival in the domain of dramatic oratorio and stands alone, without the aid of profoundly tragic interest and absorbing significance such as distinguished the story of Calvary. Elijah, no doubt, is an heroic figure in Old Testament history, but taking full account even of all that Krummacher has advanced in eulogising the Tishbite, it may be said that Mendelssohn did as much for his hero as his music gains in return. Listening to the oratorio now, and marking its easy spontaneous flow, an amateur might be pardoned for supposing Mendelssohn wrote it as he did his overture to Ruy Blas, or Mozart that to Don Giovanni. Yet, as every reader of the master's biography knows, Elijah is the result of patient toil, and of a courage which shrank not from sacrifice of the gravest kind. Hardly a number stands now as it stood in the Birmingham score of 1846. The composer dealt with his manuscript mercilessly, but in that artistic spirit which reckons nothing complete so long as a touch is wanting. He cut away, and closed the wound; again he cut away, and filled up the chasm with new matter—nay, he even revised his revise, as in the case of the opening of the second part, which was originally in its present form; then began with a recitative, and then had the recitative removed. Who shall say that the work was not saved for remotest posterity by the devotion which, to so large an extent, re-wrote it; and who will venture to declare that young composers of the present day would not benefit by following the illustrious master's example? As it is they commit themselves to the crudities of first thoughts, and rush into print before their music has been heard, heedless of the fact that what is once given to the world cannot be recalled. The performance of Elijah last night, though supported by eminent soloists—than whom, indeed, no better could be found—was far from good. Many of the numbers were taken, or, at any rate, commenced, too slowly, this being especially the case with the overture. The attack was often made like that of modern infantry in skirmishing order, and not seldom a painful uncertainty reigned on the orchestra. Intelligent readers will have no difficulty in divining the source of these shortcomings. At the same time they will hardly feel disposed to blame the conductor for what was really excess of zeal. Mr Kuhe is a clever man, but he is only a man, and it is impossible for him or any one else to bear all the burden of managing this Festival, and also to discharge an artistic task which exacts the undivided attention of a cool, clear head, to say nothing of inborn faculties—unacquirable by ever so much assiduity. No doubt the devotion that makes him captain and pilot in one is encouraged by the indifference of the public to a conductor's responsibilities. This amounts to a general evil. Every man who has mastered the grammar of music is tempted to think himself qualified for discharging the most difficult and delicate of artistic tasks, one demanding not only experience, but, as we have just intimated, qualities that nature must provide for experience to develop. Mr Kuhe's case is, however, one of attempting too much, and it would be well for him to consider how far circumstances admit an arrangement easier to himself and more advantageous to the Festival. As regards the leading soloists, it suffices to mention the names of Mdme Albani, Mdme Trebelli, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Santley, each of whom achieved a familiar success. With these great favourites were associated some young artists who should have, because they require, more than passing remark. Miss Robertson took the chief soprano music in the first part, including that for the boy, which, by the way, enabled her to make a decided mark. Her expression in the dialogue between the widow and Elijah was hardly sympathetic enough for so intense a situation, but exhibited abundant intelligence, while in the concerted music her bright, fresh voice told with excellent effect. Miss Bertha Moore did useful work as second soprano, and Mr Lucas Williams as second bass, while the little that fell to Mr Hirwen Jones served for the display in a promising manner of an agreeable tenor voice. There remains to speak of Miss Emily Dones, a young lady previously unknown to us, but certain to be often heard in the future. Miss Dones, who has a voice of charming quality, sang "Woe unto them" in a fashion which at once sent many of the audience to their programmes in search of her name. Her method was artistic, her style good, and her expression all that the subject demanded. The recognition of this young singer's merit was prompt, a hearty round of applause following the last note. The Brighton audience, by the way, do not seem to have learned the propriety of waiting till a piece is finished before making noisy demonstrations. Not a few bars of Mendelssohn's music were drowned last night in hand-clapping. Mr Matthew Arnold might call this Philistinism, and not be far wrong.

Saturday, Nov. 11th.

When a man purposes giving a "benefit" concert he naturally takes the course best adopted to secure a full house. It is significant that Mr Kuhe sought to attain this very desirable end last night by providing what is understood as a "popular" programme—one, that is to say, made up of favourite songs and light orchestral pieces. The attendance justified him in what he did for them. There were some empty stalls, but the cheaper seats found plenty of occupants, all disposed to enjoy the feast provided, and by no means unwilling to demonstrate their sentiments. It would be almost treason against art to rest content with the state of public taste thus indicated, and not to hope for a time when the million shall sit enraptured over symphonies and concertos; but as that time is not yet, and not even at hand, practical wisdom suggests that the best should be made of present circumstances. None of us can cram symphonies and concertos down the public throat; if the people will not have them they will not, and there is an end of it. At the same time we need not despair of educating them up to the required point, and one step in that direction consists in recognizing that there is popular music good, and popular music bad, the first to be accepted, the second to be shunned. Ballads, songs, and dance themes, which the least cultured ear takes in with delight, are not necessarily meet objects of scorn and contempt. The greatest masters have written them, and when excellent of their kind they minister not only to delight but to edification. A man therefore who gives "popular" concerts need not go about with shame of face as though guilty of an unworthy deed. His place among the ministers of art may be humble, but we are hardly in a position to abolish it yet. Mr Kuhe's programme last night contained little or nothing against which it was possible to advance objection, and much to be accepted out of hand. Take the orchestral pieces for example. In good sooth nobody can be other than a gainer by hearing the overture to Guillaume Tell, especially when, as on this occasion, it is capitally played. That bright, picturesque, and inspiriting composition shows how a genuine work of art can appeal to universal perception, and need not be hidden behind the clouds and darkness of abstruse and involved utterance. Weber's Concertstück is another case in point, and as this, on the testimony of the composer, has a story attached, we may regret that last night's audience did not enjoy the advantage of knowing what the music was intended to express. Happily, the Concertstück can stand alone, without help from a "programme," and it once more gave unfeigned pleasure. Mr Randegger conducted the performance in his usual clear, decisive way, and Mr Kuhe played the solo part in his best manner. Few pianists, it may be, know Weber's piece better than Mr Kuhe, and when a man of his experience takes up that with which he is intimate he has a clear right to respectful attention, with the almost certainty of success. Mr Kuhe was very properly applauded and recalled by his audience. A Sclavonian dance in D major, by Dvoràk, and a part of the ballet music from Rubinstein's Feramors followed in due course, Mr Randegger again conducting, and securing for these examples of Sclavonic composition a decided and intelligent, if not very refined, rendering. The strangeness of these pieces of Dvoràk's especially told upon their hearers, but we shall all have to familiarize ourselves with the music of the formidable race which artistically as well as politically looms large upon the European horizon. A selection from Patience, in which the orchestra was associated with the band of the 4th Royal Dragoon Guards, a Serenata by Tschaikowsky, a Romance for violin (Carrodus) by Svendsen, the Gavotte from Mignon, and the March from Le Prophète were likewise in Mr Kuhe's liberal programme. If this be our "popular" music, it is clear that we are not in such a bad way after all. The vocal pieces call for only brief remark. Mdme Albani's selections were Eckert's Guillaume d'Orange and the aria with violin obbligato from Le Prè aux Clercs, her festival pieces throughout the autumn. Mdme Antoinette Sterling sang a ditty, "Always Together," by Molloy, and Campana's romanza, "Canto d'amore." Mr Lloyd was heard in Blumenthal's well-known ballad, "Thy hand in mine," and Sullivan's "Once Again," while Mr Santley chose "Au bruit des lourds marteaux" and "O ruddier than the cherry." It is needless to state how these familiar things were given, and, indeed, we name them only to show with what discretion a programme intended to improve, while it amuses, can be made up.

* "And now the man (Kalkbrenner) is getting sentimental, imitates Hiller, and writes pieces in F sharp minor." (Mendelssohn's Letters from Paris.)—D. T.

Monday, Nov. 13th.

The business of this Festival came to an end on Saturday afternoon with a performance of M. Gounod's Redemption. There was an overflowing audience, gathered from all the country round, and influenced by the utmost curiosity as to the latest born of oratorios. So we may expect it to be everywhere till curiosity is satisfied, and then will come the test of permanent life. M. Gounod's name accounts for present crowds; but his genius only must be trusted for crowds in the future. We believe that, as exemplified in the Redemption, it will bear the strain, aided by the influence of a theme which is constant in its power, impressive in its solemnity, and instinct with a personal significance to everyone who regards it as more and better than a myth. The performance, directed by Mr Randegger, was satisfactory on the whole, having regard to limited opportunity of rehearsal. M. Gounod's work, simple as it may appear to one who sees it on paper, is really difficult and exacting. Solo vocalists of the highest eminence are not more than capable of meeting its requirements; the orchestra must be numerous and efficient in every department; while a proper rendering of the choral music demands qualities of dramatic and lyric expression precisely in the measure of the pathos and significance of the theme. The work calls for even more than this. Just as, to hear it well, the audience must give themselves up to religious feeling and avoid occupying a purely musical standpoint, so the performers, to do it justice should have their hearts in the work, not as actors playing a part, but as those to whom the events and attendant emotions are real. A performance of the Redemption, in fact, should be a religious exercise in the best sense, for, indeed, the oratorio specially claims a place by the side of Bach's Passion as one only heard in perfection amid sacred surroundings. Already we see it announced for performance in a London church, each section of the Trilogy forming part of distinct service. That the Redemption will come to be largely used in this legitimate and impressive manner we have not the smallest doubt. Meanwhile, as a piece for the concert room, it will suffer more or less from superficial or, rather, artificial expression, and we must expect the choruses to do so most of all. During the rehearsals for Birmingham M. Gounod laboured long and arduously to infuse into his choral interpreters the sentiments they were called upon to utter. His success, however, was but moderate, and at Brighton no sign of real feeling showed that the executants were in their subject and that their subject was in them. Apart from the higher and truer expression of which such a work is capable, no serious fault could be found. Mr Randegger had utilised his two rehearsals to the utmost, the result being that Brighton amateurs received, on the whole, a just idea as to M. Gounod's purpose and achievement. Of the principal singers four had previously identified themselves with the work. These were Mdme Albani, Miss Santley, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Santley, each of whom—it goes without saying—was quite competent to a task at once gracious and familiar. More, they had the music not so much at their fingers' ends as in their hearts, and gave it the just and true expression without which it resembles a soulless body. The fervid singing of Mdme Albani in "From thy love as a father," the clear and well-judged delivery of the tenor narrative by Mr Lloyd, and Mr Santley's pathetic utterance of the Divine words were especially noticeable as, in their way, perfect efforts. The contralto solos fell to Mdme Trebelli, who gave touching expression to the brief song of the Virgin Mother. Mr Lucas Williams, who took the bass narrative, sometimes sang out of tune, while failing to see that the story should be told without the least approach to demonstrativeness. He who would succeed in this task must take a hint from the simple, unimpassioned, and therefore, having regard to the subject, all the more impressive and pathetic language of the Evangelical narrative. The choruses were fairly rendered though deficient in requisite power, and the work of the orchestra, many of whose members essayed it for the first time, was often satisfactory in a high degree. Mr Randegger's conducting called for approval in various respects. It was clear and decisive, while the tempi were, as a rule, well judged, the march, for example, being taken a shade slower than at Birmingham, and thereby having that which is trivial in it toned down.—*D. FOUR TIMES MAYOR OF GLOSSOP.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR MR EDITOR,—James Sidebottom, Esq., of Queenwood Gipsy Hill, has been unanimously elected Mayor of Glossop for the fourth time. You will, perhaps, wonder why I give you the information. This gentleman is simply one of the most liberal patrons of music living. He called a meeting of his townsmen, a short time ago, in reference to the Royal College of Music and headed the subscription list with £50. He gave 50 guineas, and an annual subscription of 5 guineas, towards a Cottage Hospital lately erected here; he enlarged the Sunday Schools at the back of where I am now residing at a cost of £1,500; he heard, during one of his attendances at the Crystal Palace, that our cornet player had a very indifferent instrument, and authorized me to pay Mr Arthur Chappell £11 11s. for a new one. He is the president of the Glossop Philharmonic Society, and by his munificence keeps the society going successfully. Many other acts of a similar nature, too numerous to mention, has to be credited to this good and noble gentleman. This is why I have informed you of an almost unprecedented event, viz., that he was elected unanimously, for the fourth time, Mayor of Glossop.—Yours faithfully,

A. J. PHASEY.

Upper Norwood, Nov. 14th, 1882.

MILAN.—Eugenio Merelli, the theatrical manager, died, aged only fifty-six, on the 1st inst., after suffering terribly from a most painful disease—or rather complication of diseases. He was the son of the equally well-known Bartolomeo Merelli, who made a large fortune by giving Italian opera at the Kärntnerthortheater, Vienna. Eugenio Merelli, though little acquainted with music, possessed excellent judgment, and began by making tours with opera-companies in Italy. In later years he became the impresario of Mdme Adelina Patti and Mdme Christine Nilsson, by whom he made large sums. He subsequently lost most of his fortune in speculations connected with the money-market, though he saved sufficient to keep him above want. He leaves two children.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

Of the five works played at the concert given by Herr Richter, in St James's Hall, on Tuesday night, four rank among the most familiar in a not very extensive repertory. These were the overture to Euryanthe, Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, the Introduction to the third act of Die Meistersinger, and the Introduction and Finale of Tristan und Isolde. It is quite needless to tell how music so often heard at the Richter Concerts was rendered, but silence on this score does not at all imply that its performance was superfluous. The most valuable things in art are those which have passed beyond criticism, and the presentation of which is an event too common for remark. A fact better worth remembering just now would be hard to find. Musical life, at any rate, is not justly determined by creative activity, which may resemble the inordinate appetite often found along with small power of assimilation. We are naturally anxious to encourage production, but a rage for something new, when it begets indifference to that which is old and inexhaustible of good, can be no other than vicious in principle and in effect. Herr Richter evidently believes in going again and again over the same ground. His is no gospel of superficiality—the parent of that non-lucidity against which a philosopher has just raised his voice. Hence he invites us again and again to explore with him the depths of Wagner's few practical pieces for orchestra, and to listen with unwearied ears while Beethoven's most familiar utterances are repeated. It is just this course that teaches, in the best sense of the term, though it may fail to satisfy quidnuncs who think they need no teaching.

The one novelty in Tuesday's programme was that which, a few weeks ago, drew to the Crystal Palace a crowd of amateurs, most of whom, we may take for granted, eagerly welcomed a second hearing of Brahms's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat. We assume this, not because of an impression that there was a desire to revel again in obvious beauty, but because of a shrewd idea that connoisseurs sought to discover whether there was any beauty in which to revel. It is not intended to discuss here whether Brahms was right or wrong in composing four movements instead of three, or whether he kept in view executive display. These are questions of externals—mere husks and parings, which a man throws aside who is anxious to reach the core. There should be no desire to tie any composer down to a given form for that form's sake. Let him be "fully persuaded in his own mind," and adopt any other, of course, on his own responsibility; and let him be judged by the result, not by his temerity. The real question is whether in Brahms's new work we have the Beautiful, and therefore the Good—for, as M. Gounod has lately said, "the Beautiful and the Good are consubstantial." It is impossible to reply with an absolute negative or affirmative, since the Concerto illustrates the tendency to exaggerate which drives truth into the arms of error. That the power of musical beauty lies with Brahms no just mind will venture to deny. It has been proved again and again, yet as often, perhaps, have connoisseurs detected a "little rift within the lute"—a tendency, that is, to structural elaboration not demanded for an expression of the indwelling spirit. Passages even in the German Requiem are disfigured by this superfluity of means, and they so abound in the Concerto that those who follow the essential lines of the work are continually brought up by involutions and convolutions that either excite wonder or encourage indifference according to temperament. Herein Brahms resembles the man who seeks to irrigate a tract of land with insufficient water. There are dry and arid wastes between the channels for which his inspiration is sufficient, and these he works with painful toil in the vain hope of making something grow against the laws of nature. It is curious to observe how the extreme of such labour touches the extreme of that wherein the old contrapuntists revelled. We talk sometimes with the superiority attendant upon, if not becoming to, modern light, about the dry, formal, almost mathematical work of the periwig school, but much that is turned out of hand by the present dishevelled cultus is equally dry and, in its way, as formal, the only difference being that it is not mathematical and proves nothing; not symmetrical, and, therefore, satisfies no sense. The aridity of the old masters was at least that of a ploughed field, and showed that somebody with an eye had been at work there. Brahms's Concerto must, we fear, be regarded as "patchy" in a very grave sense of the term. In every movement there are the shinings of genius, and bright manifestations of beauty either in form or spirit; but these are divided by dark bands of laboured music tending to confusion—music not recognized by the inner perception which, in all such cases, forms the court of ultimate appeal. There is a school of theology known as the "high and dry." We want no such thing in our art outside the confessed domain of scholastic exercises, however it may be supported by metaphysical considerations. The business of abstract music is to be beautiful, and through the varied expression of beauty to excite pleasurable emotions. Whatever seeks to do more, or stops at less, fails. Brahms, on his part, has mixed the beautiful with the ugly, the orderly with the irregular, the intelligible with that which evades comprehension, the purposeful with that which seems to have no aim. In short, he has out-written himself, and in attempting a lengthy oracle did not first take stock of his afflatus. The performance, like all given under Herr Richter's direction, was excellent in intention and praiseworthy in result. Especially may Mr Dannreuther be congratulated upon playing the solo with skill and correctness. He had an unthankful task, since the effect of the pianoforte part is by no means proportioned to its great difficulty; but he achieved it with characteristic enthusiasm, and earned far more applause than an audience lacking enthusiasm were disposed to give.—D. T.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The following is the programme of music given at the fortnightly meeting of professors and students on Saturday, November 11:—

Sonata, in F minor, No. 4, organ (Gustav Merkel), Mr Edwin Drewett, pupil of Dr Steggall; Song, "Zuleika," No. 1 (Mendelssohn)—(accompanist, Mr Charles Reddie)—Mis Kate McKrill, pupil of Mr Benson; Allegro Moderato, from MS Sonata in G, pianoforte (Annie Daymond, student), Miss Annie Daymond, pupil of Dr Steggall and Mr H. R. Eyers; Song, "The Carrier Dove" (Frederic H. Cowen)—(accompanist, Miss Alexandra Ehrenberg)—Miss Dicksee, pupil of Mr Randegger; Allegro, from Sonata in E flat, pianoforte (Haydn), Miss Hann, pupil of Mr Walter Fitton; Song (MS.), "Love Song" (Mary C. Gillington, student)—(accompanist, Mr H. R. A. Robinson)—Mr Arthur Thomson, pupil of Mr Davenport and Mr W. H. Cummings; Introduction and Polonaise, Op. 19, pianoforte and violoncello (F. Chopin), Miss Knight—pupil of Mr Brinley Richards, and Mr Hambleton—pupil of Mr Pezze; Prelude and Fugue, in F minor, Op. 35, No. 5, pianoforte (Mendelssohn), Mr Gwyn, pupil of Mr S. Kemp; Recitativo, "Ditemi buona Gente," e Canzonetta, "Fanciulle che il core," Dinorah (Meyerbeer)—(accompanist, Miss E. Bull)—Miss Eleanor Rees, pupil of Mr Shakespeare; Organ Fugue, in G minor (J. S. Bach, arranged for the pianoforte by Franz Liszt), Miss Evelyn Green, pupil of Mr Harold Thomas; Tema con Variazioni, in E, Op. 31 (Sterndale Bennett), and Gavotte, in A flat minor, Op. 14 (Giovanni Sgambati), pianoforte, Miss E. Yeatman, pupil of Mr Arthur O'Leary; Song, "To Chloe in Sickness" (Sterndale Bennett)—(accompanist, Mr H. R. A. Robinson)—Miss Edith Ray, pupil of Mr Walfworth; Allegro Moderato, from MS. Sonata in E flat, pianoforte (Dora Bright, student), Miss Dora Bright, pupil of Mr Prout and Mr Walter Macfarren; Song, "He roamed in the Forest" (Arthur O'Leary)—(accompanist, Miss Susanna Fenn)—Miss Collins, pupil of Mr Fiori; Des Abends, No. 1, from Phantasiestücke (Schumann), and Study in B, No. 22 (Gradus ad Parnassum), (Clementi), pianoforte, Miss Dora Turner, pupil of Sir Julius Benedict; Song, "The Legend of the Crossbill" (Rowland Briant, student)—(accompanist, Mr Briant)—Miss Ada Iggulden, pupil of Mr Prout and Mr Fiori; Sonata, in E minor, pianoforte (Edouard Grieg), Mr Ernest Kiver, pupil of Mr Wingham.

On Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 15, Mr R. H. M. Bosanquet gave a lecture "On the Combination of Simple Vibrations."

A Chamber Concert will be given in the Academy concert room this (Saturday) evening, November 18.

CAUTION TO THE PUBLIC.—A man, age about 36, height, 5ft. 6in., complexion fair, hair, moustache and whiskers (slight) brown; shaved on chin; eyes dark and searching; slight build; dress, dark coat and vest, grey trousers; gentlemanly appearance, is in the habit of calling on organists, and other members of the musical profession; invariably representing himself to be the son or nephew of some well-known organist or organ-builder, and, that he is at the present time, either an organist of Liverpool, or of Montreal Cathedral, Canada. During the temporary absence of the person he calls upon, he abstracts whatever valuable article may be to hand; and under the pretence of having lost his purse, obtains an advance of money. He also states that he has had a letter of introduction from some well-known man in the musical world; but has unfortunately lost it. Any information respecting this man will be gladly received by The Director of Criminal Investigation, Great Scotland Yard.

"SE NON È VERO, È mal TROVATO."—According to various Paris papers, discipline at the Grand Opera is at an exceedingly low ebb. The members of the chorus and ballet, we are informed, chat with each other when on the stage, and, at a recent performance of Les Huguenots, one of the Noblemen whiled away the time during the banquet-scene by perusing the Figaro.

CHERUBINI.

Nor was the success a mere momentary affair, for two hundred performances scarcely sufficed to satisfy the public curiosity. Then, after France, other countries, headed by Germany, welcomed the work with marked favour. It is also as well to remark that in Germany, more faithful than ourselves to Cherubini's memory and glory, Les Deux Journées has never since ceased to be a stock piece in the great lyric theatres, where it was entitled Der Wasserträger (The Water Carrier), and where it continues to be constantly performed, as does also Médée. After Germany, Italy also wanted to appropriate Les Deux Journées, but the reader will see from the following lines what reasons were opposed to its success there :

"The opera of Les Deux Journées, the success of which was so brilliant and so long kept up in Paris, was transported to Naples and performed at the grand theatre by the first artists. Book and music were alike failures. Two causes are assigned for this : the first, that the exceedingly beautiful music which Cherubini composed for the work is thoroughly dramatic, and not full enough of melody for Italy, though much more tuneful than that of the other operas by him. The second is that the Neapolitans, though also emerging from the horrors of civil troubles, understood nothing of the picture representing the troubles of our Fronde; that the exhibition of strange manners did not interest them; and, lastly, that the character of the principal personage, the Water Carrier, produced no effect on them, because his occupation and the implements employed for it are entirely unknown in Naples." †

With regard to France, there is one fact which is somewhat unusual, and, therefore, worth mentioning, namely: the agreement which existed in connection with Les Deux Journées, between the opinion of artists and that of the public. The public, without being able to analyse their sensations, instinctively felt themselves in presence of a superior work, full of nobleness and grandeur, and without more ado submitted to its ascendancy; musicians, for their part, rendered justice to the powerful work, and being able to estimate its beauties and go back to their source, some of them thought fit to publish the result of the conscientious analysis to which they had devoted themselves. Thus I find in a class paper, Les Tablettes de Polymnie, then under the direction of that excellent professor, Alexis de Garaudé, the subjoined interesting article. At the time the article was published ten years had elapsed since Les Deux Journées first appeared, and the work was still in full possession of public favour.

"The most honourable and most flattering prize a musician can gain," says the writer, "is to enjoy the approbation of all the artists of Europe, and force even his rivals to admiration and praise. M. Cherubini obtained that prize, when he published the score of Les Deux Journées. That learned production put him for ever in the first place as a composer. All that is indispensable to form a whole approaching perfection may be found in this work : a learned method, broad execution, a pure style, a fine ordonnance, justness of expression, and nobleness and richness in the accompaniments, which, from the way in which they are conceived, always leave the first place to the melody—all things contribute to render this composition both classical for study and satisfactory for effect.

"The first act is remarkable for three pieces full of spirit and most finely conceived : the trio of Mikeli, Armand, and Constance, 'O mon libérateur!' which charms simultaneously the heart and ear, and leaves in the spectator's soul the pure and touching joy produced by the recollection of a noble action; the fine duet between Constance and Armand : 'Non, dût-il m'en coûter la vie,' a model of noble and pathetic style, presenting every moment the idea of that grandioso which painters with justice esteem so highly. We hardly suspect that there are any accompaniments to this charming duet, with such art are they managed and so analogous are they to the spirit of the melody which characterizes it. The finale of the first act is a masterpiece of art; the orchestra supplies a motive, but the latter takes nothing from the melody. It belongs exclusively to the style of an accompaniment, to the secondary accent of expression which embellishes a figure without concealing any of its features. The melody is always uppermost, and is of an admirable sort, being produced by Antonio's gratitude on again seeing Armand, his old benefactor. After the first motive we have a second, which is of the descriptive kind. As this kind permits of greater liberty in the employment of orchestral details, the motive is treated with the most exquisite taste, but, despite all the riches exhibited in the fine accompaniments which adorn it, the singers are always at their ease, while, as their conversation is so well heard, the orchestra seems to be speaking only 'aside,' and to be placed there merely to applaud the projects which the personages entertain. This finale ends with an invocation to Providence, which produces the grandest effect, and in which all the resources of superb harmony back up the enthusiasm of the highly touching and well-conducted scene.

"The second and the third act offer us only concerted pieces, in which the action dominates everything else; it is here we should admire the composer's dramatic genius. Thanks to the surprising resources he has derived from his art, Cherubini has here succeeded in putting so much variety, so much energy, and so much clearness of expression into the accompaniments, that the hearer, always satisfied and enchanted, advances with the dramatic action from scene to scene, without feeling the want of airs to afford him a rest or to divert him. Fancy sustaining two entire acts in this manner, without allowing the action to flag for a moment! We confess it is an effort of genius we cannot too much admire. The author was sailing on a sea bristling with rocks and full of breakers; he succeeded in avoiding all of them, by inspiring, so to speak, his crew with all the gaiety, confidence, and feeling of security which he was far from sharing himself when he ordered the manœuvres. He has proved that genius can conquer anything except ignorance and envy." ‡

† Année théâtrale for the Year X., pp. 259, 260.—Some years later, an Italian author modified the libretto of Les Deux Journées, and Mayr set it to music, the result being one of the best things he ever did. His score was not, however, as good as Cherubini's, if we are to believe Herold, who was a competent judge. I found in the diary in which Herold entered all his impressions during his travels in Italy, the following lines concerning Mayr's production :—"Le Due Giornate, by Mayr, which they are performing at the little Nuovo theatre" (Bologna), "is a fine work . . . . especially for any one who does not know Cherubini's opera."

A THOUGHT ON SKATING.*

Vivante.

The morn is crisp, the trees look gaunt and bare,
And Nature's face is pale with hoary frost;
The young folk ruddy look, the old with care
Sit close around the fire in reverie lost.

The wintry winds have clasped the earth so firm,
As if 'twere made of iron or other metal base;
The lakes and ponds and every tiny burn
Are frozen o'er, likewise the swift mill race.

Far in the distance roam from shore to shore
Of one large lake fair forms and faces gay,
Their laughter echoing down the woody gore,
While on their skates from side to side they sway.

Change time.

With faces smiling, and the ringing skate,
Which music-like keeps time with movements graceful,
Al fresco very such a pretty fête,
'Twould happy be if nothing were more hateful.

Old time.

They cross, re-cross, and wander to and fro
In endless happiness, their time their own;
The healthful pastime bringing forth a glow
Lent now by nature, but a hard made loan.

Con expressione.

For look within! close to the fire so bright
Sit those we love, who linger now on earth;
Alas! too soon to vanish from our sight,
Dear ones we've doated on from birth.

Con molto ex.

As those now skating up and down the lake
With speed so swift and heedless of all care;
So is our life for ever linked with fate,
We realize it not till death is there.

DEATH.

On November 11th, at 96, Gloucester Place, Portman Square, GEORGE ROSE, M.A., (Arthur Sketchley), in his 66th year.—R. I. P.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

GARNISH OF THE MOUNT.—Sir Petipace is still hoving at the hostelry, Miles of Malvern (which is now all snow—mere snow) being indisposed and laid up in sheets. Petipace, in sheets of another kind, pines piteously. Miles was smitten through either rib by an approved knight. Song as pretty as the "lay" to which it is wedded, but the setting of the final stanza is a mistake to justify Wagner.

CONCERTS.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Concerts are becoming more and more numerous as the winter season advances; but little novelty of any great significance has hitherto marked their progress. The first appearance for the season (much earlier than usual) of Herr Joseph Joachim at the head of the stringed quartet (on the 3rd of next month) will, as usual, give a fresh impetus to the Popular Concerts in St James's Hall. There is a spell in the name of this unrivalled artist which, year after year, only seems to strengthen. Meanwhile, much curiosity awaits the first performance of Anton Dvorák's pianoforte quartet in D major, which, hitherto unknown to Mr Arthur Chappell's patrons, enjoys the advantage of being introduced by Mr Charles Hallé. The quartet is an early work, but will be heard with not less interest on that account. With the best of good feeling, Herr Hans Richter has given two concerts in St James's Hall, the profits of which are intended to recoup, as far as possible, the losses sustained by members of the orchestra during the unfortunate series of performances at Drury Lane Theatre. Herr Richter had the same orchestra, or, at least, one in every way as efficient both in numbers and mechanical proficiency. On each occasion the hall was full (on the second, crammed), and the great Viennese conductor was hailed with acclamations. His programmes were much of the same calibre and proportions as before, the only features that could be pronounced quasi "novelties" being the second pianoforte concerto of Johannes Brahms (played by Mr Edward Dannreuther), the orchestral prelude to Wagner's Parsifal, and the "Serenade" in G by Mr C. Villiers Stanford. These have been already heard and commented upon. The symphonies were both by Beethoven—the Eroica (No. 3) and C minor (No. 5). It is to be hoped, for more than one reason, that the concerts may have answered the purpose for which they were so generously undertaken by Herr Richter. But why should he be content with so little? Explain and oblige your constant reader,

T. A. WHEELS (M.D.).

Axminster, Nov. 14th.

[Let Dr Wheels draw upon his own imagination. We ask for no more.—Dr Bridge.]

PAULINE LUCCA SPEAKS.

To hear Pauline Lucca talk about her art is not uninteresting. In reply to the remark made by a visitor that Wagner's compositions spoilt the best voices, she said: "That is all empty prittle-prattle. Neither Wagner nor any other composer spoils the voice of anyone who knows how to sing. Our vocalists, male and female, think now-a-days that if they study a year they are finished artists, and can sing before a large public. Six years of industrious application are needed to develop the voice according to all the rules of art. Only let our singers work away for their six years, and then diligently practise their scales—as I still do, to the great astonishment of our Vienna Capellmeister, Hans Richter, whom I so highly esteem, despite all our skirmishings—and then we shall have singers able to sing not merely Wagner, but correctly as well." Perhaps our singers will lay to heart these words of a vocalist who is so universal a favourite. In answer to the observation that she would certainly earn our deepest thanks if she would publish the result of her rich experience as to how a voice should be treated and what studies were requisite before natural gifts were of any value, she said: "I mean to do so, but not as you, perhaps, fancy: with pen and ink. When I feel that it's all over with my voice I shall accept a place in the Vienna Conservatory, and, as a singing-mistress, form voices as I think they ought to be formed. But, before becoming a Professoress, I hope to be able to sing a few times more." We hope so, too.—Signale.

THE accomplished pianist, Mdme Montigny-Rémaury, has been prevented by illness from going to St. Petersburgh for the purpose of taking part in the first of the series of concerts under the direction of Rubinstein. She is, however, at present much better, and will play at the concert of the Château d'Eau, Paris, on the 26th inst.

MR ARTHUR O'LEARY will read his lecture on "Sir Sterndale Bennett; his Life and Works" at Sherborne on Thursday, November the 23rd. Miss G. Howes, a young and promising soprano, will sing two of the composer's charming songs on the occasion, viz.: "To Chloe," and "May dew." Mr and Mrs Regan and other artists will also assist.

MR J. CLIPPENDALE announces a concert at Morley Hall, Hackney, on Monday, Dec. 4, under the patronage of the Lord Bishop of Bedford and Mrs Walsham How, in aid of the Tower, Schools, and Vicarage funds of St Michael and All Saints' Church, London Fields, Hackney. The singers will be Mdme Howitz, Mdme Patey, and Mr Edward Lloyd. Solos on the harp will be performed by Mr John Thomas, and Sir Julius Benedict's arrangement of his own Andante, and Chopin's Posthumous Mazurka, for four performers on two pianofortes, will be played by Miss Homer, Mrs Clippendale, Lady Benedict and Sir Julius Benedict. Lady Benedict and Mrs Clippendale will also play Mendelssohn's "Allegro Brillante," as well as Sir Julius Benedict's duet on airs from Der Freischütz, for two performers on one pianoforte.

GOUNOD ON MOZART'S DON JUAN.

At the annual sitting of the Five Academies in Paris, the composer of Faust and The Redemption thus unburdened himself on the subject of Mozart and the lyrico-dramatic masterpiece for all time :—

C'était au mois de janvier de l'année 1832. Dans l'admirable troupe musicale qui défrayait, à cette époque, les représentations du Théâtre-Italien brillaient les noms, demeurés illustres, des Malibran, des Grisi, des Rubini, des Lablache, des Tamburini, et une foule d'autres, concourant à un ensemble d'exécution tel qu'il s'en rencontre rarement au théâtre.

J'avais alors treize ans et demi : je faisais mes études au lycée Saint-Louis, et j'avais eu l'honneur (car l'enfance a le sien) de faire partie du fameux banquet scolaire qu'on nomme la Saint-Charlemagne, honneur qui entraînait un de ces congés de surérogation appelés, en termes de collège, des sorties de faveur.

J'aimais passionnément la musique, et ma mère, qui savait bien que nulle récompense de mon travail ne pourrait me causer plus de joie que celle-là, m'annonça qu'elle me conduirait, le soir même, entendre Don Juan aux Italiens.

Ce fut pour moi un tel tressaillement de bonheur que j'en perdis le boire et le manger. Ce que voyant, ma mère me dit : "Tu sais que, si tu ne manges pas, tu n'iras pas au théâtre !" Devant une pareille menace, j'aurais englouti héroïquement tout ce qu'on aurait voulu.

Je dînai donc avec une obéissance exemplaire, et nous voilà partis, ma mère et moi, pour la Terre-Promise ! Il me sembla que j'allais pénétrer dans un sanctuaire.

En effet, à peine étions-nous entrés dans la salle que je me sentis enveloppé d'une sorte de terreur sacrée, comme à l'approche de quelque mystère imposant et redoutable ; j'éprouvais, tout ensemble, dans une émotion confuse et jusqu'alors inconnue, le désir et la crainte de ce qui allait se passer devant moi.

Nous étions dans une loge du quatrième étage ; les modiques ressources de ma mère, qui travaillait pour subvenir à l'éducation de ses enfants, n'avaient pas permis de prétendre à des places plus coûteuses : mais, comme nous étions arrivés de bonne heure, nous fûmes placés sur le devant de la loge, à titre de premiers occupants.

Il fallut attendre assez longtemps avant que le spectacle commençât, mais le temps ne me durait pas ; cette salle de théâtre, ce lustre, tout cet appareil grandiose, étaient déjà pour moi un éblouissement. Enfin, on frappe les trois coups sacramentels ; le chef d'orchestre lève son archet, un religieux silence règne dans la salle et l'ouverture commence.

Je renonce à décrire ce que je ressentis dès les premiers accords de ce sublime et terrible prologue. Comment le pourrais-je, lorsqu'aujourd'hui encore, après cinquante ans d'une admiration toujours croissante, mon cœur tressaille d'y penser et ma main tremble de l'écrire ? . . . . Tout ce que je me rappelle, c'est qu'il me sembla qu'un dieu me parlait ; je tombai dans une sorte de prostration douloureusement délicieuse, et, à demi suffoqué par l'émotion : "Ah ! maman !" m'écriai-je, "ça c'est la Musique !" J'étais littéralement éperdu.

O divin Mozart ! as-tu donc reposé sur le sein de la Beauté infinie, comme autrefois le disciple bien-aimé sur la poitrine du Sauveur, pour y puiser à torrents cette grâce incomparable qui marque les grands privilégiés ? Ton berceau a-t-il entendu, lui aussi, cette parole qui descendit d'en haut sur l'Homme-Dieu transfiguré : "Celui-ci est mon Fils bien-aimé en qui j'ai mis toutes mes complaisances ; écoutez-le !" Oh ! oui, toutes ses complaisances ! Car le Ciel prodigue t'avait tout donné, la grâce et la force, l'abondance et la sobriété, la spontanéité lumineuse et la tendresse ardente, dans cet équilibre parfait qui constitue l'irrésistible puissance du charme et qui a fait de toi le musicien par excellence, plus que le premier, le seul ! . . . Mozart !

Eh ! qui donc a parcouru, comme toi, cette échelle immense des passions humaines ? Qui donc a touché les limites extrêmes avec cette sûreté infaillible, également armée contre les mièvreries de la fausse élégance et les brutalités de la force mensongère ? Qui donc a su, comme toi, faire passer l'angoisse et l'épouvante à travers les formes les plus pures et les plus inaltérées ?

Don Juan ! Tout un monde humain !—la noble femme outragée et vengeresse—la fille palpitante sur le cadavre de son vieux père assassiné—le grand seigneur, libertin jusqu'au cynisme et audacieux jusqu'à l'injure devant la Justice divine—l'épouse rebutée et bafouée—la paysanne fascinée par la galanterie—la servilité d'un valet poltron et superstitieux—enfin cette figure tragique de la Statue du Commandeur dont les accents terribles vous glacent jusqu'aux moelles—tout ! Mozart a excelié dans tout, et le sublime semble lui être aussi familier que le comique.

Mozart disait de Don Juan qu'il l'avait composé pour lui et deux ou trois amis. Paroles profondes sous les dehors d'une ambition modeste ! C'est que l'intimité est la quintessence de la vie : c'est le tabernacle de tous les grands recueillements, l'amitié, l'amour, le génie (cette forme particulière de l'extase) : l'intimité, c'est le face-à-face avec les confidences du divin. Aussi l'avenir a-t-il multiplié les deux ou trois amis de Don Juan comme les étoiles du ciel et les sables de la mer.

Ah ! jeunes gens, qui repoussez et redoutez la doctrine des maîtres comme un joug humiliant pour votre individualité ombrageuse, et qui vous jetez à la remorque du premier charlatan venu ! véritables bolides, livrés à l'influence de tous les foyers d'attraction qui traversent l'espace ! je vous connais, et je sais ce que vous voulez. Vous visez à l'effet, comme on vise à l'esprit. Ce n'est pas votre Art qui vous possède ; c'est votre Moi : vous vous souciez bien moins d'être que de paraître ; vous pensez à vous, et vous vous cherchez avec une passion qui n'est que le cauchemar de votre propre succès.

Eh bien, vous ne vous trouverez pas ; car, "qui se cherche se perdra ; et qui se renonce se retrouvera." Qui placera sa force et sa joie dans le succès trouvera sa faiblesse et son découragement dans un échec. L'amour-propre est un suicide ! C'est une méprise proportionnée à la quantité de lumière et de générosité qui est la véritable vie de l'amour, et dont il a besoin pour être pleinement satisfait.

Or, de même que l'amour, le génie est, avant tout, l'abnégation. Les lois du Beau sont les mêmes que celles du Bien ; car le Beau et le Bien, consubstantiels dans leur essence absolue, ne se distinguent entre eux, comme pour nous, que par leurs propriétés respectives et par leurs relations spéciales avec les diverses facultés de notre entendement dans lequel leur rayon unique se réfrange, en quelque sorte, comme dans un prisme intellectuel ; et c'est pourquoi, dans la valeur esthétique d'une œuvre d'art, aussi bien que dans la valeur d'un acte moral, il entre pour le moins autant de ce qu'on s'y interdit que de ce qu'on s'y permet. Le génie, c'est toujours la personnalité, sans doute, mais s'oubliant elle-même et s'élevant ainsi jusqu'à l'expression de l'Humanité tout entière, c'est-à-dire jusqu'à la plus haute impersonnalité.

Revenons à Don Juan.

Messieurs, je devrai forcément renoncer à une analyse détaillée, sous peine de donner à cette lecture des proportions qui risqueraient fort de ne plus intéresser que moi seul, et je ne pourrai guère que signaler à la hâte quelques-uns de ces morceaux qui, tous, sont des merveilles.

Et d'abord, l'ouverture. Quelle entrée en matière que ce grave et majestueux début, emprunté au lugubre tête-à-tête du coupable et de l'Homme de pierre ! Comme le rhythme solennel qui soutient ces harmonies funèbres exprime éloquemment et tranquillement le poids de cette justice divine "parfois tardive" dont parle Plutarque, et dont Tertullien disait qu'elle est "patiente parce qu'elle a l'éternité pour elle !"

Quelle philosophie profonde dans cette intuition immédiate du pur génie, intuition consciente ou non, peu importe, mais, selon la grande parole de Bossuet, "illumination soudaine de la Raison," plus sûre mille fois que les pénibles et fatigantes élucubrations d'un emphatique et prétentieux transcendantalisme ! Qu'il est écrasant ! Qu'il est effrayant ! cet Homme de pierre qui s'avance d'un pas monotone et implacable comme la fatalité ! il ressemble au grondement sourd d'un océan qui monte et qui va tout submerger ; à lui seul cet Homme est un déluge !

Mais les avertissements du Ciel ne sont point écoutés. Et voici que, soudain, des rythmes d'une jeunesse impétueuse, affolée de plaisir, haletante de débauche, impatiente du joug et du frein, nous lancent en plein vertige dans un allegro, qui déborde d'entraînement et de verve fougueuse.

Quelle énergie svelte et impudente à la fois ! quelle élégance dans ce dévergondage d'impie et de corrompu ! Que d'insouciance hautaine dans ce voluptueux spadassin qui rira et boira et chantera jusque devant la mort ! Quelle sonorité mutine et pétillante après toutes ces terreurs ! Le drame est déjà tout entier dans cette prodigieuse ouverture qui fut écrite dans une nuit : nuit féconde, dont on aurait pu dire, comme l'écrivain sacré prophétisant celle de la naissance de l'Enfant-Dieu : Nox sicut dies illuminabitur ! cette nuit sera lumineuse comme le jour !

MUNICH.—A probably unique specimen of the genus : literary man, is now stopping here. This is Baron Winzigerode, a hale and hearty patriarch of 87, who for sixty years of his life has been engaged, at his lonely ancestral home in Thuringia, writing a work on the history of music. Among his luggage is a monster trunk, wherein, carefully packed, is the voluminous MS. for which he is seeking a publisher and which, when printed, will make some 40 volumes.

CONCERTS.

THE POPULAR CONCERTS.—Abundant interest, if no novelty, distinguished the concert given on Monday last, and, though the hall was but moderately full, the gratification of those present could hardly have been other than complete. To some extent, the first work in the programme—Mozart's Quartet in D (No. 7)—accounts for this, being, as all amateurs know, a splendid example of the great musician's clearest and most graceful writing. For admiration of, and interest in it, no one requires to be told that the work gained from Frederick of Prussia a gold snuff-box full of the coins bearing his name. The fact is really more significant as regards the monarch than the music, because showing that he could appreciate a good thing which, however, needed no Royal patronage by way of passport to distinction. In the hands of Madame Neruda, MM Ries, Hollander, and Piatti, Mozart's music was of course safe. The second quartet—Haydn's in C. (Op. 33)—came at the end, and, as a merry example of the old master's unfailing humour, gained a cordial welcome. Such cheery strains as these might "appease the fiend of melancholy Saul," or restore the equilibrium of a mind and temper disordered by a course of Wagnerism, which would be a far more remarkable achievement. Hearing them, amateurs think of the first day of spring, that, according to one of our own poets, "wipes from the heavens all unseemly stains," and bless their stars for old Haydn, the master of ever fresh, genial, and natural expression, based upon consummate art. Mdlle Janotha's solo on this occasion was Chopin's Sonata in B minor, but she also joined Signor Piatti in performing Nos. 1, 2, and 4 of Schumann's "Stücke im Volkston." Her success with the sonata was immense, the audience recalling her twice. In acknowledgment, Mdlle Janotha played the same master's Berceuse. Like honours rewarded a capital rendering of Schumann's Stücke, the second being specially applauded. How much the superb execution of the facile princeps of 'cellists contributed to this result is easily imagined. Mr Harper Kearton was the vocalist, and sang Mendelssohn's "Stormy Spring" so as to obtain a recall.—D. T.

A PERFORMANCE of Handel's Jephtha was given by the Brixton Choral Society, in the Gresham Hall, on Monday evening, under the direction of Mr William Lemare. Always enterprising, and prompt to take up with novelty, the managers, in this instance, found it profitable to work the old and inexhaustible Handelian mine. They had a room crowded with local amateurs, who followed the painful story of the Jewish chieftain's "unnatural sacrifice" with continuous interest, and were quick to perceive and applaud whatever in the execution seemed worthy. The performance benefitted much by the manner in which the principal characters were represented. On this point it says no little for English executive art that a suburban concert of modest pretensions should be able to command the very satisfactory talent here shown. Mdme Clara Suter and Miss Marian Burton, as the soprano and contralto respectively, sang with genuine feeling, each deserving special praise, moreover, for so enunciating the text as to make books of the words superfluous—an example which we should like to see followed by artists of higher standing. Mr Alfred Kenningham distinguished himself as Jephtha, singing all the important music of that part with taste and skill, if not with the requisite measure of dramatic power. His rendering of "Waft her, angels" fully deserved the liberal applause it received. As for the bass solos, they could not be other than safe in the hands of an artist so experienced as Mr Lewis Thomas, whose fine voice, in admirable order, was heard to much advantage. Mr Thomas's singing of "Freedom now once more possessing" was a capital exemplification of what is meant by a Handelian style. The general performance of the oratorio fell much below expectation, and disposed us to conclude that it had been rashly ventured. Even the choral singing presented many and grave faults. It lacked precision, and was generally poor in quality. The most serious shortcomings were, however, in the orchestra. We are glad to find Mr Lemare gathering up the instrumental talent of the district; but, judging by Monday's work, it needs a deal of nursing yet. Especially should the conductor, before giving another concert, teach his violins to travel together along the right path, and his flautist, who twice broke down at a simple passage in "Tune the soft melodious lute," to learn the value of his notes. These observations are not intended to be harsh, they are inevitable, if criticism do its duty. Neither do we "despise the day of small things." There is musical spirit in Brixton, and the southern suburb will be more favourably heard of by-and-bye.—D. T.

MR WALTER BACHE'S RECITAL.—The act of homage which Mr Walter Bache annually pays to his revered master, the Abbé Franz Liszt, is almost touching in its earnestness. Taking no heed to the desire of the greater musical community, Mr Bache sedulously applies himself to the task of pleasing those who, like himself, are for certain and inexplicable reasons enamoured of the music of this peculiarly erratic musician. Appealing, as he does, to the limited few, Mr Bache evidently possesses the courage of his opinions, and is anxious to do his best towards furthering the general recognition of his preceptor as a great power in music. Unfortunately, it happens on occasions that some of the inelect peep in at these honorific entertainments, and the result to them is not unalloyed joy. To pianists who deem the highest province of a composer to be the providing of tortuous difficulties for the soloist, whence he may extricate himself according to his ability, but with no thought or heed to the sensibilities of his hearers, Liszt's music may be welcome; but to those who wish to hold their audience with the spell and fascination of melodious utterance, his works will be at a discount. Music never can become one of the abstruse sciences, for the very reason that when it loses its universal charm, and degenerates into a mere exercise of ingenuity, it is doomed to perish. How often must it be insisted upon that in music, of all the arts, the sense of beauty must be predominant? Unhappily, there was no beauty to be discovered in the programme which Mr Bache presented at St James's Hall, and we fear that he has made no new converts to his own way of thinking. Commencing with a singularly hideous prelude and fugue on the theme expressed (in the German notation) by the name of Bach, the programme followed on with the inchoate assortment of phrases known as the Sonata in B minor (dedicated to Robert Schumann); followed, after an interlude of song, by two Etudes, dedicated to E. Liszt; "Paysage"—a study described as "d'éxécution transcendante;" "Sonetto di Petrarca," "Valse Oubliée," and "Pester Carneval" (Rhapsodie Hongroises, No. 9). To deal with these various pieces in extenso would be superfluous; enough that Mr Bache, who has seldom played with more precision, did his utmost to render them acceptable, and was successful in obtaining the applause of those present whose ideas were in accord with the spirit of his theme. Liszt's two songs, "Die Drei Zigeuner" and "In Liebeslust," were delivered with artistic grace and finish by Mr Arthur Oswald, to the pianoforte accompaniment of Mr Bache.—Standard.

AT the Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden Theatre last week's classical night included Mendelssohn's Ruy Blas overture, the Entr'acte from Wagner's Lohengrin, the Danse des Sylphes from Berlioz's Faust music, and Haydn's Surprise symphony. Mdme Ida Bloch played one movement of Beethoven's concerto in C minor. The other solo performers were Mr Howard Reynolds (cornet) and Mr Viotti Collins (violin). Vocal pieces were contributed by Mdlle Elly Warnots and Mr Abercrombie. A selection of patriotic music was given on the following night in honour of the Prince of Wales's birthday, and on Saturday a selection of "Military" Music was the attraction. On Wednesday last the programme consisted of Beethoven's Leonora overture and the Pastoral Symphony; Rameau's "Rigaudon de Dardanus"; the romance and rondo from Chopin's Concerto in E minor (pianoforte, Miss Maggie Okey) and the andante and finale from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto (magnificently played by Mr J. T. Carrodus), the vocal pieces being Haydn's "Spirit song" (Mdme Enriquez), Lotti's "Pur dicesti" (Mdlle Elly Warnots), and Schumann's "Two Grenadiers" (Mr Henry Pyatt). The second part began with a selection from Gounod's Faust, and concluded with the same composer's grand march from his opera La Reine de Saba.

THE BRINSMEAD CONCERTS.—One of the series of concerts announced to be given in London and the provinces by Messrs Brinsmead & Sons, in aid of the foundation and endowment of the Royal College of Music, came off at St. James's Hall on Thursday evening before a large and fashionable audience. The programme was modelled on those given by Mr John Boosey at his London Ballad Concerts, and consequently attracted all classes of ballad lovers. The singers were Mr Sims Reeves, Mr Herbert Reeves, Signor Foli, and Mr Barrington Foote; Miss Anna Williams and Mdme Patey, assisted by the London Vocal Union under the direction of Mr Frederick Walker. Mr Sims Reeves was in excellent voice, singing Berthold Tours' setting of "Stars of the Summer Night" so much to the delight of his audience that he was compelled to return to the platform three times to bow his acknowledgments, and after "Tom Bowling" the applause was so constant and hearty that he was under the necessity of giving "The Bay of Biscay" as a return for the compliment paid him. Mr Herbert Reeves was cordially applauded after his tasteful rendering of "Kathleen Mavourneen," as well as after his own pleasing ballad, "Flowers of Memory." Signor Foli was "to the fore," giving (one verse only!) "Qui sdegno" (Il Flauto Magico), with such effect that he was obliged to repeat it, as well as a military song, "Death or Glory" (accompanied by its composer, Signor Tito Mattei). Mdme Patey was in great favour, being "called" after Gounod's "Golden Thread," and treating the audience to "The Minstrel Boy" on being encored in "The Soldier's Tear." Miss Anna Williams's contributions were "The Worker" (Gounod) and "Clover Blossoms" (Frank Moir); Mr Barrington Foote's, an Italian aria by Righini, "Three Merry Men" by Molloy, and, with Mr Herbert Reeves, the "Invocation" from Gounod's opera, Cinq Mars. The instrumentalists were Herr Poznanski (violin), and Chevalier Antoine de Kontski (pianoforte). Herr Poznanski played a "Rhapsodie Hongroise" by Hauser (accompanied by the Chevalier de Kontski), exhibiting a fine tone and perfect command over his instrument, receiving at the conclusion of his performance a hearty and deserved "call." The Chevalier de Kontski is well known as a virtuoso of powerful acquirements. He played on the occasion under notice Weber's pianoforte Sonata in A flat, and was twice called at the conclusion. He afterwards gave a Minuet and Valse of his own composition, in both of which he exhibited his powers to advantage. The London Vocal Union sang Cooke's "Strike the Lyre," "The long day closes" (Sullivan), Otto's "Pretty Maiden," and Hatton's "When evening twilight." The vocal music was accompanied by Mr Sidney Naylor in perfection, and the concert altogether gave general satisfaction.

At a meeting of the Balloon Society of Great Britain held on Friday evening last at the Royal Aquarium, Mr Etherington Hay Kendall delivered a lecture on the "History of English Opera." Herr Schuberth, the chairman, in introducing Mr Kendall, stated that he (the chairman), although only recently elected a member of the Society, had watched with great interest its proceedings, and that he considered the regular lectures delivered every Friday not only interesting, but at the same time highly instructive. Mr Kendall in his lecture described the different stages of English opera, drawing a comparison between the English and Italian schools. The illustrations he gave included music composed by the earliest masters, commencing with Purcell and ending with Balfe. After the lecture a discussion followed in which Captain Molesworth, the chairman of the Aquarium Company; Captain Hobson, the manager; Captain Carteret de Bisson, Mr Lefevre, the President, and several others took part. A vote of thanks to the lecturer and chairman brought the proceedings to a close.

PROVINCIAL.

Cork (from a correspondent).—The first concert this season by the Orchestral Union took place, before a large and fashionable audience, at the Assembly Rooms on Saturday night last; but why an evening so inconvenient to many should be chosen was not explained. The pièce de résistance was a "Grand Triumphal March," composed by Mr Ringrose Atkins, the conductor, who has already gained distinction as a musician of ability. The march was first performed at Colchester, and the success which greeted its production was a guarantee of an enthusiastic reception in its composer's native city. Mrs Stevenson and Mr G. Waters gave a Barcarolle (Gounod), and met with well-merited applause. Mr Waters also gave "Alla stella confidente," to the violoncello accompaniment of Mr W. Harrington. Mrs Laurie's singing of Henry Smart's "Lady of the Lea" was very effective, as also her rendering of "A Bird in the Hand." Mr H. P. Hewitt, who was in splendid voice, gave "I am Waiting," and would, no doubt, have been compelled to repeat it but for the notice on the programme that no "encores" could be acceded to, in consequence of the great length of the programme. This opening concert of the season is a good augury of the future, and it is a matter of congratulation that an early date—the 19th December—is fixed for a similar treat under the same auspices.—The Cork Musical Society's first concert this season is fixed for December 12th, when a selection from Sir Michael Costa's Naaman will be given for the first time in Cork.—Mr C. Bernard's Cloches de Corneville company, with Sheil Barry as the Miser, has been drawing crowded audiences at the Theatre Royal and Operahouse, Cork, during the past week.—J. F. M. C.

Worcester.—If there is one reason more than another for indulging in a feeling of gratification at the re-opening of the Public Hall, after restoration and enlargement, it is that the opportunity is again afforded of listening to the high class concerts which are so distinguishing a feature in the social life of the "faithful city." "Mr Spark's concerts" had become an established institution prior to the destruction of the Music Hall by fire, and, being necessarily suspended, their resumption is viewed with satisfaction. The first of the series of three concerts took place on Thursday evening, Nov. 9, and passed off successfully. The artists were Mdme Marie Roze, Miss Damian, Messrs D'Arcy Ferris, Bywater, Thurley Beale, Ffrench Davis (harpist), and Herr Volkmer (pianist and conductor). Most of these are favourably known here, and their re-appearance last night served to strengthen the good opinion which they already enjoyed. Especially was this so with respect to Mdme Rose. This lady first appeared here at one of Mr Spark's concerts a few years since, and on the occasion under notice she was listened to with pleasure, being called upon to repeat all her songs, among which were "Robert toi que j'aime," the Miserere from Il Trovatore (with Mr Bywater); and "Lovers' Vows," from Benedict's Graziella. The arrangements for the comfort of the audience were, as usual at Mr Spark's concerts, excellent. The hall, being as yet undecorated, would have presented a somewhat bare appearance but for an extensive display of plants and shrubs from Mr Haywood's establishment, which Mr J. H. White had tastefully disposed on the platform and in other parts of the hall. The next concert will take place on Thursday, November 30.

Barnes.—At the concert given in connection with the Cleveland Cricket Club, several well-known artists, as well as some members of the Savage Club, volunteered their services. Miss Louise Moody, Mrs Shipway, Miss Lillie Albrecht, Messrs T. Drew, Soden, Campbell, and Fleming Norton were among those who "assisted." Mrs Shipway gave the old song "Caller Herrin'," accompanied by Mr Drew, remarkably well; Mr Fleming Norton had to repeat Lover's song, "The Whistling Thief," and Mr Soden gave two of his own poems, "William Westlake's Drive" and "The obstinate Monarch." Miss Lillie Albrecht's contributions were Raff's "Tambourin," a "Scotch Fantasia," and her own composition, "La Consolation" (for the left hand), which was a remarkable display, meeting with hearty applause, and about the performance of which a contemporary observes: "Excepting as a tour de force, I can see no purpose in playing music with one hand; but it may be averred that had Miss Albrecht been deprived by nature of one of those useful members she need not entirely have forgone the practice of her instrument for the satisfaction of pleasing others."

SCHUBERT'S SEVENTH SYMPHONY.

The Standard, with reference to the filling up the score of Schubert's Symphony in E major, by Mr John Francis Barnett, has the following:—

"It will strike some people as being an evidence of self-confidence on the part of Mr J. F. Barnett that he should attempt to complete what Schubert left uncompleted. Mr Arthur Sullivan, it is true, once took the same task in hand, but abandoned it after a while. Those who have seen the MS. of the score, will, however, understand that no able musician need be ashamed of filling in the instrumentation. The Symphony is there complete in sketch from the first bar to the last. The Introduction and part of the allegro are fully scored, but after the 110th bar Schubert proceeded simply to draw in his work in outline. The time-measure and the signatures of all the instruments are written at the beginning of each movement, and there is not one bar entirely vacant. Mr Barnett has in reality but little to superadd to what already exists, and that he will do this in a musician-like manner, and with a reverent feeling for the spirit of the master, may readily be believed. Here arises no question of interference with a musician's expressed intention, such as we behold only too frequently in re-arrangements of compositions, the matter at issue simply being whether the world is to be denied the pleasure of listening to another symphony by Schubert merely because he only indicated the nature of the score instead of completing the instrumentation."

Mendelssohn once entertained the idea of completing the score, but soon abandoned it. The same idea was entertained by Arthur Sullivan, who also ultimately gave it up. Abbé Liszt might also have had similar givings, dissolved in process of time, amid intense and goulish cravings. At any rate, the directors of the Crystal Palace are lucky in escaping Franz, and stumbling upon John Francis, whose shoulders will bear any weight, and who is much more unassuming and discreet. In any case the thing must be a curiosity.—D. T.

Leipsic.—At the fourth concert of the Leipsic Gewandhaus, Robert Volkmann's Symphony in B flat was performed for the first time.* Henri Petri played Beethoven's Violin Concerto, and Schröder-Hanfstängel was the singer. The first piece in the programme was Niels W. Gade's Nachklänge von Ossian. The fifth concert opened with Beethoven's overture, Coriolan; Marie Krebs played the same master's Pianoforte Concerto in the Symphony in D (without a minuet). Songs were given by Paul Jensen. Rubinstein's Maccabäer, as was the case in Berlin, seems, after all, to have been but half a success.

* Surely, Mr Manns, this must be better music than that of Liszt and his followers, even including Smetana?—Dr Bilge.

DR GARRETT AND HIS SHUNAMMITE.

Dr Garrett is a man who has not written largely, but his efforts have been so much esteemed that the Cambridge authorities have conferred upon him the honorary degree of M.A., as well as that of Doctor in Music, which he obtained by fair trial. The Shunammite is a tempting subject, and may well invite the attention of musicians eager to obtain distinction. I fear, however, that Dr Garrett's work suffers on account of the libretto being chosen by the composer. It is all very well to countenance Wagner's theory that the inspiration of music and poetry should and, in fact, must be simultaneous, but when it comes to the compilation of an oratorio, or other sacred work, inspiration is heavily handicapped. Fashion obtains in most things, and in nothing perhaps more markedly than in books arranged for illustration by sacred music. In the first place, a simple, comprehensible story is taken, and then it becomes the acknowledged duty of the librettist to intersperse the pure narrative with as many reflective observations as can possibly be dragged in. Sometimes the reflections are not apposite, but this does not deter the musician from accepting them for sterling value. He requires contrast, and gets it. People who listen to the finished product lose the thread of the argument, no doubt, but the author does not care. In the cantata of The Shunammite the simplest possible legend is narrated. The Shunammite woman has a son, who dies of sunstroke in the harvest field. By the intercession of Elisha he is restored to life. Why will not composers learn the force of direct narrative? Reflective numbers are all very well, and if properly introduced they are like marks of punctuation in a sentence; but a simple story, simply told, is a more powerful emotional agent than any complex arrangement of facts and commentaries. There is no immediate necessity to give a detailed account of Dr Garrett's work—in fact, a few general observations will suffice to deal with the entire production. Happier in his choruses than his solo numbers, Dr Garrett exhibits a lively appreciation of the school which confesses allegiance to Mendelssohn, and has nothing whatever to do with the hideous cacophony which modern Germans would persuade us to receive as absolute music. Nothing particularly new is taught us in The Shunammite, but every effect gained is reached by legitimate means; the choruses are bright and telling, and if the solos are of diminished interest, it only instances the difficulty of writing arias in the devotional style—a difficulty experienced by even greater musicians than Dr Garrett. The opening chorus, "Praise the Lord," and the melodious "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers," will dwell without doubt in the minds of those who were present in the Cathedral to-day; while the entire work will be remembered with a sense of gratification. I fancy that The Shunammite ought to become popular with choral societies, because it is distinctly interesting, and calls for nothing beyond ordinary means of exposition. There is one chorus in particular, "Call for the mourning women," enough to prove that the author is a man of more than ordinary mind and faculty.

THE MUSICIANS' EXCHANGE, BERLIN.—Anyone requiring musicians, from an entire orchestra down to a pianist, may always get what he wants by applying, orally or by letter, to the Musicians' Exchange. This Exchange is held every day from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m., at a restaurant's in the Johannisstrasse, and is attended by hundreds of would-be "professionals." It has its fixed laws. Established in 1869 by the Association of Berlin Musicians, it is managed by a committee according to certain rules. This committee apportions the orders received and sees that the normal tarif is maintained. The latter is remarkable at giving only the minimum terms, for less than which no member may play. Ball-music, for instance, is paid, on festal days, 9 marks to each performer; on Sundays, 7 marks, 50; and, on week days, 6 marks; at grand ministerial and ambassadorial balls, each performer receives 9 marks for four hours, and 1 mark, 50, for every extra hour; rehearsals are paid 3 marks; dinner-music without dancing, 5 marks; with dancing, 9 marks, &c. The Exchange is held only for the members of the Association of Berlin Musicians, who number 700. The grand total of musical performers in the Prussian capital amounts to about 3,000, including 500 who have other callings and take part in musical entertainments only as an extra source of income. The Association possesses a capital of 30,000 marks, and pays annually from 600 to 1,000 for the relief of members in distress. As a rule, Berlin is well supplied with musicians—nay, people sometimes complain of their being too numerous. But on New Year's Eve and at Shrovetide, as well as on certain festivals of less importance, anybody capable of playing an instrument—string or wind—is pressed into the service. On extraordinary occasions—triumphal entrances and such like—the neighbouring districts, far and wide, are laid under contribution. Such lucky days are, however, rare in the life of a musician.—Fremdenblatt.

FROM GÖRLITZ.

(Correspondence.)

At the Silesian Musical Festival, held in Görlitz, the works of importance selected by the Committee (proprietors of the spacious "Festival Hall,") are Handel's "Ode on St Cecilia's Day" and Mendelssohn's Paulus, both possibly fixed upon in order to attract the attention of disciples of the "advanced" school, one of whose chief recommendations would seem to be inability to compose fugues, and another disdain of rhythmic melody. These enthusiastic gentlemen cannot be likened to the pre-Raphaelites of of another art, setting up as they do a claim to be regarded as post-Beethovenites. It is much of a muchness, however, one affectation being as notable as the other.

"OUT OF TOWN."

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—It is not often that Yorkshire singers are readily or easily pleased with new choral works of any description, and especially if they have not a smack at least of that strength and solidity always to be found in the choruses of their favourite, Handel. I have often been intensely amused to listen to the honest, outspoken criticisms of our Northern vocalists after "working hard" for an hour or two over some new work; for be it remembered that no amount of cajolery or blandiloquence will induce a genuine Yorkshire singer to give up his own independent notion of what he likes or dislikes, and, if rejoicing in a deep bass voice, he generally delivers himself of his opinion in the lower part of his register, sometimes in a style rather more pungent than polite. Knowing this, I was a little curious to hear what a party of chorus singers, who I invited to my house to try over some novel productions, would say about what I thought a capital and interesting work by our old friend Walter Maynard, entitled "Out of Town." Both words and music are to my mind remarkably cheerful, happy and melodious; whilst the quotation of themes from Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Mendelssohn's Notturno, and The Clown's Song, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," &c., display tact, taste, and talent of a high order. Those who may desire something new in part-music will here find it, and I hope they will thank me for having directed their attention to a work which is, both in conception and execution, novel, interesting, and remarkably effective. Our "Leeds loiners" were very decided in their expressions of approval after having sang over all the eight numbers, the principal basso profundo declaring in loud low notes, that "it wore best thing o' the sort he'd heard for a while, and he saw nowt to find fault with all round t' shop!"—yours faithfully,

WM. SPARK.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Will you allow me, with reference to "O. L.'s" letter in your issue of the 11th inst. regarding the music at theatres, to state that ever since I held the post of chef d'orchestre at the Court Theatre, I have, I believe, effected the very change your correspondent advocates. The works performed between the acts are all chosen from the classical repertoire exclusively, and I am glad to state that the attention of the public, although it is not quite what it might be, yet is very much greater than what is generally bestowed upon the entr'acte music at theatres.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

C. ARMBRUSTER,
Musical Director, Court Theatre.

THE BALFE MEMORIAL IN DUBLIN.—A surplus having remained after defraying the expenses of the Balfe memorial bust, placed in the National Gallery in Dublin, it was resolved at the final meeting of the subscribers to entrust its appropriate application to a sub-committee, consisting of Sir T. A. Jones, president, R.H.A.; Messrs Henry Doyle, C.B., Michael Gunn, and Hercules Macdonnell, J.P. They accordingly now offer a "Balfe Memorial Prize" of £10 for the best ballad with English words, to be composed by a native of Ireland whose age on the 1st of January, 1883, shall not exceed 21 years. Mr H. Macdonnell, of 4, Roby-place, Kingstown, has undertaken the duties of secretary in the matter, and will answer all inquiries. A very fine photograph of the Balfe Memorial in Westminster Abbey has been prepared by Mr David Hains, of 28, Upper Phillimore Place, Kensington, a young artist, who is making rapid strides towards perfection, and who already has taken a high rank among the élite of his profession.

EXCERPTS FROM PARKE'S MUSICAL MEMOIRS.

Excerpt No. 5.

1786.

Salomon gave six subscription concerts in Hanover Square, the first of which took place on the 2nd of March; Mdme Mara, Miss Chenu, and Mr Harrison were the singers. Two new French horn players, Messrs Palsa and Thurshmit, who had only played previously at the Anacreontic Society, made their first appearance in public in a concertante for that instrument. The most striking part of their exhibition was their horns, which were made of silver.

At Covent Garden Theatre Mrs Billington, who had been performing with success on the Dublin stage, made her début on the London boards, on the 13th of February, as Rosetta, in the opera of Love in a village. She sang the songs of Rosetta in a different style to that which the public had been accustomed to hear, and although she had not had much experience, she gave them with such sweetness, taste, and brilliancy, that the audience, who were both surprised and delighted, bestowed on her unbounded applause.

Amongst the friends of Mr Harris, the proprietor of Covent Garden Theatre, none was more intimate with him than Mr Hugh Dives, who was a man of fortune, and had been an officer in the guards. Mr George Dives, his brother, was also acquainted with Mr Harris. Mr Hugh Dives was so much attached to the theatre, wherein he had embarked a few thousands, that he was seldom out of it during the season of its being open; and having the free use of Mr Harris's private box and the green room, a night or morning scarcely passed without his visiting them. These two brothers were of very different dispositions, Mr George Dives being polite and good-humoured, while Mr Hugh Dives was rude and ill-tempered. One morning, during the rehearsal of the before-mentioned opera, Mr George Dives, being in search of his brother, and conceiving that he was in the green-room, proceeded thither, where, being informed that he had just left, he, on his return over the stage to follow him, said to the elder Bannister—"Mr Bannister, have you seen my brother cross?" "Sir," said Bannister, "I never saw him otherwise!"

Six oratorios were given this season for the first time, by command of their Majesties, on the six Fridays in Lent, at the Tottenham Street Rooms, under the same direction and the same regulations as the concerts of ancient music. They commenced on Friday, the 1st of March. Mdme Mara, Mr Harrison, and Mrs Billington were the principal singers. The oratorios at Drury Lane Theatre, conducted by Dr Arnold, commenced on the same evening with The Messiah. The singers were Messrs Reinhold, Bellamy, jun., Mrs Forster, and Miss George. At the end of the first act I performed a concerto on the oboe. The leader was Mr Shaw. During the third night's performance, owing to the negligence of the carpenters of the theatre, who erected the orchestra on the stage, an alarming accident happened between the second and third acts of the oratorio. The upper tier, on which were stationed the trumpets, French horns, bassoons, and kettledrums, suddenly gave way, and the performers who were on it were precipitated down a descent of fourteen feet; but fortunately no one was seriously injured. Nelson, the pompous kettle-drummer, who had escaped unhurt, strutting about with his usual dignity, said to those who lay sprawling on the floor, "Gentlemen! if any of you have broken a limb, make yourself perfectly easy, for Mr Pott, the celebrated surgeon, is in the pit." The following day I met Hook the composer, who had witnessed the accident. In speaking of it he said, in his whimsical manner, "When it happened I was astonished, for I had never even heard of an oratorio with tumbling between the acts!"

A new comic opera was produced at Covent Garden Theatre on the 8th of March, called The Fair Peruvian. The overture and music were by Mr Hook. In this piece Mrs Billington, whose powers were now considerably developed, sang two airs with such uncommon effect, that the audience were quite enthusiastic in the applause they gave her. "In the overture," says a critic, "the second movement was obbligato for the pianoforte (played on that night by the composer, Mr Hook) and the oboe. Young Parke (W. T. Parke), in the oboe part, displayed a sweet, flexible tone, and great taste and feeling."

On one of the nights this opera was announced to be performed the sudden indisposition of Mrs Billington compelled Mr Harris, the manager, to change the play, there not being any lady in the theatre who could undertake her character. This unavoidable circumstance occasioned a tumult amongst the audience, which raged with violence. Charles Bannister, the excellent bass singer, being on the stage during its acme, was desired by the manager, from the side scenes, to address the audience. Bannister, who was more remarkable for his wit than his eloquence, was instantly seized with that sort of tremor which generally fastens on persons, when, by some sudden transition, the association of ideas is disturbed; and, reluctantly approaching the foot-lamps at the front of the stage, said, in the true phraseology of a licensed victualler, "Ladies and gentlemen, what will you please to have?" "A pot of porter," vociferated a fellow in the gallery, "for this place is as hot as hell!" This reply was instantly succeeded by a general laugh, which, turning the tide of disapprobation, the actors were permitted to go through the play without further interruption.

Ranelagh Gardens opened on the seventeenth of April with a grand concert of vocal and instrumental music, patronized by his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.

WAIFS.

Wagner is in Venice where he will spend the winter.

The Teatro Rossini, Venice, has re-opened with Faust.

Palminteri's new opera, Arrigo II. at Voghera, is still running.

The Teatro Andreani, Mantua, will shortly open for buffo-opera.

The new Theatre, Vigo, was inaugurated with Donizetti's Poliuto.

The new Theatre, Brunn, was opened on the 5th inst. with Egmont.

Power, the Spanish pianist, has been playing in Malaga and Granada.

Artôt-Padilla and Husband are about to undertake a concert tour in Russia.

The Brooklyn (U.S.) Philharmonic has just completed its twenty-fifth year.

Max Bruch's Odysseus has been performed by the Bach Association, Hanover.

There has been a third Nibelungen "Cyclus" at the Victoria Theater, Berlin.

Aramburo, the tenor, has returned from Barcelona, and was a few days since in Milan.

Grammann's opera, Thusnelda, has been performed at the Stadt-theater, Königsberg.

Franz Rummel, the pianist, will shortly make a concert tour in Germany and Russia.

Carl Formes has been giving singing lessons in San Francisco, but is now in New York.

Theodore Thomas, with his orchestra, is to give six classical concerts in Philadelphia.

Robaudi's Bersagliere in Crimea is not, as erroneously stated, an opera, but merely a song.

Planquette's Rip Van Winkle was to be produced for the first time in New York on the 28th ult.

According to the Guide Musical, Anton Rubinstein has entirely lost the sight of his right eye.

Kaschmann, the baritone, is engaged to sing in Simon Boccanegra at the Teatro Costanzi, Rome.

The Teatro Alfiere, Turin, is to be lighted by electricity; so is the Teatro Cannobiana, Milan.

Mdme Chatterton-Bohrer and Miss Henrietta Beebe have arranged a concert-tour in the "States."

Gayarre is singing at the San Carlo, Lisbon, where he was lately much applauded in La Favorita.

Heinrich Hofmann's new lyric opera, Aennchen von Tharau, has been well received in Magdeburgh.

Dvoràk's opera, Der Bauer ein Schelm, is accepted at the Stadt-theater of Leipsic and Hamburgh.

The Teatro Goldoni, Leghorn, now undergoing extensive repairs, is expected to re-open in February.

According to all accounts, Les Huguenots was never before given in Rome so well as at the Teatro Costanzi.

Brindis de Salas, a black violinist, gave two concerts in Stuttgart. He intends making a tour through Germany.

David Popper, violoncellist, Emile Sauret, violinist, and C. Stasny, pianist, are giving concerts in Madrid.

Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet, with a cast including Donadio and M. Lhérie, has been well received in Barcelona.

The season at the Teatro Argentina, Rome, was brought, some little time since, to a sudden and unexpected close.

Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony" was included in the programme of the third Concert du Châtelet, Paris.

Mdme Etelka Gerster's two concerts in the Winter Garden of the Central Hotel, Berlin, attracted very large audiences.

The Italian opera company now at the Teatro de la Alhambra, Madrid, goes shortly to the Teatro San Fernando, Seville.

Rossini's magnificent Semiramide, with the Sisters Ravogli, has been performed at the Teatro del Buen Retiro, Barcelona.

A performance in aid of the sufferers by the inundations in Italy was recently given by the members of the Cercle Philharmonique, Brussels.

Bianca Donadio is announced for four nights with the Tamberlik company at Malaga, the opera selected for her first appearance being Il Barbiere.

Ercole Cuttica, a young tenor, who lately sang with much success at the Teatro Argentina, Rome, is engaged at the Teatro dei Fiorentini, Naples.

The Legia Choral Society, (Liége), lately sang for the first time a chorus, "Le Chant des Vagues," written expressly for them by François Riga.

After having sung at Hamburgh, Rostock, Stralsund, and Greifswald, Mdme Amalie Joachim visits Göttingen, Munster, and the Rhine Provinces.

Strauss's Lustiger Krieg has been performed, for the first time in Italy, at the Teatro Tomaso Salvini, Florence, by Freund's German buffo-opera company.

Mr Frederic Archer is announced to give a series of Matinées d'Orgue at Chickering Hall, New York, on the 24th inst., the 1st, 8th, and 15th December.

The Subscription Concerts of the Ducal Orchestra, Meiningen, are this year under the direction of the new Hofcapellmeister, Professor Franz Mannstaedt.

A new three-act comic opera, Das Geheimniss der Fürstin, will be produced at the Carltheater, Vienna. The music is by Herr Löw, formerly conductor there.

The directors of the New York Oratorio Society state that if Mdme Albani visits the "Empire City" this season, she will certainly sing at their concerts.

A performance of Anton Rubinstein's sacred opera, Das verlorene Paradies, under the direction of Herr Volkland, will be given at the beginning of January in Basle.

Von Bignio, barytone of the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, has accepted an engagement of several years, commencing next season, at the National Theatre, Pesth.

Hector Berlioz's Damnation de Faust, with Minnie Hauk, Ravelli, and Franz Remmertz as principal singers, was to be given by the Symphony Society of New York.

A new comic opera, La Cour d'Amour, music by Hubans, will be produced in Brussels, at the Théâtre de l'Alcazar, now under the management of Mad. Olga Léaut.

Mr Henry R. A. Robinson, of the Royal Academy of Music, is appointed under-Secretary to the Philharmonic Society, Mr Henry Hersee retaining his post as principal.

The Queen's Pilgrimage, a comic opera, by Richard Henneberg, has been given at the Theatre Royal, Stockholm, where the composer, a native of Berlin, is conductor.

"No vehicle drawn by more than one animal is allowed to cross this bridge in opposite directions at the same time"; so runs a notice posted on a bridge at Providence, U. S.

L'Africaine has been given very effectively at the Teatro Real, Madrid, the principal parts being sustained by Theodorini, Masini, Pandolfini, and Nannetti, with Goula as conductor.

Johann Strauss has decided that his new buffo opera, Eine Nacht in Venedig, shall be first produced at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater, Berlin, under his personal direction.

In consequence of the impression created by her in Linda di Chamounix at the Teatro Niccolini, Florence, the contralto, Fride, is engaged to appear in La Favorita at the Teatro Nuovo in the same city.

It is said that an oratorio by a young and rising composer has been accepted for production at M. Pasdeloup's Concerts, Paris, and that, with M. Vaucorbeil's permission, Mdlle Richard will take part in the performance.

The operatic company at the new Casino, Nice, includes sopranos: Fouquet, Griswold; mezzo-sopranos and contraltos: De Belocca, Scholer; tenors: Frapolli, Durot; baritones: Athos, Frabadelo; basses: Gailhard, Arzilli; buffo: Carbone.

"Nothing," says the American Bulletin, "annoys the keeper of a railway restaurant more than for one customer to ask in a rather loud voice of another: 'Have they ever tried plating war-ships with this kind of sandwiches?'" (Exquisite!—Dr Bluge.)

Mdme Marie Roze has returned to town from her successful concert tour, and is announced to join the Carl Rosa Opera Company at Newcastle-on-Tyne, on Monday next. Mdme Roze will make her entrée as Fidelio, in Beethoven's great opera, a character in which she has already been received with signal favour in many of the principal towns.

Mr Irving will open in New York as Matthias in The Bells, and the choice is approved by competent American judges who know the stages of both countries. I should have fancied that Charles I. was a better play in which to make a début, but it is thought by those able to give useful advice that the great actor's peculiar powers are best displayed in the melodrama. When Mr Irving arrives in New York, by the way, it is tolerably certain that he will not ask a band to play "Yankee Doodle" under the impression that it is the American national anthem, and that to beg for its performance is a compliment. Mrs Langtry, who did this, should have been better advised.—Sporting and Dramatic News.

WHERE ARE THEY?

TRIO.

(From "Switzerland"—a new Cantata.)

Where are they, where are they
Whom when o'er the seas we pass'd
We had hop'd to meet to-day
Where we lov'd and left them last?
Flow'rs and breezes, rocks and rills,
Echoes of the mountain way,
Tell us from your home of hills
Where are they, where are they?
Where are they?

Wailing echoes—ye return
The question back again to me;
Ye too sent our friends to mourn,
As those we ne'er again may see.
Then seek your caves and sleep ye on Till other friends, now far away,
Shall ask ye, when we too are gone,
Where are they, where are they?
Where are they?

GRATZ.—G. Nottebohm, well known for his writings in connection with music, especially his Mozartiana and Bethoveniana, died on the 1st inst., aged about 65. His friend, Johannes Brahms, was with him at the time of his decease.

N.B.—The right of performance not reserved.

"Out of Town is the comprehensive title of a set of eight humorous part-songs, for mixed voices, with optional accompaniment, composed by Walter Maynard, and published by Duncan Davison & Co., Regent Street. They all have a spice of the pastoral element, but are not so easy as to incur the risk of being despised by practised part-singers. No. 4, 'Beware of the Bull,' is a lively trifle, and another of the more taking numbers is 7, 'The Picnic,' descriptive of the opening of the hamper, the spreading of the banquet beneath the trees, and the incursion of wasps, the male voices imitating the buzz of the objectionable insect by repeating the word 'Zum.'"—Daily Chronicle.

"Out of Town.—Well worthy of their title are Out of Town, a set of humorous part songs for mixed voices, by Walter Maynard, who has done most wisely in stating that 'the right of performance is not reserved.' No. 1, 'A Glimpse of the Pastoral,' expresses pity for all who are compelled to stay in town during summer time; Nos. 2 and 3 are adapted to melodies from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream, the one called by the same title, the other, 'The Charms of Rural Life,' to the sprightly air known as 'The Clown's Dance.' No. 4 will cause plenty of laughter and fun, 'Beware of the Bull' is its title; both words and music are well suited for a Christmas festive gathering. There is a mock gravity about No. 5, 'In the Woods,' which will also provoke mirth, if not quite so boisterous as its predecessor. No. 6, 'On the Water.' No. 7, 'The Picnic,' in which a very good effect is introduced by the male voices imitating the buzzing of a wasp; and No. 8, 'Good Bye,' are equally funny in their way. We can most cordially recommend this amusing volume to our readers for Christmastide."—Graphic.

N.B.—The right of performance not reserved.

"Out of Town is the comprehensive title of a set of eight humorous part-songs, for mixed voices, with optional accompaniment, composed by Walter Maynard, and published by Duncan Davison & Co., Regent Street. They all have a spice of the pastoral element, but are not so easy as to incur the risk of being despised by practised part-singers. No. 4, 'Beware of the Bull,' is a lively trifle, and another of the more taking numbers is 7, 'The Picnic,' descriptive of the opening of the hamper, the spreading of the banquet beneath the trees, and the incursion of wasps, the male voices imitating the buzz of the objectionable insect by repeating the word 'Zum.'"—Daily Chronicle.

"Out of Town.—Well worthy of their title are Out of Town, a set of humorous part songs for mixed voices, by Walter Maynard, who has done most wisely in stating that 'the right of performance is not reserved.' No. 1, 'A Glimpse of the Pastoral,' expresses pity for all who are compelled to stay in town during summer time; Nos. 2 and 3 are adapted to melodies from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream, the one called by the same title, the other, 'The Charms of Rural Life,' to the sprightly air known as 'The Clown's Dance.' No. 4 will cause plenty of laughter and fun, 'Beware of the Bull' is its title; both words and music are well suited for a Christmas festive gathering. There is a mock gravity about No. 5, 'In the Woods,' which will also provoke mirth, if not quite so boisterous as its predecessor. No. 6, 'On the Water.' No. 7, 'The Picnic,' in which a very good effect is introduced by the male voices imitating the buzzing of a wasp; and No. 8, 'Good Bye,' are equally funny in their way. We can most cordially recommend this amusing volume to our readers for Christmastide."—Graphic.

Out of Town.—"Taken altogether it is a very rare specimen of light, but yet classical, music. The partition of voice parts is clever, and has the great advantage of being simple, so that the pieces can be got up without difficulty, even by amateurs. The first piece, 'A Glimpse of the Pastoral,' is taken from Beethoven's beautiful Pastoral Symphony, in which the great master so dexterously carries you into the sounds of country life that you might almost imagine yourself strolling with him through his loved favourite groves of Wahring. The close of this movement takes you by a clever modulation from F to B flat, and hushes you into a dream, taken from the Midsummer Night's Dream of Mendelssohn. This is a celebrated gem. No. 3, 'The Charms of Rural Life,' again borrows from Mendelssohn the Harvest Dance, and is cleverly partitioned for the voice quartet. No. 4, 'Beware of the Bull,' shows what Walter Maynard can do in original composition, and, though not the best of the set, exhibits literary and artistic capacity, being eminently dramatic. Nos. 5 and 6, 'In the Woods' and 'On the Water,' are very pretty specimens of 'Imitation' style, and are very effective. No. 7, 'The Picnic,' is a very jolly glee, opening in a minor strain, it quickly dashes into a major tone, then takes the character of a chanson à boire, and finally ends with a pretty scene imitating a wasp humming, such as a picnic party might meet on their outing. No. 8, 'Good Bye,' is a joyous leave-taking, ending in a rather sentimental strain, reminding you of 'Home, Sweet Home.' The entire collection is very clever, quite popular, and yet classical."

The score of the Deux Journées is in truth marvellous, and we may assert that the artist who produced a work so powerful, so equal in all its parts, and so prodigiously well balanced, was a man of genius and a master among masters. If the overture is not distinguised by an abundant flow of varied melody, and if it strikes us now-a-days as rather too much subjected to formula, properly so-called, it is at any rate written by a master-pen, constructed on a plan of rare solidity, and scored with astounding skill. The composer does not give the reins to his genius in Antonio's somewhat pale romance, or even in Mikeli's pleasing aria, but the moment we come to the fine trio of Constance, Armand, and Mikeli, we perceive with whom we have to deal. This joyous, lively, and highly coloured number, so rapid and full of movement, is written with incomparable certainty and firmness of hand, and modulated with charming grace, while the orchestra, sonorous and full, is marked by sovereign elegance. And what a style! and how well it is all presented on the stage! In the dramatic duet where Armand's wife, Constance, tells him, despite his prayers, that she will share his dangers and his perils, other qualities are revealed in the composer. Full of warmth, as pathetic and vigorous as it is possible to be, vehement and passionate in accent, and conducted with incomparable art, this duet exhibits extraordinary sharpness of outline, vigour of touch, and expressive power. As for the finale, superb, highly worked up, full of nobleness and dramatic force, it is a page of the first order. Yet, though it is divided into several episodes, each with its own individual value, and though these episodes contain in endless succession, according to the exigencies of the scene, oppositions and contrasts, the number is luminous in form, powerful in style, and of limpid clearness, while the orchestra, ample, solid, and astonishingly uniform with all its variety, is full of nervousness and colour. To those who are fond of eccentric modulations, we might recommend as a model for imitation of simplicity the modulation which connects the second with the first part of this number: to pass from E minor to G major, the composer contents himself with placing successively on the tonic of the note of E minor the chords of the augmented fifth and sixth, which cause it to fall, in the most natural way in the world, on the dominant of the note of G major! in two bars the thing is done and the new key is as firmly established as it would be with certain outrageous and exasperating harmonic efforts which are perhaps a little too much the fashion at the present day. With regard to the second and the third act, in which each number forms an integral portion of the dramatic action, and is, so to speak, welded to it, I have nothing to say in addition to what was said of them above; like the editor of the Tablettes de Polymnie, I can only admire the powerful genius of the artist who, as though in play, could surmount so many difficulties, and, under such circumstances, succeed in charming and moving his hearers. In reality it is not too much to assert that the score of the Deux Journées is a masterpiece, and we can only express regret that it has so completely disappeared from the French stage, of which it ought to be the glory and eternal honour.

Before leaving it, I will return to the history of the first performance and cite, according to Bouilly himself, and without altering anything in his account, a rather original anecdote, told by him in his Récapitulations. I would not think of suppressing a single word.

"On the first Sunday that the Deux Journées was performed," he says, "the Théâtre Feydeau was crowded with a large number of persons belonging to the lower classes, among them being some water-carriers, who had slipped in with them and filled the second and the third gallery. The piece produced even more effect than usual, and bravos emanating from broad and sonorous chests re-echoed, as though vieing with each other, from the cheap places. The next morning, about ten o'clock, twelve Water-Carriers in their working dress and with their leather shoulder-straps crossed over their back, appeared at my residence. The orator of the party had an enormous and magnificent nosegay, which he offered me, saying at the same time in his half-French, half-Savoyard jargon:*—

"'Beg pardon, Sir, if we intrude, but when the heart speaks it cannot be resisted.' 'What is it you want, my good friends?' 'To thank you, in the name of all the water-carriers, for the honour you have done us by this masterpiece on the stage, where, blood and thunder! you have drawn us in such a way . . . . that it made us cry, neither more nor less than if we had been a lot of little children.' 'I painted you as what you are, worthy and excellent men, and as you deserve to be painted.' 'Well, it all amounts to this, that, in the first place, I have come to beg you will accept these flowers as a mark of our gratitude, and then give us permission . . .' 'Permission to do what?' 'To supply your house with water for a year, gratis, of course. It is settled with all my mates of this part of the town. Each will have his week; it will be kind of you to do so.' 'I am profoundly touched by your offer, which flatters as much as it honours me. . . . But permit me to accept only these beautiful flowers, which I would not exchange for a crown.' 'Oh, do not refuse us, confound it! That would grieve us too much. . . . Like a good fellow as you are, do not refuse us.' 'Your time and labour are too necessary for the support of your families for me to think of being supplied by your unremunerated exertions and labour. Let us say no more on the subject, my good friends. . . . . If my piece made your heart beat, believe me your offer makes mine beat quite as much, and will never be effaced from my memory. . . . As for the flowers, I shall deck my wife and daughter with them, but I promise to keep one which will remind me all my life of this charming interview.' With these words I ordered up some old bottles of my best wine, and we toasted each other in the frankest and most expressive fashion, accompanied with mutual protestations of devotion and esteem. I put one of the flowers of the magnificent nosegay under the glass shade beneath which I had placed the Abbé de l'Épée's bust. I still preserve these objects in my gallery, and every time my eye falls on them, they remind me of my double success and of the most gratifying epoch in my dramatic career."

As a matter of course, Les Deux Journées was long a stock-piece at the Opéra-Comique, where it was revived on numerous occasions. I believe, however, that the last revival took place forty years ago, and was that got up in April, 1842. Cherubini died on the 15th of March previous, and, after long neglecting his works, the manager of the above theatre, hoping, doubtless, to derive some profit from existing circumstances and to re-awaken public feeling in its favour, determined on bringing out again the deceased composer's masterpiece, and on accompanying its performance with one of those acts of posthumous homage whose only fault is to express rather tardily the gratitude due to a great artist. With regard to Cherubini, this fact was so true and the ingratitude had been so glaring, that a writer who certainly could not pass as an enthusiast in music, Théophile Gautier, was unable to restrain a cry of indignation on the subject. Here are the bitter words wrung from the author of La Jeune France and Mademoiselle de Maupin by this revival, followed by "a ceremony in honour of Cherubini":

"Of a certainty, respect for the dead is a fine thing, but respect for the living would be something still finer.—Yesterday, you were only an eccentric, maniacal, insupportable personage; the papers could not speak sarcastically enough of you personally and of your talent. You were deficient in this and that, and a good many other things besides.—To-day, you are dead, and, without any intermediate stage, the voices which abused you yesterday simply form an elegiac chorus. What a loss art has just suffered! Irreparable disaster! Sun for ever concealed below the horizon! What a great nature and what a great genius! From the time of the Saviour, one must pass through the tomb before becoming a god; the door of the sepulchral vault is the true door of Heaven.—This applies to all, even to the most obscure. Though you may have been a bad husband, a bad father, a detestable citizen, without shame and without faith, die, and you will be supplied, in lapidary style, with a certificate of every virtue. A savage able to read, who, as he walked through our cemeteries, deciphered the epitaphs, would ask himself how living beings so corrupted could produce such virtuous dead.

"Cherubini's decease has furnished a superb opportunity for a number of dithyrambics, which, had they come a little sooner, would have gently delighted the old man's heart. M. Ingres, at least, did not wait till the illustrious maestro was laid in his coffin to have him crowned by the Muse. The revival of Cherubini' Deux Journées will add nothing to his glory. . . . The perform ance ended with a sort of apotheosis of him; a plaster bust was crowned with laurel; then someone recited verses written by M. Emile Deschamps, and sparkling with cleverness like everything he does, and a short and rather touching piece by M. Bouilly, which finishes with a very fine line:

"'Un grand homme s'endort, mais il ne meurt jamais.'

"A chorus from Cherubini's Blanche de Provence, adapted to words written for the occasion, was then executed more than feebly.

* Which has no equivalent in English.—TRANSLATOR.

Thus terminated the posthumous ovation for which M. Crosnier had gone to no expense and the execution of which he had entrusted to the second and third rate members of his company."*

For a sceptical and impassible being like Théophile Gautier to decide on giving vent to his ill-humour, the oblivion and contempt in which even Cherubini's most famous works had fallen for so many years, must, the reader will allow, have struck every one as very unjust, very insulting, and very cruel.

Let us now resume the thread of our narrative. While Les Deux Journées was achieving so great a success at the Théâtre Feydeau, Cherubini was preparing, with an equally important work, to make his first appearance at the Théâtre Favart. But he was not alone in venturing on this experiment, and his name was on this occasion to be associated with that of Méhul, his most worthy rival and best friend. Demoustier, the ingenious but somewhat insipid author of the too famous Lettres à Emilie, had written the libretto of a three-act comic opera, the subject of which was Epicurus, after whom the libretto was named. By what singular aberration of intellect did two artists of the importance and stamp of Méhul and Cherubini think fit to unite for the purpose of setting this work to music? That is more than I can tell. Though at one period, musical collaboration was very largely patronized by our composers, I own that the practice always seemed to me as strange as it was to be regretted, from the fact that it must naturally take from the music its unity of style, colour, and conception. After all, the work of two musicians cannot unite and blend like that of two authors; collaboration is in such a case nothing, so to speak, more than juxtaposition; the task of each composer must be separate and definite, and from those two distinct portions of work there can result, despite all the efforts possible on the part of each person engaged, only a somewhat hybrid work, without entirety and without cohesion, without any common bond and without unity.

MR HALLÉ'S MANCHESTER CONCERTS.

(Abridged from the "Manchester Examiner and Times.")

There was an immense audience last night, when Haydn's Creation was performed at the second choral concert of the season. The popularity of this work seems greater than ever, and though an experienced local impresario said, twenty-five years ago, "The Creation never draws in Manchester," it has again become one of the most attractive of the great oratorios, and Mr Hallé's statistics show that his audiences give yet no signs of growing weary of it. In many respects, the performance was one of the finest ever heard in Manchester. The choruses were sung throughout with intelligence and accuracy, and where we have occasionally remarked shortcomings there were facility and smoothness. In such familiar music there could be nothing wanting on the part of the members of the orchestra. The charming solo passages were all exquisitely played, and the "Representation of Chaos" was given with the requisite solemn and mysterious effect.

Mdme Albani, who sang the soprano solos, is not only fortunate in the possession of a voice of singular purity and expressiveness, but is one of the greatest singers of the day, her musical instincts being directed by the intelligence of a well-trained artist. Her magnificent voice is under perfect control, and she has the rare power of being able to affect her audience by her own enthusiasm, while so thoroughly identifying herself with the thoughts and sentiments of the composer, that we almost forget the art which brings home so forcibly their spirit and meaning. Mdme Albani never sang more splendidly than last night; and, indeed, since Jenny Lind sang in The Creation here, no one has done such justice to those songs as Mdme Albani. Mr Barton McGuckin gave the tenor part with his accustomed vigour and ease; his voice is very sympathetic, and he had evidently carefully studied the music. How Mr Santley sings the bass songs of this oratorio, Manchester amateurs do not require to be told—and that the audience last night recognized the grandeur and dignity of this great artist's style the frequent applause emphatically testified. Few present were aware, however, that exactly twenty-five years before, on the night of the 16th of November, 1857, Mr Santley made his first appearance in London in this very oratorio. How many times he has sung it since one would be glad to know. We remember hearing him in the Free Trade Hall that same season, and should find it difficult to say how often we have heard him in the same place. And where is there a more noble record of a quarter of a century of devotion to art than Mr Santley's? He has achieved renown in nearly every class of vocal art, in opera—serious and comic—in oratorio, in ancient and modern ballads. In the highest examples of English, German, French, and Italian music Mr Santley has proved himself one of the foremost singers of the century. We hope he may long continue to maintain the best traditions of the profession of which he has so long been a distinguished member.

At the next concert Beethoven's C minor Symphony and a new Pianoforte Concerto by Brahms will be played. Mdlle Lemmens will be the vocalist.

BERLIN.—One of the most noteworthy concerts here lately was given by Mdme Sophie Menter, whose programme comprised pieces by Bach, Scarlatti, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Liszt, &c.

BRUSSELS.—The first performance of Delibes' Jean de Nivelle at the Théâtre de la Monnaie will, it is expected, take place early in December. Meanwhile the revival of Auber's Muette de Portici has afforded Mdme Gedda an opportunity of distinguishing herself as Fenella.—La Mascotte and Bocaccio are alternating with each other at the Galeries St Hubert, where the next novelty will be Fanfan la Tulipe, which may probably be given on the 28th inst., to be followed in February either by Audran's Gillette de Narbonne or von Suppé's Juanita.—The Queen was present at the distribution of prizes to successful pupils of the Conservatory, and personally congratulated them.—There will be four Popular Concerts (two with chorus) this winter, with, as hitherto, M. Dupont, who assumes all pecuniary responsibility, as the conductor.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The officers and members of this society met together for the last time, in a corporate capacity, at a conversazione held on Tuesday evening, Nov. 21st, at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen Street. There were few, if any, signs of anguish perceptible in the act of dissolution; for, indeed, the meeting was not only interesting, but, to a high degree, enjoyable. The Society died in a manner becoming its unselfish and noble life, with a smile of satisfaction upon the past, and a look, bright with hope, upon the future of the art it had so faithfully and successfully served. Judging from ominous signs that its day was ended, and work done, it peacefully and resignedly accepted the euthanasia fate had allotted. This is good and right. After an hour spent on Tuesday evening in mutual greetings and pleasant chat, the chair was taken at seven o'clock by the respected president, Mr D. Hill, who certainly did not pitch the opening address in a doleful key. In describing the musical state of the metropolis fifty years ago, when the society was formed, he dwelt specially upon the low taste of the public in sacred music, and, quoting from "bills of the play" showed, that in the most ambitious performances of oratorio music, those held at Drury Lane and Covent Garden Theatres during the seasons of Lent, were entertainments of a most incongruous character. The speaker claimed for the society credit and honour for having rescued the sublime works of Handel from such mutilation and sacrilege, and for having placed this greatest of oratorio composers before, not only the London public, but directly or indirectly before the entire nation, in all his fulness and majesty. He dilated with marked regard upon the Society's efforts in the cause of charity, and referred to the "Fund" still in existence, with its investments, amounting to £3,000, to be devoted to the good work. With confidence he appealed to members, subscribers, and the general public for approval of the way in which the large sum of £222,000, entrusted, during the society's existence, to committees and officers, has been disbursed. The president, in respectful and feeling terms, referred to the claims their conductor, Sir Michael Costa, had upon the gratitude of the society. To his genius it was indebted for its high position and great utility. All present rejoiced at the good news announced that the eminent musician was progressing satisfactorily in health and strength. Later in the evening three cheers were given for Sir Michael. The chairman called upon M. Sainton, their renowned orchestral leader, to discourse to the company some strains of music, which he did most eloquently upon his violin, assisted by M. Leopold at the piano, thereby earning an ovation from the delighted audience. The secretary, Mr E. H. Mannering, caught up the theme dropped by the previous speaker, and contended, with considerable point and force, that the sole motto of the society had been "Art to the foreground." He gave unmixed satisfaction by announcing that the library they all so much prized had that very day been purchased by the Royal College of Music. It surely is a cause for general congratulation that, through the instrumentality of Mr Geo. Grove, Mr W. H. Cummings, and others, this desirable arrangement has been consummated. The secretary entered into details as to losses incurred by recent performances, and enforced the fact that artistic success brought often pecuniary failure; whilst the customary expenses of a concert had been so great as to preclude, in any case, the possibility of a balance on the right side. Statements such as these surely justify the dissolution of the society. Mr W. H. Cummings then favoured the company with a very artistic interpretation of David's barcarolle, "O ma maitresse," in which the excellent quality of his medium voice was specially manifested. Mr Withall provoked merriment by a humorous address, particularly so when reciting the qualifications required when he joined the society, one of which was the possession of a "strictly moral character." His reference to the late Mr Bowley, who lifted, as it were, the society to its eminence on his own broad shoulders, was fully appreciated; and had reference been made, at the same time, to the labours of his trusted and faithful assistant, Mr James Peck, it would not, perhaps, have been altogether out of place. Mr Husk, the esteemed Librarian, gave, in an instructive address, many interesting reminiscences of past doings. This gentleman is, in point of service, the oldest living member upon the society's rolls. When he joined in 1834, a fortnight after the late Mr Bowley, the constitution of the society, he said, was but in its infancy, there being only about three voices to a part, and the members had to copy out (why did Mr Littleton smile at this?) the parts used. Mr Husk, unfolding the story of the institution's growth, related its happy intercourse with Mendelssohn and Spohr, and traced the progress of its strength until it reached gigantic dimensions, culminating in the Handel festivals—which celebrations, Meyerbeer said, more than realized the highest conception previously formed by him of the power of music. Mdme Enriquez closed the first part of the programme by singing Pinsuti's "Heaven and Earth." Her fine voice, under perfect control, enabling her to declaim the varied passages with a force that appealed to the trained choristers whom she was addressing.

In the interval a medal was presented to each vocal member of the orchestra, which will, doubtless, be highly valued as a souvenir of pleasant hours past and gone. During the second part of the programme Mr Willcocks delivered an animated address. He seemed, however, to be looking more into the future than on the past, and to be more engaged in fondling in anticipation a new bantling than making dole over the defunct. However that may be, his speech was so full of life and overflowing with goodwill and humour that his hearers were provoked into positive gaiety. This jovial state was intensified when Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington, who had been detained at Calais on her journey from Brussels, made her appearance in the room. The worthy lady seemed overcome by the warmth of the reception accorded her. Well, is it not a pleasant thing to know that those with whom one has been for many years associated should entertain such kindly feelings? The accomplished artist justified the applause by singing with all her usual power and finish Handel's "From mighty kings." In accordance with the programme, "a member of the orchestra" addressed the meeting. The motto this gentleman seemed to have chosen was in character something like the herald's proclamation, "Le Roi est mort! vive le Roi!" with a strong accent however on the latter clause. But the evident feeling of the meeting was that it would be better to announce and discuss the new organization at some other time. Mr Lewis Thomas followed the speaker by singing Handel's "Honour and arms" to the satisfaction of his old patrons. The four above-mentioned vocalists, assisted, as in other pieces, by Mr W. Bendall at the pianoforte, rendered in good style Sir Michael Costa's quartet, "Ecco quel fiero istante." A vote of thanks to the soloists was proposed and carried; and, as M. Sainton had left the hall, the duty of replying fell to Mr Lewis Thomas, the next in priority of service, whose remarks were supplemented and emphasized by his comrade, Mr W. H. Cummings. In conclusion, the entire assembly joined in Mendelssohn's part song, "O forest deep and gloomy," conducted by Mr W. H. Cummings, and in the National Anthem.

ALWINA VALLERIA.

The following glowing apostrophe has been addressed by an enthusiastic poet of Auld Reekie to Mdme Valleria, after witnessing her performances at the Glasgow opera:—

How lovely, sweet, how grand thy voice—
Madame Alwina Valleria;
Thy warbling music tones rejoice
Our souls with thrilling sympathy.
The attributes of thy great mind
Abound in rich variety;
Every mortal there may find
His sweetest thought reflected.
O bright, angelic mirror-soul;
How faithfully thou picturest
Humanity: Emotions roll
In quick succession at thy will,
Unfolding visions dim or bright,
The heart's abyss of dismal pain,
The joyous soul's resplendent light.
Oh sing, sweet songstress, sing away—
The tragic scene, the simple lay.
Pour forth thy soul in music sweet,
Till angels, raptured at thy feet,
Are fain to bear thee up on high
To that pure home beyond the sky;
Where thou thy lovely voice canst raise
In tones of sweet, eternal praise
To Him, whose Love thy soul redeemed:
Gave thee thy voice—created thee.

ROBERT MCHARDY.

In consequence of the absence of Mdlle Marie Brandt, the performances of Rubinstein's Maccabäer at the Stadttheater, Leipsic, have been temporarily interrupted.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

Mr John Boosey commenced the seventeenth season on Wednesday evening, November 23rd, with the vigour and liberality which have secured for these delightful entertainments their immense popularity. Ballads, appealing to no special class, have admirers amongst all grades of the community. Perhaps in no country does this form of composition play such an important part as in England, where it is found nourishing patriotic feelings. Mr Boosey has stedfastly held this in view, and many of the songs introduced under his direction—such as "Nancy Lee," and "The Midshipmite," by the purpose they serve, have become, as it were, national property. Unfortunately, the representative of this class of music, Mr Maybrick, was unable, through indisposition, to appear on Wednesday. His place in the programme, however, was more or less satisfactorily filled by Mr Barrington Foote, who met with success in Molloy's "Three merry men." Miss Clara Samuell, from the same cause, was also prevented fulfilling her engagement; but Miss Ambler, who sang instead, acquitted herself, despite nervousness, remarkably well. Mr Edward Lloyd, an immense favourite at these concerts, sang in a manner that raised him, if possible, still higher in the estimation of the public. Whether he was singing Clay's graceful melody, "I'll sing thee songs of Araby," or Blumenthal's new song, "Thy hand in mine," or Hobbs' charming old ditty, "Phillis is my only joy," it was all the same; to each he imparted characteristic charm. Mdme Antoinette Stirling again distinguished herself as a ballad singer. The audience insisted upon hearing her twice in Molloy's "Always together," and applauded her rendering of Schubert's "Song of the Quail," and cheered her for imparting zest to the Scotch ditty, "We're a' nodddin'." Miss Mary Davies, another prime favourite, achieved success in "Good-night" (Hugh Clendon), "Maiden Thoughts" (Mendelssohn), and in "The Sailor Lad." Nor was Miss Damian unappreciated, for she gained an encore for Theo. Marzials' song, "If only," and acknowledgments for a pleasant rendering of "To the woods" (Warner). Mr Oswald showed refined taste and real ability in "If doughty deeds" (Sullivan), and "When Vulcan forged" (Braham). The South London Choral Association, under the direction of Mr L. C. Venables, contributed some well executed choral numbers. Mdme Norman-Néruda, in conjunction with Miss Maude Valerie White and Mr Sidney Naylor at the piano, performed an arrangement of "South American Airs," which, from some cause or other, did not altogether suit the taste of the audience; but the lady-violinist subsequently played Vieuxtemps "Fantaisie caprice" in such a style as to secure a veritable triumph. Mr Sidney Naylor conducted with his usual skill.

BALFE: HIS LIFE AND WORKS.*

(From Galignani's Messenger.)

The publication of Mr Barrett's work falls opportunely. Public interest in Balfe has been greatly revived by the recent monumental tribute paid to his memory in Westminster Abbey and the accompanying celebration. Whatever triumphs may be yet in store for English opera, we doubt if any productions of this order which the future may have in reserve for us will enjoy a more stable popularity than the Bohemian Girl, whose melodies have long since become English national music. But although this delightful composer has done so much to popularize opera in England, through some strange oversight many years elapsed after his death before a satisfactory record of his life was added to biographical literature. The honour of rendering this justice to Balfe belongs to Mr Barrett, who, as musical critic for the Morning Post, has fully proved his right and his ability to speak on such a subject. The book is written in an easy, attractive style, so that the reader's interest is never allowed to flag. It is, moreover, full of those bright anecdotical touches which go so far to make a work of this kind successful, simply from the light thus thrown on human character. As an illustration of Mr Barrett's pleasing style, we select a passage at random from the description of Balfe's first meeting with Rossini as a guest of Cherubini in the Rue Poissonnière:—"After dinner Balfe was invited to sing. Cherubini chose some duets written by his illustrious guest, and Mdme Rossini joined her voice with that of the aspirant for fame, Rossini accompanying and Cherubini listening with critical admiration. . ." Rossini was charmed with the sweetness and flexibility of Balfe's voice, and, above all, with the artistic spirit and intelligence of his rendering. When, in the course of the evening, Balfe had gathered together some of his old saucy spirit and sat to the piano and accompanied himself in the song, "Largo al factotum," from Il Barbiere, Rossini was delighted. At the same time he told Balfe that he was sorry that he had heard him perform that task, "inasmuch as," said the composer, good-humoredly, "until this time I had imagined that no one in the world could do that but myself." We should add that Mr Barrett's work is enriched with several portraits of musical celebrities, including an excellent likeness of Balfe himself as frontispiece.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From the "Morning Advertiser," Nov. 20.)

The first selection for the concert of last night was a Pianoforte Quartet by Anton Dvorák. It is one of his earliest works, and has not hitherto been given at St James's Hall. Dvorák is a Bohemian, and in most of his works the characteristics of his country's music are apparent. His nationality proclaims itself, to a certain extent, in this quartet, which is a clever composition, if not one of notable charm. It is written in three movements, and of these the third is by far the most likely to make an agreeable impression. The first and second subjects are clear, rhythmical, and clearly worked. There is more spontaneity in the last than in the two preceding movements, which give the impression of having been written with some effort. They "smell of the lamp," as the phrase goes, and have little or no trace of anything approaching inspiration. The opening movement is an allejo moderato, in D major; and the second, an andantino, an air and variations in B minor. The theme is more strange than captivating. Mr Charles Hallé, Mdme Norman-Néruda, Herr Straus, and Signor Piatti—four artists of the first rank, and all constantly before the frequenters of these concerts—played the quartet, it is hardly needful to say, to perfection. After Dvorák's Quartet, the Pianoforte Sonata, in A major (posthumous) of Schubert was most grateful. It was played by Mr Hallé in his most careful, precise, and finished manner. The themes are of that enchanting, melodious kind the composer has, luckily, taught the world to expect from him. Nothing could be more beautiful than the andante and variations, and the Sonata ends worthily with a charming rondo. It was first played by Mr Hallé at one of the concerts of the eighth season, as far back as 1866. A Quartet of Haydn's, in E flat, and a Sonata by Handel for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment, was given last night. The violinist was Mdme Néruda, and Mr Hallé played the pianoforte part, written by himself, on Handel's figured bass. Miss Santley sang, in a pure and refined style, a recitative and air from Mozart's opera, Idomeneo, first performed at Munich, by order of the Elector of Bavaria, on the 26th of January, 1781. The air, "Zeffiretti lusinghieri" has frequently been sung in London concert-rooms.

The following gentlemen will act this year as honorary adjudicators of the musical prizes annually offered for competition by the Academical Board, Trinity College, London:—Quartet for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello (ten guineas and gold medal), Sir Michael Costa; essay on a musical subject (gold medal), Mr G. A. Osborne; chorale or hymn tune prize (three guineas), Dr Longhurst; musical history prizes (three guineas, and two guineas), Dr Gordon Saunders. We remind our readers that all MSS. must be lodged with the secretary on or before November 30.

St Petersburgh.—Carl Davidoff, the well-known violoncellist and director of the Conservatory here, is once more, after a long pause, about to undertake a concert-tour, in the course of which he will visit Königsberg, Hamburgh, Bremen, Düsseldorf, Cologne, Frankfort-on-the-Maine, Wiesbaden, and various towns in Switzerland.

Boston, U. S.—(Correspondence.)—Mdme Christine Nilsson, assisted by Miss Hope Glenn, MM. Biorksten, Del Puente, Schnitzer, Giese, and the Mendelssohn Quintet Club, gave her opening concert on the 1st inst. Among the audience, which filled the Boston Music Hall, were many professionals and amateurs who had come purposely from New York, Philadelphia, and other places, to welcome her back to America. Mdme Nilsson was much applauded on her first appearance and during the entire evening. Miss Glenn made a favourable impression, nor had the other artists, including the members of the Mendelssohn Quintet Club, any reason to complain.—Gounod's Redemption was being rehearsed, with a chorus numbering 300 voices, under the direction of Mr J. C. Lennon.

CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY IN GLASGOW.

(From the "Glasgow Herald.")

Were the Bayreuth maestro to find his way to Glasgow this week his organization would doubtless be sorely tried. Flowing melody, as represented by the writings of Boieldieu, Verdi, Vincent Wallace, and Balfe, is extremely prevalent. Moreover, it is absolutely popular, judging from the unstinted applause falling last night to the lot of the Italian composer. While at one end of the city musical interests are zealously guarded by our premier choral society, in the heart almost of our busy centre the ear, shocking to relate, is being gratified. Clearly there is something considerably out of joint, and Mr Carl Rosa has a heavy account to settle with the higher development cultus. The impresario is, nevertheless, well-known as a man of cultured taste, and ever desirous of keeping in the van of musical progress. But he is also a man of business, and opera, like any other speculation, must not only meet its cost, but also provide some measure of profit for its proprietor. The leading towns on Mr Rosa's visiting list can only entertain the advanced form of art in homœopathic proportions, and these, be it conceded, are prescribed by a judicious hand—witness the introduction here of Goetz's Taming of the Shrew, and of Lohengrin in former seasons, as well as the revival of the Flying Dutchman to-morrow evening. Verdi is still a considerable "draw" amongst opera-goers, and, when properly cared for, the man who once believed himself to be "the best hissed of all composers," and whose melodies are piped and danced in every quarter of the globe, is not to be despised. On the contrary, given a favourite songstress in the leading rôle, and Leonora retains her power to charm. Mdme Alwina Valleria, who last night made her first appearance in Glasgow in English opera, has studied the character to excellent purpose. Her artistic triumphs contribute in no small measure to the success of Italian opera in London, while in the concert-room there is hardly a more popular artist than Mr Rosa's new representative of Verdi's heroine. To say that in her opening aria and the sympathetic music in the last act she brought to bear all the technique of her art, is only to repeat what has been chronicled over and over again. In all her achievements, her cultivated voice, purity of style, and histrionic ability were features of a personation which must rank with the foremost of modern times. Miss Josephine Yorke's Azucena has gained considerably in dramatic force, and it may be doubted if the English stage has witnessed a finer reading of the gipsy. Her first air was declaimed with great fervour, and she lent valuable aid in the concerted music. Mr Barton M'Guckin was the Manrico of the cast, being in excellent voice, it may be imagined with what artistic skill he sang "Ah si ben mio." He also gave a vigorous reading of the air which brings Act III. to a close, and had a special call. Mr Leslie Crotty repeated his well-known personation of the Count, and Mr Snazelle made an excellent Ferrando. The prison scene was admirably presented, and the opening number, which included an impressive and excellent performance of the "Miserere," had to be repeated in response to a clamorous encore. Mr John Pew conducted, and the band was again in excellent order. Altogether the representation of Il Trovatore was such as is seldom witnessed in the provinces. The audience was the best of the week; and were it sufficiently known that a high-class entertainment is with us, the remaining performances of Mr Rosa's able company would hardly fail to draw out the public in large numbers. Boieldieu's chef d'œuvre, La Dame Blanche, is announced.

A NEW OPERA AT MANCHESTER.

(From the "Manchester Evening Mail.")

The opera of Victor E. Nessler, styled in Mr. H. Hersee's English version, The Piper of Hamelin, was produced last night at the Queen's Theatre with complete success. It was the first time of the work being heard in England, and the house was crowded from floor to roof. Nor was the large audience disappointed in any respect. The opera was put upon the stage in a manner that reflected the greatest credit on the management; the company was thoroughly sufficient for the interpretation of the music; the work had been so well rehearsed that not a hitch of importance occurred; and the orchestra was quite equal to the rather arduous task assigned to it. The opera is in five acts, though the curtain falls very frequently for the arrangement of the scenery, without, however, breaking unpleasantly the continuity of interest.

The story of the opera is based upon the legend which goes back to the year 1284. The city was infested with rats, of which the piper, Hunold Singuf, agrees to rid the city for the sum of 100 marks sterling and a douceur, stipulating, however, that he shall not be observed. Leaving the council chamber, where the bargain is concluded, he is fascinated by Gertrude, a village maiden, who is warned by her former lover, Wulff, a blacksmith, that Hunold is a sorcerer, which she refuses to believe. A wager is next made by Hunold that the gift he is to receive shall be a kiss from the mayor's daughter, Regina, and, having charmed the rats into the Weser by means of playing on his pipe, he proceeds to the town hall to demand his payment and the promised gift. There is general indignation at the audacity of the demand, and Hunold is refused payment, as three young rats still remain. He then vows that he will so fascinate Regina that she shall grant him a kiss. The scene changes to the Banqueting Hall of the Court House, festively decorated for the wedding of Heribert, the town architect, and Regina. The hall is filled with guests, when Hunold arrives, and is welcomed by some of the people, who wish him to entertain them with a song. His song, addressed to Regina, so fascinates her that she gives him a kiss. A scene of excitement ensues; Hunold is charged with sorcery, and is sent to prison. He is condemned to suffer at the stake, a punishment from which he is saved by Gertrude, who, by offering to suffer his punishment, procures his release, and, having done so, drowns herself in the Weser. On the day of the marriage of Heribert and Regina, Hunold causes the children of the city to follow him into the depths of a mountain, into which they for ever disappear. We can only to-day speak briefly of the music and the performance generally. There can be no doubt of the musician-like quality of M. Nessler's work. It is full of sprightly melodies, stirring choruses, and brilliant orchestration. The company, as we have already said, were thoroughly up to their task, and the applause of the large audience was continuous and hearty throughout the evening.

[The original title of this opera is equivalent in English to The Ratcatcher. Further particulars about it are postponed till our next.—D. B.]

BALLAD.

"Why do I sit with folded hands,
And gaze across the yellow sands,
Till the evening sun is low?"
My boy, when thou art at my side,
I love to watch the flowing tide,
And the white waves come and go.

For they whisper sweet, sweet thoughts to me
Of loved ones now on the glassy sea.

"Why do my eyes grow moist with tears,
As the last white sail the harbour nears,
And the children shout with glee?"
'Tis many years, my darling boy,
Since this lone heart beat high with joy
When the boats came in from sea.

For they whisper sad, sad thoughts to me
Of a boat that sank in a stormy sea.

"Why do I watch at break of day
Till the sun's first gleam across the bay
Makes the darker shadows flee?"
Ah! angels come when night grows late
To weary hearts that watch and wait
By the ever restless sea.

And they whisper glad, glad thoughts to me
Of the brighter land and the glassy sea.

SCHWERIN.—The temporary theatre, a wooden structure erected near the railway terminus, was inaugurated with a performance of Tannhäuser. Everything went on as usual up to the end of the second act, where the Landgrave tells Tannhäuser that the only way he can clear himself from the burden of sin which he has incurred is by going to the Eternal City and imploring pardon of the Pope. Hereupon Tannhäuser rushes to the footlights and exclaims enthusiastically: "To Rome!" On the night in question, as he uttered these words, the bell of the neighbouring railway station was heard, as well as the guard calling out: "Take your seats, please, take your seats." The house was convulsed with laughter.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1882.

THE LATE HERR NOTTEBOHM.

(To the Editor of the "Times.")

SIR,—Herr Gustav Nottebohm, whose death you announced recently, deserves a longer notice than has been given him by the English press. He was not a "musical historian" so much as a provider of historical materials for others. He began life as a practical musician, and soon published several works for the piano; he was much sought after to the end as a teacher; but what gave him his lasting claim to notice was his extraordinary instinct, patience, tact, and accuracy as an investigator. The chief field which he investigated was one of remarkable interest and extent, nothing less than the sketch-books of Beethoven; and the manner in which he explored these, and the results which he drew from them and published entitle him to the gratitude of all students of music.

Little as it might be imagined, Beethoven was one of the slowest and most tentative of composers. He always carried a large sketch-book with him, into which he scribbled every thought, and every change of thought, as it occurred to him. Many of these remain, and thus the progress of his works can be traced from the germ to the finished production. His subjects and passages, on their first appearance, often almost commonplace, are gradually polished and altered, seeming to grow more spontaneous at each step, until at last, after a dozen or more corrections, they become what we know them to be. Notwithstanding the absorption which this would seem to imply, his common practice was to work at two, and even three, of his greatest pieces at the same time, the sketches for which are inextricably mixed up together in these precious books. With the music are mingled household accounts, addresses, memoranda of facts, droll puns, quotations, prayers, ejaculations, cries of misery. These pages—to most eyes a mere congeries of scratches and blots—through long practice and a peculiar art, Nottebohm could read as easily as the Times newspaper, and he has left the results in various publications. The principal of these are:—A sketch-book of Beethoven of 1802, a second ditto of 1803, reprints of the music with copious elucidations—both published by Breitkopf, of Leipzig; "Beethoveniana" and Neue Beethoveniana detached examples and extracts from the same stores, amounting to seventy or eighty numbers, many of them very long. The first of the two is published by Rieter-Biedermann, and the second must be looked for in the numbers of the Musikalisches Wochenblatt (Leipzig), to which they were communicated in the years 1875 to 1879. Nottebohm has also published a most interesting edition (the only correct one) of the early portion of Beethoven's Studies—his exercises as a youth when taking lessons from Albrechtsberger, Haydn, and Salieri, with elucidatory notes and comments; an exhaustive thematic catalogue of Beethoven's works, and another, even more complete, of Schubert's. Having used these books almost every day for years, I know their extraordinary fascination and value, and I cannot but urge them strongly on our many cultivated amateurs.

I trust that the Neue Beethoveniana may be soon re-published in a volume, and that the papers of this most indefatigable and most accurate of explorers may yield much more of the same kind—for he was never idle, and it is some years since he published anything. We should treasure everything that he has left, for such qualities as his are not likely to be soon reproduced.—Your obedient servant,

Lower Sydenham, Nov. 21. G. GROVE.

GOUNOD ON MOZART'S DON JUAN.

Le rideau se lève. Il fait nuit. Seul sur la place publique, Leporello, le valet peureux, aux ordres de tous les caprices du seigneur volage, attend son maître qui vient de pénétrer dans le palais du Commandeur, pour ravir la noble fille, dona Anna. Don Juan accourt, suivi de sa victime qui s'attache à ses pas et dont les cris ont éveillé son père. Le Commandeur provoque l'audacieux félon; on dégaîne de part et d'autre, et ici s'engage un trio, saisissant de vérité sombre et de suprême agonie auquel Leporello, transi de peur, prend, dans le coin de la scène, une part tragi-comique. Le Commandeur mort, son meurtrier s'esquive à la faveur de la nuit dont l'obscurité sert son incognito. Rentre dona Anna, pâle, effarée; sur la place déserte, elle cherche, elle aperçoit un homme étendu,—elle approche tremblante . . . C'est son père!

Quels sanglots! quels gémissements! quels cris! quelle révolte de tout l'être! Et tout cela dans quelle sereine et indicible beauté de forme! Quel ordre consommé dans l'expression palpitante de ce désordre! Quelle clarté dans ce chaos de tous les sentiments! Comme l'angoisse de l'âme, dans son paroxysme le plus poignant, n'y trouble pas, un seul instant, cette perfection du langage qui s'appelle le style et qui est le ravissement de l'esprit! Comme la musique y pleure toutes les larmes, y exhale toutes les douleurs, sans jamais vociférer! Je demande à quiconque a lu Eschyle, Sophocle, Euripide: ces grandes voix de l'humanité tragique ont-elles jamais eu d'accent plus profond et plus vrai que l'auteur de cette scène musicale immortelle? Cela reste beau en étant terrible; c'est là le propre du sublime.

Don Ottavio, le fiancé de la noble orpheline, est accouru avec elle sur le lieu du combat. Après le premier abattement de la douleur, dona Anna se relève et, dans un duo d'un élan superbe, elle adjure son fiancé de chercher le meurtrier et de le punir. Ils partent.

Arrive dona Elvire, l'épouse abandonnée, poursuivant partout son infidèle. Quel type de fureur jalouse que cet air dans lequel elle s'écrie: "Ah! qui me dira où est ce cruel qui j'aimai pour mon malheur et qui a trahi sa foi? Si je retrouve le traître, je veux lui arracher le cœur!"

Digitized by Google

Comme le sang lui monte au visage! Avec quelle intensité l'orchestre met en relief le dépit amer et tenace de la femme outragée! Comme elle sauterait à la gorge du coupable, s'il était là devant elle!

Le voici, suivi de Leporello, son souffre-douleur; mais il le laisse avec Elvire et s'esquive dès qu'il la reconnaît.

Ici se place l'air célèbre dans lequel Leporello déroule sans vergogne, devant les yeux de la malheureuse Elvire, le catalogue des "mille et trois" fredaines de son maître. Cet air, unique dans son allure, est un modèle achevé de verve comique; Molière musicien ne l'eût pas écrit autrement; c'est de la gloriole de valetaille soulignant à plaisir, sous un malicieux semblant de persiflage, les traits les plus grossiers de cette nomenclature scandaleuse.

Et cependant, là comme partout, le tact suprême du génie qui saisit l'essence même des choses dont il rejette les scories.

Mais voici reparaître dona Anna et don Ottavio, cherchant toujours à découvrir les traces de l'assassin, lorsque don Juan se présente. Le noble maintien de la grande dame l'attire et le séduit; cette douleur grave, ces vêtements de deuil, tout ce qui est pour provoquer une pitié respectueuse devient un aliment pour sa passion toujours aiguillonnée, jamais satisfaite. Il aborde la sévère inconnue dont la nuit lui avait dérobé les traits. Il s'informe du motif de cette douleur, de ce deuil; on l'en instruit; il offre, à l'instant, de joindre ses recherches à celles des deux amants.

Sur ces entrefaites paraît dona Elvire courroucée. "Ne vous fiez pas à ce traître,"—dit Elvire en montrant son époux;—"il m'a trahie et vous trahira de même."—"Mes amis!"—reprend don Juan,—"la pauvre fille est folle! laissez-moi seul un instant avec elle; peut-être parviendrai-je à la calmer."

Quel merveilleux dialogue que ce quatuor! Comme chaque personnage y est à son plan, et comme tous s'y meuvent avec une apparente indépendance et une incroyable souplesse de liberté dans le plus parfait ensemble musical!

Don Juan et dona Elvire s'éloignent. Dona Anna, restée seule avec don Ottavio, suit du regard l'homme qui vient de la quitter et dont la voix a réveillé des souvenirs qui la bouleversent. "Don Ottavio—s'écrie-t-elle—je meurs! Cet homme, c'est l'assassin de mon père! N'en doutez plus; je l'ai reconnu à sa voix,—c'est lui!" Et après un récit frémissant de cette nuit funèbre, elle se dresse de toute la hauteur d'une Némésis, et, dans une imprécation d'une solennité magistrale, elle dit à son Ottavio: "Maintenant que tu sais qui m'a ravi mon père et m'a voulu ravir l'honneur, je te demande vengeance et ton cœur même l'exige." Ce morceau est un chef-d'œuvre de fière et majestueuse indignation.

Je passe sur le délicieux petit duo (là, ci darem la mano) entre don Juan et Zerline la jeune paysanne, nouveau caprice de ce coureur sans repos et de ce séducteur sans merci. Je laisse de côté vingt autres perles de cet inépuisable écrin, l'air pimpant et alerte de don Juan ordonnant les préparatifs d'une fête, l'air de Zerline (Batti, batti, o bel Masetto), d'une douceur si câline et si coquette, et j'arrive à la grande scène du bal qui termine le premier acte.

Et d'abord, l'entrée de don Ottavio, dona Anna et dona Elvire masqués. Quel prodige d'inspiration que ce fameux "trio des Masques!". La beauté musicale ne va pas plus loin: c'est un enchantement pour l'oreille et pour l'intelligence; c'est un diamant de la plus belle eau! Et combien il y en a de cette valeur dans les œuvres de Mozart! dans la Flûte enchantée, dans les Noces de Figaro, dans Così fan tutte, dans les symphonies, dans les concertos, dans la musique de chambre (quintettes, quatuors, trios, sonates!). C'est à ne les plus compter. Et quelle plénitude d'harmonie, quelle ampleur dans l'effet produit, avec quelle économie de procédés! Comme on voit bien là, dans une pleine évidence, que la véritable marque du génie est précisément cette sobriété des moyens qui est en raison même de la richesse de l'idée! C'est le sentiment de cette vérité qui dicta un jour à Mozart une fière et superbe réponse. On venait de représenter Don Juan à Vienne. L'empereur fait appeler Mozart dans sa loge, et lui dit: "Monsieur Mozart, vous venez de nous donner un fort bel ouvrage; mais, dites-moi, est-ce qu'il n'y a pas bien des notes là-dedans?"—"Sire,—répliqua Mozart,—pas une de plus qu'il ne faut!" Il n'y a que la conscience de la vraie force qui inspire de telles réparties.

Et cette fête qui succède au "trio des Masques"! quel entrain! quelle animation! Et le finale robuste et tumultueux qui termine l'acte! que de lumière dans cette mêlée! que d'éclat dans cette bagarre! Et tout cela, sans violence d'instrumentation, parce que la sonorité est dans la force et que la force est dans l'idée.

Me voici à moitié seulement de ma course déjà longue, bien que hâtive, à travers cette œuvre faite de chefs-d'œuvre. Il me faut restreindre, jusqu'à la mutiler, l'analyse du second acte.

Je ne puis cependant passer sous silence quelques-uns des plus beaux morceaux qu'il y ait au monde.

Le trio sous le balcon d'Elvire, si complètement exquis, d'un art si consommé qu'il suffirait à rendre immortel le musicien capable de l'écrire! Quel hypocrisie féline dans les soupirs amoureux que, sous les fenêtres mêmes de sa femme, don Juan adresse à la jeune camériste! Quels replis, quelles insinuations perfides dans cet orchestre qui fait patte de velours, et dont les caresses ne sont que piège et mensonge!

La crédule Elvire descend à la voix du séducteur qu'elle croit repentant. Soudain, dans un de ces éclairs familiers à l'astuce, don Juan troque son chapeau et sa cape contre ceux de son valet, le chargeant de donner le change à dona Elvire et de faire la place libre à son nouvel exploit.

Quelle trouvaille que cette petite sérénade fripponne, souple et railleuse! quel sursaut de gaillardise dans ce sceptique qui n'écoute et n'entend plus que ses sens!

Hélas! il me faut passer, sans m'arrêter, devant l'air adorable de Zerline, "Vedrai, carino"; devant le magnifique septuor dans la forêt; devant l'air "Ah! non mi dir" de dona Anna, résistant avec une dignité si noble et si touchante aux tendres instances de son fiancé; devant la scène du Cimetière, chef-d'œuvre d'impression tragique sur le fond de comédie de cet étonnant Duo qui nous montre Leporello terrifié devant cette statue du Commandeur hochant la tête, sur une tenue d'orchestre d'une simplicité lugubre, autour de laquelle se dessine un tremblement nerveux qui nous fait lire jusque dans les entrailles du valet blême d'épouvante.

Vient enfin la scène capitale du Festin.

Don Juan va souper. Il a déjà oublié son invitation insolente acceptée par "l'Homme de pierre." On frappe à la porte. Leporello va ouvrir et, à l'aspect du terrible convive, recule, mort de frayeur.

Alors commence cette scène formidable, d'un accent tragique sans égal. Rien ne peut rendre l'impression sinistre qui circule à travers cet orchestre d'une teinte sépulcrale. La justice s'avance avec une sûreté, avec une autorité, avec une puissance souveraine à laquelle on sent que le condamné ne peut plus échapper.

C'est en vain qu'il se tord et se débat sous cette étreinte inflexible: aux dernières instances, aux dernières menaces de la voix qui le sollicite encore: "Repens-toi!" il répond: "Non! vieux fou!. . ."; il ne résiste pas seulement: il blasphème et il insulte!. . . il tombe enfin dans le gouffre éternel de sa damnation.

Cette page est une œuvre de géant; et si jamais elle est égalée, elle ne saurait être surpassée: elle marque le sommet de la tragédie lyrique.

Ainsi se termine, du moins au théâtre, cette œuvre sublime, la plus belle étoile peu-être qui ait jamais resplendi au firmament de l'art musical.

L'art, Messieurs, dans son acception la plus complète, c'est le sentiment du Beau devenu science du Beau; c'est l'Instinct devenu Raison. Dans un ordre quelconque, le progrès vers la perfection consiste à connaître et appliquer de plus en plus les Lois qui président à cet ordre de réalités. C'est pourquoi l'on peut dire de tous les grands maîtres qu'ils le sont par les mêmes raisons, encore qu'ils ne le soient pas par les mêmes côtés: l'un découvrira la loi de ses sensations, c'est-à-dire des impressions produites sur ses organes; celui-là sera un maître par la science de la palette, ou de l'instrumentation, cette palette du musicien; un autre découvrira la loi des impressions produites non plus sur ses organes, mais sur son entendement, par des éléments d'un autre ordre, tels que les contours, les proportions, les attitudes, les caractères, les expressions, en un mot, par tout ce qui relève du domaine non de la matière, mais de la forme; celui-là aussi sera un maître. Je n'ai ni le dessein ni, moins encore, le droit de fixer les rangs dans cette hiérarchie des grands artistes; mais qu'il me soit permis de rendre ici un suprême et complet hommage à ce génie exceptionnel qui s'est appelé Mozart, et qui, par un privilège peut-être unique, a pénétré le secret de toutes les perfections.

CH. GOUNOD

MR GYE has concluded an arrangement with Mr Joseph Maas to join the company at the Royal Italian Opera next season. The affair was settled on Friday, the 17th inst.

Mdme Fursch-Madi has left Madrid to join Mr Mapleson's company in New York.

ROME.—One afternoon, a short time since, a red strip was pasted over the bills of the Teatro Costanzi. On it was the following notice:—"Owing to the asserted, but not professionally attested, indisposition of the tenor, Prévost, there will be no performance." The relations between the artist and the public have, in consequence, become very strained, and it is expected that the former's engagement will be cancelled.

CONCERTS.

POPULAR CONCERTS.—Since our last notice of these performances the string quartet party and the solo pianist have remained the same as on the opening night until last Saturday afternoon, when Herr Straus replaced Mr Hollander at the viola, and Mr Hallé appeared, for the first time this season, in lieu of Mdlle Janotha. The last named gentleman sustained the principal part in Brahms' Pianoforte Quintet in F minor, Op. 34, and played, for his solo, Beethoven's sonata in E flat from Op. 29. The quintet had previously been heard four times at these concerts, and may now be briefly dismissed. It is a dry, diffuse, and laboured piece of mere technical workmanship, which would fail to produce any effect but for excellence of rendering such as that of Saturday's performance. In the sonata, Mr Hallé displayed all that neatness and clearness of execution and thoughtful interpretation in which he has so long excelled. Herr Franz Ries' prelude, romance, and scherzo for violinw as repeated "by desire," with the advantage of Mdme Norman-Néruda's refined playing, as before; and Beethoven's string trio in G—by the lady violinist in association with Herr Straus and Signor Piatti—completed the instrumental programme. Mr Santley was the vocalist. His first song was Signor Piatti's "Hymn to God the Father," given with such marked success by the same singer at a recent concert. The other vocal piece on Saturday was Gounod's "Le nom de Marie." . . . . . This week's evening concert brought forward—for the first time here—a pianoforte quartet by Anton Dvorák. A sestet and a quartet—both for stringed instruments—by the same Bohemian composer had previously been introduced at the Popular Concerts, and some of his orchestral works have been heard at the Crystal Palace and elsewhere. Of these latter, his "Sclavonian Dances," and "Rhapsodies" are the most interesting as being strongly impressed with a distinctive national character, and not being amenable to such principles of coherent structural form and development as should, more or less, govern the composition of works of the symphonic class. The quartet given on Monday night had twice before been heard through the agency of Mr Hallé—at his series of recitals at the Grosvenor Gallery in May and June last. There is, therefore, no occasion now to say more than that its interest does not increase by repeated hearing, not even when so admirably played as it was by Mr Hallé in association with Mdme Norman-Néruda, Herr Straus, and Signor Piatti. The most successful portion is the middle movement, an andantino, with variations, some of the elaborations being ingenious and effective, In the first allegro and the final allegretto some detached themes, agreeable in themselves, are strung together so loosely and surrounded with so much discursive and laboured surplusage that the effect of the whole work is disappointing, not to say wearisome. Its performance on Monday added another to many instances of the factitious importance given by fine execution to music that is really commonplace, however pretentious in assumption. Mr Hallé's solo piece was Schubert's pianoforte sonata in A major, a late and posthumous work by the composer. Here, also, diffuseness and over-prolongation are apparent in its principal movements, with this difference from much of the music of the day, that Schubert's inventive power scarcely ever fails him, and his subject-matter is rarely, if ever, commonplace, although it may be occasionally overwrought. The sonata was very finely rendered, especially the scherzo and the final rondo. Another charming solo performance was that of Mdme Norman-Néruda in Handel's sonata in D, for violin (with pianoforte accompaniment), the instrumental selection having closed with Haydn's quartet in E flat (from Op. 71); a bright and genial work of the past, in which imaginative genius and artistic power are combined in a way to throw into lamentable contrast the dreary boredom of much (we might, perhaps, say most) of the laboured productions of the present that assume symphonic dimensions and importance with an absence of any intrinsic title thereto. The vocalist of the evening was Miss Santley, who sang Mozart's aria, "Zeffiretti" (from Idomeneo), and Gounod's song, "Esclave et Reine," with great charm and refinement. Mr Zerbini officiated, as usual, as accompanist, with the exception of Handel's sonata, the pianoforte part of which was sustained by Mr Hallé.—D. N.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—At the sixth Saturday Afternoon Concert the specialties were Mdlle Janotha's performance of Beethoven's Concerto in G, and of some unaccompanied solos, and, for the first time here, of Mr F. Corder's "Nocturne" for orchestra, composed for and produced at Mr Kuhe's recent Festival at Brighton. Mr Corder's Nocturne is graceful and melodious, and was favourably received. Mdme Howitz, a lady from Australia, we believe, made her first appearance here, and displayed a powerful voice in "Hear ye, Israel" (Elijah). Mozart's Symphony in G minor, and Weber's overture to Oberon, completed the programme. At to-day's concert Miss Arma Harkness, a new lady violinist, is announced to appear.

MR WALTER BACHE'S RECITAL.—This gentleman's twelfth annual performance of pianoforte music took place at St James's Hall on Monday afternoon, when his programme consisted entirely of original compositions by Franz Liszt—of whose works Mr Bache has long been an enthusiastic executant and zealous expounder. At several of his annual orchestral concerts Mr Bache has brought forward, for the first time in England, some of Liszt's ambitious symphonic works in which the composer assumes a poetical and metaphysical mission such as would require the genius of a Beethoven worthily to fulfil. Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the merits of these pretentious effusions, thanks are due to Mr Bache for the opportunities afforded by him for English hearers to form their opinion by means of excellent performances. Monday's recital of unaccompanied pianoforte pieces calls for little remark beyond a record of Mr Bache's earnest expositions of the music of his favourite composer, friend, and instructor. The most ambitious piece in the selection was the sonata in B minor dedicated to Schumann, of which an elaborate analysis — including an enthusiastic eulogium—was furnished to the audience, for their acquiescence or otherwise. Of this violently eccentric sonata we have before spoken in reference to its previous public performance, and need now say no more than to express the full belief that it will be generally comprehended and admired when the sonatas of Beethoven, Clementi, Dussek, and other classical masters are forgotten—scarcely before that far distant period. The other pianoforte pieces in Mr Bache's programme were the fugue in the letters of Bach's name, B. A. C. H. (B meaning b flat, and H b natural in German notation); three "Etudes;" Sonetta di Petrarca (from the Années de Pélerinage), Valse Oubliée, and Pesther Carneval (No. 9 of Rhapsodies Hongroises). In all these Mr Bache's laboriously cultivated powers of execution were successfully manifested, his efforts having been much applauded in each instance. An agreeable contrast was given to the instrumental music by Mr Oswald's refined singing in two Lieder by Liszt—"Die drei Zigeuner" and "In Liebeslust."—Daily News, Nov. 8.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.—The announcement of Mendelssohn's Elijah by the Choral Society of the Royal Albert Hall, on Wednesday evening last, awakened the usual public interest, and an enormous audience was present, including the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, to listen to a performance which, in attractiveness, it would be impossible to surpass, whether as regards the celebrity of the principals, the efficiency of the orchestra, or the force and grandeur of Mr Barnby's well-disciplined choir. Under these circumstances, the enjoyment of all present could but be of that high and ennobling kind which ever attends a due and complete representation of Mendelssohn's matchless work. Mdme Albani has, within the last year or two, given so many proofs of her admirable fitness for the interpretation of the chief soprano part as to render it superfluous to say more than that, upon the present occasion she was quite equal to herself, and, consequently, to the music. She sang throughout the evening with a fervour, grace, and brilliancy which have never been excelled in the executive annals of the oratorio. Her delivery of the exhortatory air, "Hear ye, Israel," was a superb display of declamatory vocalism; while her assistance in those touching expostulations and admonitions assigned to the intervening "Angels" lent all the charm to them of which they are so eminently susceptible. The contralto responsibilities were borne by that intelligent and useful vocalist, Mdme Isabel Fassett, whose efficiency was tested agreeably in everything that was confided to her, and whose delivery of the lovely air, "O rest in the Lord," left, in spite of obtruding comparisons, but little to be desired. Like Mdme Albani, Mr Santley challenges but passing notice, for his rendering of the music of the Prophet has long been among the most famous of his achievements, being, as it unquestionably is, one of those exceptional combinations of fine natural endowment with highly cultured art to which we can call to mind but few parallels. That Mr Joseph Maas would sing the beautiful air, "If with all your hearts," and fulfil all the other duties devolving upon him well and truthfully it is needless to say. This excellent artist is always welcome. He touches nothing that he does not adorn, thanks to the sympathetic quality of his voice and his skilful and judicious management of it. The remaining vocalists were Miss Marianne Fenna, Miss Dones, Mr Arthur Thompson, and Mr Henry Cross, whose services in the several concerted pieces in which they were engaged were uniformly satisfactory. Mr Barnby conducted with his accustomed vigilance and spirit, and, by means of the skilled amateur society over which he presides so wisely and so well, invested the magnificent choruses of the oratorio with as much majestic and illustrative effect as it was probably possible to attain.

ENTERTAINMENT FOR THE PEOPLE OF ST. GILES'S, BLOOMSBURY.—A concert of a good class was given in the Girls' Schoolroom, Endell Street, on Monday, Nov. 13, the vocalists being Misses Ellis Walton, Henden-Warde, and Sanders, Messrs Addison and John Cross. The pianists were Misses Carr Moseley, Millard, and Mr F. Sewell Southgate. The violinist was Miss Colvina Waite. Miss Ethel Lloyd recited "The Dream of Eugene Aram," and an orchestra of ladies and gentlemen, including more than one titled performer, gave a most efficient rendering of a cleverly written "toy symphony," composed by Miss Carr Moseley, R.A.M. The building was crowded to excess with a highly delighted and enthusiastic audience.

PROVINCIAL.

GLASGOW.—Last night's representation of Wagner's Flying Dutchman by the Carl Rosa company was a commendable one, keeping in view the severe demands of the author on all concerned. All things considered, band and chorus got amazingly well over their work. The music of the heroine was assigned to Mdme Valleria, who, thoroughly grasping its poetic significance, carried her audience with her throughout. Alike in the scene with Erik in Act 2, and in the great duet with the "Dutchman," she sang with rare sweetness and pathos, the needful vocal power being also imparted in the more dramatic passages. In the duet just named Mdme Valleria was joined by Mr Ludwig, whose declamatory music in the opening act was artistically delivered, and whose conception of the spectre-captain is in most respects admirable. Mr M'Guckin personated Erik, phrasing the cavatina in the last act with delightful effect; and Mr Henry Pope, as Daland, made probably his most successful appearance of the week. His air, when soliciting from Senta a friendly welcome for Vanderdecken, was exceedingly well sung. Mr John Pew ably conducted the performance, which, as we have said, was witnessed by an overflowing audience. Before the commencement of the opera Mr Knapp found his way to the gallery, and, in a few well chosen sentences, declined to believe that former unseemly proceedings at another house could be charged against our young friends at Gilmorehill. His observations were received with unmistakable demonstrations of good humour.—Nov. 18.—Another account.—An immense audience assembled on Friday week, to witness Wagner's Flying Dutchman. The performance was a complete triumph and the reception of the opera warmer than that accorded to any other representation by Mr Carl Rosa's Opera Troupe during their present engagement. Public interest with regard to the performance was naturally enough centred in the Senta of Mdme Valleria, and her vocal and dramatic efforts in the character were responded to by plaudits amounting to little short of an ovation. The character is, for the music entrusted to it, one of the most difficult and trying that can fall to the lot of any prima donna, but Mdme Valleria's execution of it proved her in every respect worthy to take rank in the character with either Ilma di Murska or Frau Sucher. Never before have we heard her to more if to so much advantage. Her histrionic efforts were in every way worthy of her vocalization. Her conception of the character is most artistic, and was characterised last evening by a repose and ease which is the legacy only of the experience of the most refined and finished artists. The Vanderdecken of Mr Ludwig was also very satisfactory, as were also the Daland of Mr Henry Pope, the Eric of Mr M'Guckin, the Mary of Miss M. Walsh, and the Steeraman of Mr B. Davies.—Daily Mail.

CAMBRIDGE.—The Cambridge Musical Society gave their usual "terminal concert" in the Guildhall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 14. The work performed was Handel's Esther, under the direction of Mr W. C. Dewberry; the solo singers were Miss Carlotta Elliott, Miss Alice Farren, Mr Vernon Rigby, Messrs Henry Blower and Hagyard. Mr F. Dewberry presided at the organ. Miss Carlotta Elliot, in "Flatt'ring tongne," was particularly good. Mr Vernon Rigby's "O beauteous Queen," and "How can I stay when love invites," were undoubtedly the gems of the evening. This gentleman—says the Cambridge Chronicle—always reminds us of Sims Reeves in his most robust style; his refined taste and exquisite pathos fairly brought down the house, and still further reminds one of the great English tenor. The part of the young Israelite was ably sustained by Miss Alice Farren, a local artist who has been trained at the Royal Academy of Music. The choruses went splendidly throughout, and the orchestra, led by Mr F. Ralph, left little to be desired.

BRIGHTON.—At the Aquarium last Saturday Mdme Cave Ashton's "opera company" concluded their engagement by giving excerpts from Wallace's Maritana in the morning, and from Il Trovatore in the evening. The concert in aid of the funds of the Brighton Hove and Sussex Throat and Ear Dispensary, was given last week at the Pavilion, as also Signor Conti's, on Thursday, in the same locale, assisted by Signori Scalzi and Sajeghi, Messrs William Shakespeare, Horscroft and Haughton. Signor Conti was not in good voice but his companions were, especially Mr Shakespeare, so that the selection from Bellini's Puritani went off much better than was expected. Miss Kuhe's concert is announced for this morning at the Pavilion Dome, at which the Misses Robertson, Miss Ella Lemmens, Mdme Antoinette Sterling, Miss Terry, Messrs Bernard Lane, Edward Lloyd and Santley are announced to sing, and Mr. Henry Irving to recite "The dream of Eugene Aram" and Charles Dickens's "Copperfield and the Waiter."

SALISBURY.—On Wednesday evening, Nov. 15th, the third of the series of Miss Aylward's chamber concerts was given at the Assembly Rooms, in aid of the fund for re-pewing St Thomas' Church. The singers were Miss José Sherrington, Mr A. Burnett, Mr W. E. Whitehouse, and some gentlemen of local musical eminence. Miss Sherrington, says the Salisbury Times, possesses a beautiful voice, wealthy in tone, and of wonderful compass, a style chaste and brilliant, her notes never in the highest range losing their sweetness. In a mazurka of Chopin's, arranged for the voice, "Tu commandes qu'on t'oublie," she, after a most brilliant cadenza, took a splendid high D. Her other songs, Rubinstein's "Du bist wie eine Blume," Schumann's "Widmung," Mendelssohn's "Reiselied," a new song of Tosti's "That day," and "Home, sweet Home," (which she gave in response to an encore for the preceding song), were in no wise less worthy the vocalist. Of the instrumental performances we must especially allude to the "Variations concertantes" for piano and violoncello (Mendelssohn), which Miss Aylward and Mr Whitehouse rendered with skill. A sonata, in A major, of Bach's, for violin and piano (Mr Burnett and Miss Aylward), and a charming string quartett of Haydn's (No. 1, Op. 76), by Mr A. Burnett, Rev. E. H. Moberley (violin), Messrs A. Foley (viola), and W. E. Whitehouse (violoncello). Beethoven's trio in C minor (Miss Aylward, Messrs A. Burnett and W. E. Whitehouse) concluded the concert. Mr A. Aylward was accompanist.

CARL ENGEL.

We regret to have to record the death, on the 17th inst., unfortunately under very painful circumstances, of Mr Carl Engel, the well-known collector of musical instruments and learned writer upon them. The fine collection of instruments at South Kensington was partly gathered by him, and the catalogue describing them, published in 1874, a masterpiece of erudition and lucid arrangement, was from his pen. His works upon musical subjects, chiefly historical or ethnological, have become of standard authority, and it is understood that his magnum opus, a continuation of the South Kensington catalogue, a voluminous work, including all the musical instruments known in the world, and, happily, completed, will be published under the auspices of the Department of Science and Art. Mr Engel was only sixty-four years old. He was a native of Hanover, and pupil of Hummel, but had resided the greater part of his life in England, and at Kensington, where he died.

LEIPSIC (Correspondence).—The programme of the Fifth Gewandhaus Concert was thus constituted: Part I.—Overture to Coriolanus (Beethoven); Air from Elijah (Mendelssohn); Pianoforte Concerto in G major, with the original cadences (Beethoven); Songs, with Piano Accompaniment (Franz Schubert, Adolph Jensen and Carl Reinecke); Pianoforte Solos (J. S. Bach, Carl Reinecke and Mendelssohn). Part II.—Symphony (without Minuet) in D major (Mozart). The vocalist was Herr Paul Jensen, of the Theatre Royal, Dresden; the pianist, Mdlle Mary Krebs, who played superbly, and was rapturously applauded. The sixth concert was dedicated to the memory of Mendelssohn, and all the works performed emanated from his pen. They were: Part I.—Motet for Eight-part Chorus, "Mitten wir im Leben sind" (words by Luther); Air from Elijah; "Ave, Maria," for Tenor, Eight-part Chorus, and Orchestra. Part II.—Symphony in A major; Air from Die Hochzeit des Camacho; Overture, "The Hebrides"; Finale from the unfinished opera of Lorely. Two of the above pieces, the motet and the air from Die Hochzeit des Camacho, were novelties in Leipsic. The world-renowned Violin Concerto, also, was to have been included in the programme, but, owing to the illness of Mdlle Marianne Eissler, of Vienna, who should have been the executant, it was omitted. The vocalists were Moran-Olden, Oldenburg Grand-Ducal chamber singer, and Hedmont, of the Leipsic Stadttheater.

MARIE KREBS.

*(From the Leipsiger Tageblatt.)

"As regards execution, the Concerto in G major is certainly more difficult than that in E flat major. It demands less strength, it is true, from the player, but, to make up for this, more agility and, finally, more lasting power. With respect to expression, there is less need of a passionate going-out-of-one's-self than inward warmth united to gracefulness. As a rule, artists who quite satisfy all the demands made on them by the Concerto in G major are rare. That foremost among those naturally qualified for this task stands Marie Krebs, yesterday evening amply proved. It was a great, a magnificent treat to see so gifted a performer combine with so intelligent an orchestra in such a work. Words of gold are due to them for what they did. Yet it is precisely when a writer is actuated by the best intentions that his critical pen sometimes fails him. If I must declare my firm conviction, it is: that no one is capable of rendering the G major Concerto with greater clearness, technically, as well as generally, with more life and truth, than Mdlle Marie Krebs. With the most earnest attention I could not find a shortcoming anywhere: her runs, her shakes, her tone—everything was a model of perfection, a marvel. But what most especially enhanced the impression produced was the noble repose exhibited by the fair executant; there was nothing inconsiderate, no hurried expression, but everywhere the same thorough command, conscious of the aim it had in view, over the task to be accomplished. Owing to the intentional restraint kept on herself by the player, the entire Concerto appeared to be shaded one degree deeper than usual, but, judging from the artistic success, this rendering, which raises the expression so extraordinarily, may be designated as appropriate. That Mdlle Krebs played the original cadences was probably an interesting fact for many persons. Beethoven, as we know, himself wrote cadences to some of his concertos, and several to the Concerto in G major. But, if by means of the cadence an opportunity is to be offered the player of presenting in a virtuoso-like and condensed form the passport of what has preceded, no one can be angry with other artists for adopting the perhaps more grateful cadences of Reinecke, Bülow, Clara Schumann, &c. On the other hand, and as a matter of course, we cannot object to the feeling of reverence which causes Marie Krebs to remain, here as elsewhere, true to the Master.

"In the way of solo-pieces, Mdlle Krebs played the D minor Toccata by Bach-Starke, a Gavotte, Op. 129, by Reinecke; and the Prelude in D major, from Op. 104, by Mendelssohn—the Toccata with the greatest possible energy; the Gavotte, a very grateful piece, with exceeding gracefulness; and the Prelude with astounding fluency. This last work is a kind of Perpetuum Mobile, the execution of which is rendered even more difficult than it otherwise would be because the semi-quavers are given to both hands. The extra piece ('Am Springbrunnen'), by H. Scholz, was of a pleasing character."

* Apropos to her recent performance at the last Gewandhaus concert.

EXCERPTS FROM PARKE'S MUSICAL MEMOIRS.

Excerpt No. 6.

1786.

There were three grand performances this year at Westminster Abbey, by command, and under the patronage of their Majesties. They commenced on the 31st of May; and were under the direction of the honorary noble president, and the noble vice-presidents of the Royal Society of Musicians, so styled by command of the King, George the Third. Mdme Mara and Mrs Billington were at the head of the vocal corps, and Cramer led the band, which was considerably increased in number. The profits of these performances were applied in aid of the fund of the Royal Society of Musicians, the Westminster Hospital, and the Sons of the Clergy. Their Majesties were accompanied by the Queen's brother, the Prince of Mecklenburg, the Princess Royal, and five other princesses. The Abbey was thronged at the performance of The Messiah. At the last rehearsal, owing to some neglect, there were not the customary refreshments prepared for the magistrates who attended. On Mr Justice B—d entering the room wherein they had been usually displayed, and not seeing any preparation for them, he said, with surprise, "Are we not to have any of the good things of this world to-day?" Being answered in the negative, "Oh!" said he, "if that's the case, I can be of no use here; so I wish you a good morning," and departed! That justices of the peace have been long famed for good living, admits of no doubt: indeed, it may be clearly traced as far back as the reign of Elizabeth (who, by the bye, loved a good beefsteak for breakfast), for Shakspere describes one, "With fair round belly, with capon lined;" and, if we may hazard a conjecture, the science of gastronomy might have been known amongst the quorum, even at a much more remote period.

Mr Justice Collick, the hair merchant of St Martin's Lane, with whom I was acquainted, displayed a different disposition to his before-named worship, being, though a little eccentric, kind and liberal. He was good-natured, though at times he affected to be severe. He did not care a straw for money, while he was desirous to appear frugal. He had acquired a large fortune in trade, and was from habit still so devoted to it, that though he had an elegant house at Clapham, where he always slept, he never failed being in his carriage at nine in the morning, Sundays excepted, and in the midst of his business at ten. Mr Collick, who was in the commission of the peace for Middlesex, having no family, was at all times happy to see a few of his old friends, mostly musical ones, drop in at the dinner hour, for whom preparations were made whether they came or not. Among the oldest and most intimate was Mr Crosdill, the celebrated violoncello player, who, when he intended visiting Collick, proceeded to the fishmonger, poulterer, &c., of the latter, and directed those articles he preferred to be sent to his house for dinner. When Collick was informed of such arrivals, he pretended to be displeased, exclaiming, "Ah! now I see that scapegrace, Jack Crosdill, is coming, rot him!" while he was secretly highly gratified. Indeed, the most happy hours of his life were those in which his friends passed their time with him in that manner. The old gentleman being one day taken with a fit of economy, and considering that his servants consumed at their luncheons an unreasonable quantity of cheese, hit on a scheme by which he thought he would restrain them in future. He posted to the warehouse of his brother magistrate, Slaughter, the cheesemonger, and desired to see a good and strong Cheshire cheese. After having tasted two or three which he thought too mild, they produced one which they called a peeler, a name appropriate enough, it having blistered his tongue while tasting it. "Ay," said Collick, "this is quite the thing I wanted. Send it to my house." The servants, however, rejected the peeler, and in future ate meat instead of it. Collick at length discovering this, through the increased amount of his butcher's bill, said to himself, "I see my scheme don't take, I have been too cunning for myself;" and, ringing his bell for the servants, good-humouredly told them that, "as they could not eat the peeler themselves, they might send it as a present to the fire-eater, who would perhaps think it too mild."

Vauxhall Gardens opened for the season on the first of June, with a brilliant fête, entitled "The Vauxhall Jubilee," the gardens having been established half a century. Mr Incledon sang there that season for the first time, with great applause. The songs, &c., by Mr Hook were appropriate and pleasing.

Walking with James Hook, the composer, and his first wife, to view the British Museum, we were accosted by a female beggar, one of the most miserable in appearance imaginable. The poor creature, who solicited alms, had neither shoe nor stocking on, and her dress consisted literally of "shreds and patches," while she amused herself, during the whole of her solicitation, with a practice well-known north of the Tweed, that of scratching her thigh. The applicant being disgusting as well as wretched, Hook, who was never at a loss for a pun, in order to get rid of her (which was no easy thing), wrapt some money in a piece of paper, and keeping at a respectful distance, dropped it into her hand, saying at the same time, "There, good woman, is sixpence for you; but I must say, you are a very feel-thigh (filthy) woman."

A translation of the popular French piece, Richard Cœur de Lion, was produced at Drury Lane Theatre on the twentieth of October, with the original music by Grétry. Miss Romanzini (afterwards Mrs Bland) sang the pretty chanson, "The merry dance," with great naïveté and effect. The character of Richard was acted by Mr John Kemble, who, though he had not a singing voice, got through the two-part song, on which the plot hinges, better than was expected. At one of the rehearsals of this piece Kemble, who had got the tune of it tolerably well, being very deficient in keeping the time, Mr. Shaw, the leader of the band, impatiently exclaimed, "Mr Kemble, that wont do at all! you murder time abominably!" "Well, Mr Shaw," replied Kemble, "it is better to murder it, than to be continually beating it as you are."

This song will shortly be published.—Athenæum.

On Tuesday Dr Diplock held an inquest at 54, Addison Road, Kensington, on the body of a German gentleman named Carl Engel, sixty-four, who was found dead on Saturday morning last, on which day he was to have been married to a Miss Lawrence. It appeared that on Friday evening last the deceased retired to bed in his usual health. On the following morning his bedroom door was found to be locked. The door was broken open, and the deceased was found dead, suspended by a strap which was fastened through a hole cut in the cupboard door. The jury returned a verdict that the deceased committed suicide whilst in a state of unsound mind.

An organ, which is to have 120 speaking stops, is (according to the Leipziger Zeitung) being built by Walter & Co., in Ludwigsburg, near Stuttgard, for the Cathedral at Riga. As it is to have all the most modern improvements, it will be the most elaborately-designed instrument there is. It will be so constructed that it can be played from an upper gallery or from below. The whole upper portion is to be blown by gas motors, and the lower part by hand. Thus two people will be able to play at the same time, one playing the solo, whilst the other plays the tutti. It will, according to the above-named journal, be the largest organ in the world, and is to cost 90,000 marks (say £4,500). The great organ in New York has 115 speaking stops.

The concert at the Royal Victoria Coffee Hall in the Waterloo Road, on Monday evening, the 11th December, will be under the direction of Mr Charles Oberthür, when the first part will consist of his cantata for ladies' voices, The Red Cross Knight, performed by the South Kensington Ladies' Choir under the direction of Mrs Arthur O'Leary, the solo parts being sung by Misses Howes, Park, O'Leary, Guy, and Fräulein Bertha Kaysel. In the second part Mr Oberthür will play, with his pupil, Miss Fortescue, his brillant duet for two harps on Meyerbeer's Huguenots. Fräulein Kaysel will give the same author's romance, "Je voudrais être" (with harp accompaniment). Mr Alfred Hemming will sing Blumenthal's "Evening Song," and the South Kensington Ladies' Choir, Schumann's "Gipsy Life" and other choral pieces.

LITTLE MAY.*

Out in the morning's balmy air,
Into the fields so fresh and fair,
Hied Little May,
So blithe and gay,
Into the woods where the flowers were rare;
There in the nook,
Where the noisy brook
Laughed and murmured all day long,
She stole the flow'rs
From the sylvan bow'rs,
And mingled her voice with the water's song.

Into the brook with feet all bare,
Laughing eyes and sunny hair,
Little May stepped,
And her basket kept
All the bright flow'rs she had picked with care;
But ere she crossed
Her flowers were tossed
Into the stream to her sad dismay.
And Little May cried
At the water side
As the flowers she'd gathered were swept away.

So in life's early morn we go
Into the fields where pleasures grow,
To gather the flow'rs
Of childhood's hours
Before the heart a thorn can know;
But the hour draws nigh
When those pleasures die,
For sorrow's stream comes gliding past,
And ere the day
It has swept away
The joys we fondly thought would last.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. SAVOY THEATRE.

Mr W. S. Gilbert is an illustration of the common fact that when a man has hit the taste of the public in a special way he remains a specialist, because, even if he would, the public will not allow him to change. We have not the smallest reason to suppose that Mr Gilbert desires to alter his course as a librettist. He, and his musical colleague, resemble the present Government in being "on the crest of the wave of public favour," and are doubtless satisfied with that enviable altitude. All the same there is an obligation on him to work in the way which gave the first impetus to his upward course. He has created an appetite that must be fed, imparted a flavour of pleasant fooling without which no concoction would be palatable, and marches as a prisoner bound to the chariot-wheels of his own art. This state of things is in no case an unmixed good, and assuredly cannot be so considered with a speciality limited in its nature and to some extent restricted in its application. There is danger of exhaustion on the one hand, and of satiating public taste on the other. Face to face with such a contingency Mr Gilbert has not yet arrived, but even now each succeeding play is revealed to a public who have discounted its character, divined its method, and prophesied its personages. The librettist seems to be aware of the fact, and in his latest work gives indications of a desire to belie it. Thus, he has stopped the proud procession of the P's, discerning no absolute reason why he should run in an alphabetical rut. He is credited with having looked at Perola, and wished to place it in the gallery that already holds Pinafore, The Pirates, and Patience. With an effort, however, he wrenched himself away, travelled back towards letter A, and, halting at I, embraced Iolanthe. Even this exercise of an independent will is, to some extent, resented by the public, who naturally looked for their P, and now take it out in complaining. Mr Gilbert, on the other hand, does not seem to have risked much by venturing into fairyland; mixing the supernatural with those realities of the common world he has handled in so grotesque a fashion. The first audience of Iolanthe gave a kindly greeting to the fairies, and the author may congratulate himself upon having opened up a fresh field. For the rest, Iolanthe is Mr Gilbert in Topsyturvydom, where we have now so often seen him. He takes us once again "behind the looking-glass," and shows us all things inverted, working with the old machinery a set of fresh puppets—in some cases not fresh puppets, only new clothes. Really, however, the mannikins do not much matter so long as they are mouthpieces for the author's quips and cranks. We, as an audience, go through the play, reading the dialogue from Mr Gilbert's book, and, turning the leaves altogether with a mighty rustle, simultaneously behold Mr Gilbert laughing at us in his grim way on the other side. So intense a personality is hard to sustain, and even this ingenious creator of a new dramatic method falters under the burden of his own invention. The last act of Iolanthe sometimes halts and totters. Its march is that of weariness. The author, unsupported by character and plot, and himself speaking through each mouthpiece, ends by being in the position of his own Lord Chancellor when he sings "The night has been long; Ditto, ditto, my song; And, thank goodness, they're both of them over." To this Mr Gilbert is condemned, just as Mr Tom Matthews, of pantomime fame, was fated to be always singing "Hot Codlins."

Having resolved upon a band of fairies, it became the author's obvious care to associate them with a set of mortals as little congruous as possible. He therefore hit upon the Peers of England, and the connection of those robed and coronetted personages with the aerial denizens of woods and streams is the basis upon which Mr Gilbert erects his structure. The idea is aptly developed from beginning to end. We see its expansion when, in the first act, the Peers hold informal session by daisied bank and babbling brook, and when, in the second, the fairies gambol in old Palace Yard, under the eyes of Private Willis, of the Grenadiers, there, for some unexplained reason, on "sentry go." This wild inversion of habitat has its complement, not so much when the Peers lay their coronets at the feet of an animated Dresden china shepherdess called Phyllis, as when they each and all take a fairy to wife, and, suddenly developing wings, become fairies themselves. Moreover, the Lord Chancellor has married a fairy, Iolanthe, before the play opens, and it is their son Strephon, who is fairy down to the waist, that carries off Phyllis against his own father and the entire House of Lords. Still further developing his unutterably odd idea, Mr Gilbert places the Peers under a fairy spell, condemning them for sundry offences to become the legislative slaves of Strephon, M.P.

> "You shall sit, if he sees reason,
> Through the grouse and salmon season;
> He shall end the cherished rights
> You enjoy on Wednesday nights," and so on. Upon these violent incongruities the main structure of the play rests; as for the attendant details, students of Mr Gilbert's method will not be surprised to hear that the Lords enter the Arcadian meadow of the first act headed by the band of the Grenadier Guards; that the Chancellor and two of his peers dance in Old Palace Yard by moonlight; that Phyllis's noble suitors implore her not to "treat with virtuous scorn the well connected," since "high rank involves no shame;" and that the most exalted of her lovers puzzles his legal mind with doubts whether a Chancellor can obtain his own consent to marry his own ward, and, if he marry his own ward without his own consent, whether he can commit himself for contempt of his own court. All these things were more or less inevitable, while it was quite in Mr Gilbert's way that he should mingle something of grave satire with his grotesque treatment of the second estate. He is hard upon the Lords, those "Paragons" of legislation, "Pillars of the British nation." They are the one British institution "not susceptible of any improvement;" Britain won her proudest bays when "The House of Peers made no pretence to intellectual eminence;" and thrashed Bonaparte because "The House of Peers throughout the war, Did nothing in particular, And did it very well." The satire is smart, but that it forms an element of strength in the play may be doubted. Mr Gilbert is not here covering with ridicule a "fashionable craze," or holding up to laughter a civilian "ruler of the Queen's Navee," while even his fertile fancy invents no new gibe against an institution many Englishmen admire, and the rest are content to tolerate. For this reason his satirical humour falls flat. Not so, however, the quaint conceits in prose and verse that attend the development of the plot and throw it, as we have already remarked, into second place. The first act—by far the better of the two in all respects—is one long procession of laughter-moving oddities. "Who taught me to dive into a dewdrop—to nestle in a nutshell—to gambol upon gossamer?" asks Miss Alice Barnett, as the Fairy Queen, thinking of Iolanthe, then doing penal servitude "on her head" for marrying a mortal. Strephon speaks of trying to placate the Lord Chancellor by playing songs of Arcadee in court, and objects to going into Parliament because his fairy half being Conservative and his mortal legs Radical, a majority of two to one would take him into the wrong lobby. And when Strephon pleads before the legal guardian of his love that Nature bade him take her, the official answers "It's not evidence;" but professes readiness to weigh well "an affidavit from a thunderstorm, or a few words on oath from a heavy shower." The supply of such mental and verbal fireworks throughout a long evening, and in connection with scenes and characters of narrow limit, above all, when an audience will not be diverted from looking after them, is a task that Mr Gilbert here finds beyond his powers. He ultimately repeats himself; he is tedious in a dialogue between two peers as to which shall kill the other; the sparks of humour become less frequent and bright, and a feeling spreads that the author has sat down in the saddle and is riding home for dear life. As usual in Mr Gilbert's work, the lyrics are admirable, whether regarded for themselves or as lines for music. There may, perhaps, be a little too much of the patter song, but in contrast of subject and variety of rhythm the verses of Iolanthe are exceptionally rich.

Mr Sullivan's share of the work is important in a special degree, the musical pieces being not only numerous, but some of them—the first finale for example—of large dimensions. The composer has risen to his opportunity, and we are disposed to account Iolanthe his best effort in all the Gilbertian series. Not that the music claims to be more tuneful or better adapted for popularity. It is that, while pleasing the general ear, artistic requirements are met with a frank and practical acknowledgment of their claims. Mr Sullivan has written nothing from which the cultured musician is absent, and probably could not do so if he tried. In Iolanthe the cultured musician predominates, investing graceful and refined ideas with all the charm of art. It need hardly be said that Mr Sullivan again displays the acute sense of humour which makes him fit Mr Gilbert as glove fits hand. This is often overlooked, its special effect being merged in a general sensation of pleasure. It exists, nevertheless, and in Iolanthe cannot easily pass unrecognized. Examples crowd upon us for quotation, but we will take only one. The Fairy Queen, referring to the common sense which restrains her amorous nature, finds in Captain Shaw its figurative presentment, whereupon the chorus of fairies invokes Captain Shaw, "type of true love kept under," in strains of the most gushing sentimentality, set off by voluptuous orchestral colouring. The house on Saturday caught the fun of the idea at once, and broke into a shout of laughter. With such true comedy in music the new work abounds, but, indeed, merit of even higher kinds shines in each scene. Schubert in his sweetest mood might have written the fairies' invocation of their banished sister Iolanthe; and there is laughter-moving humour in the pompous ensemble, with military band, that ushers in the House of Peers, as well as in the short fugal passage which then and after introduces the Lord Chancellor. Not less distinguished is some of the music to the scene between Phyllis and the Lords, Mr Sullivan here giving free rein to his fancy in the orchestra. The first finale, long though it be, is sustained without flagging, and evinces a power of combination and development unusual in works of the class. Among the best pieces in the opera for artistic interest is a dialogue with the very unpromising refrain "Tarradiddle, tol lol lay." In the second act a song by the sentry deserves praise; and that of Lord Mountararat, "When Britain really ruled the waves," has a character of its own subtly mingled with the least possible flavour of "Rule Britannia." It is, however, in a patter song for the Lord Chancellor, descriptive of a weird dream, that Mr Sullivan's art touches its highest point. He might have been content with mere chords of accompaniment, since the audience in such cases listen only to the words, but the orchestral part is one of singular elaboration, beauty, and effect. We know nothing better of its kind. It has all the delicacy of touch and felicitous fancy of Mendelssohn when dealing with kindred themes. These examples of general and nearly uniform merit must suffice. Enough with regard to the opera as a whole that Mr Sullivan has associated his colleague's outrageous conceits with examples of true and refined musicianship. The performance which was witnessed by a crowded and representative audience, had every merit that careful rehearsal and clever adaptation of work to workers could secure. No hitch of any importance disfigured it, nor did incompetence anywhere convey a sense of weakness or insecurity. The dresses were superb; the scenery was excellent—the "set" of Palace yard with the towers of the Houses of Parliament soaring into the air, being a triumph which met with prompt recognition, while the details of the stage management scarcely gave room for criticism. Miss Leonora Braham, as Phyllis, again asserted her value to the company, singing and acting with brightness and charm, in which she was emulated by Miss Jessie Bond (Iolanthe), Misses Fortescue, Gwynne and Gray also doing good service as three prominent fairies. The imposing figure and intense seriousness of Miss Alice Barnett made the character she presented stand out conspicuously, and helped to give significance to an impersonation by no means lacking quiet humour. The Strephon of Mr R. Temple; the Sentry of Mr Manners—a figure admirable in its disciplined stolidity; the Earl Tolloller of Mr Lely; and the Earl of Mountararat as embodied by Mr Rutland Barrington fitted into the play so as to leave no gap open for the darts of, at any rate, serious criticism, while Mr George Grossmith as the Lord Chancellor was a constant cause for laughter, whether gravely debating knotty points, singing patter songs, dancing in Palace-yard, or developing into a fairy. Throughout this versatile artist showed a perfect adaptability, and a power of throwing into each scene something of his own native humour. Mr Sullivan conducted an orchestra generally efficient, and at the close was summoned, with Mr Gilbert, to receive all the assurance of success that cordial and unanimous applause could convey.—*D. RICHTER CONCERTS.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—We regret to inform you that our relations with Mr Richter are again broken off. . . . . We had undertaken the management of the autumn concerts, and the future series of Richter Concerts were also to be under our management, for which a basis of terms had been agreed upon.

Now, after the good results of the autumn concerts, cheaper terms for the management having been offered to Mr Richter, unacceptable to us, our connection with these concerts has ceased.—Yours faithfully,

SCHULZ CURTIUS.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

There is very little to relate on matters musical; but I saw, for the first time (though it had been performed twice previously), Un Lycée de jeunes filles, by Louis Grech. The words are by M. A. Brisson, the author of Le Voyage d'agrément. The "plot and passion" I will not describe, but must notice the talent of Mdlle Suzanne Leblanc (a new acquisition here) in the character of Tambourine, and that of M. Rispal, the directeur du Lycée. Mdlle Geoffroy has established herself as a good singer, and as an artist of histrionic capabilities, in Giroflé, La vie Parisienne, and Les Braconniers. In La vie Parisienne M. Bérard, the director, well known to us here years ago, appeared in the first two acts as Frick and "le Major." L'Assommoir also attracts the frequenters of the "upper boxes," who applaud, look on astonished, and go out between each of the nine tableaux to drink. M. Bérard has signed for Gillette de Narbonne, and I hope we shall have it well brought out in January. From what I have not only read in the papers, but heard from the best of sources, the opera is so good that you may anticipate us in London by its production in an English dress; for I hear that it is bought by some one who knows "what's what." Fanfan la Tulipe is announced for Tuesday, and Pompon is in rehearsal. I do not despair of our having the new Parisian drama, Les Mères ennemies—when Mdme Agar has time to visit her property near Boulogne, and, bringing a starring troupe with her, as she usually does once or twice a year, to entertain and charm the Boulonnais. The first Philharmonic Concert (intime) takes place on Monday, December 4, and, thanks to the efforts of the vigilant founder of the society, the programme is well selected. The Mass in honour of Ste Cécile is to come off at the Church of St Nicholas on Monday morning.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

The winter exhibition of this esteemed and long-established society, which opened to the public on Monday, November 27th, contains many works of high merit, while in average quality it equals—perhaps excels—former displays. It is evident that the need of strenuous efforts is, at the present time, unmistakably enforced on English artists of a certain grade; for the foreigner, never absent in art, is now very active in the market competing for that patronage, already lessened by prolonged depression and uncertainty in the trade of the country. Formerly, when the aristocracy only "did" the grand tour, "old masters," oftener than not spurious, were brought home; now, however, in these days of return tickets and coupons, the Continent is overrun by travellers whose journeyings during the rest of the year are limited to daily pilgrimages to the City. These worthies are generally seized with the proud desire of bringing back signs of foreign travel, in the shape of works of art. Oftentimes such patrons, doubting their own judgment, procure art treasures through traders. Naturally, picture dealers are not wanting in devotion to that first, and chiefest commandment in the gospel of trade, "buy in the cheapest market, and sell in the dearest," and, in fulfilment of that pure and lofty precept, English art is apt to be pushed aside. To win, then, the native artist must either sell cheaper, or work better than his rival. How far the exhibitors have been successful in holding their own is an enquiry which the visitor to the Suffolk Street Gallery will not find unpleasant to pursue. Early in the catalogue will be found Mr Walter Stacey's "News of the world," (No. 10), a vigorous representation of an old man, at his cottage door, reading; and near (No. 15) will be seen Mr Arthur Bell's sketch of the "River Rother," in which a prevailing harmony of grey tones is skilfully preserved. Mr J. H. S. Mann sends a cabinet picture (No. 46) of charm and merit; a mother, enacting that earliest of conceits, is pointing out to her amused child "the pig that went to market, and the one that stopped at home." The author has modestly called it a sketch, whilst it is, in every sense of the word, a highly finished picture. In the same room no one can fail seeing Mr Christian Symons' "Three stages of life" (No. 80); the epochs are illustrated by a girl, mother, and grandmother. If Mr Symons had done justice to his idea, by carrying it out with something approaching elaboration, then the work would have been enjoyed by many, now passing it by as immature.

Mr W. H. Gadsby has, this season, elected to send a small canvas "Asleep" (No. 90); but the simplicity of the subject, a child sleeping in its little bed, is made thoroughly attractive by the consistent treatment, and unconstrained handling of this progressing artist. Mr James E. Grace, not unmindful of the particular landscape which brought him renown, has again in "Amongst the Surrey hills" (No. 108) painted the well-known pool, with long grass, and the silvery-barked tree, with encircling meadows. No one has hesitated in acknowledging the power of Mr Edwin Ellis's brush; to see his productions from afar is sufficient to be impressed with his unusual vigour. Perhaps "Pemberth Cove" (No. 136) is better appreciated from the end of the room furthest from the picture. Standing at that point the blue waves seem alive with foam-producing motion, as they tumble on the beach, where fisher-folk are busy with nets and boats. On coming near, however, the effect is lessened, for paint then looks only like paint. This is unfortunate, for buyers have not always large rooms, and it is not likely they will build on purpose. Moreover, pictures are not banners to be "hung on the outward walls." Mr. J. C. Waite, never found wanting in jealous care for his artistic reputation, always places before the public well-studied transcriptions of nature, and in "Looking at the Well" (No. 164) he again demonstrates his skill. Another humorous incident in priestly recreations is graphically told by Mr Dendy Sadler in "Habet" (No. 182). Whether priestly fun loses by repetition, or the present picture is too black in tone, this capital work scarcely provokes the same mirth as its predecessors. One of the most valued and respected contributors to the gallery is Mr. E. J. Cobbett, and great pleasure is felt in witnessing the sustained strength of the artist. No. 170 "On the Coast," shows the capacity he retains for out-of-door work. Sea, beach, and sky, are harmoniously blended, whilst light from the hastening sun tips the ruffled waters, and turns into silver the pools left by the receding tide. Mr Ernest Waterlow, always an acceptable exhibitor, sends a well executed study entitled "A Thaw," (No. 210); near which hangs Mr Haynes King's most important effort of the season, "Granny's Story," (No. 196.) The old lady seems to be a good teller of a story, and the younger, if anything, a better listener; both however are admirably depicted, and the interior with its lights and shadows is painted with a Dutch-like fidelity.

The "Plague of the Village" (No. 230) revels in brilliant colour, and the grouping of the figures adds naturalness to the animated scene. Mr Caffieri, in "Back of Hurley Lock" (No. 294), has made a charming picture out of unpromising materials, but this gentleman has a keen perception of nature, and a fine touch that seldom fails him. Mr G. T. Walters is evidently a devotee to uniformity, and therefore exercises his gifts in supplying representations of an unvarying character. In "Sunset after Rain" (No. 306) will be found the same sunlight, struggling through the same broken clouds, upon the same rippling waters, which floats the same boats, that have done time-honoured duty. There will also be found the same excellence, but his thoughtful admirers might possibly be glad now and then of just a little variety. Mr Helmick's "Working for his Landlord," and "Working for Himself" (Nos. 327 and 626), are extremely good in subject and treatment, and withal full of unenforced humour; while Mr Thomas Watson must be congratulated upon a fine landscape, "A Surrey Lane" (No. 335), in which a thoroughly English scene is set forth with such artistic judgment, and such loving reverence for the subject, as to place the author amongst the highest of the exhibitors. Mr Yeend King has an agreeable breadth of style, but in "Fresh-water Sailors" (No. 345) the colours seem to be laid on too much in masses; while Mr A. F. Grace cannot fail to please by his manly and unaffected "Our Village" (No. 369). Mr Carlton Smith's "Normandy Milkmaid" (No. 379) is full of vivacity; and Mr Lance Calkin's "Eventide" (No. 632) full of promising merit. There are many lady exhibitors, amongst whom must be named Miss Phœbe Cobbett, who gives a pleasant reminiscence of "Autumn" in No. 258. It would be superfluous to discuss the high artistic qualities of Mr A. J. Woolmer, or the skill of Mr Thomas Roberts, the Secretary, for their positions have long been placed beyond question.

MARIE ROZE.

Another enthusiastic poet of Auld Reekie thus ardently addresses Mdme Marie Roze, after seeing her as Fidelio and Lucrezia Borgia.

O beautiful Singer of tender lays
That linger long in the hearer's heart;
Like the golden breath of the Summer days
Is the sweetening touch of thy matchless art;
In hours of gloom, when the spirit seems
To lie like a load on the wearied breast,
Thy presence comes from a land of dreams,
And the sound of thy song is the voice of rest!

Winter is wailing around me here;
Beauty hath vanished from land and sea;
In the dreary woodlands the leaves fall sere
From the shivering grasp of each desolate tree;
The rapture of music is heard no more,
Breathing of love from the blossoming bough;
The singers are flown to a summer shore,
Whose strains bloom only in fancy now.

But thou, perennial nightingale!
Thro' all the seasons art with us still:
Though flowers have faded from wood and dale,
And mists are creeping from hill to hill,
Yet nought can silence that stream of song
Wherewith thou makest all eyes gleam bright;
For grief is banished, and hope grows strong,
Wherever thou pourest thy floods of light!

THE BEGINNING OF THE CONCERT-SEASON IN VIENNA.*

Signor Enea Brizzi, chief of the Florentine Orchestral Association, began by giving his word and afterwards failing to keep it. Tremendous posters invited the public to go and hear the concert of the Italians in the large room of the Musical Association—but the concert was first postponed and then altogether abandoned. This last step was, no doubt, a painful one, but it was wise. However delighted we should have been to mark the great progress which a people hitherto celebrated musically only for its singing has recently made in orchestral playing as well, our delight would not have been very profitable for the concert-givers. Despite some excellent soloists (especially on wood wind-instruments), the orchestral efforts of our visitors, despite all their excellence, would scarcely have been such as to create a sensation in Vienna. Yet nothing but what would create a sensation, nothing but what was extraordinary, must have been offered for the concert-tour of an orchestral society numbering seventy persons to pay in Germany, which is above all others the land of symphony. Even the most brilliant execution of the programme would never have satisfied us with a programme like this: Overtures to Verdi's Giovanna di Guzman, Guillaume Tell, and Mignon, Variations by Volzani, an Oboe Concerto by Pascilli, and a Fantasia on Verdi's Ballo in Maschera—these are not model specimens of a "celebrated orchestra" to be offered to the serious lovers of music in Vienna, but mere sweetmeats of which we have plenty supplied us at garden-concerts by popular military and civilian bands. On the national soil of Italy itself, however, we should have been extremely pleased to make the acquaintance, in reality and not only on posters, of the Florentine orchestra.

Earnestly and nobly has the Society of the Friends of Music come forward with Handel's Judas Maccabæus. This oratorio, seldom, comparatively speaking, heard in Vienna, was last performed (under Herbeck) eighteen years ago. At that time, there ran even through the most favourable notices a tone of lamentation and reproach at the want of sympathy exhibited by the audience. We appear to have improved as regards Handel, for at the performance this month the Maccabæan hero had no reason to complain either of scanty attendance or lukewarm reception. The public listened reverently, besides applauding much and warmly. This was the more satisfactory as Judas Maccabæus contains, by the side of what is imperishably grandiose and sublime, much that both humanly and musically is tolerably far removed from us. Few are familiar with and still fewer take an interest in the conflicts of the Jews with the Syrians, and their alternate victories and defeats (160 years before Christ), the significance and connection of which are, moreover, not quite intelligible in the oratorio. The pathos of freedom, religious and political, bursts forth powerfully among the masses, but forces almost entirely into the background the separate personages, including the dead hero, Matathias, whom we hear mourned for all through the first part, and the living Judas, who follows him as leader of the army. This imparts to the whole action something peculiarly impersonal and abstract, and does not excite so lively an interest as the oratorios of Samson, Saul, and Belshazzar, which contain incomparably more dramatic action. What strikes us musically as strange in this, as in other oratorios by Handel, are the airs. Our modern feeling has lost nearly all sympathy with them. This applies not only to their stiff, conventional form, not only to the old fashioned way in which they are decked out with bravura passages that strike us as doubly strange in the mouths of heroes and prophets—there is, strictly speaking, an utter absence of varied inward life. A Handelian air rolls along like a ball, it may be slowly or it may be quickly, but always like a ball, straightforward, evenly, and without stopping. Since Beethoven, we have been accustomed to musical development from within, to growth and blossoming of the living thought, and in Handel's airs we keenly miss this expansion. There are certainly exceptions in his works, but they are rare; one of the most beautiful specimens is Samson's tenor air: "Nacht ist's umher; nicht Sonn', nicht Mond," which, for simple, tender fervency, stands almost alone. We scarcely know an air in Judas Maccabæus which can be compared to it, and in which genuine human feeling has so flung off the fetters of old fashioned musical conventionality. It would be rather late in the day to praise the grandeur and power of the choruses in Judas. Even in Handel, there are not many such splendid pieces as "Fall war sein Los," which will never fail to make an irresistible impression. The oratorio was carefully got up and as carefully conducted by Herr Gericke. If that gentleman does not possess Herbeck's glance and arm, which sent forth fire, moving and inflaming, as it were, the masses, his conducting left scarcely anything to be desired on the score of ability and correctness. The instrumentation had been judiciously strengthened in many over-thin portions, and a good dozen pieces omitted from the very long work. No objection to such a course can be raised from the standpoint of intelligent reverence, honestly anxious for the effect of the work as a whole, and only double-dyed Handelian chamber-scholars like Chrysander are likely to enter the lists against it.† Excellence predominated in the solo parts. Mdme Materna's voice poured forth warmth and brilliancy over the airs of the Israelitish Woman, while Herr Rokitansky displayed in Simon's difficult A minor air a rare mastery of florid singing. As far back as eighteen years ago, when his voice was in full vigour, the heroico-dramatic part of Judas Maccabæus did not quite suit our admirable lyric tenor, Herr Walter. On the present occasion, in no single bar did he fail to prove himself a classically-trained singer, and even now we may defiantly ask: Which of his colleagues would sing the part of Judas not to say better, but as well? A Mdlle Mayer sang the contralto part respectably, but without making a deep impression.

* From the Neue freie Presse.

† What Handel himself thought on this head is shown by a letter of his, referring, moreover, to one of his most effective oratorios, Belshazzar. On the 2nd October, 1745, he wrote to the author of the text: "I consider it a very grand and noble oratorio, but it is really too long; I have already cut out a large portion of the music, so as to preserve as much as possible of the text, but it must be shortened still more." As, however, the author would not sacrifice a line, there was nothing left for Handel but to set and publish the entire book in its unabbreviated form. He had, however, the following notice printed on it: "As the oratorio is too long, various pieces have been marked with a black line in the margin as pieces that may be omitted in performance." According to Schoelcher (Life of Handel, p. 290), more than 200 lines of the book were marked with this black line.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Dear Sir,—We shall be much obliged if you will kindly give the following facts circulation in your valuable paper. A short time since an American manager engaged, through our musical agency, the following artists to appear in Liverpool and sing for the "Orphan Boys' Asylum":—Mdme Mina Gould, Miss Clara Myers, Mr Hirwen Jones, Mr Cecil Traherne, and Mr Ernest Cecil. In addition to the above-named concert there were to be five others in England, and in the event of the artists pleasing the public, they were to have been individually offered a six months' engagement in the United States of America. On the arrival of the artists in Liverpool they were somewhat astonished to see that they had all been advertised in the papers "as prior to a six months' tour in the United States of America," whereas no contract had ever been submitted, let alone entered into by any of them. On the evening of the concert there was a notice placed outside the Philharmonic Hall saying that the "hirer not having completed the terms of the hiring contract there would be no concert." The American manager then called on the artists at the Adelphi Hotel, and wished them to sing to him there, and they rightly and justly refused, their contract being to sing at the Philharmonic Hall, which they were prepared to fulfil, and on the results of which they were to have been offered or not an American engagement, but not certainly on a private hearing.

Trusting that you will give the matter all the publicity in your power, as the future appearances of the artists in Liverpool or elsewhere may be injured by such unbusinesslike conduct.—We are, dear Sir, yours truly,

F. Allan Gould, & Co., Musical Agents.

Moscow.—Joseph Kotek, of Berlin, recently played at a concert, under the direction of Max Erdmannsdörfer, a new Violin Concerto by Peter Tschaikowsky. Both the work (said to be one of the composer's best) and the execution, were greatly admired.

ST. ANDREW'S DAY.

ST. JAMES'S HALL was crowded to overflowing on Thursday night with an enthusiastic audience. The Glasgow Select Choir made its second appearance, and received such a reception as to confirm the good opinion formed of it last year upon a similar occasion. Mr Austin, with all his ability, will find it difficult to prepare equally attractive programmes without this choir, unless he gives his Caledonian friends an opportunity of hearing the other "select choir"—Mr Lambeth's. From first to last Mr Allan's choir sang in an almost faultless manner—now delighting their audience with the touching pathos of "Annie Laurie" and "The Flowers of the Forest," firing their patriotism in "Scots wha ha'e," or heartily enjoying the rich humour of "Kate Dalrymple," "Willie Wastle," and the "Laird o' Cockpen," substituted as an encore in one instance. Their opening song, "In the garb of old Gaul," and several others, were re-demanded in such a manner as to leave no room for refusal. It is not too much to say that the Select Choir proved the very backbone of the concert; or shall we rather say it formed a fit setting for our matchless Master artist—Mr Sims Reeves? We all know how well Mr Reeves can render Scottish songs, whether as regards words or music, and upon this occasion his "Land o' the Leal" and "The Macgregors' Gathering" were given with such taste and spirit as to call forth round after round of applause, the latter song being given again in response to an encore. In Mr Reeves' opening phrase, "I'm wearin' awa'," a sympathetic chord seemed to be touched. We dare not expect to have him long with us as a vocalist, but may at least hope that it may be long before he leaves us for the "land o' the leal." It is some consolation to know that Mr Lloyd may be counted on for many years yet to come, and he never fails to create a favourable impression at the Scotch concerts—encores being a matter of course. Miss Agnes Ross seems to be quite an established favourite, "Auld Robin Gray" was re-demanded, as was also "Caller Herrin'," for which "A man's a man for a' that" was substituted. Mr Santley was even more successful than upon previous occasions. "Bonnie Dundee" was given with great spirit, and when the first few bars of "The Deil's awa' wi' the Exciseman" were heard for the encore song, the audience at once testified their delight. Mr Santley was equally successful in the humorous song "M-HM!" two verses of which he repeated in response to universal demand. An apology was circulated for Mr Walter Clifford, who was absent through indisposition. Mdme Bertini and Miss Helen Meason sang with their accustomed good taste, and received a hearty reception, the latter lady being re-called for "Jock o' Hazeldean." Miss Meason injured her second song very much by singing Jamie instead of Jemie. Signor Piatti, accompanied by Mr J. B. Zerbini, brought the first part to a close with a "Fantasia on Scotch Melodies," as a violoncello solo, written specially by Signor Piatti, and rendered, it need scarcely be added, in the most artistic manner. The duet singing of the Misses Allitsen was equally artistic. There was nothing finer in the programme than their charming rendering of "O wert thou in the cauld blast," and "Ye banks and braes," and the audience testified their appreciation by an enthusiastic re-call. One could only wish to have heard them in solos—and a future occasion we hope may afford this opportunity. The Scottish National Anthem, "Auld Lang Syne," followed by "God save the Queen," brought a most successful concert to a fitting conclusion, for the Scotch are as loyal as they are patriotic, and the Premier, whose proud boast is that every drop of blood in his veins is Scotch, was not very far wrong, after all, when he referred to the land of his fathers as the "land o' the leal."—W. H.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.—While the Right Hon. Sir William Harcourt, of "the Golden Mouth," was dilating to the upper ten of "the Scottish Colony" at the 218th anniversary festival of the Scottish Corporation, Mr William Carter, of "the Golden Stick," was holding forth to the "middle ten thousand" at the spacious tholus at South Kensington. A glance at the immense audience assembled at the shrine of St Andrew was sufficient to justify the compliment of the Home Secretary, that "all the Scotch ladies were young, and all the Scotch men were well to do." An excellent programme was prepared, and thoroughly appreciated by an exacting audience, who, before the last item was reached, had nearly doubled its proportions. We cannot help remarking, however, that the realm over which the Scottish Muse wields supremacy is so extensive that it is possible to give the programmes wider variety—nine of the pieces presented on this occasion having been given at the last year's concert. All the same, they were received with undiminished favour. The pipers of the Scots Guards, who paraded the hall, included those whose war-note led their comrades to victory at Tel-el-Kebir, and this knowledge prepared the way for an ovation from all parts of the house, which must have cheered the hearts of the gallant fellows. The festival opened with the National Anthem, followed by "See the conquering Hero comes," given with the full forces at Mr Carter's disposal. "Let the bright Seraphim" (cornet obbligato, excellently rendered, of course, by Mr J. Levy) was superbly given by Mdme Marie Roze. Her piquant singing of "Comin' thro' the Rye" was a gem in its way; and when Mr Carter led her on to assist in "Rule Britannia," although not set down for her in the programme, the audience testified their approbation in the heartiest manner. This talented artist has made marked advance in her mastery over the difficulties of Scottish pronunciation—no mean achievement in her case. Mdme Trebelli, it is needless to remark, in "What the Waves said," and, in what was more apropos to the occasion, "Robin Adair," sustained her high reputation. Mdme Isabel Fassett, in "The Blue Bells of Scotland," and "Jock o' Hazeldean," proved that she is making steady advance in her profession, while Mdlle Patti Winter, a pupil, we believe, of Mr Carter, did credit to her mentor, in "Auld Robin Gray," and in a pretty new ballad, "Not for ever." Mr Redfern Hollins gave with refined taste "The Death of Nelson," and "The standard on the braes o' Mar," with verve and expression. Mr Sinclair Dunn, who made his début before a Royal Albert Hall audience, in his first selection ("The Macgregors' Gathering,") appeared slightly nervous, but in "O Nannie wilt thou gang wi' me," showed more confidence, and, consequently, produced a better effect. Signor Ghilberti, in "Willie brewed a peck o' maut," would have appealed more directly to his audience had he infused more spirit into his rendering. The same remark applies to Mr Frederick King's "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled." We are glad to note a further improvement in the work of the choir in the direction of steadiness of attack and obedience to the conductor's beat. We think, however, there is still room for improvement, especially in their rendering of the part-song "The Land o' the Leal." To our mind, taking the line "Our bonnie bairn's there, Jean" fortissimo is a mistake, and sadly marred the otherwise faithful rendering of one of the most plaintive airs ever written. Credit where credit is due, however. "Ye banks and braes" received ample justice at their hands, and was received with proportionate favour. We must not omit to note the services of Mr Levy, his cornet solo, "Annie Laurie," with band accompaniment, evoking a loud encore, to which he responded with the pawky "Within a mile o' Edinboro' town." The band of Her Majesty's Scots Guards gave valuable assistance, and the "Scotch Symphony" (Mendelssohn), performed by Mr E. Bending at the grand organ and Mr W. Carter at the pianoforte, was well received. "Auld Lang Syne" brought the festival to a termination.—WETSTAR.

MY BONNIE WEE ROSE.

Awa' in the woods, the bonnie green woods,
That grow on the haughs o' Kenmare,
There blooms a wee Rose, a bonnie wee Rose,
On a stem sae comely and fair.
I've tended that flower, that bonnie wee flower,
As miser gloats over his gold;
Wi' fondest delight, at morn and at night,
I've watched a' its beauties unfold.

In wealthier bowers far gaudier flowers
May bloom for the lordly to see,
But my bonnie wee Rose, at eve's dewy close,
Keeps a' its sweet fragrance for me.
Ere winter's cauld frost the woodlands has cross'd
To kill the wee flowers wi' its smart,
I'll pluck the wee Rose, the bonnie wee Rose,
And wear it aye close to my heart.

THE PIPER OF HAMELIN.

(From the "Manchester Examiner and Times.)

The interest excited by the production of Herr Nessler's opera was evinced in the fact in spite of inclement weather, not a seat in the Queen's Theatre was unoccupied on Saturday night, when it was given for the second time. That public hesitation was not disappointed is proved by the unflagging attention of the vast audience during a performance which lasted fully three hours and a half.

We spoke fully of the plot in our first notice. It only remains to refer to the music and the manner in which it was performed. As to the music, a second hearing does nothing to weaken its freshness, while it undoubtedly confirms an impression that though Nessler has remarkable powers of adaptation, he possesses no great originality. In him we have no Weber or Gounod. The Ratcatcher of Hamelin—for that is its proper title—does not open new ground or take people by surprise, as did the Freischütz of the former composer or the Faust of the latter. Yet Nessler seems to have something in his nature which has absorbed the romantic and folk-song forms which delighted Weber, while his early ecclesiastical training has given him so much in common with Gounod that he readily seizes on the church forms and quasi-sacred harmonies so potently used by that great master of stage effect. The combination of these forms—the popular German romantic and what may be called the sensuous ecclesiastical—is what, perhaps, gives its peculiar interest to the style of Nessler. While full of suggestiveness—because, somehow, we are being constantly reminded of something familiar—he is never really guilty of plagiarism. Try as we may, we are unable to convict him of directly appropriating the ideas of others, though there is ever that subtle something—in rhythm or harmonic sequence—which proves how thoroughly Nessler is imbued with the manner of certain earlier writers. As an example of this we may cite the "Wedding March" in the last act, which it is certain would never have been written had Mendelssohn and Hofmann not existed. Yet the march is really a beautiful one, and can hardly be said to resemble exactly any other composition. The influence of Mendelssohn is again shown in the peculiar fondness which Nessler displays for the augmented fifth, a device which may almost be said to be the peculiar property of that composer, and the use of which must always be suggestive of his influence. In Nessler, then, we have clearly displayed the love of simple national forms of folk-song, tinctured by the influence of an early training in church music and an evident partiality for the particular sequences of Weber and Mendelssohn. Necessarily the result is something of a pot-pourri. It is a combination of odours in which none specially predominates, though each may faintly be detected. As a writer of modern times Nessler can hardly be quite uninfluenced by Wagner, though this influence has gone no further than an adoption, to some extent, of leit-motifs as indicative of particular characters. The Mayor of the city especially is associated with a theme of simple dignity which, however pretty as it is, becomes at last almost as tiresome from repetition as does the master bellfounder's theme in Romberg's well-known setting of Schiller's Lay of the Bell. In no other instance, however, has Nessler carried the device to an extreme. Of course there are the "rat" motive and the "charm" motive, but these are so sparingly used that probably they almost escaped notice. Then, all these musical elements are so ingeniously combined as to form an attractive whole, while each tableau is long enough for complete development without being carried to the point when musical forms become tedious. We shall not attempt to point to particular movements in support of what we have said above. The musical student will easily trace out the portions to which our remarks apply; nor can the study of the work be other than productive of pleasure to all who feel an interest in the development of artistic musical form.

It would be unfair to criticise severely the performance of the opera, though it was much better on Saturday evening than on Thursday. In the first place, the orchestra was not only inadequate for, but also far from familiar with, its task. The frequent changes of tempo, and the peculiar harmonies, require that they should be so well known as to be always anticipated before they can be effectively rendered, and, with the small amount of rehearsal usually accorded to new works in England, we need not say that nothing like this degree of familiarity had been acquired by the orchestra. To some extent this may be said also of the vocalists, though, all things considered, they had by Saturday evening gained considerable mastery over their parts. Mr Sauvage especially, as the Piper, must be complimented on having at a bound placed himself in the front rank amongst English operatic singers. Young as he is, he is evidently an accomplished musician. No matter how difficult the music of his part, he displays none of that uncomfortable reliance on the aid of the conductor which so often dispels all illusion as we listen to an operatic singer. It is this which makes the difference between an artist who can grasp the whole harmony of the work and one who masters his part only. The latter always needs a guide, while the former has that perfect knowledge which prevents him ever going astray. Mr Sauvage's voice is a high baritone, of excellent quality in its upper range, though somewhat wanting in volume below. He certainly ought to make a mark on the lyric stage. Our old friend Mr Lyall, was, of course, admirable as Ethelerus, everywhere proving how valuable are his services to any company of which he forms part. A player of less tact would have been tempted to exaggeration in the drinking scene with the priest. As it was, while it was absurdly humorous, nothing was attempted for which the score does not afford justification. Mr Temple's Mayor was given in his usual careful manner, which is in perfect keeping with the dignity and self-importance of the part; while Mr Howell—if he had but a voice—would be as acceptable as we might expect from his musical acquirements as Sunneborne. The ladies ought to have been first noticed perhaps, but it is not too late to say that Mdme Blanche Cole—though her voice is hardly so fresh as a few seasons ago—is still an accomplished singer; while Miss Siedle possesses a voice and style which ought to commend her to future notice. Miss Helen Armstrong was capital as the nurse Dorothea, her somewhat worn voice not being objectionable as associated with the character. Mr Aynsley Cook had not a great part as Wulff but he supported it with all his accustomed energy and intelligence.

THE SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY'S LIBRARY

(To the Editor of the "Times.")

Sir,—With reference to the paragraph in The Times, I beg leave to say that the library has not been purchased by the Royal College of Music, which has no funds applicable to such a purpose, but has been secured for its use, and will be removed at once to the college building at Kensington Gore. No boon could be more acceptable to the college than this noble library, which contains musical works of great rarity, variety, and extent, invaluable to both Professors and students. Had it been dispersed, there is no probability that so comprehensive and valuable a collection could ever have been got together again.—Your obedient servant,

G. Grove, Director of the College.

MUSICAL COPYRIGHT.

(To the Editor of the "Times.")

Sir,—From the advertisements which frequently appear in journals circulating principally among ladies, offering to supply manuscript copies of copyright music at ridiculously low prices, it would seem the advertisers are under the impression that the making copies by hand of copyright music is no breach of the Copyright Acts.

If this be the impression under which the advertisers labour, it is high time that they should be informed of their mistake; and I therefore ask you, by publishing this letter, to acquaint the public of the fact that the multiplying copies, by any means whatever, of copyright music or other works without the sanction of the owner of the copyright is a breach of the Copyright Acts, and subjects the offender to an action.

The Music Publishers' Association has recently been compelled to take proceedings against one lady, and to threaten proceedings against another, in respect of this very offence, and has only consented to stay further proceedings on an ample apology and payment of costs being made.

In the case of similar infringements of the publishers' rights being hereafter brought to light, the offenders must expect less lenient treatment,—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

H. Lawrence Harris, Secretary.

Music Publishers' Association, 32, Argyll Street.

The New Yorkers are eagerly expecting Mdme Albani in their city early next year.

Joseph Joachim has arrived, with his Imperial bow, and, at the Popular Concert of Monday night, will lead the Rasoumowski Quartet in C major (No. 3, Op. 59). Hoch! Skaal! (Hear! hear!)

Marie Brandt brought her engagement at the Leipsic Stadttheater to a close by appearing as Leah in Rubinstein's Maccabäer. The members of the operatic company presented her on the occasion with a silver laurel-wreath bearing a flattering inscription. Her absence necessitates the temporary withdrawal of Rubinstein's opera.

CONCERTS.

Royal Society of Musicians.—The performance of The Messiah annually given in aid of the funds of the Royal Society of Musicians took place on the 24th ult. at St James's Hall, in the presence of a large assemblage of the patrons of the institution. The principal artists, as is usual upon these occasions, gave their services gratuitously, and a glance at their names will fully reveal the substantial value of the assistance so kindly rendered. Miss Marie Davies, Mdme Isabel Fassett, Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Jessie Jones, Mr W. H. Cummings, Mr Edward Lloyd, Mr Frederick King, and Mr Hilton were the vocalists who undertook the solo parts, one and all acquitting themselves in a manner worthy of the high position they severally enjoy, and which, as a matter of course, ensured an interpretation of the leading airs of the oratorio hardly to be exceeded in artistic interest. The choruses were effectively sung by a large body of choristers, under the experienced bâton of Mr Barnby, and the orchestra, also of fitting dimensions, included Mr J. T. Carrodus, as principal violin, and Mr T. Harper, as trumpet, Dr E. J. Hopkins presiding at the organ. The hall was crowded in every part, and hence it may be assumed that the performance, so considerably helped by the profession, afforded material benefit to the excellent charity in behalf of which it made its annual appeal. —H.

The "Concert d'Invitation," given by members of the St George's Musical Association, at St Andrew's Hall, on Thursday evening, the 23rd ult., was numerously attended. The concert began with Chopin's "Introduction and Polonaise" in C, for pianoforte and violin, played by Misses Elsie Evans and Kate Chaplin, who also contributed solos on their respective instruments with success. Miss Nellie Chaplin gave Chopin's "Fantaisie Impromptu" with much skill, and two movements of a trio by Rheinberger received justice at the hands of Mrs Ullithorne (pianoforte), Miss Adelina Dinelli (violin), and Mr G. Dinelli (violoncello). Mr George Gear was re-called after his effective fantasia on M. Gounod's Faust. Miss Edith Ruthven sang "Softly sighs" (Der Freischütz) in very good style, her clear and sympathetic voice finding scope for display in Weber's admired scena and winning for her a double "call." Later in the evening the same artist sang "When night is gathering round," by Mr George Gear (a tasteful song with flowing accompaniment), and again met with deserved success. Miss Nelly McEwen was "called" after her expressive rendering of Taubert's song, "My darling was so fair," and the same compliment was paid to Miss Frances Smith after Mr George Gear's "Sweet visions," a song we noticed favourably when first introduced by Mdme Patey, and which has since become very popular. Mr Sackville Evans displayed a powerful bass voice in "Honour and Arms" and "Les Rameaux" (violin obbligato, Miss Kate Chaplin). Miss Amy Dicksee sang two songs, and Mr G. Tattersall took part in some concerted music. The accompanists were Miss Nellie Chaplin and Mr George Gear.

An evening concert was given by Mr Arthur Roby, organist of Camden Road Church, on Tuesday evening, 28th ult, in the Hall, Camden Park Road. He was surrounded by "a host of talent," both vocal and instrumental, and a lengthy programme was rendered to the satisfaction of a crowded audience. The concert opened with the overture to Semiramide (arranged for eight hands) the performers being Misses Elsie and Eva Treadaway, Cissie Geflowski, and Green. Miss Coyte Turner made her mark in "Lord Mayor Whittington, or the Bells of Bow," (Roeckel), and in La Serenata (Braga), the violin obbligato to the latter being given with much effect in an adjoining room by Mr E. Parfitt, who also showed much executive power in an "Air Varié" (Vieuxtemps), and Romance (Svensden). Mr Herbert Blackmore, the possessor of a capital baritone voice, gave "Sailing" (Marks) with much acceptance, and received an encore for his rendering of "A Creole love song" (Mrs Moncrieffe). Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor was performed with spirit and executive facility on two grand pianofortes by Mr Arnold Birch and the concert-giver. Mr F. J. Gordon sang with taste and expression the two songs set down for him, "Tell her I love her so" (De Faye), and "Annabelle Lee" (Leslie). The same may be said of Mr Herbert Nash, who sang "Stars the night adorning" (Wekerlin), and "The Pilgrim of Love." "Bon Soir," and the National Anthem brought a very enjoyable entertainment to a close.

The monthly concert given by the St George's Glee Union, on November the 3rd, proved a marked success; the concert-room was again filled to overflowing with an appreciative audience. The programme comprised a miscellaneous selection of vocal music interpreted with more than the customary skill exhibited at these concerts. Mdlle Alice Roselli's songs were most favourably received. She was re-called, and in response to very marked applause repeated the "Valse de Venzano." Miss Jeanie Rosse (a promising contralto) and Mr Distin contributed to the success of the concert. The part singing of the choir merits great praise for the careful attention they paid to "light and shade." Mr Joseph Monday conducted.—West Middlesex Advertiser.

Miss Mary Beare gave a concert at Brixton Hall on Friday evening, November 21, assisted by Miss Hilda Wilson, Messrs Hirwen Jones and Lucas Wilson, (vocalists), Mr W. L. Barrett, (flute), Miss Lilian Griffiths (violin), and Miss Dinah Shapley (pianoforte). Miss Beare, a pupil of Mr Goldberg at the Royal Academy of Music, made a great effect by the charming style in which she sang "Pretty mocking bird," the flute obbligato part being beautifully played by Mr Barrett, of the Royal Italian Opera. Miss Hilda Wilson, a pupil of Mr Shakespeare, at the Royal Academy of Music, rendered the song, "The Miller and the Maid," most charmingly, and Miss Dinah Shapley's performance at the pianoforte gained for her hearty applause. The concert altogether pleased immensely.

The London Literary and Artistic Union gave one of their interesting musical réunions on Tuesday evening at St. James's Hall before a full and fashionable audience. The selection of vocal music was fully appreciated, being selected from the compositions of Mozart, Schubert, Bellini, Rossini, &c. The vocalists were Mdmes Heaketh, Nettnam, Shenstone, Gertrude Bendazzi, and Mr W. J. Russell. The pianists were Miss Lillie Albrecht, Miss Lavinia O'Brien, and Herr Liebich. Miss Albrecht gave with much effect Raff's "Tambourine" and Chopin's Etude in C major, receiving great applause after each. Miss Lavinia O'Brien, one of the favourite pupils of Stephen Heller, played with Herr Emanuel Liebich the overture to Coriolanus (Beethoven), and two characteristic duets by Moczkowsky, entitled "Russia" and "Hungary," which pleased the audience immensely. Herr Liebich accompanied the singers.

Mdlle Luise von Hennig gave a concert at Lancaster Hall, Notting Hill, on Thursday evening, Nov. 23rd, under distinguished patronage, assisted by Mdme Mina Gould, Mrs Andrew W. Tuer, Mrs Charles Marshall, Messrs A. D. Sceales, Traherne, Ernest Cecil, and George Bard. The concert-giver sang Mendelssohn's "Hear ye, Israel," Lieder by Schubert, Eckert, and Blumenthal, and joined Mrs Tuer in two duets by Rubinstein, and Messrs Traherne and Cecil in a trio from Verdi's Attila, "Te sol quest' anima." Mdlle von Hennig pleased both her friends and the public by the style in which she rendered each piece, and was deservedly applauded. Among the novelties introduced were a duet, "Eyes," and a song, "Stay," the composition of Mdme Mina Gould. The duet, capitally sung by Messrs Traherne and Cecil, was heartily applauded and deservedly encored. The song, admirably rendered by Mr Cecil, might also have been repeated, judging from the evident pleasure it afforded the audience. The pianoforte pieces given by Mrs Charles Marshall were Ritter's "Veloce" and Silas's "Andalouse." The accompanists were Mdme Mina Gould and Mr George Bard.

PROVINCIAL.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The Carl Rosa opera company brought their week's engagement at the Theatre Royal to a close by a fine performance of Verdi's Rigoletto, the principal parts in which were taken by Miss Burns (Gilda), Miss Yorke (Maddelina), Mr Turner (Duke of Mantua), Mr Crotty (Rigoletto), Mr Pope (Sparafucile), and Mr Snazelle (Count Montrose). There was a large audience, and the opera was enthusiastically received. Mr Turner had to repeat "Fair shines the moon to-night." The part of the jester, in the hands of Mr Crotty, was a masterpiece of acting, whilst his artistic vocalization throughout gained for him golden opinions. Miss Burns's representation of Gilda was exceedingly good, and the other characters were ably personated. The celebrated quartet in the last act provoked the usual furore; the band and chorus were thoroughly up to their business; and the conductor, Mr Goossens, had little trouble in directing the performance.

Cheltenham.—The third of a subscription series of twelve Promenade Concerts was given at the Montpellier Rotunda, Cheltenham, on Saturday, Nov. 18th; vocalists: Miss Clara Dowle (Guildhall School of Music) and Mr C. W. Fredericks; accompanist: Mr A. von Holst; conductor: Mr A. G. Pollock, R.A.M. This was Miss Clara Dowle's first appearance in Cheltenham, and she made a most favourable impression. Her songs were "It was a dream" (Cowen), "Robin Adair" (Niel Gow—harp accompaniment by Mr Pollock), "Softly Sighs" (Weber), and "The Watchman and the Child" (Cowen). These were all much applauded and encores demanded. In responding to one, she gave "I cannot say good-bye" (Roeckel). Mr C. W. Fredericks, an old favourite in Cheltenham, sang, with effect, "I arise from dreams of thee" (Salaman), "Greklein" (Kucken), "My heart is thine alone" (Kloss), and "The Anchor's Weighed" (Braham). Messrs Pollock and von Holst played Oberthür's Grand Duo, for harp and piano, on airs from Lucrezia Borgia in masterly style. The Cheltenham military band assisted.

Sherborne.—An intellectual and fashionable audience assembled at the Town Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 23rd, to hear an essay on "Sir Sterndale Bennett: His Life and Works," read by Mr. Arthur O'Leary. The lecture was illustrated by a selection of Bennett's compositions. Mr and Mrs Regan, Mr Donkin, and Miss Howes (who possesses an excellent soprano voice) assisted. The essay was listened to with great attention and the lecturer frequently applauded. After the reading, a short miscellaneous selection of music was given. Mrs Regan played Wollenhaupt's "Caprice" (pianoforte) with great spirit; Mr Regan contributed a movement of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto; and Miss Howes (who was vociferously encored) sang a song from Sullivan's Patience, and "I know my love," by Rosetta O'Leary Vinning.

Conductor, Sir George Smart.
Leader, Mr Eliason.

Sacred Harmonic Society.—In our account of the final gathering of the old Sacred Harmonic Society, mention was made of the distribution of the medals struck in commemoration of the fiftieth and last season. It is a very handsome bronze medallion, on the obverse side is a reduced fac-simile of Roubilliac's statue of Handel, and the words "To commemorate the fiftieth and last season, 1882," on the reverse, a lyre, with open score of Messiah enclosed in a wreath, with the inscription, "Sacred Harmonic Society, Founded 1832." The only two recipients of this medal apart from the list of members and assistants of the late Sacred Harmonic Society, were Mr James Peck and Mr Henry Wright, both of whom have for so many years conducted the business of the office in their respective departments.

The programme on the occasion of Mdme Sembrich's last appearance at the Teatro Real, Madrid, comprised the third act of La Sonnambula, the third of Lucia di Lammermoor, the fourth of Hamlet, and the grand air from Il Flauto magico.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

The second of Mr John Boosey's "London Ballad Concerts" was given at St James's Hall on Wednesday evening before an audience as numerous and enthusiastic as at the first, the singers being Misses Mary Davies and Edith Santley, Mdme Antoinette Sterling, Messrs Edward Lloyd, Maybrick, and Santley. Mdme Norman-Néruda was again the violinist, and the South London Choral Society, under the direction of Mr L. C. Venables, held their usual post in the van, centre, and rear of the excellent programme. The new songs were "For Pity's Sake" (Stephen Adams), sung by Miss Mary Davies, and "Kismet" (Molloy), sung by Mr Santley. Both were received with marked favour, and had to be repeated at the unanimous desire of the audience. All the old songs were received with great applause, "The Little Hero" (Stephen Adams), "The Three Ravens," "Here's a health unto his Majesty," and "Wapping Old Stairs," respectively sung by Mr Maybrick, Mdme Antoinette Sterling, Mr Santley, and Miss Edith Santley, being heartily encored. Mdme Néruda has taken firm hold of her new audience, who "called" her after her performance of a slow movement by Viotti, and insisted on a repetition of Wieniawski's "Mazurka." The satisfaction of the audience was also loudly expressed after the South London Choir had sung Sir R. P. Stewart's arrangement of "The Bells of St Michael's Tower," and were compelled to repeat it. Mr Sidney Naylor accompanied the singers with his well-known ability. The concert under notice was the last to be given, in the evening, this side of Christmas; but one is announced for Wednesday morning next, which, no doubt, will be well patronized by those who fear to encounter the night air.

MR COWEN'S "SCANDINAVIAN" SYMPHONY.

The New York Tribune, of November 12, in its notice of the opening concert of the forty-first season of the New York Philharmonic Society, thus writes about Mr Cowen's symphony, which, en passant, we may remark, is announced to be given at the Sydenham Crystal Palace on December 16th, at Aix-la-Chapelle on the 21st, at Birmingham in January next, and at Glasgow and Edinburgh in February:—

Mr Cowen is a native of the Island of Jamaica, and an alumnus of the conservatories of Leipsic and Berlin. Though still quite young—he is in his thirty-first year—he has been an industrious and successful composer, having written cantatas for the English festivals, an opera for Carl Rosa, many songs and various other music. This is his third symphony. It ought to assure his position in the front rank of the contemporary English school, even if it do not vindicate his right to a still higher place, for it shows vigour, fine workmanship, and fresh ideas. Although it appears from its title to belong to the class of descriptive music, it is entirely free from the extravagances and strained effects into which the followers of the programme style are apt to be betrayed. The name of "Scandinavian," which Mr Cowen applies to it, indicates only the character of the themes, and although there are certain devices in the second and third movements with a distinctly picturesque object, they are, nevertheless, musically legitimate. The opening of the first movement (allegro moderato ma con moto), with its striking use of the reeds, inclines us to expect something in the Mendelssohn manner; but that delusion does not last long, and by the time we reach the broad and beautiful second subject we feel quite sure that Mr Cowen is nobody's echo. The treatment here is principally by means of dialogue with some charming contrasts of tone and expression; especially happy is the interchange of the melody between the violins and the violas and 'cellos; the subsequent development and combination of the two principal subjects is ingeniously managed; and the working up of the close of the movement is admirable. It is apparent that Mr Cowen knows how to write as well as that he has something to say. The extent of his scholarship is indicated by the solidity of the score; it is compact and well balanced; the colouring is not brilliant, but it is harmonious and refined; instead of trusting to sensational combinations, he relies principally upon the strings, which give a substantial character to the music not to be obtained in any other way. The second movement (adagio con moto) is marked on the score "A Summer Evening on the Fjord," a legend which perhaps sufficiently indicates the soft and dreamy spirit of its melody and the delicate quality of the instrumentation. An exceedingly pretty effect is produced by a quartet of horns placed out of sight behind the orchestra, with accompaniment of harp arpeggios. The quartet is repeated at a still greater distance, and dies away in an echo. Nothing could have been finer than Thomas's execution of this passage. The third movement (scherzo) is not explained on the score, but we have seen it referred to—we know not upon what authority—as a suggestion of a sleigh-journey. It requires no great stretch of fancy to hear in the quick rhythmic movement the beat of flying hoofs and the ring of the frozen snow; the faint sound of distant bells, too, comes to us now and then; but, however this may be, Mr Cowen has written a beautiful and brilliant scherzo, again showing his good judgment and self-confidence by giving the best work to the strings, and avoiding the ostentatious use which a man of smaller talent would have been sure to make of the triangle. It is no slight praise to say that the last movement (allegro ma non troppo) shows no falling off either in animation or construction. It is on the contrary the strongest, most masculine part of the symphony, and it culminates in a masterly finale. The whole work received a most sympathetic interpretation, dainty in the adagio and scherzo, animated in the two allegros; and the applause showed that it was keenly relished by the audience.

—o—

COVENT GARDEN PROMENADE CONCERTS.

On several occasions lately the managers of these concerts have given prominence to works by English composers. They did so last Wednesday evening, and may now be congratulated, not only upon a successful stroke of policy, but upon having shown with what ease a programme of modern music may be made up without going beyond the range of native talent. Those who have faith in the capacity of Englishmen as composers saw nothing to disconcert them in the selections put forward, but much that was confirmatory. For example, Mr Walter Macfarren's "Pastoral" overture, originally produced at one of Mr Kuhe's festivals, has merit of a high order—merit alike in fancy, development, and characteristic expression. This very pleasing work, performed under the author's own guidance, could not be heard without satisfaction. Then, there was the "Graceful Dance" from Mr Sullivan's incidental music to Henry VIII., shortly followed by his setting of the "Willow Song" from Othello. These pieces are too well known for description, while that they rightly had place in an English programme, and faithfully represent some of the best features in English art, is obvious. Mr Eaton Faning's overture, The Holiday, was another fit illustration of native talent, and as much may be said, with particular emphasis, regarding Mr Cowen's Suite de Ballet, "The Language of the Flowers." These graceful little pieces, as happy in character as in name, and marked by touches not less dainty in their way than those of Flora's pencil, are now established in the rank of popular favourites, and bid fair to endure. They deserve the peculiar honour of long life, for, trifles though they be, the invention and workmanship here shown are of the highest order. Mr Cowen conducted in person, to the obvious advantage of his music and its audience. A song, "Best of all," by Moir; an orchestral selection from Pinafore, the Irish air known as "Oft in the stilly night," Mr A. Burnett's pretty "Mandolinata," for strings; Mr Cowen's march, "Maid of Orleans;" and an arrangement of Balfe's airs, as well as of old English melodies, by Mr F. Godfrey, completed the list of works from the pens of British composers. That the programme gave satisfaction need not be insisted on, especially as the performance was in most cases fairly good.

Besides the works named above, Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in G, and violin solos by Vieuxtemps, Saint-Saëns, and Sarasate were given. The Concerto was played, with her usual sound judgment and good taste, by Mdme Frickenhaus; the violinist being Miss Alma Harkness, a young American lady of whose ability the Paris Conservatoire is justified in boasting. The vocalists were Mdme Isabel Fassett and Mr Redfern Hollins.—D. T.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The commencement of this institution in March, 1823, was by the election of ten boys and ten girls instead of forty of each, as at first resolved. At the time expectation ran high. Their names were:—

EXCERPTS FROM PARKE'S MUSICAL MEMOIRS.

Excerpt No. 7.

1786.

The composer of the music of Richard Cœur de Lion, Gretry, was born at Liege, a well-known town in Westphalia, in the year 1741. At an early age he became sensible to the charms of music, and, to this sensibility, when he was only four years old, he was nearly falling a sacrifice. It is related of him, that being left alone in a room where some water was boiling in an iron pot over a wood fire, the sound caught his ear, and for some time he amused himself by dancing to it. The curiosity of the child, however, at length prompted him to uncover the vessel, and in so doing he overset it; the water fell upon and dreadfully scalded him from head to foot. From the care and attention that were paid to him by his parents and medical attendant, he at length recovered in every respect from this accident, except having a weakness of sight, which continued ever afterwards. When he was six years old, his father (a teacher of music) placed him in the choir of the collegiate church of St Denis, and unfortunately, but necessarily, under the tuition of a master who was brutal and inhuman to all his pupils. Young Gretry had his full share of ill-treatment; yet such was his attachment to this man, that he never could prevail upon himself to disclose it to his father, fearing that by his influence the chapter might be induced to take some steps that would be injurious to him. An accident, which for a time put a stop to his studies, deserves to be related here. It was usual at Liege to tell children that God will grant to them whatever they asked of him at their first communion; young Gretry had long proposed to pray on that occasion that he might immediately die if he were not destined to be an honest man, and a man of eminence in his profession. On that very day, having gone to the top of the tower to see the men strike the wooden bells which are always used during the Passion week, a beam of considerable weight fell upon his head, and laid him senseless on the floor. A person who was present ran for the extreme unction; but on his return found the youth upon his legs. On being shown the heavy log that had fallen upon him,—"Well, well," he exclaimed, "since I am not killed, I am now sure that I shall be an honest man and a good musician." He did not at first appear to have sustained any serious injury, but his mouth was full of blood, and the next day a depression of the cranium was discovered, on which, however, no operation was attempted, and which was suffered to continue. From this time, but whether owing to the accident or not, it is not known, his disposition was considerably altered. His former gaiety gave way in a great measure to sadness, and never afterwards returned, except at intervals. On his return to the choir he acquitted himself by no means to the satisfaction of his father, who for a time withdrew him for the purpose of his receiving further instruction. He was now placed under the care of a master as mild as the other had been severe. When his father replaced him in the choir, his improvement both in singing and playing was found to have been very great. The first time he sang in the choir, the orchestra, delighted with his voice, and fearing to lose the sound of it, was reduced to pianissimo; the children of the choir around him drew back from respect; almost all the canons left their seats, and were deaf to the bell that announced the elevation of the Host. All the chapter, all the city, all the actors of the Italian Theatre applauded him; and the savage master himself took him by the hand, and told him that he would become a musician of great eminence. Some little time afterwards his voice began to break. It would then have been prudent to have forbidden his singing; but this not being done, a spitting of blood was brought on, to which, on any exertion, he was ever afterwards subject. Not long subsequently to this he was placed under the care of Moreau; but such was the exuberance of his genius, that he had previously attempted several of the most complicated kinds of music. "I composed six symphonies," says Gretry, "which were successfully executed in our city. M. Hasler, the canon, begged me to let him carry them to the concert. He encouraged me greatly, advised me to go to Rome in order to pursue my studies, and offered me his purse. My master in composition thought this little success would be mischievous to me, and prevent me from pursuing that regular course of study so necessary to my becoming a sound contrapuntist. He never mentioned my symphonies." Gretry walked to Rome in the early part of 1759, being then only eighteen years of age. Here, in order that his genius might be as much unfettered as possible, he studied under several masters, and he almost every day visited the churches in order to hear the music of Casali, Eurisechio, and Lustrini, but particularly that of the former, with which he was greatly delighted. The ardour with which he pursued his studies was so great, that it suffered him to pay but little attention to his health. This consequently became much impaired, and he was obliged for a while to leave Rome and retire into the country. One day, on Mount Millini, he met a hermit, who gave him an invitation to his retreat, which he accepted, and he became his inmate and companion for three months. He returned to Rome, and, young as he then was, he distinguished himself by the composition of an intermezzo, entitled Le Vende Miatrice. His success was so decisive that he was very near suffering fatally from the jealousy of a rival in his profession. Admired and courted in the capital of Italy, Gretry here continued his labours and his studies with assiduity and perseverance, till Mr Mellon, a gentleman in the suite of the French ambassador, incited in him a desire to visit Paris. In his way to that city in the year 1767, he stopped at Geneva, and there composed his first French opera of Isabelle et Gertrude. Respecting the performance of this work he relates an amusing anecdote. "One of the performers in the orchestra, a dancing-master, came to me in the morning previously to the representation, to inform me that some young people intended to call for me on the stage with acclamation at the end of the piece, in the same manner as at Paris. I told him I had never seen that done in Italy. 'You will, however, see it here,' says he, 'and you will be the first composer who has received this honour in our Republic.' It was in vain for me to dispute the point; he would absolutely teach me the bow that I was to make with a proper grace. As soon as the opera was finished they called for me sure enough, and with great vehemence. I was obliged to appear to thank the audience for their indulgence; but my friend in the orchestra cried out aloud, 'Poh! that is not it!—not at all!—but get along!' 'What's the matter?' asked his brethren in the orchestra. 'I am out of all patience,' said the dancing-master. 'I went to his lodgings this morning, on purpose to show him how to present himself nobly; and did you ever see such an awkward booby?'" It was some time before Gretry could obtain in Paris a piece to compose; and he was first introduced to public notice there, in 1768, by writing the music to Marmontel's opera, Le Huron. This met with the most flattering success. The opera of Lucile followed, which was even more successful. His fame was now established in France, and he produced nearly thirty comic operas for the great operahouse in Paris. Of these, Zemire et Azor and Richard Cœur de Lion have been translated and successfully brought out on the English stage. The taste of the Parisians tended greatly to corrupt that of Gretry; but he has done much towards improving theirs: they have met about half way; and perhaps the genius of the French language, the style of singing, and the national prejudices, even if he had determined to continue inflexible, could not have admitted of a nearer approximation than we find in his music. Sachini has been known to say of Gretry that he remembered him at Naples, where he regarded him as a young man of great genius, who wrote as much in the style of that school as even any of the Italian masters; but that when he heard his comic opera at Paris, many years afterwards, he did not find that his style had much improved by composing to French words and for French singers. Gretry, during the times of anarchy in France, became tainted with revolutionary principles: he went so far as to publish a work on the subject of religion, entitled "De la vérité de ce que nous fûmes, ce que nous sommes, et ce que nous devrons être"; which shows him also to have been deeply tinctured with infidelity. He died at Montmorency on the 24th of September, 1813.

I SLEPT AND WAS WEARY.*

BALLAD.

I slept and was weary; I slept well, and then
A voice from the window awoke me again,
Crying, "Rouse thee, fair maiden, for long have I been Awaiting without, and I fain would be in."
'Twas sweet to my ear as the voice of the grove,
When its bosom is burst with the nightingale's love;
I knew 'twas his voice, for I'd heard it so oft
In accents so thrilling, melodious and soft.

I flew to the window as swift as the gleam,
As the moon from a dark cloud obscuring her beams;
Could my fond heart deceive me? I flew to my dear,
But judge my surprise when no Jamie was there.
I tossed and was weary, till morning came in,
And I wished to dream over my vision again.

MR GEAUSSENT'S CHOIR.

This body purposes giving two concerts during the present winter season, and the first took place in St. James's Hall on Thursday evening. A somewhat motley programme was put before a rather scanty audience, whose smallness was due more to unfavourable weather than to dissatisfaction with the varied bill of fare. Of all nations we English are the most remarkable for an indiscriminating musical appetite. We are ready to swallow anything in any quantity, and those amongst us who perceive and regret the fact have hardly a right to censure concert-givers for heeding it in their own way. Nevertheless, the sooner Mr Geaussent can see his way clear to avoid mixing up Bach and ballads the better he will please lovers of the congruous, and those who long for the reign of a genuine eclecticism. Bach was represented in the programme of Thursday night (Nov. 23rd) by his cantata "O, light everlasting"—one of the smallest, though not least meritorious, contributions to sacred art from the old master's untiring pen. The work opens with a very elaborate chorus, followed by an air and two recitatives; a second chorus of smaller dimensions and simpler construction serving as finale. Its general character need not be indicated, because, while evincing inexhaustible resources in detail, the church cantatas of Bach differ but slightly in other respects. Enough that this example was welcome for the marvellous clearness and effect of its choral writing, and for the antique grace of its contralto air, which, however, was badly placed for the voice of Miss Marian Mackenzie, so many of its passages being on and about a very decided and not easily manageable "break." The choruses were attacked with great spirit and confidence, but hardly with entire success. Apropos, it may be said that Mr Geaussent's people are heard to less advantage in accompanied than in unaccompanied music. This is not unusual, and may arise from a vague idea that "chorus singing" is less exigent than part-singing. The mistake should be corrected. Another feature of interest was Schubert's Psalm, "The Lord is my shepherd," nicely rendered by sixteen ladies, equal attention being deserved by the performance of Mendelssohn's Cantata for male voices, "To the Sons of Art." The choir, however, appeared at its best in the madrigals and part songs; notably in Hatton's "Indian Maid" and Blumenthal's "Gather ye rosebuds." Of the last named a remarkable rendering was given, despite the absurdly exaggerated speed at which the piece was taken—such a speed that only an accomplished master of "patter" song could have articulated some of the words. We trust that Mr Geaussent, who is a young and presumably inexperienced man, will avoid sensationalism of every kind. He has an admirable choir, with the possibilities in it of great excellence, and its powers should not be abused. The programme contained one instrumental piece, to wit, a Duo Concertante in G, for pianos, by Mr C. E. Stephens, who played it in conjuntion with Mr Geaussent. This work has distinct and easily appreciable merits, to be found chiefly in its first and third movements; the second, a choral with variations, having little regarding which terms of praise can be used. The opening allegro, written in strict form, is not only well adapted to the instruments employed, but full of high interest and charm, while the finale excels in brilliancy, tempered always by delicacy and grace. Such a work cannot fail to please, through its symmetry, elegance, and purity of thought. As regards it, Mr Stephens should be a German, for two reasons: first, because he would derive from the work the credit he deserves; and next, because it would afford proof that a German composer now-a-days dares to publish that which is at once beautiful and coherent. The duet was well played and much applauded. As the solo vocalists engaged supplied the song and ballad "padding," little need be said about them. Praise is due to Mr Lloyd for an excellent rendering of "Adelaide"; to Mr King, for a spirited version of Benedict's "Rage, thou angry storm"; and to Miss Clara Samuell, for singing with expression a ballad, entitled "Waiting for the King." Mr Sidney Naylor presided at the organ and Mr Herbert Waite at the pianoforte—both very efficiently.—D. T.

VIENNA.—Dr Eduard Schelle, writer on music, and Professor of Musical History at the Conservatory, died on the 16th November. He was born on the 31st May, 1816, at Biesenthal, near Berlin, and studied philology and theology at the University, but eventually devoted himself exclusively to music. After a long stay in Paris, Rome, Florence, &c., he accepted, in 1864, the post of musical critic on the Presse. Here, too, he concluded his work (1871) on the Sixtine Chapel, and contributed valuable articles to different periodicals. He was respected as a thoroughly conscientious critic, and an amiable man. His loss, like that of his friend, Nottebohm, who preceded him to the tomb, is regretted in all the musical circles of the Austrian capital.—Signale.

BERLIN.

(Correspondence.)

Baron von Perfall's opera, Raimondin, has been produced as the first novelty of the season at the Royal Operahouse. It met with a friendly, though far from enthusiastic reception, and will probably not long be retained in the bills. After a lengthened interval Mdme Carlotta Patti has again been heard here. She gave a concert in the Winter Garden of the Central Hotel. She was supported by her husband, De Munck, the violoncellist; Leitert, pianist; and Boretti, vocalist.—The second Subscription Concert, under the direction of Dr Franz Wüllner, at the Philharmonie was no less successful than the first. The solo-player of the evening was Marsick, the well-known violinist. At the third concert, on the 4th inst., Pablo de Sarasate, the violinist, will take the place of Hans von Bülow, who is still seriously indisposed.—The Musical Collection of the late Dr. Müller, librarian of the Conservatory, is announced for sale on the 4th inst. Among the rare works put up—for which, report says, the authorities of the British Museum and the Belgian Government will appear as rival bidders—is a collection of sonnets published in London about 1710, and written by Jean Baptiste Lœillet, of Ghent, who made a large fortune in the English capital by his weekly concerts and music lessons. The collection is thus entered in the catalogue:—"LŒILLET (J.), XII sonatas in 3 parts; 6 of which are for 2 violins and a bass, 3 for 2 German flutes, and 3 for hautboy and common flute, with a bass for the violoncello and a thorough bass for the harpsichord. Op. II.—London print. for J. Walsh. No date (about 1710). 4 vols., small fol. A fine and perfect copy in old leather binding. Extremely rare."

WARE WONG!

Englishmen are accustomed to those censorial prohibitions which taboo our theatrical stage to operas or dramas founded upon any Biblical subject, and, as a rule, more or less cheerfully acquiesce in ordinances which practically hinder the playwright or actor from touching upon persons and events, narratives and incidents, universally regarded as sacred. It is curious and interesting to observe how diametrically opposite a view of the drama's mission on earth is taken by official perceptions in China. Some of the Canton magnates have recently raised objections to the mundane and even frivolous character of the pieces performed at the local theatres; and their remonstrances have elicited a very remarkable decree from Provincial Treasurer Wong, chief censor of plays:—

"The population of Canton, as I am aware, delight in dramatic representations. And why? Because those who worship the gods know full well that it is necessary to pay them especial honour through the medium of theatrical performances. Thus does the theatre become a pure source of enjoyment for the people; and there exist no laws that could or should restrain it in that direction. But, on the other hand, it is absolutely requisite that the pieces performed should be animated by a tendency to stimulate their audiences to fear of the gods, attachment to the throne, and veneration of their parents. The performance of frivolous plays cannot but lead to the annihilation of morality. I therefore, hereby command all theatrical lessees and managers to forbear the production of such abominations for the future, under penalty, not only of imprisonment, but of extremely severe corporeal punishment. Given on the seventh day of the tenth month of the eighth year of the reign of the Emperor Tung-Chi."

Judging by this specimen of Chinese censorship, we are entitled to assume that, were China a Christian country, its operatic impresarii would have no difficulty in bringing out such works as Rossini's Mosé, Rubinstein's Maccabäer, Goldmark's Koenigin von Saba,* or Massenet's Hérodiade, the plots of which lyric dramas have been culled from the pages of the Apocrypha and the Old Testament.—D. T.

Mr Nicolas Mori has been appointed Professor of the Violin at the West London College of Music, of which Sir Julius Benedict, Mr W. Kuhe, and Mr Carl Rosa are the "examiners."

* Or Gounod's Reine de Saba (Irène)? We have already had Verdi's Nabucodonozzar (Nabucco); and Auber's Enfant Prodigue; and why not Méhul's Joseph? Wong is a great matter.—Dr Blidge.

WAIFS.

Last Saturday, at the Crystal Palace Concert, we had Schubert's Ninth or (as Mr George Grove is thoroughly persuaded) Tenth Symphony. The concert to-day will be devoted to M. Gounod's "Oratorio," The Redemption. What different forms music can assume! Proteus and Alberich sink into the shade.

The tenor De Negri has been singing in Prague.

Sparapani, the baritone, returned from Brazil, is now in Florence.

Mancinelli is engaged as conductor at Parma for the Carnival season.

Verdi has taken up his winter quarters at the Palazzo Doria, Genoa.

Bianca Donadio is singing with the Italian-opera company in Malaga.

Carmen has proved a great success at the Italian Operahouse, St Petersburgh.

Teresa Théo is now in Havannah, whence she returns next March to New York.

The Théâtre Royal, Liége, opened for the season with Gounod's Roméo et Juliette.

Paolo-Marie has been ill in America with typhoid fever but is now convalescent.

Joseph Edler, Professor at the Conservatory, died in Vienna on the 2nd November.

Biorghi-Mamò's benefit at the Teatro Dom Pedro, Rio Janeiro, was a great success.

There is some talk of giving Arrigo Böito's Mefistofele at Modena during the Carnival.

Pozzoni is said to be engaged at the Teatro Costanzi, Rome, to play Amneris in Aïda.

Mdme Basta's engagement at the Theatre Royal, Munich, is renewed for two years.

Franz Liszt has left Weimar for Venice, where he intends making a stay of some months.

Marschner's opera, Sangeskönig Hiarne, is in rehearsal at the Theatre Royal, Munich.

It is reported from Barcelona that Albert Bernis has taken a five years' lease of the Liceo.

The Istituto Rossini, Pesaro, has been formally opened under the management of Pedrotti.

The Orfeon Valenciano, Valencia, has established a gratuitous music school for children.

Kéler Béla, the well-known composer of dance music, died in Wiesbaden on the 20th ult.

The Theatre attached to the New Casino, Nice, will be opened in the early part of January.

A Conservatory of Music, with Fernando Sellès as director, has been established at Jativa, Spain.

Mesdames Sachse-Hofmeister and Reicher-Kindermann are engaged at the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Emil Kaiser's opera, Der Trompeter von Säkkingen, has been produced at Olmutz with fair success.

Gounod's Redemption, with Flemish text, is to be given next year by the Society of Music, Antwerp.

It is definitely settled that the Spohr Memorial, Cassel, shall be inaugurated on the 15th April, 1883.

Mdme Franck-Duvernoy was much applauded in Verdi's Lombardi at the Italian Opera, St Petersburgh.

Synonymous: "A soldier of fortune" and "A soldier who has none."—(Excruciating.—Dr Blinge.)

Rubinstein has already begun a new opera, Sulamith, ein Schäferspiel, to be first produced at Hamburgh.

Moran-Olden commenced a short engagement at the Stadttheater, Leipsic, appearing as Leonore in Fidelio.

A new theatre, to be called the Teatro Morrananzo, is in course of construction at Salto Orientale, Uruguay.

According to a Florence paper, Wagner's Walküre will probably be given ere long at the Teatro Regio, Turin.

Les Huguenots, with De Reszké and Gayarre as Valentine and Raoul, has been given at the San Carlos, Lisbon.

Mdme Odoardo Barri was engaged to appear at the Italian Opera, Trieste, on the 29th November in Verdi's Aïda.

It is proposed to erect in the Piazza Venezia, Turin, a large hotel with, among other accessories, a café and Theatre.

The Baltimore (U.S.) Oratorio Society will give performances this winter, of The Messiah, Elijah, and The Redemption.

The Antigone of Sophocles, with Mendelssohn's music, has been performed at the Grand-Ducal Theatre, Darmstadt.

At a recent concert in the Town Hall, Genoa, Sivori played two pieces on the violin formerly belonging to Paganini.

A new Quartet Society, consisting of Jeno Hubay, Colyns, van Styndoort, and Servais, has been formed in Brussels.

Arrigo Boito's Mefistofele is in rehearsal at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, and will be produced in January.

Boïeldieu's Dame Blanche has been performed 1,465 times, and Herold's Pré aux Clercs, 1,341, at the Paris Opéra-Comique.

Mdlle Mei will probably by this time have made her first appearance at the Teatro Real, Madrid, as Leonora, in La Favorita.

Von Suppé's Boccaccio has been performed at the Teatro de San Fernando, Seville, by the buffo Italian company under Scalvini.

Gounod's Tribut de Zamora, with Pauline Lucca in the leading part, will be given early next year at the Imperial Opera, Vienna.

Christine Nilsson's stage-jewels, supposed to have been destroyed at the Park Theatre fire, New York, have been recovered uninjured.

The Spanish composer, Enrique Marti, is setting two zarzuelas in the Catalonian dialect—Los Fills de Catalunya and La Pell de Cabra.

A new opera, Getafe al Paraiso ó la Familia del Tio Maroma, music by Barbieri, is in preparation at the Teatro de Variedades, Madrid.

After an interval of several years, Wagner's Lohengrin has again been performed at the Teatro Comunale, Bologna, where it is still running.

The Musical Association, Darmstadt, recently celebrated its 50th anniversary, and, at the same time the 40th of Herr Mangold as director.

Francisca Kopka, the popular German buffo-opera singer, is taking lessons of Lamperti, in Milan, and will appear in January at the Scala.

There is to be a season of Italian opera at Lyons, among the artists already engaged being Carolina Ferni, and the tenor Abrugnedo.

Adelina Patti and Christine Nilsson will probably sing at the Cincinnati (U.S.) Opera Festival in January.—(Very probably.—Dr Blinge.)

The Italian operatic season at the Teatro Principal, Valencia (Spain), was inaugurated by La Juive, never previously performed in that city.

Philip Fahrbach of Vienna will again conduct the orchestra in the crush-room on the occasion of the four masked balls at the Grand Opera, Paris.

Bianca Bianchi, who created a deep impression in Lucia, at the National Theatre, Pesth, has undertaken the part of the heroine in Doppler's opera, Ilka.

Dr Ludonesky, Vieuxtemps' son-in-law, died on the 9th November, having taken cold at the funeral of his wife who was buried only three days previously.

Massenet's Hérodiade, already given seventy times at the Theatre de la Monnaie, Brussels, will be performed this winter at Hamburgh, Pesth, Prague, and Nantes.

The Promessi Sposi of Ponchielli has been performed in Leghorn, under the direction of the composer, Catalanotti, the regular conductor being indisposed.

Next year's festival of the North American Sängerbund will be held at Buffalo, from the 16th to the 20th July, and conclude with a trip to the Falls of Niagara.

It is said that the first performance of Gounod's Redemption at the Imperial Opera, Vienna, will take place in Christmas week, for the benefit of the Pension Fund.

A cantata, Le Hoyon, words and music by M. E. Mathieu, director of the local School of Music, has been performed for the first time at Louvain, Belgium.

The King of Portugal lately conferred the Cross of the Order of the Redeemer on Popper (violoncellist), and Emile Sauret (violinist), who have been giving concerts in Lisbon.

Auber's Fra Diavolo has been performed at the Teatro Alfieri, Turin, a fact worthy of notice because the operas of the most gifted and prolific of French composers are seldom heard in Italy.

The Nestor of living artists is probably Christophe Hilf, formerly a clarinettist of repute, who attained his ninety-eighth birthday on the 4th November, and resides at Elster, in Saxony.

After singing at Monte Carlo, where she is to receive 6,000 francs for two concerts, Anna de Belocca goes to Nice, for the Italian season at the Casino, under the direction of Sig. Vianesi.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 879 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. SIMON BOCCANEGRA IN VIENNA.*

Most of the audience assembled at the Imperial Operahouse probably asked themselves how much historical truth there was in this Doge Boccanegra and the tangled series of events heaped up around him in Verdi's early work. In the most accessible manuals and other similar works they will not find his name, so we will spare them the trouble we ourselves have gone through, and give them, in a condensed form, the essential facts culled from old special histories of mediæval Genoa. The plot is based upon the stormy political events of the 14th century, when civil wars between the Plebeians and the Nobles convulsed the free Italian States, and when Genoa more especially (the scene of the opera) was at war, now with Venice, now with Pisa, Milan, and other neighbouring cities. Dissatisfied Genoese sailors, in the pay of Philip of Valois, revolted in 1339 against their admiral, Doria, who had kept back what was due to them. They returned, for the purpose of lodging their complaint, to Genoa, where they found their fellow-citizens full of bitterness against the Fieschis, the Dorias, the Spinolas, and the Grimaldis. For eighteen years these four great families had by their jealousy of one another convulsed the State, which they wanted to subject to an hereditary oligarchy. Two Ghibelline captains, a Spinola and a Doria, ruled Genoa; they had wrested from the people the latter's right to elect their own Abbés (Abbots of the People), magistrates, like the Tribunes in Rome, chosen to be the protectors and defenders of the lower orders. The discontented spirits in Genoa demanded the restitution of this right. Twenty Plebeians, elected by their fellow-citizens, met on the 23rd September, 1329, at the Prefecture, when one of their number, a silver-foil manufacturer, exclaimed, "Choose Boccanegra!" (Italian historians sometimes write the name: "Boccanigra," and, sometimes, "Boccanera," but, for the sake of convenience, we shall adhere to Verdi's mode of spelling it). Simon Boccanegra is described as a man of courage and experience, who, though of an ancient and noble family, always defended the Plebeians. He was enthusiastically proclaimed the new Abbé, but declined the office. The people then felt that the title of "People's Abbé" was fitted only for a Plebeian, and that Boccanegra, on account of his rank, could not accept a post of such inferior rank. "Be, then, our Prince, our Doge!" cried the multitude, and their leaders pressed him to accept the proffered dignity. As the title of Doge accidentally conferred on him reminded the people of the Doges of Venice, the heads of an independent State, like Genoa, the new constitution, developed, so to speak, amidst the popular tumult, was free and Republican. Boccanegra made praiseworthy use of the power entrusted to him, and retained it for five years. He checked with a strong hand the excesses to which the people at first abandoned themselves. He rescued his personal foe, the Guelph, Rebella Grimaldi, from the hands of the insurgents, and subjected to the Republic old castles and fortresses on both Rivieras. Meanwhile he had always to contend against the intrigues of the four powerful families whom he had excluded from the government. These families combined against him, and at last, tired of the conflict, he resigned his post, and went to Pisa. At one of the most stormy epochs in the history of Genoa, and, again, in consequence of an armed rising, he was elected Doge a second time, in November, 1353. He at once banished some of the most influential Nobles, and allowed Plebeians alone a share in municipal affairs. During the visit of King Peter of Cyprus to Genoa in 1363, the Doge, while dining with his Majesty at Malacelli's, was poisoned, and taken ill in consequence. The opposite faction then rose up, forced their way into the Dogal Palace, and caused Gabriele Adorno, a wealthy merchant, to be elected Doge. Soon afterwards Boccanegra died, and, being hated by the Adorno party, who then held sway, was buried with scarcely any ceremony.

Verdi's librettist, Piave, has retained only a few leading outlines connected with Boccanegra as a historical figure (his election by the people and his poisoning) but in other respects has made up a thoroughly arbitrary personage of romance.† Of the other historical characters he takes simply the names, with which he decks this or that creature of his own fancy. He makes the succeeding Doge, Adorno, a warm-blooded tenor lover, and "Paolo, the gold-thread-spinner," the intrigant and villain of the piece. Various historical names (Grimaldi, Fieschi, &c.) are continually flitting about like so many bits of ostentatious tinsel; nay, even a letter from Petrarch admonishing the people to preserve peace is produced before the Assembled Council and ridiculed by Paolo. No one can blame a librettist for making free use of historical events, especially such obscure and distant events as these, if he only has the skill to draw from them an exciting and connected plot, and living characters which arouse our interest. Piave, unfortunately, does precisely the reverse.

In the Prologue, Boccanegra comes as a young man to Genoa for the sake of once more seeing his Beloved, the daughter of the proud patrician, Fiescho—he finds her a corpse. The first act takes place five-and-twenty years later. Boccanegra's daughter and Fiescho's grandchild, supposed by both to be long dead, has been saved—Heaven knows how—in Pisa, and, under the name of Amalia Grimaldi, is living near Genoa. She is in love with a young noble, Gabriel Adorno, who proposes for her. In order to communicate to her personally the consent of her supposed brothers (the Grimaldis), the Doge Boccanegra visits her and recognizes in her his own daughter. A grand meeting of the Council in the Dogal Palace follows. Adorno, pursued by the people, rushes in; he has murdered a certain Lorenzino, to whose house, Amalia, after being violently carried off, has been conveyed. Adorno believes the Doge to be the person who has had her spirited away, and rushes on him with drawn sword; Amalia, to shield the Doge, throws herself between the two. The second act plays in the Doge's chamber. The most unlikely characters come and go without let or hindrance—the captive Adorno, the captive Fiescho, and lastly Paolo, who puts the poison into the Doge's goblet. Boccanegra drinks the poison, which is slow in its operation for the sake of the opera, as he has to sing all through the third act. At first it makes him only drowsy; scarcely, however, has he fallen off to sleep ere Adorno with naked dagger steals in. Again does Amalia appear at the right moment and stop the murderer's arm. Now for the first time Adorno learns that Amalia is not the sweetheart but the daughter of the hoary-headed Doge, whereupon he immediately resolves to fight for the latter. Most opportunely again "Foes" appear on the spot ("Und frage nicht wo Feinde sind—Die Feinde kommen mit dem Wind,"‡ as Herwegh once sang to the King of Prussia). In the third act we behold Boccanegra slowly die from the effects of the poison; in his last moments he unites Amalia and Adorno, while, in obedience to his wish, Adorno mounts the throne; Paolo, the scaffold.

The principal personages who by fits and starts impel this absurd story forward are wooden dolls in fine costumes, without flesh or bone. We willingly accept the magnanimous Boccanegra, who forms so strong a contrast to the blackguardly set around him; but that he should give his only daughter as wife to a wicked fool like Adorno, who would murder him in his sleep, and that he should urgently recommend such a fellow to the people as most worthy to be Doge —— is something which passes the limits even of operatic magnanimity. Then we have this detestable lover, Adorno, and the incomprehensible Amalia, who twice stops the murderous youth when he is about to slay her father, and yet does not speak the only words which can enlighten and disarm him: "Boccanegra is my father!" What her grandfather, the very old Fiescho, has to do with the plot is a mystery of the most brain-puzzling description. Every time he appears he only makes things more confused than before. In the Prologue he has a long conversation with Boccanegra to whom he is perfectly well known. As, however, he appears in the following acts under the name of "Andrea," we are bound to suppose that, after Boccanegra's election, he has been banished, and, stealing furtively into Genoa under an assumed name, dares not go near the Doge. But lo and behold! at the solemn meeting of the Council we see our Fiescho-Andrea among the members, and absolutely close to the Doge! In the third act we have something yet stronger. Fiescho addresses the Doge. "Ah! that voice!" exclaims the latter in surprise (though he has just been singing with him all through the second finale). "You have heard it before," replies the aged man; "do you know me?" "Fiesco!" Is not that enough to drive one silly? The audience are also much in the dark with regard to Paolo, and his sudden change from Boccanegra's friend and companion into his deadly foe and murderer. For this obscurity, however, the management of the Imperial Operahouse is more to blame than the librettist. Let the reader judge. Paolo has begged the Doge to sue, in his name, for the beautiful Amalia. But when Boccanegra has recognized in her his daughter, he is far from feeling inclined to gratify Paolo. After the duet between Boccanegra and Amalia (which concludes the scene in Vienna) the libretto contains the following short dialogue between Boccanegra and Paolo, who is waiting to hear what course things have taken:—

* Neue freie Presse.

† We cannot well understand by what right Piave has made Boccanegra a "pirate"; our historians mention nothing of the kind, but merely say that, after Boccanegra was elected Doge, the Nobles driven by him out of the State lived by piracy. Stella names a Grimaldi, a Marin, and a Malacelli among the pirates who preyed on Venetian vessels.

PAOLO. What said she? DOGE. Abandon all hope. PAOLO. I shall never be able to do so. DOGE. It is my will! (exit). PAOLO. Your will! Do you forget what you owe me? PIETRO. (advancing) How did matters go off? PAOLO. Repelled! PIETRO. What will you do? PAOLO. Carry her off. Of an evening she strolls alone by the seaside; she shall be taken on board my vessel, and then Lorenzo's abode shall receive her.

This short dialogue, which alone casts a light on all that follows, since it explains to us Paolo's sudden hatred of Boccanegra and acquaints us with the fact that it is Paolo who will carry off Amalia—is all cut out at the Imperial Operahouse! Yet it is so indispensably requisite that a clear-sighted dramatist would supply it of his own accord were it not in the libretto. The fact is, we could see in the way the opera was placed on the stage the hand of the stage-manager skilled in effective decoration and excellent as regards all externals, rather than the deeper and more searching eye of the dramatist, as the following and second example will prove. The Doge knows it is Paolo who has carried off Amalia; he determines to give him to understand this and act on him morally, without unmasking him before the assembled and excited people. "There is a traitor among us," he says with emphasis, "My word of thunder shall strike the infamous knave! A curse on the traitor! And you, Paolo, shall repeat the words." Paolo does repeat them; he ought to do so, moved in the inmost recesses of his soul, "startled and trembling," as the libretto directs, but with the artificial outward composure of a hypocrite who knows that his life depends upon it. Paolo may turn pale and shake, but he must remain erect like an accused murderer who at the decisive moment takes a false oath that he may not be his own guide to the gallows. Instead of this, the representative of Paolo at the Imperial Operahouse falls, after repeating the curse, penitently on his knees and hides his face with both hands, while the crowd point their fingers at him. By this utterly false reading of the scene, the very reverse of what the author intended is done; instead of being touched only in conscience, Paolo, by his penitently despairing behaviour, becomes his own accuser, confesses his crime before the entire people, and thus could not possibly do as he does: appear in the next act, in undisputed possession of his former post of honour and with head erect. Thus the story of Boccanegra is in the Vienna version even more confused than it was originally.

Among the various kinds of pernicious operatic librettos the unintelligible and involved specimens are more prejudicial to musical effect than those which are simply wearisome. In Verdi's Boccanegra as in other operas, our interest in the music diminishes the moment we can no longer follow the story with sympathetic comprehension, and begin to wax more and more angry with the contradictions of a disconnected plot. This opera, now a drawing piece in Italy, was, as we are aware, composed as long as twenty-six years ago, when it proved decidedly unsuccessful at the Fenice. Fétis explains the fiasco on the ground that in Simon Boccanegra Verdi took as his model German Music of the Future, "une fantaisie," necessarily attended with disastrous results. Of this we can find no trace even in the new and modern version, though we can see in it a true and more dramatic adaptation of the music to the text, sharper accentuation, and more choice instrumentation—qualities foreshadowing the style of the composer's later operas. This is very natural; Boccanegra, written between Les Vêpres Siciliennes and Il Ballo in Maschera, stands at the threshold of Verdi's last period or "Maniera terza." Not, however, with half, but with three-quarter profile does Simon Boccanegra look backwards, and is, therefore—even from a Verdi standpoint—Music of the Past, rather than of the Future. The hand of the maestro was probably most busy in the Prologue and first act as regards revision and the introduction of fresh matter; in these we find the fire of youth combined with the heightened art of age. In them there reigns the sweet melodiousness, fierce sensualism, and passionate dramatic spirit of the early Verdi, partly refined and partly spiced more highly by the more delicate elements of his later style. The instrumental introduction of the Prologue, and the following scenes, treated rather in conversational tone than otherwise, at once captivate us by the warm life and peculiar power of exciting anxious curiosity which Verdi understands how to impart to such preparatory scenes. Fiesco's sorrowful cavatina with the "Miserere," heard from afar, blending with it, is charactized by genuine feeling and the most beautifully harmonious charm. The following duet between Boccanegra and Fiesco breathes a strong sentiment of pathos, and is brought to an effective conclusion by the People flocking in and enthusiastically announcing Boccanegra's election, while he himself is bowed down with grief for the death of her he loved. The most pleasing portions of the opera are contained in the first part of the first act. The introduction is scored with delicate and almost coquettish grace; a flowery vocal dialogue between clarinet and violoncello, accompanied by high tremolo violin chords, which imitate the low warbling of birds. Amalia's air in E flat major and her love-duet with Adorno—though, it is true, transiently disturbed by certain commonplace outbursts—proved effective, in consequence of their melodic charm and passionate character. Of less account, and as though purposely toned down, is the duet between Adorno and Fiesco. On the other hand, the duet which follows between Amalia and Boccanegra, in the portion where it dramatically develops the story, as well as in Amalia's intermediate lyrical part ("Grave d'anni della pia") is one of the best Verdi has written. On the grand scene in the Doge's palace which concludes the first act, the composer has bestowed especial care, and his fire did not fail him during his task. The finale is built up comprehensively and effectively; especially striking, musically, is the long and pathetic F sharp major movement, over which the melody of the soprano part ("Pace!") floats like a silver streak.

We are now at the end of the first act, which for us is the end of the opera. Nearly all that follows in the last two acts consists of familiar melodies, conventional phrases, and worn-out effects. It is the old Verdi, but out of sorts, absent-minded, and fatigued. A shower of bright sparks fly upwards now and then, particularly towards the close of the opera; but in the damp gloom of the whole they decrepitate without making any impression. Simon Boccanegra is, in its first half, emphatically worth hearing and, on account of the magnificence with which it is got up, amusing and worth seeing from beginning to end. Mdme Materna lifts the part of Amalia by her brilliant voice and passionate style. There is nothing to be done dramatically with it, and even less with that of Fiesco, which pleases only on account of Rokitansky's splendid voice. The title-part is more thankful and characteristic. Herr Beck (though evidently fatigued by the rehearsals) flung into it the ever welcome dash of his genuinely artistic nature. Herr Broulik, as Adorno, endeavoured to be moderate, but, unfortunately, not in the right way, for his invariably toneless, dry mezza voce was not much more edifying than the fortissimo bursts he turned on directly afterwards. Herr Horwitz deserved considerable praise in the not very long but important and ticklish part of the villain Paolo. Great credit is due to Herr Jahn, who conducted, for the success of the performance, which evoked loud applause.

BRUSSELS.—Jean de Nivelle has been somewhat coldly received at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, owing partly to the general inefficiency of the performance, partly to the libretto, and partly—say critics—to the music, which is found wanting in originality. The performance, nevertheless, was all that could be desired. M. Dupont was the conductor. On the 20th, Arrigo Boito's Mefistofele will be produced, with a French version of the text by M. Paul Milliet, who wrote the libretto of Massenet's Hérodiade. Varney's Fanfan la Tulipe has been brought out at the Théâtre des Galeries, Saint-Hubert.

SCRAPS FROM PARIS.

Two days after the retirement of Villaret from the Grand Opera his place as tenore robusto was taken by M. Salomon, formerly a member of the theatre to which he has returned, and which he left some years ago. Since then, he has been singing in the provinces. For his re-appearance he chose the part of Jean de Leyde, in Le Prophète. Neither his style nor voice has improved during his absence, but he was well received and applauded on several occasions during the evening. Mdlle Richard was an excellent Fidès, lending life and colour to what was generally a tame and spiritless performance. Guillaume Tell, with Mdme Lacombe-Duprez, Sellier, Lassalle, and Boudouresque, has re-appeared in the bills. Another quasi revival has been that of Sylvia, in which both M. Léo Delibes' music and Mdlle Sangalli's dancing were as greatly admired as ever. It is hoped that Mdlle Rosita Mauri will soon be able to take part in the rehearsal of the new ballet, La Farandole, music by M. Théodore Dubois, whose colleagues for the literary portion of the work are MM. Gille and Mortier, while M. Mérante represents Terpsichore.—With regard to Henry VIII., all the singers are perfectly up in the first act, which is now, or shortly will be, in rehearsal on the stage. But rumour asserts there is to be an important alteration in the cast. To please one of the artists, who complained that his part did not lie well for his voice, M. Saint-Saëns modified it considerably more than once. Still the artist was not satisfied. At length, M. Saint-Saëns wrote to M. Vaucorbeil stating that, though a great admirer of the exacting malcontent, he would sooner give someone else the part than alter another note.

By a ministerial decree recently published, M. Carvalho's lease of management, which was on the point of expiration, has been renewed for seven years, at the Opéra-Comique. This has afforded general satisfaction, for M. Carvalho is regarded by the majority of the artistic world as eminently the right man in the right place. He certainly cannot be accused of want of energy. For instance: Next June, Mdlle Isaac, one of the most popular members of his company, will leave his theatre for the Grand Opera. While people were wondering what he would do, and whom he could possibly find to replace her, he had already engaged Mdlle Emma Nevada, a young countrywoman of Marie Vanzandt's, and an ex-pupil of Mdme Marchesi's. The young lady, who has already made a name in Italy, and was going to the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, when M. Carvalho secured her, will probably make her first appearance as Zora in Félicien David's Perle du Brésil. Another new-comer is Mdlle Rolandt, a native of Gratz, who is said to possess a phenomenal soprano voice. The repertory has been augmented, temporarily, at least, by two slight novelties—La Nuit de Saint Jean, music by M. Lacome, composer of Jeanne, Jeannette et Jeanneton, Le Beau Nicolas, and La Dot mal placée, book by MM. Delacour and Lau de Lusignan; and Battez Philidor, music by M. Amédée Dutacq, book by M. Abraham Dreifus. The first-named libretto is founded on a story entitled Les Fiancés de Grinderwald, from the pen of MM. Erckmann-Chatrian. The gist of it is as follows: Franz is devotedly attached to the lovely Charlotte, but the latter's father objects to the match, because the youth has not the means to support a wife. Notwithstanding this opposition on the part of the stern parent, Franz proceeds, in conformity with the custom of the country, to serenade his beloved on Midsummer's Eve. He meets an old Judge, Zaccharias Seiler, who also is in love with Charlotte, but, on learning the true state of affairs, pleads the cause of the young couple so effectually that the father relents, and gives his consent, which he has no longer any reason for withholding, as Zaccharias promises his young and fortunate rival the post of garde-chasse, or forester. M. Lacome has written some pleasing music, but its charm is considerably deteriorated by a pretentiousness out of place in a light production such as that under discussion. The pieces most applauded were the duet between the two lovers, a quartet, the serenade, and Seiler's song: "J'avais rêvé," admirably rendered by Grivot, who undoubtedly bore off the chief honours, and was excellent both as singer and comedian. The other artists comprised in the cast were Mdme Thuillier, Mdlle Vidal, Mouliérat, and Maris.—Battez Philidor introduces us to the famous Café de la Régence, whither Philidor, renowned as a composer, and still more as master of all the secrets of chess, at which he was unrivalled, used to repair of an evening to play his favourite game. A young Violinist, Richard, loves Mdlle Doris, daughter of Boudignot, proprietor of the Café. When he begs her hand of her father, the latter at once refuses, save on one condition, which he fancies is an impossibility: "Beat Philidor at chess, and my child is yours." Richard accepts the condition, though he has scarcely ever touched a pawn in his life. He goes off at once and states his case to Philidor, whose heart is touched by the young man's appeal, and who promises to allow himself to be beaten. Unfortunately, while he is playing to lose, Doris begins singing an air from his score of Ernelinde. His delight on hearing his music thus charmingly rendered causes him to forget his kindly intentions, and he wins the game without thinking what he is doing. Richard is in despair. But all is not lost. When Philidor finds what is the disastrous result of his absence of mind he at once declares that, unless Boudignot will consent to the marriage of Doris and Richard, he, Philidor, will transfer his patronage to the Café Procope, an act which would prove tantamount to the ruin of the Café de la Régence. As Boudignot is by no means prepared to face such a contingency, he acts upon the principle that discretion is the better part of valour, and accepts the enamoured Violinist as his son-in-law. The best part of the score is at the commencement of the piece, where Philidor is discovered playing chess. The rest is weak. Let us hope that M. Dutacq, who some few years ago was second "prix de Rome," will do better next time. On the first night, the music had certainly not a fair chance. M. Nicot was unlucky enough entirely to lose his voice just before the rising of the curtain, and consequently was totally unable to do the composer justice. At the second performance, however, he was in full possession of all his means, and the piece went off proportionately better, though not destined probably to achieve lasting popularity. M. Barré was Philidor; M. Grivot made the very most of Boudignot, and Mdme Thuillier appeared to advantage as Doris.—Les Noces de Figaro and Joseph en Egypte are to be revived as soon as the receipts of Mignon and Roméo et Juliette show signs of diminution. At present these two pieces are almost as attractive as ever, and M. Carvalho is, therefore, naturally reluctant to change the bill. Meanwhile, Mdme Bilbaut-Vauchelet, fully restored to health and strength, has returned to the scene of her triumphs, appearing first as Catarina in Les Diamants de la Couronne, and then as Isabella in Le Pré aux Clercs, the part she chose for her original début at this theatre.

The plot of Gillette de Narbonne, lately produced at the Bouffes Parisiens, and founded on a tale in Boccaccio's Decamerone, is from the combined and practised pens of MM. Chivot and Duru. It bears a marked resemblance to the plot of Le Jour et la Nuit, and is pronounced very full flavoured, even for Paris. Such being the case, it is as well, perhaps, not to describe in detail the means whereby Gillette fulfils conditions on which alone Comte Roger de Lignolles declares he will become her husband. The music is light, facile, and sparkling, but not equal to that of La Mascotte by the same composer, though occasionally very suggestive of it as well as of productions by other musicians. The best things in it are a duet, "Rappelez-vous nos promenades," and the finale of Act I., and a trio in Act II. The artists were Mdme Montbazon, Mdlle Gélabert, Morlet, Maugé, and Lamy, to all of whom librettists and composers owe no small portion of the success achieved.

The question of the Opéra-Populaire has advanced a step. The Municipal Council have voted an annual grant of 300,000 francs towards it, but nothing is as yet decided as to who is to be the manager or which the site.—The Chamber of Deputies has stopped the grant to the Maitrises of the Cathedrals, but has continued that paid to the School of Sacred Music founded by Niedermeyer.—The Berlioz Monument Committee have decided that the inauguration shall take place very shortly. The tomb will be surmounted by a bust of the composer, after that by Perraud at the Institut. Above the bust will be the inscription: "Monument erected to the glory of the composer, Berlioz (Louis Hector), born at Côte-Saint-André (Isère), the 11th December, 1803; died a member of the Academy of Fine Arts, the 8th March, 1869.

have published an arrangement for voice and piano of Berlioz's Grande Messe des Morts, performed in 1837 at the Invalides on the occasion of the funeral service for General Damrémont, the Officers, and Soldiers, who fell at the taking of Constantine. At the beginning of the score is the following phrase, taken from a letter addressed by the composer, two years before his death, to his friend, Humbert Ferrand: "If anyone threatened to burn all I had ever written with the exception of a single score, the Messe des Morts is the one I should beg to have spared."

THE BEGINNING OF THE CONCERT-SEASON IN VIENNA.*

The Orchestral Concerts given at half-past four on Sunday afternoon in the Ehrbar Rooms by Herr Kretschmann, are a new speculation which at first sight strikes one as strange. A more unfavourable day and a more unfavourable hour, we should have thought, could scarcely have been selected, for who of "all Vienna," musically speaking, which fills the regular Sunday morning concerts of the "Philharmonicans" and the "Friends of Music," can have sufficient appetite left for a second orchestral concert immediately afterwards? But actual experience has strikingly refuted our apprehensions. Ehrbar's concert-room, brilliantly lighted up and glistening like a jewel casket, was filled with an attentive and grateful audience. It was a different public from that of the Philharmonic and the Society's Concerts, but those engaged in the speculation appear to have relied on this very fact, namely: on the existence of a considerable contingent of persons who, though fond of music, cannot find admittance in the greatly reduced parquet of the Musikverein's Hall, but who probably can devote Sunday afternoon more conveniently than any other time to serious musical enjoyment. In a word, there could scarcely have been a more auspicious commencement. Herr Kretschmann, the excellent violoncellist of the so-called Radnitzky Quartet, proved himself in his new enterprise a skilful conductor, and, at the same time, the possessor of sound judgment in the constitution of his programme, which, mingling the Classical with the Modern, lays great importance on compositions not generally known. Practical, too, is the composition of his orchestra, which is restricted to 12 violins, 4 tenors, 3 violoncellos, and 2 double basses, together with a full wind band, trombones and noisy instruments, however, being excluded. Only such orchestral pieces, therefore, are played as are adapted for a small locality and free from the drawback of over-loudness. The first of the Six Subscription Concerts began with a Mozart Symphony (that in A major, No. 29). Herr R. Hummer, a member of the orchestra at the Imperial Operahouse, then played, with most beautiful tone and brilliant execution of the rapid passages, a Violoncello Concerto by Handel, one of the most graceful and most thankful pieces of old concert literature. In the harmonious rather than original prelude to the fifth act of Reinecke's Manfred, the pianissimo of the orchestra was something astonishingly beautiful. The concert, which took up scarcely an hour and a half, was brought to a conclusion by an Orchestral Suite in five movements (Op. 49), from the pen of Saint-Saëns. The Prelude, which reminds us rather strongly of the principal motive in the "Hebrides Overture" and the Pastoral Symphony, is followed by a delicately scored "Gavotte," a melodious romance (the best thing in the work probably), and lastly a fresh finale foaming along all of a piece. The work in its entirety is not imposing either by depth or luxuriant fancy, but pleases by the grace and skilfulness of form distinguishing this delicate composer who, though genuinely French, is thoroughly embued with German musical feeling.

The series of concert-playing pianoforte virtuosos (may it not reach too great a length?) was opened by Herr Heinrich Barth, Pianist to the Court of Berlin. Such a beginning as this we like. Herr Barth is an eminent performer, and his virtuosity of that sterling brilliancy which does not desire to shine everywhere and at any price. Herr Barth's object is above all things to play good—and, moreover, difficult good—music in such a way that, never reminded of the technical difficulties so completely overcome, we never have our enjoyment disturbed. His principal aim and principal excellence are perfect clearness of exposition and distinctness in the smallest detail. Glaring contrasts, intrusive coquetting, and the other things in which the caprice of "genius-gifted" individuals delights to exhibit itself, he utterly disdains. It is impossible to praise too highly his rendering of Brahms' "Handel Variations," Op. 24. This clever piece requires above all things rhythmical clearness and transparency, with a nice distribution of light and shade, if it is to stand plastically before us. Herr Barth renders this enjoyment of easy attainment, and by his rendering of the piece enables us to follow the composer into the most hidden recesses of his marvellous metamorphosising power. In Beethoven's sonata, "Adieu, Absence, et Retour," also, Herr Barth combined energy with delightful repose. Perhaps certain details of this piece, in which, it is true, Beethoven's heart does not pulsate so fully and freely as in other sonatas, but is impeded partly by capricious, and partly by "modish" accessories, might be given with deeper feeling; that is, however, an open question. Herr Barth may, possibly, side with the new school of research, which, to the grief of sentimental commentators, have decided that in this piece Beethoven was referring not to any parting from his mistress but from his pupil, the Arch-Duke Rudolph; and of a truth we really often seemed to distinguish in Barth's version "Imperial Highness" rather than "beloved darling." The concert-giver's cardinal virtues, clearness and fidelity of reproduction, are, of course, highly valuable in every composition, but they are not always completely sufficient. Rarely are they enough for Schumann, and still more rarely for Chopin. In the technically perfect rendering of two of the most difficult among Chopin's pieces (the G minor "Ballad" and the E flat major "Polonaise," Op. 22), and then in that of Schumann's second "Nouvelette," we miss that something so difficult to define which is a blossom of only the most delicate nervous susceptibility, and usually designated by the name of "poesy." In the whole nature of our athletic Court Pianist from Berlin there is a touch of the celebrated Prussian discipline and accuracy. This does not preclude a poetic, but does probably preclude a dreamy spirit. We scarcely need state that, as last winter, Herr Barth reaped a plenteous harvest of merited applause. By way of warning to future concert-givers it may, on the other hand, be mentioned that at Herr Barth's concert three programmes of different import were in circulation and puzzled many of the audience (but, let us hope, none of the musical critics). Let concert-givers, therefore, stick bravely to the programme first issued.

The day before yesterday, Sunday, we had the first Philharmonic Concert. Herr Wilhelm Jahn, manager of the Imperial Operahouse, who officiated for the first time here as conductor, though not recognized when he first appeared, was rewarded with hearty applause after each piece. It is unquestionably a stroke of great good fortune for the Philharmonic Concerts that a Capellmeister of acknowledged distinction like Herr Jahn should have been found to occupy the conductor's empty chair. After a predecessor so talented and so famous as Hans Richter, a second-rate man would have had a difficult task and, through him, the enterprise itself one more difficult still. The Philharmonic public will certainly not forget Richter's services and good qualities, which we have ever acknowledged and readily praised. If we were often compelled to oppose him, the opposition was generally to his programme, which was latterly deficient in interesting and meritorious novelties. In this respect the present year's programme shows no advance, but rather the reverse. With the exception of Dvorák's "Legenden," interpolated at the last moment, we are promised nothing save old familiar things we have often heard, for the second composition put forward as a "novelty," an unpublished Symphony of Schubert's, appears on good authority to be the one performed under Herbeck's direction. Yet Herr Jahn, as manager of the Imperial Operahouse, possesses this advantage over his predecessors that he can have as many rehearsals as he likes with the Philharmonic orchestra. The concert began with Lachner's D minor Suite, a sterling and agreeable work which on the present occasion, as once before under Dessoff (1863), proved effective rather by the virtuosity with which it was performed than by its own inward importance; nay, the latter struck us, after the lapse of nineteen years, to have shrunk a little more than before. The other two numbers in the programme, Schumann's Genoveva Overture, in which capricious changes of time, and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, in which the far too rapid tempo of the Allegretto and still more of the finale, were conspicuous, are known as model performances, worked out with special delicacy, of our Philharmonic orchestra, and evoked, as they always do, loud applause. Many amateurs hoped that at the first concert Herr Jahn would give the Prelude to Wagner's Parsifal, already performed in several towns in Germany, and in Paris by even two orchestral associations (those of Colonne and of Lamoureux). The performance of the piece in question would at any rate have been a natural mark of attention towards the Philharmonic subscribers, who are now compelled to make acquaintance with this much discussed sensational composition at the Promenade Concerts of Herr Eduard Strauss. EDUARD HANSLICK.

"BUT BRIGHTON."

(From a Correspondent in Transit.)

But Brighton, like a hospitable friend, is not at all disposed to ask this hard-worked, sorrowful, pale-faced London down to see her without giving a very special Saturday set of amusements. The full fun of a Brighton Saturday does not consist of chatting on the parade, lounging on the pier, or starting off with the breeze full in one's face, turning the back to fashion, and skirting the sea-shore as far as Shoreham. What is there to be done to-day at Brighton? asks the anxious epicure. Better may be asked, What is there not to be done? Music, as ever, is in the ascendant. There is to be music under the Dome, music at the Aquarium; the Black Watch band is to play at the opening of the Hove Rink; for Brighton, unlike the rest of the world, is still devoted to roller-skating; and there is to be more music at the Bazaar at the Pavilion, made into the form of a pretty Swiss village. Strangest eccentricity of all, there is to be music of an attractive kind in St Patrick's Protestant Church, where Mdme Marie Roze Mapleson is to sing in aid of the funds of the National School for Music, and from which curious exhibition his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, who was advertised to play, excused himself early in the day on the score of indisposition. But even this is not nearly all, for Brighton consults every conceivable taste when she sets about it. Brandram—the most popular entertainer in Brighton—is to recite The Wife's Secret from memory at the Pavilion, and will be sure of a good house; and Mr Edgar Bruce's "Colonel Company" has once more done so well that Mrs Nye-Chart has determined on giving a morning performance, for which every seat is booked. Even the children are not forgotten, and after luncheon they are crowding off to that delightful entertainment, "Myers' Circus."

One more, the greatest attraction, may be left, like a bonne bouche, for the last, for has not Miss Kuhe been able to announce that Mr Henry Irving, in fulfilment of an old promise given long before Much Ado About Nothing was such a success, or the consequent arrangements were made, has abandoned the London matinée, which would have been crowded in every seat, in order to keep his word and recite at the great concert under the Dome? Such spontaneous acts as these are well appreciated, particularly at Brighton, and the consequence was that the Dome presented a curious scene. Long before the concert began people were turned away, and in this huge space there was not room for another seat. Those willing to stand crowded into the doorways, and were generous in their applause when such distinguished favourites as Mr Santley, Mr Edward Lloyd, Mdme Antoinette Sterling, Mdlle Lemmens, and the charming sisters Robertson sang the songs and duets allotted to them. Encores on such an occasion were out of the question. At such a musical feast provided by Miss Kuhe there was more than enough. The appearance of Mr Henry Irving on the platform was the signal for unstinted applause, generously given and gracefully acknowledged. But the huge audience was hushed to immediate silence as the popular actor gave his well-known rendering of Hood's Dream of Eugene Aram, with even more than his accustomed force and power of facial expression. This, we all know, is more than a recitation in the accepted sense of the term; it is a piece of very fine tragedy, highly wrought, powerful, and in the best taste. As an immediate contrast, Mr Irving gave the celebrated scene between the child David Copperfield and the waiter with such quiet incision and comedy power that had it not been for the London train which was to take the actor back to town at five o'clock, the audience would have broken through all rules and insisted on an encore. What wonder then that the season is encouraging and Brighton as popular as ever, when a Saturday by the sea is productive of so many and such varied pleasures? "BEATTIE."

THE POPULAR CONCERTS.

In the programme of Saturday last there were no novelties, but classic excellence abounded, and served for entire content. This will be understood the more easily, seeing that the larger works have long held high rank among established favourites. Schubert's String Quintet in C, for example, is always a safe "draw" with that composer's legion of admirers, while the mere announcement of Beethoven's "Waldstein" sonata suffices for many others, without particular reference to the artist named as its executant. Lovers of Mozart, again, are prepared to swear by his Pianoforte trio in E, and so it came to pass that Mr Chappell delighted a mass of his patrons on this particular occasion. The pianist was Miss Dora Schirmacher, a young lady who has appeared in St James's Hall often enough for an estimate of her powers, and who, unquestionably, is an artist of ability beyond common. With her were associated in the trio Mdme Néruda and Signor Piatti, these admirable performers, in turn, having Messrs Ries, Straus, and Pezze as colleagues in the quintet. Under such circumstances, description can hardly be required, and criticism finds little or nothing to say. Let exception be made, however, even at the risk of superfluity, in favour of Signor Piatti, whose rendering of an Allemande, Largo and Allegro, by Veracini, was the perfection of interpretive musical art. The vocalist, Miss de Fonblanque, is always welcome at these concerts for the grace and charm of her style. All her work is done with taste and refinement, such as commend it to those whose culture exact high qualities.

On Monday night Herr Joachim made his first appearance for the season, and, notwithstanding the thronged streets, a crowd came out to give him welcome. His reception was as enthusiastic as heretofore—indeed there is no likelihood, hardly a possibility, that the favour shown to an artist so sterling in quality will ever abate. The great violinist led Beethoven's Quartet in C (Op. 59) with all his old breadth of style and power of expression, subsequently playing Bach's Concerto in A for violin, a double quartet doing duty for the master's small orchestra of strings. This fine work was grandly rendered, and so wrought upon the audience that the concluding Allegro had to be repeated. In its performance Herr Joachim's associates were Messrs Ries, Pollitzer, Wiener, Zerbini, Straus, Zerbini, jun., Pezze, Reynolds, and Piatti. They proved worthy of him, as he of them. Mendelssohn's ever-welcome Ottet concluded this remarkably good programme, which contained also the same master's "Scherzo à Capriccio" in F sharp minor, for pianoforte alone. In this piece Miss Schirmacher achieved a genuine success, playing with such precision and point that the audience honoured her with a call for a second piece. The singer was Miss Carlotta Elliott, another of Mr Chappell's acceptable vocalists. Miss Elliott pleased greatly in a song by Kjerulf and another by Taubert.

NAPLES.—The programme of the Teatro San Carlo has been issued. The season commences on the 15th inst. and terminates on the 15th April, 1883. The operas will be Il Re di Lahore, La Traviata, L'Africaine, La Favorita, and Simon Boccanegra. The company will comprise, sopranos: Mdmes Singer, Rubini-Scalisi, Heilbron (for La Traviata only); contraltos: Mesdes Mariani, De Angelis, Aimo; tenors: Gayarre, Cardinali, Nouvelli; barytons: Kaschmann, Laban; basses: Silvestri, and Jeromin, with Sig. Scalisi as conductor. Señor Gayarre, engaged for sixteen nights, will sing in L'Africaine and La Favourita. There will be two ballets: Pallerini's Due Gemelle, with music by Ponchielli, and Danesi's Arduino d'Ivrea, with music by Giaquinto.

Mr. Herbert Standing has purchased the sole rights of a new three-act opera bouffe entitled Robert Macaire, the music of which is from the pen of Mr Eugene Barnett, younger son of Mr John Barnett, the famous composer of The Mountain Sylph and other operas. Robert Macaire will shortly be produced in London, and should prove successful, for the music, we are informed, is charmingly melodious, and very dramatic. Mr Eugene Barnett, who is already known as the composer of some pretty songs, has also written music to a comedietta by Mr Malcolm Charles Salaman, which will probably be produced at the same time as his opera.

LAMOUREUX CONCERTS IN PARIS.

(From an errant Correspondent.)

The large audience assembled last Sunday in the Theatre du Chateau d'Eau testifies to the prosperity of M. Lamoureux's artistic venture. These concerts are entering a second season of success, and, considering who is their initiator and director, there is no reason why the high standard of excellence they have hitherto maintained should not make them a permanent institution. Long ago M. Lamoureux proved his inborn capacity as a conductor, and now he is generally admitted to be one of the most eminent conductors of the day. The same qualities that distinguished his orchestra a year since have been developed to an even greater degree of perfection—such as steadiness and unanimity, liveliness, "go,"* with, at the same time, extreme finish and delicacy of execution; and this result is directly traceable to the rigid discipline enforced by a leader eminently endowed with that aforesaid inborn capacity. The programmes are in every respect well arranged, with a liberality of spirit which excludes no kind of good art. Of this the programme of the last concert was a fair instance. We were given the Italian Symphony, an air from Alceste, fragments of Manfred, Beethoven's First Concerto, a very interesting excerpt from Berlioz's Beatrice et Benedick, and, to finish, the overture to Rienzi. The performance of Mendelssohn's deliciously magnificent and genially glorious Symphony was from one end to the other irreproachable, and it would be difficult to say which of the four movements received the finest interpretation. After the opening bars of the andante, the audience, by an irresistible impulse of admiration, nearly interrupted the music. Immediately following Mendelssohn's Symphony, "Divinités du Styx" sounded somewhat rococo. Howbeit Gluck's air was exceedingly well declaimed by Mdme Brunet Lafleur.

The Manfred music scarcely had the same justice that was rendered to the great symphony, insomuch as the overture was taken at a faster pace than is the prevailing use. At the end of Manfred a curious incident occurred. The invariable custom of a Parisian audience is to demand an encore for the "Apparition de la fée des Alpes," the last of the four fragments. But on the other hand M. Lamoureux, having evidently set his face against the vicious "encore" system, refused to obey the noisy demonstration of the galleries. If any piece of music can bear repetition assuredly this delicious fancy of Schumann's can, being, if anything, too short, and it is unfortunate that the battle should have been waged over anything so beautiful. But M. Lamoureux opposed an obstinate indifference to the vociferations which began to assail him on all sides, and the issue was doubtful, till suddenly there was a great commotion in the top gallery, and an excited young man, personally addressing the conductor, cried out with a loud voice "Monsieur Lamoureux, on veut mettre un monsieur à la porte parce qu'il crie 'bis!'" This settled the question, the indignant uproar that ensued obliging M. Lamoureux to yield, and the disputed "Apparition" was played again, to the intense delight of the large majority.

When, as presently, the Berlioz duet was encored, some of the audience groaned in spirit, but they had brought it on their own heads, and it served them right.

The original intention had been that Mdme Montigny-Rémaury should introduce a concerto by Gernsheim, spoken of as very interesting; the orchestral parts, however, having been delayed in transmission from Germany, Beethoven's Concerto in C major was cheerfully substituted, and the great pianist's performance of that work needs no criticism. Besides, I believe you, in London, have had an opportunity of appreciating it. She has the work absolutely at her fingers' ends, alike in abstract and in concrete; it was, therefore, by no means surprising that Mdme Montigny should achieve a veritable success. But the ovation that crowned her performance on this occasion was an absolute triumph; and though, like a true artist, she prefers satisfying her own artistic conscience to merely winning so much hand-clapping from the public, the enthusiasm she created cannot but have gratified her. The combined beauty and brilliancy of her play were never more conspicuous.

Mdlle Roch was associated with Mdme Brunet Lafleur in the duet from Berlioz's little opera, which, as I have already stated, obtained an encore. This duet is truly one of the most pleasing examples of Berlioz in his happiest mood.

The concert came to an end with Wagner's Rienzi overture. It could not here be said, "Finis coronat opus," for the overture, though full of power, is not one on which admirers of the mighty modern master are most wont to dwell with complacency. But its strenuous clamour was not ill calculated to lead people to the quest of cloaks and umbrellas. When will audiences learn to sit a concert out to the end? There are no signs of such a desirable consummation. Anyhow, till that time comes, music like the Rienzi overture may well continue to be placed as a kind of hardy bulwark at the stern of a programme.

CONCERTS.

THE Covent Garden Promenade Concerts conclude their series this evening, but an "extra night" is announced for Monday. Recent performances have included selections of English music—instrumental and vocal—and a repetition of the popular and quaint music which had previously proved so attractive. The first-named occasions comprised a Pianoforte Concerto, by Mr E. Evans, introduced for the first time, performed by Mr Leipold, and conducted by the composer. As a young effort, the work is creditable, and holds out promise of better productions—another novelty having been a bright and pleasing Overture, by Mr E. Faning, entitled The Holiday. Other more familiar pieces made up the programmes, which, however, were but partially representative of English music. During the past week the skilful performances of Mdme Frickenhaus (pianoforte), and Miss Arma Harkness (violin) have been among the attractions, as well as the cornet playing of Mr Levy, and solos by other well-known performers.

THE Highbury Philharmonic Society (conducted by Dr Bridge) made a good commencement of their new season, when the programme comprised Herr Gade's dramatic cantata Psyche, and a miscellaneous selection. The cantata has already been fully noticed in our report of its first production at the recent Birmingham Festival, where, of course, it had the advantage of a grander rendering than is possible by a small suburban society. It was, however, on the whole, very creditably performed by the Highbury Institution, with a select orchestra and chorus, and Miss M. Williams, Mrs B. M'Kay, and Mr Bridson as principal solo vocalists. The miscellaneous selection included a cleverly-written overture by the late Sir John Goss. The Messiah is to be given by the society on the 18th December.—D. N.

SCHUBERT SOCIETY.—The last public Soirée of the sixteenth season of this society (for the introduction of young rising artists) took place at St James's Hall on Friday, December 1st. Not less than eleven ladies and gentlemen, vocalists and instrumentalists, on this occasion made their début. The artists who took part, in addition to the members who made their first appearance, included the Countess Sussi, Mdmes Vogri, Zimari, Kean, English, Klein, and Burt; Messrs Rocca, Fritz, Cox, and Shepherd, &c. Herr Schuberth conducted. The hall was very full, and the audience highly appreciative. The two private soirées announced to take place on the 13th and 27th December will close the sixteenth, and one of the most successful seasons of this excellent society.

HACKNEY.—A "Welcome Home Concert and Entertainment" was given at Manor Hall, which attracted a full audience, on November 30. The concert was admirably gone through. Amongst the principal attractions were Mdme Reeves, who proved herself a most talented artist, playing Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata," receiving much applause, and singing Meyerbeer's "Robert toi que j'aime" (Robert le Diable), "Golden Days" (Wellings), and Wellington Guernsey's "O buy my Flowers" (encored); Mr Woods, who gave "The Old Brigade"—as well as Balfe's "Come into the Garden, Maud;" and Mr Plunket, in Henriette's admired ballad, "The King and I." Mdme Reeves also accompanied the vocal music.

THE soirée musicale of Mr Lansdowne Cottell's London Conservatoire of Music, given at the Principal's residence in Tavistock Square, on Tuesday, November 28, went off, as usual, with great spirit. The young students were all on their metal, "Excelsior" evidently being their motto. There was Miss Findlater in Signor Tito Mattei's "Psyche," Miss Catherine Taylor in Lysberg's "La Napolitana," Miss Hall in Lansdowne Cottell's popular "Sea song," Miss Mary Leary in Liszt's Tannhäuser, Miss Leonora Sorrell in Signor Tito Mattei's "Valse galop," and Mr George Sumpter in a fantasia on airs from J. F. Barnett's Ancient Mariner, all rising young pianists who vied with each other in obtaining the lion's share of the applause, applause so equally distributed that they must have been very hard to please if not satisfied. In the second part of the programme there was Miss Clarina Haslewood in the adagio and allegretto movements from Beethoven's sonata in C, Op. 53, Miss Alice Gould in a transcription of Mr Lansdowne Cottell's "Westminster Bridge," Miss L. Chapman in Schubert's Impromptu in A flat, and Miss L. Rimanoczy in a nocturne by Ravina, entitled "Ines." These fair and youthful students also met with hearty applause, and ought also to have been satisfied with the approbation meted out to them. We have gone into such length with the pianists that we have no space left to record the doings of the vocalists, whose names, however, were Misses Gertrude Thilenberg, E. Conyngham, Vere de Vyne, and Mdme Allan Dobson; Messrs J. Betteley, J. Sisley, W. Dailly, Joseph Newbold, and George Aylmer. Solos on the flute were also played by Mr Colonieu, on airs from The Pirates of Penzance, (arranged Mr J. Radcliff) and Fra Diavolo (by Mr Sampson); and on the violin by Mr D. Brodolet. The accompanists named on the programme were Messrs F. A. Jewson, Robinson Irving, and Lansdowne Cottell.

PROVINCIAL.

EDINBURGH.—Sir Herbert Oakeley, Professor of Music, gave the first of this season's organ recitals in the Music Class-room, Park Place, on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 30. The body of the hall was crowded with students, and the reserved seats near the organ were occupied, as usual, by a select company present on invitation. The programme began with Luther's Choral for Advent, "Great God, what do I see and hear!" which Sir Herbert played with fine expression. Handel's sublime air and chorus, "O Thou that tellest," was next given, both parts coming out clear and tuneful, and displaying the rich tones of the instrument. After a prelude and fugue by Rink, a selection from Haydn's Symphony in C elicited much applause, while an Allegro cantabile of lovely character from a pianoforte sonata by Mozart was no less acceptable. Two examples of Beethoven, from early works, a gavotte by Bach, and the finale to Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, No. 3, made up a most enjoyable recital.—Daily Review.

NORWICH.—Mendelssohn's Elijah is announced for performance on Thursday evening next at St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich. The singers engaged are the Misses Robertson, Messrs Hirwen Jones and Lucas Williams, with Mr F. W. B. Noverre as leader of the band, Dr. E. Bunnett, organist, and Dr. Horace Hill, conductor. On Friday evening M. Alex. Guilmant will give an organ recital in the same locale.

WORCESTER.—The new organ, built by Mr Nicholson of Worcester, which has been presented to St. Mary Magdalene's Church by Colonel Johnstone, was opened on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 29, with a recital by Mr W. Haynes, Professor of Music at Malvern College. It has been erected in a chamber to the left of the chancel, and immediately opposite the pulpit. The following is a description of the organ:—

The organ has three complete manuals from CC to G, 56 notes; also separate pedal organ, CCC to F, 30 notes, containing the following stops:—

GREAT ORGAN—CC TO G, 56 NOTES.—Bourdon, wood and metal, 16 feet, 56 pipes; large open diapason, metal, 8, 56; violon diapason, metal, 8, 56; clarabella, wood, 8, 56; keraulophon, metal, 8, 44; principal, metal 4, 56; wald flute, wood, 4, 56; fifteenth, metal, 2, 56; mixture (4 ranks), metal, 224; preparation for trumpet.

SWELL ORGAN—CC TO G, 56 NOTES.—Bourdon, wood and metal, 16 feet, 56 pipes; open diapason, metal, 8, 56; Gamba and stop bass, metal, 8, 56; Lieblich gedact, wood and metal, 8, 56; voix céleste, metal, 8, 44; principal, metal, 4, 56; harmonic flute, metal, 4, 56; piccolo, wood, 2, 56; mixture (3 ranks), metal, 168; cornopean, metal, 8, 56; oboe, metal, 8, 44.

CHOIR ORGAN—CC TO G, 56 NOTES.—Dulciana, metal, 8 feet, 56 pipes; stop diapason, bass, wood, 8, 56; stop diapason, treble, wood, 8, 56; gamba, metal, 8, 44; flute, wood, 4, 56; piccolo, wood, 2, 56; cremona, metal, 8, 44.

PEDAL ORGAN—CCC TO F, 30 NOTES.—Open diapason, wood, 16 feet, 30 pipes; Bourdon, wood, 16, 30; principal, metal, 8, 30.

COUPLERS.—Choir to pedal; great to pedal; swell to pedal; swell to great; swell to choir; super-octave to pedal; three composition pedals to great organ; three composition pedals to swell organ; radiating pedals.

Large bellows with four feeders and double action.

In addition, it may be mentioned that the great organ comprises 660 pipes, the swell 704, the choir 312, and the pedal 90, making a total of 1,766 pipes.

A service was held in the evening, at which the late vicar, the Rev. C. H. Pilkington, preached. The choir was augmented for the occasion by members of St. Martin's and St. Stephen's, and comprised about sixty voices. There were processional and recessional hymns. The "Magnificat" and "Nunc Dimittis" were sung with spirit to settings by Mr Caleb Simper, the organist and choirmaster of the church, after which a collection was made in aid of the fund for defraying the expense incurred in the erection of an organ chamber. Mr E. J. Spark, organist of St. Martin's, presided at the organ during the service, at the conclusion of which a short recital was given by Mr Stanley James, organist of St Stephen's.

OXFORD.—On Wednesday evening, Dec. 29, the Choral Society gave a concert in the Corn Exchange, when Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed before a densely crowded audience. The soloists were Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington, Mdlle Enriquez, Mr Burgon and Mr Acott. Of the former it is hardly necessary to say that her dramatic delivery seemed to have lost but little of its former fire. Mdlle Enriquez took all her hearers by storm, and every one who heard her magnificent rendering of "O rest in the Lord" will admit that she achieved a triumph, and showed herself worthy to rank among the first of oratorio contralto singers. Her quiet, unaffected manner, and the absence of all airs and graces, add charm to her grand voice and fine declamation. Mr Burgon undertook the onerous part of Elijah, and, in the absence of Mr Vernon Rigby, Mr Acott, the tenor of Christ Church, took the "Ahab" music. The supplementary solos were allotted to local vocalists, who all acquitted themselves with success. The choruses went with spirit, especially "Thanks be to God." Mr C. H. Lloyd, Mus. Bac., held the bâton, and proved himself a most admirable conductor; he is a perfect musician, first-rate timeist, and evidently throws himself heart and soul into the work, so that the Choral Society have reason to congratulate themselves on the head and hand which are now conducting them to a fresh series of successes. Mr Burnett was, as usual, leader of the orchestra, which included many leading musicians of the University and city, as well as the young lady violinists who are now become recognized members of the band on these occasions.

BRIGHTON.—M. Voarino gave a concert in the music-room of the Royal Pavilion on Saturday afternoon, December 2, assisted by Mdme Dukas Van Noorden, Miss Gertrude de Lille, Messrs D'Arcy Ferris and Hayes (vocalists), Mdme Napoleone Voarino (pianoforte), Mr Beresford (violin), Mr Chas. Oberthür (harp), and Mdme de Naucaze (reciter). M. Voarino did not appear en artiste, but Mdme Voarino played, with success, a "Caprice de Concert," by Raff, a "Caprice" of her own composition, a Rondo, by P. Strada, joining M. Oberthür in his popular duet, for harp and pianoforte, on airs from Weber's Oberon. Among the other successful instrumental pieces were Vieuxtemps' "Fantasia appassionata" for the violin, capitally rendered by Mr Beresford; Mr Oberthür's Fantasia, for the harp, on airs from Martha, played by the composer so much to the satisfaction of the audience that he was compelled to return to the platform and give another of his admired solos, "La Cascade." During the afternoon Mdme de Naucaze "recited," both in French and English, and was honoured by a "call" at the conclusion. The concert, which was fully and fashionably attended, finished with a trio, "The Knights of the Cross" (Oberthür), entrusted to Miss G. de Lille, and Messrs D'Arcy Ferris and Hayes.

TAUNTON.—The first number of a monthly magazine has been just published in connection with the Independent College, which, it is anticipated, will do much good by developing the thinking powers of the students, who are, for the most part, the contributors, and at the same time retain the interest of old students in their alma mater. The publication is under the able editorship of the Principal, the Rev. F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc. In his brief introduction, Mr Aveling explains the scope and intention of the magazine. He says:—"It was suggested, not long ago, that the school should bring out a magazine, which should contain original articles by the pupils, and an account of what is being done in the class and in the playground. This proposal, originating with the boys, has been warmly received by all. The editor will receive articles in prose and poetry from present and from past students. Letters from 'old boys' now abroad, or studying at the Universities, or in art studios, will be inserted from time to time. It is hoped that a natural science column will be opened, and will contain useful and interesting information from past and present students concerning the physical sciences." Mr Thomas J. Dudeney will contribute a series of papers, entitled "Lives of Musicians," and the present number contains the commencement of a Biography of Professor Macfarren, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, London. Prizes will be given at the end of the year for the best poems and essays.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—A meeting of guarantors for the Festival was held in the Leeds Town Hall on Tuesday afternoon, the Mayor (Councillor Woodhouse) presiding. Mr Fred. R. Spark (hon. sec.) read a report, showing what had been done by the provisional committee. The new works already secured are King David, an oratorio by Professor G. Macfarren; Sardanapalus, a secular cantata by Mr Frederic Clay; and the "Ninety-seventh Psalm," by Mr Joseph Barnby. Signor Verdi, Herr Joachim Raff, and Herr Niels Gade were solicited to write works for the Festival. Signor Verdi, in reply, expressed his regret that he was unable to comply with the wishes of the committee. He had almost entirely given up writing, and above all he could not undertake anything which would oblige him to write within a definite time. Herr Gade replied that his engagements were such as to prevent his writing anything new for the Festival, however much he should like to do so. With Herr Joachim Raff the committee began a correspondence early in this year, and whilst negotiating for the production of his recently completed oratorio, The End of the World, Judgment, and the New World, the death of the composer unhappily took place. A letter received from his widow stated that her husband had made up his mind, if his work were completed, to attend the performance at Leeds personally, and this occasion she added, would have been his first visit to England. The report was unanimously adopted, and fifty gentlemen were elected on the general committee. The guarantee fund now reaches £17,000, nearly double the amount subscribed at the corresponding period for the previous festival.

BIRMINGHAM.—The third of Mr S. S. Stratton's "popular chamber concerts" was given at the Masonic Hall on Monday evening, December 4th. In accordance with his usual regulations, Mr Stratton's programme contained works by classical masters of our own and other countries, with one example by a living English composer, viz., a quartet in B flat for stringed instruments, by Mr Ebenezer Prout, a work—says the Birmingham Gazette—"characterised by beauty of theme and symmetry of form. The first and third movements display more originality perhaps than the second and fourth, but, as a whole, the piece is among the finest compositions which Mr Stratton has brought forward. The performance was admirable, and every movement met with genuine applause." The second piece was Beethoven's sonata in G, (No. 3 of Op. 30) for pianoforte and violin, played by Messrs T. Troman and F. Ward. Mr Troman afterwards gave the late Sir Sterndale Bennett's Capriccio, Op. 28, for pianoforte alone. This was followed by Schumann's pianoforte quartet in E flat, Op. 47, and the last piece in the programme was Beethoven's quintet in C major, Op. 29, capitally played by all concerned.

EXETER.—Miss Alice Roselli gave a "grand concert" on Tuesday evening, November 14, at the Victoria Hall, with the assistance of Mdme Enriquez, Messrs W. H. Cummings and Frank May (vocalists), Mr Carrodus (violin), M. Hollman (violoncello), and Signor N. Carozzi (pianoforte). The concert was one of the best we have attended at Victoria Hall, the excellence of the programme giving unmixed satisfaction. The concert began with the andante and allegro movements from Mendelssohn's trio in D minor, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, capitally played by MM. Carozzi, Carrodus, and Hollman. Amongst the most admired of the vocal pieces were Blumenthal's "Our Ships at Sea," which afforded Mdme Enriquez an opportunity of exhibiting the beauty of her rich contralto voice; Rossini's ever fresh and charming aria, "Una voce poco fa," so brilliantly rendered by Miss Roselli that she was called back to the platform with enthusiasm; and Blumenthal's famous song, "The Message," which Mr Cummings sang with so much expression that a unanimous "call" was the result. Then there was a charming duet (the composition of Miss Harriet Young), "In Sunny Spain," contributed by Miss Roselli and Mdme Enriquez, as well as "The Raft," by Pinsuti, which obtained for Mr Frank May a vociferous encore. In the second part of the programme Lucantoni's pretty duet, "Una notte a Venezia," was charmingly sung by Miss Roselli and Mdme Enriquez, and afterwards Miss Roselli gave Milton Wellings' new ballad, "Forget and Forgive," with consummate taste and genuine expression. We must not omit to mention the artistic way in which Mr Cummings gave his own pathetic ballad, "The love of long ago," re-demanded with acclamation, but Mr Cummings sang in place of it the favourite old ballad, "Sally in our Alley." Mr Carrodus created a furore by his splendid performance of Ernst's fantasia on airs from Rossini's Otello, and M. Hollman obtained great applause after his solos on the violoncello. There were many other successes during the evening, which want of space will not permit us to enumerate. The concert concluded with the quartet, "Dormi pur," from Flotow's Martha. Signor Carozzi accompanied the songs like a thorough musician, and the concert altogether gave unbounded satisfaction.

SHEFFIELD.—The visit of the Carl Rosa Opera Company to Sheffield is always welcome, and doubly so when, as last night, it was the means of presenting Beethoven's Fidelio with so accomplished an artist as Mdme Marie Roze in the title rôle. So far as we are aware, this is the first time Fidelio has been given in Sheffield, and thus it constituted an event of much interest. One of the choicest numbers in the opera is the quartet, "Within this panting breast," and Mdme Roze was heard to much advantage in it as well as in the trio, "Fear not my son," and in the recitative and air, "Remorseless Fiend." The scene in the dungeon occupies the whole of the second act, and it is in this act that Mdme Roze produced the highest dramatic effect. The minor characters were well sustained. Miss Clara Perry acquitted herself admirably as Marcellina. The Rocco of Mr Snazelle was excellent. Mr Ludwig made the most of a character which never finds favour on the stage, and Mr McGuckin, as Florestan, was heard to considerable advantage in the air, "Though I mourn my young hopes blighted." Mdme Marie Roze was called before the curtain at the close of the second act, a compliment which was repeated when the opera was concluded. Mr J. Pew conducted.

MANCHESTER.—M. De Jong's popular concert was not so fully attended as its merits deserved, owing to the very unfavourable weather. The principal singers were Mdmes Lemmens Sherrington, Enriquez, and Valleria, who delighted the audience by the beautiful style in which they respectively sang Beethoven's "A perfido," Mozart's "Voi che sapete," and the "Jewel Song" from Gounod's Faust. The band gave the overture to Otello (Rossini), the "Saltarella" from Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, a Russian Dance by Glinka, as well as a Waltz by Gungl and a Galop by Lumbye, all of which were highly enjoyed and heartily applauded.

LIVERPOOL.—A meeting of the Society of Professional Musicians was held on Saturday, Dec. 2nd, in the Union Hotel, Clayton Square. Mr J. C. Bridge, M.A., Mus. Bac. (Chester), presided, and there were also present Dr R. W. Crowe, and Messrs F. Haworth, J. J. Monk, W. D. Hall, and H. Grimshaw (Liverpool); Drs Hiles, Horton, Allison, and George Marsden, and Messrs J. Wrigley, John Marsden, W. J. Young, James Thorley, and C. Grundy (Manchester); Messrs T. S. Hill, and W. H. Hunt, Mus. Bac. (Birkenhead); Messrs James Dawber, Mus. Bac. (secretary), J. Mortimer, A. Alexander, and A. W. Newell (Wigan); Mr S. Myerscough (Rochdale), Mr Slater (Oldham), Mr J. M. Field (Bowdon), Mr R. B. Woodward (St Helens), Mr George Mellor (Blackburn), and Mr Hinchcliffe (Southport). The following declaration was then submitted by the council of the society and adopted:—"It is desirable that in England music should be re-instated in its old position as a branch of learning, and its cultivation again recognized as an important educational influence. The facilities for its study should therefore be largely increased and diffused.—1. By the systematic teaching in all large schools, public and private, of vocal music and the rudiments of the grammar of the science. 2. By classes in conveniently situated schools or public buildings for the practice of more important orchestral instruments. 3. By the further training in higher-grade schools of those students who in elementary classes have displayed talent. 4. By the establishment in our larger cities of colleges wherein every branch and detail of a musician's thorough education may be fully directed and matured. Drawing classes, aided by Government grants are now general throughout the country; schools wherein will be given scientific instruction in all technical matters will probably soon be opened in all suitable centres of large population, and attention is called to the advisability of stimulating and systematizing musical instruction. It is therefore of the greatest importance that a wise and well-considered scheme should be adopted, and the earnest co-operation of all musicians and lovers of music is sought, in order that the opportunity may not be wasted, and that, by the adoption not only in London, but throughout the kingdom, of the most advanced educational methods, a school of English music may be fostered and developed worthy of the traditions of the past." After which Dr. Horton Allison, of Manchester, read a lengthy but interesting paper on "The Registration of Teachers," in the course of which he said—"Teachers are one of the most important, if not the most important, section of the body of professional musicians, and as such may reasonably undertake and have entrusted to them any project for the amelioration of the condition or raising the status of the professional musician." A discussion followed the reading of the paper, and the subjoined resolution was carried unanimously, on the motion of T. S. Hill, seconded by Dr. Hiles:—"That it be an instruction to the Council of the Society of Professional Musicians to confer upon and submit to an early meeting of the society a scheme for bringing the subject of the legal registration of teachers of music before members of Parliament with a view to legislative action." Votes of thanks having been conveyed to Dr. Allison for his paper, and to Mr Bridge for presiding, the meeting came to a close. At the next meeting Mr J. J. Monk will read a paper on "The Compilation of Musical Directories."

The New York Chorus Society's first concert this season was to come off on the 6th inst. The others will be given on the 16th inst, on February 17th, and April 14th. At that on February 17th, scenes from Wagner's Parsifal will form part of the programme.

The romantic drama, Pluck, was given at Drury Lane on Saturday evening for the last time this season, having completed its hundredth night of representation on Wednesday last. The theatre will remain closed until Boxing-night, in order to allow time and space for the preparations for the Christmas pantomime.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

Mr John Boosey's Ballad Concert on Wednesday morning went off famously. The singers were Mrs Hutchinson; Misses Mary Davies, Clara Samuel, Fonblanque, and Damian; Messrs Edward Lloyd, Maybrick, and Santley. Miss Davies, on being called upon to repeat Molloy's "Little Match Girl," responded with "Only for One"; and Mr Santley, after "O ruddier than the cherry," favoured the audience with Hatton's "To Anthea." The new songs given were Mr F. Clay's "Courage, dear heart" (Mr Edward Lloyd), Marzials' "If only" (Miss Damian), Stephen Adams' "Sprung a Leak" (Mr Maybrick), and Molloy's "Kismet" (Mr Santley). The South London Choral Society sang the "Bridal Chorus" from Mr F. H. Cowen's Rose Maiden, Miss E. Philpa' "Hop Pickers," Sullivan's "Evening," Caldicott's "Jack and Jill," and Henry Leslie's "We roam and rule the sea." Mdme Norman-Néruda, the "Queen Violinist," played an Adagio by Spohr, as well as a "Sarabande" and "Tambourin" by Leclair, winning hearty applause and an encore for the last piece, which the accomplished artist responded to by playing another popular composition. Mr Sidney Naylor accompanied the songs with his well-known musical ability. Mr John Boosey announces that his next "Ballad Concert" will be given on Saturday morning, Jan. 6th ("Twelfth-Cake day"), when the singers are to be Misses Mary Davies, Agnes Larkcom, Damian, and Mrs Hutchinson; Messrs Edward Lloyd, Barrington Foote, Maybrick, and Santley. Mdme Norman-Néruda will be the violinist, Mdme Sophie Menter the pianist, the South London Choral Society will occupy their usual post, and Mr Sidney Naylor will be the accompanist.

BERLIN.—Having returned from Warsaw, Varesi has been singing at concerts with her usual success.

There is some talk of giving Hamlet and Mignon at the Teatro Rossini, Venice, during the Carnival.

The music composed by Dr G. A. Macfarren for the recent performances at Cambridge and Eton of the Ajax of Sophocles in the original language is everywhere highly spoken of. The distinguished occupant of the musical chair in Cambridge University is now busily engaged upon his new oratorio, King David, written expressly for the Leeds Festival of 1883.

The following "appeal" we extract from Lloyd's Newspaper, Dec. 3:—"Scarcely a day now passes without inquiries for lost relatives being sent us, and far more have come to hand this week than we can possibly deal with. Room must, however, be found for the following appeal of a mother:—'In the year 1874 I left in charge of a musician named Rice, living at Whitby, my daughter, then ten years of age, to be taught music and singing; but in 1877 he left that place, taking the child with him. Since that time I have not been able to gain intelligence of them, but believe them to be travelling in the north of England or Scotland. The girl (now eighteen) is named Alice Minns, but is supposed to be passing as his daughter, and called Alice Rice. If any of your numerous readers could give me any information that would lead to the recovery of my child, I should be truly grateful.—MARY A. MINNS.'"

THE MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—A distinguished and numerous audience assembled at the second meeting of the above association, on the 4th inst., to hear Signor Carozzi unfold the story of his several inventions for the aid of vocal students. Signor Carozzi delivered a well written paper dealing with the history of vocal art, its present condition, and its defects as compared with the excellence of former epochs. Great interest was evinced by the members of the association in making acquaintance with the many uses of Signor Carozzi's ingenious Ortophone and its adjuncts; it was clearly demonstrated that by its aid masters and pupils could ensure a proper position of mouth and tongue, and combining the Ortophone with the Teinomoro, a just and complete system of breathing, the foundation of all good singing. The length of Signor Carozzi's observations and explanations absorbed most of the time usually allotted by the society to discussion, but the value of Signor Carozzi's inventions was emphatically endorsed by the President in the Chair, Mr W. H. Cummings, whose practical knowledge as a vocalist and teacher entitled him to speak with authority. Dr. Lennox Brown also added his testimony to the excellence of Signor Carozzi's very clever inventions. It was understood that very shortly Signor Carozzi would be prepared to show other inventions for the use of students, which have already received commendation from the most eminent masters on the continent, and for which Signor Carozzi received diplomas granted at the Milan exhibition of last year.—A. CHERUBINI.

Despite of everything, and whatever may be the value of these reflections, it was evidently not the music of Epicure which the public of the Théâtre Favart had in view when they gave the work a reception, which, as the reader will see, was aught but encouraging. The first performance on the 23rd Ventôse, Year VIII. (14th March, 1800), was not followed by many others, and, moreover, in order to render the piece anything like endurable, it was necessary to re-cast it almost entirely, and cut out an act. One thing is certain, namely, that the spectators were in a very bad humour on the first night, which was marked by disturbances, cries for silence, protestations, and whistling, and that it was with much difficulty that the performance could be finished in the midst of unusual and regrettable noise. Epicure, with Solié in the leading part, was, nevertheless, well played and sung by all its interpreters: Chenard, Saint-Aubain, Paulin, Dozainville, Andrieu, Moreau, Allaire, Batiste, Mdmes Jenny Bouvier, Pingenet (sen. and jun.), and Quinebaud, but, in addition to the defects of the book, it must be observed that a work of this kind belonged to the Opera rather than to a comic-operatic stage, and that, despite the talent displayed by the excellent artists engaged in the performance, there were complaints that the piece had not been cast in a way to bring out the good qualities of all of them, and put each one in his proper place.

The Courier des Spectacles gives us a specimen of the incidents which troubled the performance:—

"If," it says, "the imperfections of a work are to be calculated by the signs of disapprobation on the part of the public, those in the book of Epicure are exceedingly numerous. . . . . These defects, which neither the elegance of the poetry nor the remarkable beauties of the music could palliate, were detrimental to the success of the piece, which, however, was played to the end, though with difficulty."

Sauvo, the critic of the Moniteur Universel, enters more into detail. Here is a fragment from the interesting article he dedicates to the subject:—

"The music of this opera is by two justly celebrated authors. It was not doubtless as an example to be followed that they exhibted their extraordinary talents combined for one composition. It was not to two authors that we owed Iphigénie, Alceste, Œdipe, and Didon; we might even add Stratonice and Lodoïska, were it necessary to bring their own authority to bear upon the two authors in the present instance by mentioning their own successes. Are we justified in expecting new masterpieces from such a partnership? No. The arts have a common object, the imitation of nature; but every artist has a manner of his own. The different parts of a work confided to two artists may be beautiful, but the work will be wanting in uniformity, in that homogeneous character conveyed by the expression: the stamp of the master, and it is difficult to believe that any work can be improved by this defect. There are some great beauties in this dual composition containing few songs, but many concerted pieces. The first duet, though, perhaps, too long, has some charming touches; the short air which follows is full of grace; the finale is too uniform in tone, and would probably be better appreciated sung in a buffo style; but there is in the work an admixture of the Comic and the Serious, of the Graceful and the Grotesque, which must puzzle those who have to define it, and consequently those who devote their talent to its representation. Epicurus's dream produced little effect; it is a piece which should be heard without our having to consider its merit with regard to the situation it occupies: the songs of the second act are full of warmth and bold touches; the only remarkable thing the third offers us is the first concerted piece, with which, we fancy, fault may be found on account of its defects of prosody. The first night was extremely stormy. There was no call for the authors. On the second, whether the tumult had frightened the peaceable spectators, or whether the first verdict was regarded as decisive, there were few persons present, but the authors were called for. They are citizens Dumoustier for the words, Méhul and Cherubini for the music. Solié, who sustained the part of Epicurus, acquitted himself with talent, and sang with grace. As for the other parts, though, in truth, of secondary importance, they are cast, we must say, in a manner little favourable to the work, which, after all, appertaining to the domain of the Opera, would there have found more ample means of execution, and placed within its authors' reach developments and accessories sufficiently pleasing to establish it as a pendant to Anacréon. It is not the first time that such an error has been fatal to lyrical theatres of the second class, but what special privileges can no longer command, will, doubtless, be commanded by interest and experience."

The failure of Epicure was quite an event in Paris, and the Gazette de France very gently reproached the public for their boisterous conduct on the occasion:

"It has long been observed," said the venerable publication, "that the actors of the Opéra-Comique are unfortunate whenever they attempt to assume the cothurnus; the Greek costume suits neither their figure nor their class of theatre. The opera of Epicure excited more noise than applause; it will, however, continue to be played. The music of Méhul and Cherubini, and passages evidently emanating from the author of Le Conciliateur, deserve to try more than once the taste of the public, who, we beg to say without offence, now take to the theatre the turbulence of which they have corrected themselves in political matters."

The second performance of Epicure took place on the 26th Ventôse, three days after the first, to a house three parts empty. This unsatisfactory circumstance induced Dumoustier to shorten the piece, so as to render it more lively. At the third performance, which came off on the 20th, the Courier des Spectacles, when announcing that Epicure had been given at the Théâtre Favart, stated that it was "reduced to two acts." This did not render the public much more favourable, and the work soon languished away.* It is as well to remark that, in reaching the poet, the storm passed harmlessly over the heads of the composers, to whom the critics generally were well disposed, though declaring they entertained small liking for collaboration in musical matters. The Année Théâtrale said on this subject:

"Méhul and Cherubini have not belied in the pieces with which they have enriched this work their brilliant reputation. The public recognized in the first act the original and brilliant manner of the author of Lodoïska, and in the second the learned touch, the sustained and harmonious style, of the author of Euphrosine. But as was generally observed at the performances, of which there were not many, Gluck was alone when, to use Piron's expression in speaking of his own works, he cast in bronze his Iphigénie en Tauride; he was alone when he found the accents of Armide and Alceste; two composers did not write Didon; Stratonice and Démophon are each due to only one great master. When two talented men unite their efforts, the details may be charming and the separate parts deserving of all our suffrages, but the whole is seldom satisfactory. The work is of two colours, the same style is not everywhere perceptible, and unity, the principle of all the imitative arts, is sacrificed to the innovation of a dangerous precedent."

I have discovered, however, one tartish note amid the concert of praise which greeted the work of the two musicians; it was struck by the Etrennes lyriques et théâtrales, indulgent for the librettist while severe on his collaborators:

"Four insignificant personages," says this publication, "opera-like scenes of magic, a hurried ending, the love of a young girl for old Epicurus, and the child's confession before the grave Areopagus, put the spectators in a bad humour and inclined them to laughter. It was time the piece finished when it did. Little interest but facility of versification; agreeable touches, but buffoonery for comedy: interest without interest, but a tolerably satisfactory development of the character of Epicurus, which is in itself pleasing—such, to our mind, are the beauties and defects of the work. The music is not the music for such a subject; it belongs neither to the buffo nor the terrible style, but makes an infernal noise, produces many orchestral effects, and multiplies difficulties—we do not know very well wherefore. Wishing to surpass each other, the two composers who wrote the music have offered us something scientific for trained ears; the audience were not likely to take this into account."

This is the only example I have found of a really surly criticism of the score. We saw above, from the account given by the Année Théâtrale, that the music of the first act was written by Cherubini, and that of the second by Méhul (they no doubt divided that of the third between them). The overture was, therefore, Cherubini's, and the following letter addressed by him to his friend Pleyel, the publisher, informs us that he himself undertook the pianoforte arrangement:—

"Here, my dear Pleyel, is the overture of Epicure arranged. I did my best, especially at the commencement, where the task of an arrangement was not easy. I have endeavoured to make it easy of execution, so that it may be played by all pianists, no matter what their strength.—If the duet is engraved, I should like to have some copies. May I beg you to make me a present of one or two romances. —Send me, please, news about your health; mine is still feeble.

* The bill on the first night of Epicure was completed by La Bonne Mère, a short comedy of Florian's.

This was the reason of my not sending you the overture sooner, because, being unwell, I have not been able to work these last few days. Adieu; my respectful compliments to Mdme Pleyel. Ever yours, with the esteem and consideration which are your due,

"CHERUBINI."

EXCERPTS FROM PARKE'S MUSICAL MEMOIRS.

EXCERPT No. 8.

1786.

In the year 1784, when the opera in three acts, called Robin Hood, was first produced at Covent Garden Theatre, it soon became very popular, and had a long run to overflowing houses. In consequence of the great success of this piece, the author of it, MacNally, then a briefless barrister of the sister kingdom, who had come to England to court Dame Fortune, but who had only become acquainted with her illegitimate sister, Miss Fortune, rose high in the favour of Mr Harris, the proprietor of that theatre. Mr Harris intending to bring out, this season, the favourite French musical piece called Richard Cœur de Lion, then performing with great success at Drury Lane Theatre, in the plenitude of his partiality he gave the copy of it to MacNally to translate and adapt it for the English stage. MacNally, who, though totally unacquainted with the French language, was, nevertheless, too poor to stick at trifles, employed a friend to put it into English for him; but, it proving altogether a lame production, it limped on for a few nights, but had no run. The following season Mr Harris revived Robin Hood at his theatre, in which a new singer named Bowden appeared in the principal character, Robin Hood. This performer's talent not being of any high order, the houses, which at the first production of the opera had been overflowing, were now miserably thin; on which an actor one night behind the scenes, observing the benches to be nearly empty, exclaimed, "Here's a wretched house!—Do ye call this Robin Hood?"—"No," replied Charles Bannister, "it is not Robbin Hood,—it's Robbing Harris!" This same singer (Bowden) had a remarkably prominent proboscis. He and some other vocalists of the theatre, being subsequently engaged to attend a public dinner, had appointed to meet at Williams's coffee-house in Bow Street, Covent Garden, situated on the spot where the entrance to the boxes now stands, where, having waited till the last moment for Bowden, they left the coffee-room to proceed to their destination without him. When they had got into the street, however, Bannister suddenly exclaimed, "Stop, stop! Bowden will be here in a minute or two, for I perceive that his nose has already turned the corner of Hart Street!"

This season I became an honorary member of the Anacreontic Society, and at the first meeting played a concerto on the oboe, as did Cramer on the violin. The assemblage of subscribers was as usual very numerous, amongst whom were several noblemen and gentlemen of the first distinction. Sir Richard Hankey (the banker) was the chairman. This fashionable society consisted of a limited number of members, each of whom had the privilege of introducing a friend, for which he paid in his subscription accordingly. The meetings were held in the great ball-room of the Crown and Anchor Tavern in the Strand, once a fortnight during the season, and the entertainments of the evening consisted of a grand concert, in which all the flower of the musical profession assisted as honorary members. After the concert an elegant supper was served up; and when the cloth was removed, the constitutional song, beginning, "To Anacreon in Heaven," was sung by the chairman or his deputy. This was followed by songs in all the varied styles, by theatrical singers and the members; and catches and glees were given by some of the first vocalists in the kingdom. The late chairman, Mr Mulso, possessed a good tenor voice, and sang the song alluded to with great effect. A curious circumstance occurred to that gentleman, whose person was by no means athletic. As he was walking down Southampton Street, Covent Garden, with a friend, a horse belonging to a hackney coach, waiting at a shop door, suddenly seized him by the arm, and with his teeth so severely gripped it, that, stimulated by surprise and pain, he, like another Milo, struck the animal on the head with his doubled fist with such force that it felled him to the earth as if he had been shot.

The above mentioned gentleman was a most agreeable companion, and had a happy knack of relating stories bearing on the circumstances in which he happened to be placed. The following is an instance.

"I was in a party a few years ago, in which there was a young gentleman who had recently returned from his travels. This traveller, like many of his fraternity, was 'rather too poetical in his prose,' related so many wonderful occurrences that the surprise he had at first excited was afterwards converted into ennui. In fact, he tired the company with his marvellous loquacity. Mr Mulso, who was present, being disgusted with his improbable narrations, and determined if possible to silence him, said to the young traveller, 'Pray, sir, are you acquainted with the mode in which they catch tigers in the East Indies?' Being answered in the negative, he added, 'Then, sir, I will inform you. The persons employed in that hazardous service go out for the purpose, armed only with a cork target and a wooden mallet, and when they discover one of those ferocious beasts preparing to spring upon them from amongst the jungle, they receive him on the cork target, which his long talons passing through, they clench them on the inside with the wooden mallet, and then lead him home quietly on his hind legs!'"

At the death of Mr Mulso, Sir Richard Hankey succeeded to the presidential chair. Sir Richard, with whom I had the pleasure of being intimate, was an accomplished musical amateur, and performed admirably on the oboe. He had been in the army, and had served with his regiment during the war in North America, where he was placed in a situation of great jeopardy. The commander of the English forces having hanged an American officer, who had been taken as a spy, the American general was so incensed that he determined to retaliate, and having several British officers prisoners, among whom was Sir Richard Hankey, he ordered that they should draw lots to determine which of them should suffer. The lot fell on Captain Asgill, son of Sir Charles Asgill the banker; but the unjust sentence being from some cause delayed, he was saved by the humane interference of Maria Antoinette, consort to Louis the Sixteenth of France.

This society, to become members of which noblemen and gentlemen would wait a year for a vacancy, was by an act of gallantry brought to a premature dissolution. The Duchess of Devonshire, the great leader of the haut ton, having heard the Anacreontic highly extolled, expressed a particular wish to some of its members to be permitted to be privately present to hear the concert, &c.; which being made known to the directors, they caused the elevated orchestra occupied by the musicians at balls to be fitted up, with a lattice affixed to the front of it, for the accommodation of her grace and party, so that they could see without being seen; but, some of the comic songs not being exactly calculated for the entertainment of ladies, the singers were restrained; which displeasing many of the members, they resigned one after another, and a general meeting being called, the society was dissolved.

The King's Theatre opened for the season on the 23rd of December, with the serious opera of Alceste. The music, which was entirely new, was by Gresnich. In this opera Rubinelli and Mdme Mara delighted the audience, who bestowed on them the most unbounded applause.

On Advent Sunday afternoon, December 3, Mr N. Dumville, senior "Singing Man" on the foundation of the Manchester Cathedral, sang for the twenty-first time "Comfort ye my people," from The Messiah. Few can record that for 21 years, on the same day each year, without interruption, they have sung the same air.

The Alhambra Theatre, which took fire early on Thursday morning, is now a wreck, nothing remaining but the ornamental doorway, the minarets, and the central dome. Eight houses at the back were destroyed, as well as the Turkish baths and Messrs Riviere and Hawkes' music warehouse immediately adjoining. It is stated that the fire broke out in the balcony, and the resident fireman had difficulty in making his escape. Two of the fire brigade men were seriously injured, and lie in a very critical condition. At present the loss is estimated at quite £150,000. Orders, it is announced, have already been given for the immediate re-erection of the building.

"Out of Town is the comprehensive title of a set of eight humorous part-songs, for mixed voices, with optional accompaniment, composed by Walter Maynard, and published by Duncan Davison & Co., Regent Street. They all have a spice of the pastoral element, but are not so easy as to incur the risk of being despised by practised part-singers. No. 4, 'Beware of the Bull,' is a live'y trifle, and another of the more taking numbers is 7, 'The Picnic,' descriptive of the opening of the hamper, the spreading of the banquet beneath the trees, and the incursion of wasps, the male voices imitating the buzz of the objectionable insect by repeating the word 'Zum.'"—Daily Chronicle.

"Out of Town.—Well worthy of their title are Out of Town, a set of humorous part songs for mixed voices, by Walter Maynard, who has done most wisely in stating that 'the right of performance is not reserved.' No. 1, 'A Glimpse of the Pastoral,' expresses pity for all who are compelled to stay in town during summer time; Nos. 2 and 3 are adapted to melodies from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream, the one called by the same title, the other, 'The Charms of Rural Life,' to the sprightly air known as 'The Clown's Dance.' No. 4 will cause p'enty of laughter and fun, 'Beware of the Bull' is its title; both words and music are well suited for a Christmas festive gathering. There is a mock gravity about No. 5, 'In the Woods,' which will also provoke mirth, if not quite so boisterous as its predecessor. No. 6, 'On the Water.' No. 7, 'The Picnic,' in which a very good effect is introduced by the male voices imitating the buzzing of a wasp; and No. 8, 'Good Bye,' are equally funny in their way. We can most cordially recommend this amusing volume to our readers for Christmastide."—Graphic.

Out of Town.—"Taken altogether it is a very rare specimen of light, but yet classical, music. The partition of voice parts is clever, and has the great advantage of being simple, so that the pieces can be got up without difficulty, even by amateurs. The first piece, 'A Glimpse of the Pastoral,' is taken from Beethoven's beautiful Pastoral Symphony, in which the great master so dexterously carries you into the sounds of country life that you might almost imagine yourself strolling with him through his loved favourite groves of Währing. The close of this movement takes you by a clever modulation from F to B flat, and hushes you into a dream, taken from the Midsummer Night's Dream of Mendelssohn. This is a celebrated gem. No. 3, 'The Charms of Rural Life,' again borrows from Mendelssohn the Harvest Dance, and is cleverly partitioned for the voice quartet. No. 4, 'Beware of the Bull,' shows what Walter Maynard can do in original composition, and, though not the best of the set, exhibits literary and artistic capacity, being eminently dramatic. Nos. 5 and 6, 'In the Woods' and 'On the Water,' are very pretty specimens of 'Imitation' style, and are very effective. No. 7, 'The Picnic,' is a very jolly glee, opening in a minor strain, it quickly dashes into a major tone, then takes the character of a chanson à boire, and finally ends with a pretty scene imitating a wasp humming, such as a picnic party might meet on their outing. No. 8, 'Good Bye,' is a joyous leave-taking, ending in a rather sentimental strain, reminding you of 'Home, Sweet Home.' The entire collection is very clever, quite popular, and yet classical."

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. EDINBURGH UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY.*

Sir Herbert Oakeley speaks.

"As the objects of this meeting may not be known to all present, it seems well to commence this Annual Report by stating them. We wish to re-establish and get into working order our University Musical Society, and for 12 years past it has been the custom at this time to hold a general meeting of those interested in the matter, as a sort of overture to our programme for the session. It is advisable to glance at what has been done since last November, to ascertain the state of our funds, to elect office-bearers, and to fix the time of practising. For the information of new-comers I may as well read our rules:"

(Ten rules here read.)

"To these ten rules a resolution from the Sederunt Book of March 25, 1880, should be supplemented as rule II,—'The Committee agreed to recommend that in future when any member of the Committee (not being the Secretary or Treasurer of the Society) shall have ceased to be a matriculated student of the University of Edinburgh for a period of two years, and shall also have ceased to give the Society any active assistance, his name shall be removed from the Committee, and that he be made an honorary member of the Society." Having referred to these matters for the benefit of fresh-men here, I wish to express a cordial welcome to those who have joined in preceding years, and to those I last saw before me on a memorable occasion eight months ago when they promised, in chorus, to 'Tak' a cup o' kindness yet, for auld langsyne.' Though all these choralists can never again be present, and already between some of us and them 'seas braid hae roar'd,' it is to be hoped that a considerable number of them, and also an unprecedented quantity of new members, may this winter combine in forming the best Students' Chorus we have had. It is neither the place nor the occasion for allusion to changes and chances at home and abroad which have occurred since we last met, my glance at passing events being from a musical point of view; although, in regard to heroic scenes enacted abroad, perhaps no more inspiriting theme to a musician could be found, if he were fortunate enough to be supplied with words—say by the author of 'Alma Mater' (Professor Maclagan)—than the dash of the Highlanders at Tel-el-Kebir. But the changes in this Society seem great this session—more members having left, and more apparently coming to the University than usual. Already 2915 are enrolled, or 94 more than this day last winter. New-comers may infer that the increase augurs well for our numbers, but old stagers have observed, with curiosity if not with disappointment, that it does not always follow that a proportionate number of matriculations is reflected by a corresponding increase of enrolments in the Musical Society. For instance, in the session before last, 1880-81, with 3160 matriculations, we had 247 members—or rather less than a twelfth of the whole of the students. Last session, with 3269 students, our numbers were 185—less than one-seventeenth of the matriculations. It is, moreover, curious to note, as I have previously done here, that in the case of a sister University, 150 students, or one-fifth, have joined their choral association. Supposing we have this winter as many as last winter—3269—according to Aberdonian rules of proportion we ought to have about 650 members on our roll, or nearly the numerical strength of the Aberdeen students. Some consolation may be elicited in regard to discrepancy in this matter between two Scottish Universities by considering that not only would so large a chorus be very difficult to manage, but that the 650 members, each with a friend's ticket, and including the other admissions we give away, would amount to about 1400, a number which would just fill the Music Hall in every part, and thus leave, as we sang last year, 'no space for receipt of a fly,' indeed no chance of 'receipts' at all.

"But though our chorus is not so numerous as might be wished, there is encouragement, not only in looking back on what has been done by them under circumstances presenting real difficulties, but in perceiving each year some advance in musical taste and skill throughout the country generally. It should not be forgotten that until quite recently here the mere putting, or even adapting a melody to words, or of words to a melody, seems to have been considered evidence of existence of much musical cultivation. Now there is a craving after higher things, and the real art which was brought to perfection by great Teutonic masters seems to be making way and to be sought after in the larger towns of Scotland. Now operas and concerts are not generally considered wicked, nor oratorios profane, and the highest development of the art, orchestral music, is each year more appreciated,—that is, pure and absolute music untrammelled by words, which tells its glorious and mysterious story, to those who can hear it, with greater depth and power than music which is only a handmaid, or sometimes, as in these latter days, a mere slave to other arts with which it is associated. It is, indeed, not unfrequently asserted that the resources of pure instrumental music are exhausted, and that even a Beethoven seemed to admit this from his introduction of a chorus into part of his last symphony—an introduction evidently merely experimental or for the sake of variety,—and had he lived to finish his tenth symphony it would probably have been, like all his others excepting No. 9, without chorus. The assertion alluded to is disproved by some great orchestral works which have been composed since Beethoven, and even in our own times. And those who thus take a low estimate of musical development seem unable, as might be expected, to produce music not dependent on words, or on a given subject, or on some dramatic situation, or dependent on 'orchestral effects'; they cannot, in fact, successfully give us a symphony, or a sonata, or a string-quartett, those pure forms left us by the great masters as things of beauty and joys for ever. The theories of the modern party to which I refer seem retrogade, not progressive, and would take us back to the 'earliest development of music among the ancient Greeks, when the art was still in a position of tutelage to its more developed sister arts, Poetry and Dancing, and independent instrumental music was quite subordinate.' But, returning from somewhat of a digression, I think it may fairly be said that the production of pure and unalloyed music is greater evidence of national pre-eminence in that art than the production of music allied either to poetry or to any fine art. 'Music is indeed strong to aid and second poetry through retaining, not through surrendering, inherent strength and beauty.' The growing appreciation here of orchestral music, which is so satisfactory to notice, might be expected sooner or later in a land so long renowned for love of Song, a love which may be taken as an indication of susceptibility to, or capability for the more developed art so highly cultivated by some other nations, and high promise is thus given for the musical future of this part of the kingdom. Those who have been here even as long as I can bear witness to the rapid improvement and to the enlightened views on music which have taken place. When the first tolerably efficient band had been heard here in 1867, a local journal remarked that the occasion might be said to be 'the first on which Edinburgh had heard an orchestra.' Two years later when, thanks to General Reid, Hallé's band was imported here, great orchestral works were at last adequately heard in Scotland, and from that time, musical appetite having been whetted, each year has shown further appreciation. Various associations have aided in the encouragement, cultivation, and practice of good music. A leading Society, not satisfied with promulgating a love for choral music whence its name is taken, has laudably co-operated with its sister union at Glasgow in securing also for Edinburgh a series of orchestral concerts, which were last year more successful and are this year more numerous than ever. Even the rare feature of amateur orchestral societies is here found, of which the principal one has this winter over sixty players, including no less than thirteen violoncellos—until lately an unusual instrument in Scotland—and even a couple of amateur trombonists. This useful society has for some years given three creditable concerts each winter, and has often assisted University concerts. Leith also forms or resuscitates an amateur orchestral union this year. Other musical associations which have sprung up here during the last decade of years might be specified and eulogised, but enough will have been said on this head to show you that a strong desire towards musical improvement exists in Scotland; and that while there is reason for thankfulness on the part of those who have striven for such a result, there is also a lesson to be learned by our Students' Society, rough and changing as its members will always be,—namely, that it must, so far as it can, keep pace with the times, and a high standard must be aimed at, though it may not be reached, owing to circumstances over which there is no control.

"The advance in matters musical, though, as has been shown, especially marked and rapid here as contrasted with a few years ago also continues farther south. If no striking or original genius has lately astonished the world, a growing love for the art is shown by the increase in Continental countries, as well as in England and in our Colonies, of all phases of musical associations. Many an athenæum, museum, club, or even mechanics' institute has a choral society, and the first and most elevating of all recreations is now found to be eminently beneficial to working men. To take the latest instance which has come under my notice in an article in a well-known Review, entitled an 'Alsacian Manchester,' in which the writer, after alluding to the advantage of knowing something of the life and training of continental workmen, and of considering whether they may not live and work under conditions more favourable to productive power than our own artizans, gives a remarkable account of the admirable and comprehensive system of general care and training of mind and body provided by masters and merchants for their employés and their employés' families at the manufacturing town chosen for illustration, namely Mulhausen, in Alsace. And in a long list of schools, colleges, museums, and cercles of almost every description, it is shown that in the Cités Ouvrières music is not forgotten as a great agent or lever in the training even of mechanics and artisans. But there are instances nearer home, in Lancashire and Yorkshire, of something of the same kind; and the necessity of bringing recreation within the reach of the working classes generally is almost everywhere more and more recognized. Another evidence of the attention given to the subject is shown by the attempt to establish a National School of Music in London, on the excellent system of foreign conservatoires, which ought here, as abroad, to elicit musicians.

* Twelfth Annual Meeting, Nov. 28, Sir H. Oakeley in the chair.

Digitized by Google

"It may be noted that at the autumnal musical festivals in England an oratorio by a great French composer has been produced, and will soon be heard here, and that several works by native musicians have been brought forward. Amongst these is one by a native of Edinburgh who has often led the violins at our concerts, and who, though inadequately appreciated here, for 'Propheta in sua patria honorem non habet' is, in the opinion of those competent to judge, making his mark in the far wider field in which he is now working, reflecting credit on the thorough German training he received from his boyhood.

"It will be expected that some allusion to our tercentenary celebration should be made in addressing the University Musical Society this session. But I am not in a position to give you the first, and to us a very important point, namely, its date. A committee meeting has been held, but we came to no decision, and I am therefore obliged to defer giving you information on the matter. I may, however, say that the event is not likely to occur so soon as some of us had anticipated, and that it need not, I think, cause us this session to alter our arrangements either for practising or for the annual concert.

"The mention of practising reminds me to allude to a new difficulty which presents itself this winter, regarding the afternoon of Fridays. The great reason for choosing that time two years ago was that there was then no anatomical demonstration, and thus many could attend here who could not do so any other afternoon. But it appears that this session Dr Chiene has a lecture, very numerously attended, at four on Fridays. Therefore, unless this can be altered, which I fear is unlikely, our time must be changed. And if so, we seem driven back to an evening practice. I am aware of the great difficulty most of you find in giving up an evening; but there may be no alternative, and, after all, the Society for eight years used to practice here on Monday evenings, and there is no doubt whatever that members can then give far greater attention than at a time which seems about the very worst, for physical reasons—I mean after a day's work, and before dinner—for grinding at a musical mill. But this is only the opinion of a Doctor of Music, who speaks under correction in the presence of Doctors of Medicine. It was decided in committee to hold the first practice, with enrolment and trial of voices, to-morrow afternoon, at a quarter past four, as usual, and then to consider whether Wednesday evening might do, instead of Friday afternoon, for the future.

"To add a few practical remarks to a Society in which I have always taken the deepest interest:—In the present stage of musical advance, to which allusion has been made, no educated person with a fair voice, able to 'turn a tune,' should be quite unable to take a part in simple part-singing. The various registers of voices, including bass and tenor, have been created so entirely different, in quality and pitch, that it may fairly be inferred that they were so created for combination—for Divine harmony, or 'order, Heaven's first law,' rather than for being all used together in unison, by which use the particular characteristic of each register is missed. Many voices, scarcely worth the arduous cultivation and practice necessary for solo-singing, are quite good enough to be useful and agreeable in part-music. Many of you, working hard to acquire the knowledge necessary for various learned professions, have little time to spare; but, after all, life is not merely professional, or its whole object to gain funds or fame. Of much importance, also, are the antidotes to labour found in harmless relaxations and elevating recreations, to which I have been referring, and which, moreover, contribute to make society brighter, happier, and more cultivated. If this is so, it is scarcely possible to mention any agent more valuable for these purposes than part-singing—easily acquired by you, but curiously difficult to acquire as life goes on. For, as a rule, in Britain, it has to be acquired. We have not yet nationally the musical instinct that causes the youths of a German village to march through it after their working hours singing their Lieder, in three or four-part harmony, which they seem able to supply by the light of nature; or, as may be heard in Norway, a militia regiment making their camp gay of an evening with their harmonized national songs. Or, as I lately heard at Venice, a chorus, containing specially splendid tenor voices, singing in the palatial hall of the hotel a selection of melodies, to which the accompaniment, as if instrumental, was made; giving the idea of improvisation, in chorus. But it requires but a little painstaking to place yourselves, at least, on a level of providing a source of pleasure to others at home and in society. One or two hours in the week may surely be spared from severer work for a pursuit, not unpleasant in the present, and securing such advantage in the future. I would further remind you that as soon as the craft of part-singing is attained, a door is opened admitting to a treasury of beautiful things in the realm of vocal music—to madrigals, glees, part-songs, and choruses. Much is thought and said now in Scotland about improvement of Church music; but, perhaps, the first step towards such improvement is a wide-spread taste amongst the people, 'the laity,' for harmony, and their ability to sing in parts. If the masses generally understood, and therefore better liked artistic music, they would insist on higher aims and greater cultivation in ecclesiastical music—so long here neglected in respect to its rendering as well as its composition.

"I hope that a large accession of new members may aid in making appreciation of choral music more national. There are, I am thankful to know, some amongst you who, beyond the initiatory stage of having rudiments to learn, can read part-music with some facility. These I would beg to have patience with beginners, and not to desert their University Musical Society because they find it irksome to be held back by the tardier gait of less experienced new-comers. It is doubtless more amusing to sing with those as advanced as themselves, and I would not say a word against their doing so, but they may bear in mind, especially if they only have time for one musical society, that in this one they are really useful, as being the greatest helpers to beginners, and are also most valuable and reliable aiders at the concert, seriously handicapped, as it always is, by the annual difficulty of loss of some of the best singers, as year after year they quit the University. It is most gratifying to learn from some members in our society that last year some two-thirds of another students' musical club here were also members of this society, and also that this year many of the pieces learnt here are in the programme of a coming students' concert. Thus, any other students' musical society here is an offshoot from the original; and that ours should have ramifications in directions to suit all musically inclined, widens our sphere, and aids our main object of diffusing a taste for choral music amongst students.

"And, from a University point of view, I would add a few words. With full appreciation of this noble University, with its deep and wide-spread educational advantages, and illustrious for the roll of great men who have taught or studied in its class-rooms, I may be excused, if, as an Oxonian, I miss one stirring enthusiasm which to a greater extent animates the English Universities, namely, esprit de corps—the corporate feeling which makes 'Alma Mater' a name with an inspiring charm to the end of life.

"Therefore, I think, everything that brings you together as students of this great University—and you ought to feel connected by that tie—everything that contributes to a feeling of fellowship, or camaraderie, or brotherhood, should be encouraged and cherished. And, perhaps, nowhere do we find a better occasion for the manifestation of such fellow-feeling and sympathy as at our annual concert. I have frequently said how proud I feel of our students when I see them before me at that concert. Indeed, the scene is one which, to any member of Senatus, should give gratification, for I question if on any other occasion our students show before the public to better advantage. The music indulged in is at least of a higher order than that to which we are sometimes favoured by a larger and less taught chorus of you elsewhere. The last excellent concert gave more general satisfaction than any previous one of the kind. Many letters of congratulation reached me, as well as others who were present. We were fortunate with soloists as well as with chorus, and I shall be delighted if we do as well next March. Sed etiam meliora speravimus.

"I think that the treasurer's report will show a satisfactory state of our funds; for, although we had last winter sixty-two members less than the previous year, representing a deficit in subscriptions of £15 10s., our total balance in hand does not seem to have suffered to that amount. The costs and receipts of concerts must, of course, vary from year to year, but the society must be gratified to know that, notwithstanding such variations, we have been able, the last four years, to give four excellent concerts without drawing on our funds. Thus those four concerts have cost altogether £486, and have brought us £490, so that they are absolutely gain instead of loss to our funds. And it should not be forgotten that future expenses are likely to be diminished rather than increased. For, during the last ten years or so, we have acquired a large and unique collection of music arranged as well as composed for men's voices, including accompaniments of full orchestral scores, most of which belongs to the society. Upon this collection we can draw the more frequently as it increases and as time goes on. And besides annual fees for valuable instruction to our chorus-master, and also to our librarian and custos, and including, too, an elementary class free to members, the hire of a pianoforte, and other annual expenses, we have been able to give some aid to a Musical Society at an older sister University—which is without many of our advantages, and, indeed, has a struggle for its existence; and this winter I hope you will sanction a donation to the low funds of our Athletic Club, to which this Society owes co-operation in its early days. I do not think, therefore, that any anxiety should be felt, even if the subscription funds were slightly trenched on, so as to do a little more with our balance; for instance, by securing a still more effective orchestra at the concert, when I have sometimes felt the want of more and better wind instrumentalists. £ s. d. often enters too much into matters musical. Here our very moderate subscription of 5s. proves sufficient for our moderate expenses. We have something laid by to meet a rainy day, or a rainy concert night, and an increase, say of 100 members, would probably place us beyond fear of deficit. But I must not trespass on the ground of our excellent treasurer, without whose care, prudence, and trouble for many years, our accumulated balance might have been less than it is to-day—and my allusion to 'the needful' is only suggestive of a liberal principle on which, I think, our society now might act. Nor will I delay you longer to talk about music. I would rather remind you of the old German classification of the arts under the forms or species—the 'bildende,' or constructive and representative, and the 'sprechende,' or speaking arts. To the former belong painting, sculpture, and architecture; to the latter, besides poetry and the drama, is assigned music. Music has her own and her universal language, and speaks most eloquently for herself. Only those who frequently listen to music, and, still more, those who make music, know anything really of her, or can approach her shrine. Gentlemen, I will always do my best to aid you in making acquaintance with music more worth listening to than any amount of prelections on an art which is not only itself 'sprechende,' but which, without irreverence, is called 'divine.'

Mr Small, honorary treasurer, submitted his annual financial statement, showing that the society began last year with a balance of £206 18s. 3d.; that the income of the year had been £391; and the expenditure £200 10s.; leaving a balance of £191 7s. 8d.

Professor Rutherford and Sir George Warrender also addressed the meeting, the last named concluding by requesting Sir Herbert Oakeley to play on the organ, and after two pieces had been performed, the proceedings terminated with hearty cheering.—(Condensed from "The Edinburgh Courant.")

NOVELTY THEATRE.

On Saturday night this theatre opened its doors to the public for the first time, and received within its walls a curious and somewhat demonstrative audience. The Novelty may be regarded as standing without the bounds enclosing the peculiar domain of London theatres; yet its position, nearly opposite the Freemasons' Tavern, is but a little way from our two greatest houses, and enjoys the advantage of being easily accessible from all quarters. The architect, moreover, has taken pains to provide as far as possible for the comfort of those who do not consider Great Queen Street too remote. A spacious vestibule, a foyer of unusual dimensions—to be utilized also for the display of pictures—and a fair measure of lobby and passage room, are advantages which the public will readily appreciate, as they will Mr Verity's provision of two exits from every part of the house. The decorations are liberal and, for the most part, in good taste, while as to the auditorium, if exception may be taken to the pillars necessitated by very deep "circles," comfort, as well as a combination of chasteness and richness in adornment, is unquestionable. Room has been provided for 1,000 persons, and not room only. Frequenters of the pit and amphitheatre will find their seats separated and numbered, so that they may be secured in advance; the attendants are forbidden to accept fees; programmes are distributed free of charge, and, by way of absolute novelty, opera glasses are lent on the same terms to the occupants of the stalls, boxes, and dress-circle. Clearly, if the public are not drawn to the new theatre, the reason cannot lie in want of considerate treatment.

The house opened with a new comic opera, in three acts, entitled Melita; or, the Parsee's Daughter, libretto by Juba Kennerley, music by Henry Pontet. As neither of these authors can boast more than a nodding acquaintance with fame, the management relied not upon their reputation so much as upon their work. We regret our inability to see where the reliance comes in. The play is a crude, amateurish composition, with no adequate dramatic motive, very little incident, and scarcely anything that deserves to be called character. In construction it is a three-fold quartet, with a low comedian obbligato. There are four Parsee maidens who want to be married; four British officers who are willing to marry them; four outraged Parsee fathers eager to "forbid the banns," and an Irish sentry to help in the comic business. As for the incidents, they are these: first, Captain Melville, the lover of Melita, rescues her from drowning, and obtains from her father, Jamsetjee, the entrée of himself and comrades to the Parsee's "palatial bungalo"; secondly, the four British officers drug the four Parsee fathers in order to carry on with the four Parsee daughters, but the parents "come to" inconveniently early and expel them from the house; thirdly, Captain Melville marries Melita secretly, and takes boat for England in the nick of time, Jamsetjee storming from the shore, while the remaining Parsee fathers triumphantly rescue the remaining Parsee maidens from the residue of the British officers. This in substance is the play. The details call for no more than two remarks. In the dialogue broad farce is interlarded with stilted sentiment, and in such development of character as offers itself may be observed a curious gravitation towards intense seriousness, checked now and then by spasmodic attempts at burlesque. It is as though a clown had to force his jokes through a thick stratum of something on his mind. Thus the Parsee fathers are essentially a grave and earnest quartet till, without any warning, they begin to sing—

"I always have been chary
Of English military,
They are such a rakish lot," cutting a caper to the chorus, "Oh, we are unhappy Parsees." Melita, too, at one moment pathetically conjures her father by the memory of his dead wife, and soon after "chaffs" him to the tune of "Forgive me, papa!

I wish you ta-ta.
Your dearest daughter
Crosses the water."

No doubt life is made up of smiles and tears, but merriment in this case seems the result of conviction that where no spontaneity exists a little force will serve. Mr Pontet's music, though tuneful, and in some instances engaging, is far from adequate to the requirements of even such a libretto as that provided by his colleague. The composer gives us the idea of being equal to a ballad, but the variety, dramatic power, and entrain demanded in an opera of this class seem altogether beyond him. One of the best things in the work is a gavotte danced and sung by the officers and maidens. This obtained a deserved encore, and shows capacity as far as it goes. For much of the rest the old remark will serve: "What is good is not new, and what is new is not good." Mr Pontet may do better in the coming by-and-bye, but meanwhile he must enlarge himself considerably. The opera is well put upon the stage, the dresses being particularly handsome, and the performance promises in a little while to go as well as can be expected where the artists are not singers of capacity. Miss Clare Leslie as Melita stood out conspicuously from the rest, as did Mr Henry Hallam (Captain Melville), and Mr E. Rosenthal (Jamsetjee), all three obtaining much applause. The peculiar humour of Mr F. Thorne (Lieutenant Buzzer) and the broad fun of Mr E. D. Lyons as an Irish sentry were of great value in securing such success as the work enjoyed; while Mr Otto Langey, an exceedingly energetic conductor, presided over an orchestra numerically sufficient. At the close the authors obeyed a call, but the greeting they received was more than a little "mixed."—D. T.

CAEN.—The Conservatory of Music here has been re-organized. The Director is now M. Jules Carlez, who has under him thirteen professors, three for solfeggio and ten for instruments. With one or two exceptions, the professors are bound to belong to the orchestra of the theatre. The number of pupils, including those of both sexes, is at present fifteen hundred.

NEW YORK.—During the whole of a recent performance of Faust at the Academy of Music, Mdme Adelina Patti was attended by detectives who escorted her when she drove home. It appears that she had received during the day a letter saying she would be shot if she went on the stage as Marguerite that evening. The letter was written in a bold hand with no trace of nervousness. What its object may have been nobody can surmise. It is fair to suppose that it emanated from a lunatic, for Mdme Patti is not known to have any enemies. (Correspondence.)

HECTOR BERLIOZ.

The monument to Berlioz will shortly be "inaugurated." The tomb is to be surmounted by a bust of the now honoured, once (by his compatriots) neglected, musician, with the subjoined inscription above: "Monument erected to the glory of the composer, Berlioz (Louis Hector), born at Côte-Saint André (Isère), December 11th, 1803; died a Member of the Academy of Fine Arts, March 8th, 1869.—Harold en Italie—Romeo et Juliette—Benvenuto Cellini—La Fuite en Egypte—Les Troyens—Beatrix et Benedict—Grande Messe des Morts, &c." Referring to the Mass performed in the Church of the Invalides, on the 5th of December, 1837, at the Funeral service for General Damrément, and the officers and soldiers whose lives were sacrificed at the taking of Constantine, it may be added that an arrangement for voices, with pianoforte accompaniment, has just been issued by the eminent Paris firm of Brandus & Co. In a letter to his friend, Humbert Ferrand, Berlioz thus writes about his avowed most ambitious effort:—"If it were decided to commit to the flames all the scores I have produced with a single exception, the Messe des Morts is the one I should most desire to have spared." Some may agree, others not, with this opinion coming directly from the author of the Requiem; but words so earnestly spoken merit, on the part of those now inclined to rate Berlioz as a sort of "phenomenon," no less earnest consideration. It remains for Mr August Manns to persuade the audience at the Crystal Palace, where the Messe is to be given on a Saturday in Lent, next year; and if he succeeds his example will, in all likelihood, be followed by musical societies with resources in hand to pay for a chorus and orchestra able to realize in its full significance the effect contemplated by the musician. Had Berlioz lived to witness the singular enthusiasm excited of late by his works among the Parisians, for whom he so often and emphatically expressed his contempt, he would have been lost in amazement. How much of this newly-born rapture is attributable to the events of 1870, has frequently, and not unreasonably, formed a topic for discussion. The Germans had created a Richard Wagner, who mercilessly (and in anything but good taste) ridiculed the French, after their reverses; and so, to retaliate, the Parisians conjured up a formidable rival in the shape of their own erewhile unappreciated Hector Berlioz, who, though Wagner had gathered much from him, in the way of extraordinary orchestral combinations, was a staunch opponent of the principles laid down by the Bayreuth Oracle in his elucidation of "Art-Work of the Future," as exemplified in that elaborate and very original treatise, "Oper und Drama." Berlioz, in short, paid Wagner back in his own coin, by publicly repudiating all connection, or sympathy, with the newly-promulgated doctrines.—Graphic.

FÉDORA.

Paris, Dec. 11.

It is easy to imagine what feverish excitement has prevailed for a month back among those singularly ardent people called "Tout Paris" to be present at the first night of Fédora, a comedy in four acts, by M. Victorien Sardou, which was given this evening at the Vaudeville, and wherein Mdme Sarah Bernhardt acted the chief part; hoisting her victorious flag in rivalry to the Comédie Française, with which she so romantically severed her connection. With the exception of a flying visit to Paris, to play in the Dame aux Camélias, for the benefit of a poor artist's widow, she had not appeared here since her sudden break with the Théâtre Français. Mdme Favart and Mdme Croizette, have retired from the Paris stage, and thus, since Sarah Bernhardt's absence, brilliant nights—the so-called soirées étoilées—have become few and far between. Fédora has brought back Mdme Bernhardt, whose talents have been, if possible, enhanced by the homage she has received all over the world. That homage has gratified the judgment of the French public, which again singles her out, as of yore, for its favourite actress. Sardou's comedy throws into relief the manifold and striking qualities of her unrivalled genius, in which powerful artistic insight is aided by the most melodious of voices, and indefinable grace, and a marvellous skill in fascinating her audience.

Fédora is a Russian woman, whose affianced husband has been assassinated, in Russia, and who is on the track of the supposed murderer, on whom she seeks to wreak her vengeance. However, in the course of her search she falls in love with him whom she wishes to deliver over to justice; and finds that the motive of his crime is justifiable, Loris Ipanoff, the supposed murderer, having killed her lover in order to avenge his own honour, and thereby also avenged hers. Unfortunately, before having made this discovery, which excuses Ipanoff in her eyes, Fédora, to avenge the death of her affianced, has written to the Russian head of the police, denouncing Ipanoff's friends and relatives as belonging to the Nihilist party. When Ipanoff learns that it is Fédora who has denounced him and his friends and relatives, he is inspired with a sudden hatred towards her. Fédora, to escape from this hatred, poisons herself, and dies as only Sarah Bernhardt can die.

The idea of the piece is strange and fresh, and in many respects conceived with all the ability characteristic of M. Sardou's talent. It is admirably got up, and yet without the attraction of Mdme Bernhardt, without the fascination she exercises on the spectators, without that art she has of bringing into relief the slightest details, and most subtle shades of emotion, it would hardly bear criticism. But the is Fédora an event by itself. To-night's applause, the general and intense delight, were due to the artist's work. Berton, an actor of the Vaudeville company, who plays the part of Loris Ipanoff, contributed to the success of the piece, and was much applauded in the third act, where he confesses his crime. The public showed throughout rapt interest—an interest intensified during each successive act, as Mdme Bernhardt's dramatic powers were gradually unfolded; and it was before a house unanimously thrilled that the curtain fell half-an-hour after midnight. The great actress was re-called four times, amid unparalleled enthusiasm.—Times Correspondent.

ROME.

(Correspondence.)

On the site of the old Teatro Quirino, as we learn from the Italie, there has arisen in a few months a magnificent edifice, including a Theatre and a vast five-storied block of other buildings. The Theatre is spacious, well-ventilated, fitted up with every comfort both for public and artists, and adapted for all kinds of performances, though principally for buffo opera and comedy. It is all that can be desired as regards safety, being constructed entirely of stone and iron. There are numerous convenient means of egress, and every contrivance will be adopted to prevent or to extinguish fire. The owners intend that though the new theatre shall preserve the characteristic popular physiognomy of the old, combined with more elegance and commodiousness, the public shall enjoy as much liberty as before. It will be the only Theatre where smoking will be allowed. The same paper (the Italie) publishes the programme of the Teatro Apollo. There will be fifty-two performances in the course of the season, the operas being Le Prophète, Meyerbeer; La Vestale, Mercadante; Il Guarany, Gomez; La Favorita, Donizetti; and L'Assedio di Firenze, a new work by Sig. Terziani. There will be only one ballet, Manzotti's Excelsior. The vocal company will include Signore Biancolini, Carbini, Tati-Giannelli, Cortini, Martinez; tenors: de Sanctis, Bertini; baritons: Vilmant, Sardou; basses: Abulcare, Buzzi. Gayarre, also, will appear a few nights in La Favorita. The season will be inaugurated with Le Prophète.

DESSAU.—Herr Thiele celebrated on the 1st inst., his fiftieth anniversary as Capellmeister at the Ducal Theatre. The opera was the same he had conducted when wielding the bâton for the first time. The Duke of Anhalt created him Knight of the Ducal House Order, besides bestowing other marks of favour. He was, likewise, presented with a grand piano and with an inlaid tablet bearing the inscription: "To the Master, Eduard Thiele, 1st December, 1882, from Friends and Admirers."

VIENNA.—Gounod's Tribut de Zamora will be performed at the Imperial Operahouse, with this cast: Hermosa, Mdme Pauline Lucca; Xaima, Mdme Kupfer; Hadjar, Herr Bignio; Ben Said, Herr Sommer; Don Manuel, Herr Müller. The management intend giving, in the early part of next month, an historical performance of specimens taken from different works, and illustrating the progress of opera from its commencement down to the present day.

THE POPULAR CONCERTS.

In the programme of Monday night there was nothing new and nothing strange; but neither this negation nor the very positive fog prevented a crowded audience from assembling. The main attraction was Herr Joachim, undoubtedly; we must, however, take the fact into account that amateurs always reckon upon a selection of first-rate classical works when the great violinist is chief interpreter. Herr Joachim is content to let others range over the fields of "advanced" music. For him the purer and serener region of the great masters, and of their worthy successors, amply suffices, and thus we had on Monday night Mozart's Quartet in G (No. 1), Schubert's Trio in B flat, and, by way of show piece, Tartini's famous "Il Trillo del Diavolo." All these were splendidly played, Herr Joachim having as his colleagues in the first MM. Ries, Straus, and Piatti; in the second, Mdme Haas and the accomplished Italian violoncellist. The personal triumph came, however, with Tartini's brilliant solo, performed by the Hungarian artist in St James's Hall for the twenty-fourth time. It once more created the utmost enthusiasm, a perfect tumult of applause compelling Herr Joachim to re-appear twice. On the last occasion, besides bowing his acknowledgments, the violin master played another piece. Mdme Haas introduced as her solo Chopin's Impromptu in F sharp major, with which she made an unquestionable success. Her style is artistic, and her command of the instrument easy as well as efficient. This the audience promptly recognized, stamping the performance with their approval in a manner unmistakable by twice re-calling the executant. Mdme Haas responded with a movement by Scarlatti. The pleasure of every amateur in the room was much enhanced by the singing of Mr Santley, who introduced two of the most effective songs in his large repertory—Sullivan's "Thou art passing hence" and Schubert's "Erl King." Wide asunder as these works are in style, they were equally well rendered by our favourite baritone. The "Erl King" was, as usual, received with abundant applause, answering which, Mr Santley gave Boildieu's "Toi" in his best manner, Mr Zerbini ably accompanying.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The fortnightly meeting of professors and students was held on Saturday, December 9. The following is the programme of music performed:—

Air with variations, and Finale Fugato in A, organ (Henry Smart)—Mr Edwin Lemare, pupil of Dr Steggall; Song (MS), "The Angelic Chord" (Theophilus Ward, student)—(accompanist, Mr T. Ward; organ, Mr G. J. Bennett)—Mr Lucas Williams, pupil of Mr Davenport and Mr Randegger; Rondo, from Concerto in A minor, No. 28, violin (Viotti)—(accompanist, Mr H. R. A. Robinson)—Mr T. W. Blakey, pupil of Mr Burnett; Duet, "Children pray," God, Thou art Great (Spohr)—(accompanist, Mr C. S. Macpherson) Miss Mary Thomas and Mr Dyved Lewis, pupils of Mr Fiori; Bourrée, in G, and Tarantella, in A minor (MS.), pianoforte (German E. Jones, student)—Mr Septimus Webbe, pupil of Mr Prout and Mr Westlake; Aria, "In questo semplice," Betley (Donizetti)—(accompanist, Miss Margaret Gyde)—Betley, Miss Florence Norman, pupil of Mr Garcia; Impromptu, in E flat (MS.), pianoforte (Cecilia Lancelot, student)—Miss Cecilia Lancelot, pupil of Mr Davenport and Mr F. B. Jewson; Aria, Mignon (Ambroise Thomas)—(accompanist, Miss Cantelo)—Mignon, Miss Eddison, pupil of Mr Duvivier; Allegro, from Sonata in G minor (MS.), pianoforte and violin (Margaret Gyde, Thalberg scholar)—Miss Margaret Gyde and Mr Frank Arnold, pupils of Professor Macfarren, Mr Walter Macfarren and Mr Sainton; Recitation, Les Femmes Savantes, Act ii., Scene vi. (Molière)—Philaminte, Miss Amy Bellinfante, Bélise, Miss Kate Skinner, Martine, Miss Amy E. Horrocks, Chrysale, Mr Woodgate, pupils of Mr Hartog; Song (MS.), "The fountains mingle with the river" (F. Kilvington Hattersley, Balfe scholar)—(accompanist, Mr F. K. Hattersley)—Mr Courtice Pounds, pupil of Mr Davenport and Mr F. Walker; Sonata, in A minor, Op. 23, pianoforte and violin (Beethoven)—Miss Kate Isaacson, pupil of Mr Wingham, and Miss Colvina Waite, pupil of Mr Sainton; Song (MS.), "The Children's Song" (Caroline Moseley, student)—(accompanist, Miss Moseley)—Miss Henden Ward, pupil of Mr Prout and Mr Shakespeare; Characteristic Piece, "Lurline" (Hans Seeling)—Miss Theakstone, pupil of Mr Eaton Faning; Duet, "I will always give thanks" (T. M. Mudie)—(accompanist, Miss Lilian Munster)—Miss Beatrice Walker and Miss Penelope May, pupils of Mr F. R. Cox; Polonaise, in D (MS.), violin and pianoforte (W. Richardson, student)—Mr German E. Jones and Mr Septimus Webbe, pupils of Mr Davenport, Mr Burnett, and Mr Westlake; Aria, "O, Salutaris Hostia," Messe Solennelle (Rossini)—(accompanist, Mr H. R. A. Robinson)—Miss Gillington, pupil of Mr R. H. Cummings; Brautgesang und Festzug, from Hochzeitsmusik, pianoforte (Adolf Jensen)—Miss Peck* and Miss Sbalders, pupils of Mr Morton.

VISIONS.*

'Twas but a lay of other years,
A plaintive little strain,
That filled my aching eyes with tears,
And woke the old, old pain.
My fancy saw him mid the throng,
The gayest of the gay;—
The singer paused, and with the song
The vision died away.

'Tis but the tread of passing feet,
Beneath my window pane,
And as they echo through the street,
I dream he comes again.
Friends whisper, Time will heal the wound;
I heed not what they say;—
The footsteps cease, and with the sound
The vision fades away.

And still those visions come and go,
In fitful sunny gleams,
To bathe the heart that's bowed with woe
In mem'ry's golden beams.
They tell of radiant joys above,
That never can decay,
When, heart to heart and love to love,
These dreams have passed away.

PAULINE LUCCA ON MDME REICHER-KINDERMANN.

(Correspondence.)

Vienna, Dec. 9.—"We in Vienna cannot comprehend the sudden development of this extraordinarily gifted lady,† of whom the public and the critics of Berlin entertain, and with strict justice, so high an opinion. She was engaged three years ago in Vienna. Even then I was struck by the magnificent middle register of her voice. She sang various parts with success. As Leah, in Rubinstein's Maccabäer, she proved herself an artist of the first rank, but that she would become what she at present is I never could have imagined. We have now at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, another lady whose artistic career bears some resemblance to Mdme Kindermann's. Mdlle Schläger used to play in buffo opera, but came out a short time ago with great success in Les Huguenots; her powerful voice involuntarily reminds us of Mdme Kindermann."

ST PETERSBURGH.

(Correspondence.)

The Philharmonic Society intend giving a series of concerts this winter. The band will be made up of the bands from the Italian and the Russian Opera, reinforced from other theatres. The number of stringed instruments will be 150; that of the wind, 50. The conductors are Naprawnik and Vizentini. The Society is the oldest of its kind in Russia, the list of its honorary members comprising the names of Joseph Haydn (1808), Field, Cherubini, Glinka, Schumann, Berlioz, Meyerbeer, Spohr, Ernst, &c.

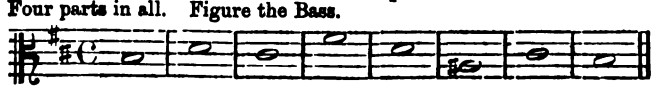
COUNTERPOINT.

1. Write a fugue in two parts on the following subject. Figure the Bass throughout.

2. Continue the following canon in the ninth above. Make it perpetual and add a free coda. There must not be less than twelve bars within the repeat.

3. To the following Canto Fermo add counterpoint of the third species for Soprano, and of the first species for Tenor and Bass. Four parts in all. Figure the Bass.



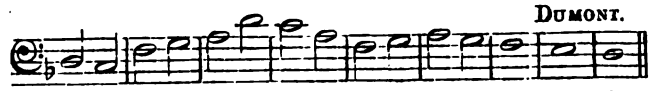
4. To the same Canto Fermo add counterpoint of the fourth species in the Bass. Also counterpoint of the fourth species for Soprano. Each score to consist of two parts. Figure the Bass.

5. To the same Canto Fermo add two parts in second species, one above and one below. Three parts in all. Figure the Bass in both instances.

6. Transpose the Canto Fermo into C minor. Put it in the Bass, and add counterpoint of the first species for first and second Soprano, of the fifth species for Alto, and of the first species for Tenor. Five parts in all. Use C clefs and figure the Bass.

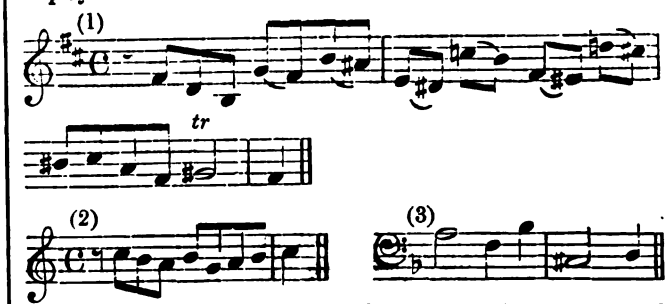
7. Write a double counterpoint in the octave to the following subject, fifth species. Also write the inversion and figure the Bass in each instance.

DUMONT.



8. Write the subject to precede the following fugal answer. State from what work the subject is taken.

9. Write answers to the following fugal subjects. State from what works the first two are taken, and what several authors have employed the third.



10. State the difference between the resolution of suspensions and of other prepared discords.

ATTACK UPON RUBINSTEIN AND HIS ADMIRER.

(To Dr. Beard.)

DEAR BEARD,—The subjoined savage (nay, inhuman) attack upon a pianist universally known, and a sonata as universally considered, appears in the columns of one of your most esteemed and ably edited contemporaries:—

"Rubinstein's Sonata for that beautiful, but too-rarely-heard combination, 'cello and piano, is unequal, but not altogether unpleasant. The first movement must resemble that improvisation, in the course of which Beethoven inquired, 'When are you going to begin in earnest?' The opening phrase, called, by courtesy, 'first theme,' is nothing but a preamble, ambling to nothing. The second movement is a common-place melody for the 'cello in 'minuet and trio' form. The finale is the most pleasing division of the work, being tuneful, though not original."

"Though not original" (the italics are mine*) is good. To be "pleasing" we must be "tuneful," but "not original."

What follows, touching up the author of the Analytical Remarks, "sarves him right," being peppery and pungent to a particle.

"By the way, what is the meaning of the extraordinary statement made at the end of the 'Analytical Remarks?' After being told that 'the position he (Rubinstein) now holds at the head of his profession is universally acknowledged,' we read, 'Who knows not Anton Rubinstein is himself unknown!' (The exclamation is mine.†) This is evidently considered an overpowering climax, to annihilate those who do not know Anton Rubinstein. But would not 'is himself unknowing'‡ have more sense in it? It is, perhaps, a very awful thing to be 'unknown;' but to know Rubinstein will not remove the curse. Many remain unknown who know, at a distance, Rubinstein, Sir Garnet Wolseley, Roger Tichborne, and others. It really is no help at all to know Rubinstein; and it is advisable to warn those who might be misled by the wording of a sentence which probably only means 'any one who does not admire Anton Rubinstein pianist and composer, has shockingly bad taste.'

"B. F. WYATT-SMITH."

Of course it does, as you, dear Beard—not to know whom argues ones'self unknown! (the italics and "exclamation" are mine§)—will readily admit, recognize, and acknowledge. Yours always, as of old,

SIMON HALF.

Half-way House, Slapton-on-See.

DR. BEARD.—I admit, recognize, and acknowledge nothing. Perish the thought! (Aside.) The exclamation is mine.

TWO FRANKENSTEINS.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Are there not now two Frankensteins in the field? A Teutonic Frankenstein and a Gallic Frankenstein? Are not both haunted by spectres of their own creation? Is not the mysterious influence of these spectres likely to hold fast for an indefinite period? Are not these spectres Richard and Hector? Can you guess which of the two spectres is destined to be laid first? Hector or Richard? Richard or Hector? Will you urge that, when Richard has departed, he has no likely successor, his imitators being little more substantial than shadows? Will you insist that Hector has no possible successor? Having, also, no imitators?—unless Richard be hailed as one? Can you accept either forecast as a true solution? Can you deny that Gauls are as susceptible as Teutons are obstinate? Can you deny that both are vain? Can't you understand that both, Gauls especially, will make it a point to stand by their champions? Is not this, after all, a sheer matter of politics? Open to Messrs Gilbert and Sullivan for their next co-rhapsody? Will you, by allaying some or all these doubts, oblige yours faithfully, INTERROGATOR?

P.S.—Or will you not?

[We will not. "Interrogator" interrogates too curiously. We refer him to Messrs Sullivan and Gilbert.—Ed. M.]

It is reported by the local press that Mdme Christine Nilsson will shortly re-appear on the operatic stage in America.

Mdme Minnie Hauk will appear before the end of the season in Carmen, Lohengrin, and L'Africaine at the New York Academy of Music.

Mdme Adelina Patti's New York engagement has proved so successful that Mr Mapleson (it is said) has released the subscribers to the Guarantee Fund from their liability (£8,800.)

PROFESSOR MACFARREN has agreed to deliver four lectures to the Blind Musicians at Sydenham. So what with his duties at Cambridge University and as Principal of our Royal Academy of Music, to say nothing of his oratorio for the Leeds Festival, &c., his hands must be full.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The Competition for the Bonamy Dobree prize for violoncellists (£10 10s.) was competed for on Monday. The examiners were M. Albert, M. Lasserre, and Mr Edward Howell (chairman). The prize was awarded to James E. Hambleton.

MR W. G. CUSINS announces a "Christmas performance of The Messiah," at St James's Hall for this evening (Saturday), December 16. We learn that he has made a special study of Handel's score and will restore some of the original readings. Mesdames Albani and Patey, Messrs Maas and Santley are to be the soloists, and an efficient chorus and orchestra have been engaged.

VERDI'S Simon Boccanegra has been well received in Vienna. Dr Hanslick, of the Neue Freie Presse, gives, with certain reservations, a favourable account of it—more especially with regard to the first, and—as he esteems it—by far the best act. Although the libretto can by no means be reckoned among the happiest with which Piave has supplied his renowned collaborateur, Simon Boccanegra, which but lately was revived at the Scala, Milan, is now to be revived at the San Carlo, Naples. It will probably take the round of Italy, and then, in all likelihood, go from city to city wherever Italian opera is not (as the "advanced people" proclaim it) a thing to be henceforth repudiated by cultured amateurs.

STATISTICAL.—According to a paragraph which has lately gone the round, first of the French, and afterwards of the remaining of the continental press, the number of theatres in Europe is 1,457. Italy has 348; France, 337; Germany, 194; England, 150; Spain, 100; Austro-Hungary, 132; Russia, 44; Belgium, 34; Holland, 22; Switzerland, 20; Portugal, 16; Sweden, 10; Denmark, 10; Norway, 8; Greece, 4; Turkey, 4; Roumania, 3; and Servia, 1. Hereupon, the Trovatore remarks: "Every year the French papers repeat the statistics of the theatres of Europe, and always with the same errors, at least, as regards Italy, because they say Italy has 348 theatres, while we really boast of 1,231." Whether our facetious contemporary is serious, or simply "poking fun" at his readers, is an open question.

BARCELONA.—During the performance at the Odeon Theatre here, this evening, a thief raised a cry of fire, and a panic ensued, in which several of the spectators, while endeavouring to escape, were thrown down and trampled on. One person was killed, and eighteen others sustained injuries (Dec. 9).

CONCERTS.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.—The inevitable sequel of such a success as the first performance of Gounod's new oratorio at the Royal Albert Hall was a second presentation of that interesting work. It took place on Saturday afternoon, and again an enormous crowd gathered to hear music so much discussed, and in some respects, so open to the criticism that waits on novelty. It was our duty, on the previous occasion, to speak well of a performance generally excellent, though not free from weak points. Last Saturday those points were found strengthened, and the ensemble made as perfect as the most fastidious could expect. The orchestra, for instance, contained an increased number of strings—as many as the space at command permitted—the power of the "celestial choir" was augmented by additional harps and boys' voices; while the contralto solos, which, if not numerous, are important, were sung by Mdme Patey, their interpreter at Birmingham. The result of these changes, and the natural consequence of greater familiarity with the work, satisfied everybody, and Mr Barnby, to whom credit most belongs, might have challenged for the performance the criticism of M. Gounod himself. More than this there is little need to say. Amateurs understand perfectly well now what special merit enters into the execution of The Redemption music by Mdme Albani, Mdme Patey, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Santley, and they know for what good reasons nothing better could be desired. Those reasons were, perhaps, more obvious than ever on Saturday afternoon, since a true artist cannot fail, as acquaintance ripens, to grasp with increasing firmness the character of the work he undertakes. Miss Santley and Mr Pyatt also did good service in the discharge of their comparatively subordinate functions. The orchestra was adequate to its task, and the chorus exceedingly fine, making a special effect not only in "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," which almost "goes" of itself, but in the dramatic utterances of the priests and people. A profound impression was, as usual, the result of the ensemble, "From Thy love as a Father." To this Mdme Albani largely contributed by her fervid expression, and by what it is not hyperbole to describe as the angelic purity of her tones. Mr Barnby conducted in excellent style, and with all that was done, equally with the doing of it, the immense audience seemed well pleased. Their Royal Highnesses Princess Beatrice and Princess Christian, with their respective suites, were present at the performance.—D. T.

MR WILLING'S CHOIR.—"After the fathers come up the children." The old Sacred Harmonic Society being dead, Mr Willing's choir succeeds, with an undoubted right of heirship. No question will arise as to the paternity of a body conducted by the organist of the late society, having an orchestra and chorus composed, for the most part, of those by whom the late society was served, and numbering Sir Michael Costa among its honorary officers. These are credentials sufficient to ensure a welcome beyond that which every new artistic venture should receive. For favour in excess of deserts Mr Willing and his colleagues will not look. No one will say "This is the heir: come, let us kill him"; but the heir must earn what he obtains, getting nothing on account of his parentage. For our own part, we heartily wish the new choir well, and trust that it may live through the perilous time of infancy to enter upon a long career of robust usefulness. The first concert, given in St James's Hall on Tuesday night, was not honoured by a large attendance. This surprised nobody acquainted with the exceedingly deliberate acceptance always given by our public to a novelty, substantial or ideal. Of greater consequence was the fact that the performance of Handel's Acis and Galatea proved unfortunate in several respects. Probably for reasons not unconnected with the presence in the programme of an important novelty, the beautiful serenata had not been prepared with adequate care, and its rendering was marked by the indiscriminate vigour, almost amounting to roughness, which in this country is supposed to accord with Handelian tradition. In the next place Mr Lloyd could not attend, and his substitute, Mr Frank Boyle, should also have stayed away to nurse the cold which, soon breaking him down, necessitated the appearance of the second tenor, Mr Albert James (Damon) in the part of Acis, as well as his own. Under such circumstances the less said the better, and we pass Acis and Galatea to notice the first performance in London of Herr Gade's Birmingham cantata, Psyche. This was really the choir's "inaugural"—one, moreover, wherein reasons for satisfaction were found. Concerning the work itself there is no need to speak, after the full discussion given to it in these columns a very few months ago. Let us say, nevertheless, that better acquaintance sustains the first impression that its merits immensely preponderate. A certain sense of monotony—a monotony of charm—is doubtless experienced by those who hear this music, and it arises from the composer's steadfast adherence to a particular measure of feeling and mode of expression, but we can never lose sight of the fact that we are listening to that which is in the highest degree artistic. Many composers now-a-days deal with sounds as a common house-painter handles colours—that is to say, not artistically. They inflict upon us crude and blatant noises, on the assumption, apparently, that every noise belongs to music. Herr Gade is not of this band. He is an artist in tones, and keeps his duty as such ever before him. Hence grace and refinement, with the true spirit of beauty, distinguish his pages, and give a large measure of compensation for the absence of profound genius. Psyche was presented to its first metropolitan audience with an encouraging degree of success. The performers knew their work, and if not "attuned to the finest issues," did it substantial justice. This may be said equally with reference to chorus, orchestra, and soloists, the first-named coming well out of the ordeal imposed by an unfamiliar task. There are good voices and plenty of ability in the choir—so much is clear; the rest ought to follow. Another rehearsal would, no doubt, have given greater finish to the orchestra, as to the capacity of which, however, question did not arise, seeing how many of our best instrumentalists, besides Mr Carrodus, were in its ranks. The soloists were Mdme Marie Roze, Miss Coward, Miss J. Rosse, Mr Albert James, and Mr. F. King. Mdme Roze, who, it will be remembered, "created" the title-character at Birmingham, displayed on this occasion all the qualities upon which we then commented. The French artist never lacks one great element of fitness for such work as she had to do on Tuesday night. That element is sensibility—a warmth of natural feeling that conveys the music through the right medium and tinges it with fitting colour. Her singing in this respect was admirable enough to account for liberal applause. Miss Coward, a young artist of excellent gifts, did good service in the concerted music, while Miss Rosse, in the solos of "Proserpine," displayed a fine voice and promising gifts generally. Mr King, on whom devolved the part assumed at Birmingham by Mr Santley, acquitted himself exceedingly well, singing with spirit, correctness, and artistic skill. There remains to add, referring back to Acis and Galatea, that Mr Bridson delivered the Polyphemus music in capital style; that Mr Barrett's piccolo obbligati were perfect, and that Mr Willing proved himself the possessor of considerable qualifications for the post of conductor.—D. T.

THE Crystal Palace Concerts will be suspended after to-day, Saturday, until February 10, to allow for the run of the Christmas amusements. Last Saturday's concert calls for little remark beyond confirming the success of Miss Arma Harkness, the young violinist who first appeared at these concerts last month. The young lady again achieved a marked success by her refined and skilful performances, which, on this occasion, consisted of a Rondo Capriccioso by M. Saint-Saëns, and a Polonaise by Wieniawski, in which she was encored.

ROYAL AMATEUR ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.—The first concert of the eleventh season of the above Society took place on Saturday evening last at the Royal Albert Hall, when the following programme was gone through: Overture, Das Nachtlager in Granada (Kreutzer); Saltarello (Gounod); Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 1 (Liszt); Concerto, pianoforte, in A minor (Schumann); and Overture, Giralda (Adam). H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh occupied the post of first violin; the pianist, was Miss Clara Asher, a young artist of budding promise; and Mr G. F. Bambridge was the accompanist. The vocalists were Misses Madeline Hardy and Frances Hipwell, who gave respectively the recit. and air, "I will extol," from Costa's Eli, "There's a bower of roses" (Villiers Stanford); "The Spirit's Song" (Haydn) and "In life and in death I am thine" (Barnby) more than creditably. The scantiness of the audience in the more select parts of the house was, no doubt, due to the fact that large numbers of concert-goers had "assisted" at the repetition of M. Gounod's new oratorio, The Redemption, at an earlier hour in the afternoon. We may be permitted to note that, although there was no lack of earnestness in the orchestra generally, yet there was, at times, a want of precision, especially in their execution of the "Rhapsodie Hongroise." Mr George Mount was the conductor.—WETSTAR.

A concert under the direction of Mr Chas. Oberthür took place on Monday evening last at the Royal Victoria Coffee Hall. Mr Oberthür's cantata The Red Cross Knight, sung by the South Kensington Ladies' Choir under the guidance of Mrs Arthur O'Leary, was announced as the principal attraction. Only a very few however of those inhabiting the "other side of the water" made their appearance. The severity of the weather and the thin audience had a depressing effect on the whole proceedings, and altogether, South Kensington refinement seemed somewhat out of place at Lambeth. Miss Howes, the principal soprano, has a fine voice which is evidently being artistically trained, no doubt she has a future before her. Miss Mackness played a "Morceau de Concert" for the pianoforte on a popular air by Arthur O'Leary, and her brilliant performance was much applauded. The concert-giver gave various harp solos of his own composition, including a charming duet with his pupil, Miss Fortescue, with his well-known skill, meeting with deserved success. Miss Kaysell and Signor Villa also assisted.

Mr Windeyer Clark gave a highly successful concert at Ladbroke Hall, Notting Hill, on December 5th. The programme was carefully drawn out, and the performance gave great satisfaction to a large and appreciative audience. The chief features of the evening were the concert-giver's performances on the pianoforte and Mustel organ and the singing of his newly formed choir, which exhibited most careful and artistic training. Mr Clark chose as his piano solos Walter Macfarren's "Rondo grazioso" and second Tarantella, as well as a brilliant rendering on the Mustel organ of Engel's fantasia on Don Pasquale. The principal vocalists were Miss C. Thudicum, Miss Ada Iggulden, and Mr Dyved Lewis (all of the Royal Academy of Music), and excellent instrumental solos were given by Miss Helen de Lisle (violin) and Mr R. H. Tompkins (flute). Mr Arthur O'Leary accompanied Miss Iggulden in his own lovely song, "He roamed in the forest," the remainder of the accompaniments being shared between Mr C. W. Pearce, Mus. Bac., Mr R. Stokoe, Mus. Bac., and Mr Clark.—A. B.

PROVINCIAL.

Northampton. — The Union Glee Club and the Instrumental Quintet Society, whose public co-operation has in late seasons been productive of so much enjoyment to lovers of good music, gave a special concert at the Town Hall, on Tuesday evening, Dec. 5, to defray the expenses incurred in the recent copyright case, Wall v. Union Glee Club. The audience, although not so large as could have been wished, was fairly numerous. Dealing first with the instrumental contributions, we may state that the band was composed as follows:—Messrs Bonner and Warren, first violins; Messrs Cosford and Grant, second violins; Mr Kirby, viola; Messrs A. and W. Shaw, violoncellos; Mr Laundon, double bass; Mr Oates, flute; Mr Duke, clarionet; Mr Shepherd, hautbois; and Mr Strickland, pianoforte. The overture to Mozart's Le Nozze de Figaro received thoroughly adequate treatment; Michaeli's "Turkish Patrol" was admirably played; the remaining concerted piece, Waldteufel's waltz, "Jeunesse Dorée," also proved successful. Mr Bonner, an able musician, who has tried his hand with good result at original composition, gave a fantasia brillante, for the violin, "Souvenir de Bellini" (J. Artot), in which, tone, expression, and manipulation were alike commendable. An encore was responded to with Henry Farmer's "True love" Gavotte. The part songs, "Come live with me" (Bennett), "When hands meet" (Pinsuti), "The sands of Dee" (Macfarren), and "Jack and Jill" (A. J. Caldecott), fully deserved the manifestations of approval they received. Miss Cosford, of the Guildhall School of Music, pleased every one by her refined singing of Wellington Guernsey's "O buy my flowers." To a voice of remarkable purity, judiciously cultivated, she adds enviable gifts of expression. Miss Cosford was encored each time she appeared, the other songs given by her during the evening being "Dreaming," "Waiting," and "Miriam's Lullaby." Miss Kate Cosford, to whom Northampton audiences owe much in the way of musical enjoyment, appeared with her sister in Badia's duet, "Say to me." Mr A. Warren, who merits a word of special praise for his services as conductor, gave two songs, "The King's Champion" (M. Watson), and "The Outpost" (Pinsuti). The last named was loudly encored. Mr T. Cosford imbued "Ehren on the Rhine" (Hutchinson) with tenderness and feeling, although his voice was by no means at its best. Miss Kate Cosford, Miss Gardner, and Mr Strickland officiated as accompanists.—Northampton Chronicle, Dec. 7.

Sheffield.—The visit which Sheffield receives annually, from Mr Carl Rosa and his company, has begun, and the Alexandra Theatre is once again the temporary home of English opera. On Monday evening, Nov 27, Beethoven's Fidelio was presented, and during the rest of the week lovers of operatic music of the highest order had a feast in the performance of Rigoletto, Faust, The Bohemian Girl, The Flying Dutchman, and Lucrezia Borgia. Mr Carl Rosa's present troupe is quite equal to any previously introduced to Sheffield under his management. Among its members are Misses Georgina Burns, Josephine York, Ella Collins, M. Walsh and Perry, Messrs Barton M'Guckin, J. W. Turner, Ludwig, Snazelle, Crotty, B. Davis, Wilfred Esmond, Hy. Pope, J. H. Stillard, and Brooklyn. The absentees are compensated for by the engagement of Madame Marie Roze and Madame Valleria. Such an array of talent is perhaps only capable of being associated and maintained for a provincial tour by a man of the daring and enterprise of Mr Carl Rosa. Never was a more numerous or appreciative audience assembled in the Alexandra Theatre on an opening night than that which welcomed Mr Rosa as he appeared to conduct the performance. The interest of the occasion was not a little enhanced by the production (we believe for the first time in Sheffield) of Beethoven's Fidelio, and by the appearance in it of Madame Marie Rose as Leonora, a character which she has sustained with unusual brilliance and success in many of the towns visited during the present tour of Mr Rosa's company. The musicians of Sheffield gave the work a very enthusiastic reception, and their appreciation of the music was frequently marked by vigorous applause.

Liverpool.—Whatever beneficial results may accrue to musical art from the Liverpool Philharmonic Society's forty-fourth series of concerts, the first half thereof will scarcely be remembered as productive of novelty in any important degree, the executive choosing rather to rely upon oft-repeated excerpts than to distinguish the present season by submitting any new works of importance. An experience of close upon half a century, however, should be a sufficient guarantee that the taste of the society's patrons is thoroughly considered, and it will therefore be sufficient to briefly chronicle the programme of Tuesday evening, Dec. 5. The vocalists were Mdme Georgina Burns, Miss Josephine Yorke, Messrs J. W. Turner and Leslie Crotty, names familiar to opera-goers as forming an all-important contingent of the Carl Rosa troupe. With the exception of Mdme Burns and Miss Yorke, this was, we believe, the first appearance of these artists at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society. The committee had certainly no reason to regret their selection, and the concert may with propriety be characterized as one of the most successful of the season. Mr Turner gave a spirited rendering of the air from Irene, "Lend me your aid," and Mdme Burns in Mozart's scena, "Thou may'st learn to hate me," was enabled to display to the full her remarkable powers of execution. To Mr Leslie Crotty, however, fell the honours of the evening, his rendering of Wolfram's song from Tannhäuser being a perfect specimen of the cantabile style of vocalization, and the re-call earned was richly deserved. Miss Josephine Yorke was also successful, and the combined efforts of the quartet in the beautiful Fidelio canon deserve special mention. The chorus had but little to do, and the orchestra were at their best.—Mercury, Dec. 6.

Brighton.—A vocal and instrumental concert was given at the Aquarium last Saturday afternoon, the singer being Mdme Catherine Penna, and the pianist Miss Maggie Okey. Mdme Penna sang "From Mighty Kings," (Judas Maccabæus), Haydn's song, "My mother bids me bind my hair." and Gounod's "Nella Calma" (recalled). Miss Maggie Okey played Chopin's Concerto in E minor (with orchestral accompaniment), and Scarlatti's "Pastorale," in addition to which she took part in a duet with Mr J. Grebe (violin) from Guillaume Tell. The programme included several attractive selections by the Aquarium Band.—Mr Brandram concluded his series of recitals on Saturday afternoon, when he gave Shakspere's As You Like It, at the Royal Pavilion.—The Saturday "Military Promenade Concerts" are to be revived to-day at the Royal Pavilion by the band of the 4th Dragoon Guards.

Canterbury.—At the special service at the Cathedral on Friday, Dec. 8, the most impressive part was the hymn "Comes, at times, a stillness as of even," written by the Rev. Gregory Smith, and set to music by Sir Herbert Oakeley, both of whom were formerly pupils of the late Primate. Professor Oakeley's music was repeated in the Cathedral, and sung at Westminster Abbey last Sunday, and, as it was also selected at St Mary's Cathedral and at Rugby, it will have been heard on the same day in the places with which the Primate was intimately connected, as Archbishop and Metropolitan, in his native city, and in the chapel of the school of which he was headmaster.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The second of the series of orchestral concerts announced by Messrs Alderson and Brentnall took place in the Town Hall, and was attended by a very large and fashionable audience. The programme was excellent, including compositions from Dr Pepusch and Bach, to Raff and Wagner. The instrumental music was entrusted to the famous Manchester band, organized and conducted by Mr Charles Hallé—the style in which they rendered Cherubini's overture to Anacreon, Rossini's to Guillaume Tell, Wagner's march from Tannhäuser, and Raff's Leonora Symphony, proving the excellent metal they are made of. The careful way in which they accompanied Mr Charles Hallé in Weber's "Concertstück" (which he played in perfection) redounded also to their credit. The vocalist was Miss Orridge, whose sympathetic voice was heard to advantage in Meyerbeer's "Fanciulle che il core" (Dinorah) and in Dr Pepusch's "cantata," Alexis (violoncello obbligato, M. Vieuxtemps). We hope to hear at the next concert (the last of the present series) Mr Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony, which has already been heard in London, under Herr Richter, and at the Crystal Palace, under Mr Manns, as well as at the principal cities on the continent. Messrs Alderson and Brentnall, the entrepreneurs of these excellent concerts, are doing excellent work in the cause of music, and we trust their enterprise will meet with substantial reward.

Cork.—The first concert of this season under the auspices of the Cork Musical Society was held on Tuesday evening, Dec. 12, at the Assembly Rooms, before a large and fashionable audience. A special attraction was the appearance, after a long interval, of Miss Lucy Ashton Hackett, a young lady whose charming voice, wonderful flexibility, and compass has already attracted considerable attention in the musical world. The concert opened with selections from Sir Michael Costa's Naaman. The introduction over, Mr J. Sullivan's powerful bass voice was heard to great effect in the recitative, "Thus saith Elijah," the other pieces from the oratorio entrusted to him being equally well rendered. Mrs Theodore Wood—an old favourite—had ample opportunity for a display of her vocal powers in the recit. and aria, "They shall be turned back," as well as in the air, with chorus, "Maker of every star." The miscellaneous portion of the programme, which comprised the second part, opened with the martial chorus, "The Charge of the Light Brigade." This was beautifully sung, and showed the careful training of the conductor, Dr Marks. Miss Davidson gave "The Unfinished Song" (Cowen) capitally, and elicited a hearty encore. "The Shadow Song," from Dinorah, was sung by Miss Lucy Ashton Hackett, who was warmly welcomed. Some years ago, at a concert given by Dr Marks at the Theatre Royal and Operahouse, when ladies were even grateful for standing-room amongst the "gods"—so over-crowded was the theatre—Miss Hackett fairly "brought down" the house by her execution of this difficult song; and on the present occasion her success was none the less complete. She fairly held her audience in her power, and deafening applause greeted her. Mrs Jerome Murphy's rendering of the song "Amore" was perfect, and her well-cultivated voice was listened to with extreme pleasure. Mr Gill was also very favourably received in "Ehren on the Rhine," which brought the concert to a conclusion. Too much credit cannot be bestowed on Dr Marks for this excellent musical treat; and the only thing to be regretted is that the management of the Society should be so very conservative when the public treat it in such a very liberal and generous spirit. This is an old standing evil, and should be remedied immediately, if the prestige of the Cork Musical Society is to be sustained in the future.—J. F. McC.

MORE YET TO BE DONE.

A correspondent has addressed the subjoined letter to the dramatic critic of the Daily News:

Sir,—Will you allow me to bring under your notice the fact that the awkward entrance to the pit at the Savoy Theatre was very nearly becoming the scene of a dangerous panic on the evening of the first performance of Iolanthe? There was a great crowd, and this crowd, had to descend a staircase before those composing it were allowed to obtain their tickets and file slowly into the theatre. The ordinary pressure is hard enough to bear, but when it is being applied on a descent the sufferings of the unfortunate people who are nearest the bottom must be terrible. On this occasion several persons became visibly sick, and complained of being hurt. There were loud cries of "Back, back;" but a flowing tide might as well have been expected to ebb at man's bidding as this crowd, jammed on a staircase, to resist an overwhelming pressure from a multitude extending far out into the street behind them. For some moments it seemed not at all certain that there would not be a sacrifice of life on this staircase; but, happily, in response to passionate and peremptory demands, an iron gate through which there was an exit to the Embankment side of the building was opened, and a portion of the struggling mass found an outlet into the street. Those who were thus swept past the door of the theatre were in most cases too thankful to be out of a perilous position to dwell upon their disappointment. Surely to allow a crowd to press down a staircase when only one or two at a time can pass the ticket office at the bottom, is to court a calamity. The Savoy Theatre occupies a situation favourable to the trial of the French "queue" system, and there is need of a fairer, more orderly, and less dangerous system of admission at all theatres. Why should managers not extend to other parts of the house the system by which orderly entrance to the stalls and dress circle is secured? If tickets were issued at any time from some shop in the neighbourhood, and these tickets bore the number of the bench on which the holder was entitled to sit, a theatre crowd need never exceed the capacity of the building, and all excuse for dangerous scrambling would be taken away.—Yours, &c., Experto Crede.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

The first "soirée intime" this season of the Société Philharmonique de Boulogne-sur-Mer was given on Monday night, Dec. 4, at the Hôtel des Sapeurs-Pompiers, to the delight of all present. I subjoin the programme:—

Premièrs Partie—Andante et Menuet (symphonie) (Haydn); Recit. ed Aria, Noces de Figaro (Mozart); Morceau d'ensemble, Marie Stuart (Niedermeyer); Andante du trio en ut mineur (Mendelssohn); "Les Bleuets" (1re audition), ballade et chœur (J. Cohen). Deuxième Partie—"Le Sommeil de la Vierge" (Massenet) and "Canzonetta" (1re audition) (Mendelssohn); Duo, "Parigi o Cara," Traviata (Verdi); Duo pour piano; Canzoni Napolitana, Nenella (Badia); Chœur, "Plaisirs d'Amour" (Martini).

The orchestra (amateurs) performed their duties well, though I must say that more light and shade would not have been out of place in the Andante and Minuet of Haydn. Amateurs are, perhaps, not so accustomed to attend to the bâton of their conductor like professional musicians. The choruses were well rendered under the direction of M. Brunet. The singing of Mdlle Biencourt in the solo part of M. Cohen's "ballade et chœur," "Les Bleuets," was remarkable for taste and expression, while "Le Sommeil de la Vierge" (Massenet) and Mendelssohn's "Canzonetta" met with deserved applause. Mdlle Mitten, a lady possessed of a good voice, which she knows how to use, gave with effect "Deh Vieni non tardar" (Les Noces de Figaro) and Signor Badia's Neapolitan song, "Nenella," obtaining a "call" after each. "Pour les attraits" (Niedermeyer), sung by the chorus, the quartet part by three lady amateurs and Herr Reichardt (who was in excellent voice) was vociferously applauded. Herr Reichardt also took part with Mdlle Mitten in "Parigi o Cara" (La Traviata), which so pleased the audience that a "call" was the result, when both reappeared and gave in response a pretty Neapolitan duet. Foremost among the pianists was Miss Cecilia Keene, who, ably accompanied by MM. Boyard and Malo (violin and violoncello), displayed exceptional talent in the slow movement from Mendelssohn's trio in C minor. After this two pianoforte duets were played by Mdme de Launey and Mdlle Gay, the last of which they were called upon to repeat. Altogether, we congratulate the Philharmonic Society on its successful beginning. Although this was only a "Concert Intime," if a specimen of what the four public concerts are to be, I am sure all would wish them, as I do, a brilliant season.

Boulogne-sur-Mer, Dec. 6, 1882.

HOPE DEFERRED.*

When first they met 'twas early spring
The childhood of the year;
The time when birds begin to sing,
And flow'rs bloom far and near.

They plighted troth in summer-time
That autumn they should wed,
While happiness, that light divine,
Shed radiance o'er each head.

The autumn came, but bridals none,
For he was call'd away
To distant lands, and she alone
Was left to hope and pray.

Then gloomy winter, cold and drear,
Brought fogs and frost and snow.
But no fond lover back to cheer
Her solitude and woe.

Of brightness grief soon robbed her eye,
Her cheek of rosy hue;
She daily pray'd that she might die
Were he to prove untrue.

When, lo! an end came to her pain,
For the ensuing spring
The absent one return'd again,
And brought the wedding-ring.

The season of promenade concerts at Covent Garden Theatre was brought to a close on Monday evening with a "grand extra special night." Extra attractions had been provided, but unfortunately, through the conduct of a body of young men, some fifty or sixty strong, the enjoyment of the majority present was greatly lessened. Marching round and round in a compact body, these young men (or idiots) frequently interrupted the vocalists, till at last Mr Maas, who was singing the "Bay of Biscay," left the platform in disgust. A scene of confusion ensued. At length a body of constables appeared, and after considerable difficulty succeeded in ejecting some of the principal rioters. Mr Gwyllym Crowe then gave the signal to the orchestra to perform the National Anthem, and the concert was abruptly brought to an end.

WAIFS.

Professor G. A. Macfarren is engaged on the composition of a new sonata for the pianoforte—his fifth work of the kind. The first and second sonatas (in E flat and A major), were written some forty years ago and played in public by Mr W. H. Holmes (still happily a professor in our Royal Academy of Music). Mr Holmes also introduced the same composer's pianoforte Concerto in C minor, at one of the memorable concerts of the "Society of British Musicians."

De Negri, the tenor, is engaged at Messina.

Gobatti's Cordelia is to be given at Reggio d'Emilia.

A new musical monthly, Apollo, has appeared in Boston, U.S.

The present is the 23rd season of the Quartet Society, Madrid.

The Politeama, Alexandria, will shortly open with buffo opera.

There will be no Italian opera this year at the Casino Theatre, Nice.

The Max Strakosch English Opera Company have been to Canada.

A portrait, in oil, of Molière has been discovered at Montpellier (France).

The ex-tenor, Sottimio Malvezzi, has opened a school of Singing in Florence.

The Aramburos, man and wife, soprano and tenor, are in Florence.

The baritone, Storti, has returned from Rio de Janeiro, and is now in Milan.

Flotow's romantic (and insignificant) opera, Indra, has been given at Posen.

Bomboni's Haidouk, with Roumanian libretto, is in rehearsal at Bucharest.

It is estimated there are some thousand pianos out on hire in New York.

A new zarzuela, Miss Brandum, is announced at the Teatro Martin, Madrid.

On the 12th inst., Bilse conducted his 3,000th concert in the Concerthaus, Berlin.

Marie Wilt opened at the National Theatre, Pesth, in Erkel's Hunyady Laszlo.

La Cour d'Amour, music by Hubans, has been produced at the Alcazar, Brussels.

Johann Strauss, recently conducted his Lustiger Krieg at the German Theatre, Pesth.

The Duke of Coburg has appointed Oscar Möricke of Berlin, Ducal Musicdirector.

The sum of £8,000 is to be expended in re-decorating the interior of the Liceo, Barcelona.

The first concert of the Soller Musical Association, Erfurt, began with Raff's Symphony, Im Walde.

Léon Gastinel has written an opera, Le Barde, destined for the "Populaire" (that is to be), Paris.

A new Overture and Symphony by Polak-Daniels, have been received with favour in Amsterdam.

The Messiah will be given by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society on the evening of January 1.

Lucrezia Borgia, with Teodorini, Masini, and Nanetti, is announced at the Teatro Real, Madrid.

A new opera, Das Andreasfest, by Carl Grammann, has been produced at the Theatre Royal, Dresden.

Moran-Olden's series of performances at the Stadttheater, Leipsic, has led to her re-engagement for 1884.

The management of the Italian Opera, Tunis, has failed. (Parisian Opera-goers are jealous.—Dr Blidge.)

Handel's Judas Maccabæus has been given at the Dreikönigskirche, Dresden, under Baumfelder's direction.

Kansas City will have a Musical Festival in February, which Theodor Thomas is engaged to conduct.

Wilhelm Hill's prize opera, Alona, was recently produced, with moderate success, at Frankfort-on-the-Maine.

Louis Roth, conductor of the Josephstädter Theater, Vienna, has written a buffo opera, Der Marquis von Rivoli.

In consequence of ill-health, the danseuse Paolina Zamperoni has cancelled her engagement at the San Carlo, Naples.

Gounod's Redemption has been sung in its entirety by the choir at the Park Reformed Church, Jersey City, New York.

Edmund Neuport, the Norwegian pianist, who made his début in New York, is announced to play this month in Boston.

A new opera, Muzedin, by S. Bachrich, is to be produced, after Gounod's Redemption, at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna.

Tschaikowsky, the Russian composer, has completed a new opera, Massepa, the book founded on a poem by Pouschkin.

The Choral Society of Ghent will give, this winter, a concert with a programme consisting exclusively of compositions by Massenet.

Mr Charles Lyall has returned to London, the operatic tour in which he took a conspicuous part having come to a temporary end.

Aimée, the popular singing-actress now in the States, has been prohibited by her physician from publicly appearing more than once a week.

Marie Pappenheim—a Norma and Fidelio not to be sneezed at (ask "the Long Captain")—is engaged at the Teatro Bellini, Palermo.

"An old Californian," we read in the New York Music and Drama, "says the first opera ever given in San Francisco was La Sonnambula."

The Prince and Princess of Wales witnessed the performance of Messrs Gilbert and Sullivan's Iolanthe at the Savoy Theatre on Saturday night.

We read flattering accounts, in various foreign journals, of recent successes achieved by Miss Fernanda Tedesca, the young and gifted American violinist.

Donizetti's "posthumous" opera, Il Duca d'Alba, with De Cepeda and Stagno in the leading parts, will be performed next season at the Liceo, Barcelona.

After their débuts in Florence, Nina Friede, Paula Novak, and Ida Myers-Morena, pupils of Mdme Marchesi, have been engaged respectively at Palermo, Venice, and Pisa.

During his recent concert-tour Alfred Grünfeld, the pianist, visited Warsaw, St Petersburgh, Moscow, and Odessa. He will shortly undertake tours in France and England.

The Opera Festival, Cincinnati, in which, according to report, both Adelina Patti and Albani will sing, is fixed for January 29th. (The other day it was Patti, Nilsson, and Albani.—Dr Blidge.)

The Pergola, Florence, has been taken for the Carnival season by pretty little Bianca La Blanche, who intends producing Fornari's Zuma (first performed at the Teatro Bellini, Naples), the Faust of Gounod, &c.

"And who," asked the Young-Lady Teacher, "comes after Esther?" There was a pause. "Was it," she continued, "Job?" "No, Miss," replied the Pupil, "it was Billy Piper's big brother. I see him a Sunday."

Anton Rubinstein's Ocean was performed at the second Symphony-Concert of the Russian Musical Society, Moscow. Rubinstein conducted the band of the Russian Musical Society of St Petersburgh at Etelka Gerster's third concert.

The Commander in Chief, H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge, has been pleased to accept the dedication of a "Quintet for Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, and Bassoon," composed by Carli Zoeller, bandmaster 7th (Queen's Own) Hussars.

Miss Emma Thursby, we learn from an American contemporary, has recently sung "with fine success" at a concert in Brooklyn. ("Fine success" is good.—Dr Blidge.) During her visit to Boston, Miss Thursby was the guest of Mrs Ole Bull, widow of the well-known violinist.

Having concluded their engagement at the San Carlo, Lisbon, the mezzo-soprano, Pasqua, and the tenor, Gayarre, have been singing in Oporto. Gayarre was a great favourite in Lisbon. The bills of a recent Corrida de Toros (Bull Fight), given in his honour, were headed: "Homenagen ao celebre cantor Gayarre."

Arditi's L'Estasi.—In the music lesson scene of Il Barbiere di Seviglia, Mdme Adelina Patti rendered Arditi's beautiful waltz, "L'Estasi," with a brilliancy and taste that carried away her audience. It was encored vociferously, and Mdme Patti sang it again with more spirit, if possible, than at first.—American paper.

Mr and Mdme Bodda (Miss Louisa Pyne) announce that a concert will be given by the students of their "Academy for Singing" on Tuesday evening next, at the Marlborough Rooms, for the benefit of the "Frithville Memorial Homes for Reduced Gentlepeople." We hope that so excellent a purpose will cause the entertainment to be liberally patronized.

The Pandora Theatre in Leicester Square is to be ready for opening towards the end of January. Meanwhile, the company appear at Her Majesty's Theatre, which will open for a brief period under Mr Alfred Thompson's direction on the 30th inst. with a "grand spectacular Feerie" by Mr Robert Reece and the lessee, called The Yellow Dwarf. Mr Telbin will prepare the scenery—a right man in a right place.

The ballet of Prometheus with Beethoven's music was first brought out, for the benefit of a danseuse named Casentini, on the 21st or 28th March, 1801, at the Kärntnerthor-Theater, Vienna, its full title being, Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus oder die Macht der Musik und des Tanzes. (The Beings created by Prometheus, or, the Power of Music and Dancing.) It achieved only a moderate success. The version now adopted is that of Herren Frank and Degen, conductor and ballet-master respectively at the Theatre Royal, Hanover.

At the annual meeting of the shareholders of the Blackpool Winter Gardens, the chairman (Mr W. H. Cocker) stated that the company claimed £500 from Mdme Sarah Bernhardt on account of breach of engagement in August last, as she said through ill health, but, as the directors said, through bad temper. It was also said that Mdme Bernhardt had paid £270 on account. (Thus much according to "Cocker." Gallant chairman, gallant shareholders! And "Mdme Bernhardt has paid £270 on account!"—Dr Blidge.)

Mr Irving is having reprinted in the form of a pamphlet, with a brief preface by himself, the essay of Talma on the Art of Acting, which was published in an early number of the Theatre by the wish of Mr Irving, who thought that it would probably be of service to brother actors. As at present there are appearing works of value on the art in its physical manifestations, it may interest many to whom the stage is dear to read, or re-read, the views of such an actor as Talma on the question in its intellectual aspect. The pamphlet is to appear shortly, and the proceeds of its sale, if any, are to be given to the Actors' Benevolent Fund.

A curious musical entertainment has been recently arranged at a circus in the Champs Elysées. Round the circus are supported a variety of instruments, including bells, flutes, cymbals, drums, oboes, &c., connected by wires with a key board in the middle of the circus. There is also, in the space below the circus, a machine similarly connected, which gives a sound, as it were, of earthquakes. An orchestral piece is performed on four trumpets in the centre, one of the performers, by pressing now and again an electric key-board, bringing into action the distant instruments as required; now a drum beat, now a play of bells, imitation of bird-song, &c. He is also enabled in the same way to produce far off detonations, and ignite blue lights. A strange impression is produced.—(Very strange.—Dr Blidge.)

Some two months ago, arrangements were announced for holding a musical festival in Handsworth parish church in aid of the fund for providing additional elementary school accommodation in Handsworth, so as to obviate the necessity of a School Board. The promoters hoped by such means to make up an amount entitling them to the fulfilment of certain promises by which the sum of £5,000 was to be raised; but the Bishop of the diocese, who is opposed to musical entertainments in churches, placed his veto upon the scheme in a letter to the wardens:—"Gentlemen,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th inst. You are, however, under an entire misapprehension as to my having given any sanction to the entertainment which you propose to hold in the parish church. It would be impossible for me to approve or allow such a service to be held where admission is to be obtained by payment, however indirectly that payment may be made. It would be all the more difficult for me to approve in this case when I took so decided a line with reference to a similar entertainment in the parish church of Tamworth last year. Yours faithfully, W. D. Lichfield."—(Put not your faith in Bishops.—Dr Blidge.)

Carlsruhe.—The management of the Grand Ducal Theatre has been distinguishing itself. The bills pasted against the walls contain the following notice with reference to the ballet of Prometheus: "For cast, &c., see other side."

Genoa.—A tablet with the following inscription has been affixed to the house where Paganini first saw the light: "A great honour fell to the lot of this modest house, in which, on the 27th October, 1782, Nicolo Paganini, unsurpassed in the divine art of Tone, was born, to the glory of Genoa and the delight of the world."

"This collection consists of eight separate part songs, so connected as to be singable together or apart, and suitable either for unaccompanied or accompanied singing. Mr Maynard's idea is distinctly new, and likely, we should imagine, to be welcomed by choirs and choral societies. 'Out of Town' is conceived, as regards the words, in a spirit of simple, unpretentious fun; while the music is in many parts far superior to the music we usually find in the company of humorous words. The singers in No. 1 resolve to go into the country. Mr Maynard has taken the first phrases of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, and scored them for four voices. This has been ingeniously and tastefully done, without any liberties with the original being taken. No. 2 is a charming arrangement in the same manner of the Nocturne from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream; the words celebrating the pleasures of the country. It makes a very good part song: No. 3 is called the 'Charms of Rural Life,' and is of a more humorous character. The music is that of the clown's dance in the Midsummer Night's Dream, which has been cleverly dealt with. In No. 4 Mr Maynard brings his singers in contact with a bull, who soon dissipates their notions about the charms of rural life. It is a vigorous and effective part song. No. 5, 'In the Woods,' is preceded by a charming prelude (andante) for the pianoforte or the orchestra, which is, we think, the most artistic writing in the book. It is melodious and harmonized with refinement. The song itself is a reminiscence of the bull incident. The party recovers its equanimity and goes on the water. The men's voices in this song (No. 6, 'On the Water') are extremely effective, forming a flowing accompaniment to the female voices. No. 7, 'The Picnic,' begins with a four-part fugue, of which the effect is very comic. The theme is set to the words, 'Bring forth the lamb,' &c. It is carefully worked out. The unfortunate people find very soon that they are sitting on a wasp's nest; their terror being very brightly rendered by a clever accompaniment of voices. In the last song they are brought home again, sadder and wiser. Some bars of 'Home, Sweet Home' are cleverly interwoven with the song, and produce an original effect. These songs are certainly original, and they are written in a thoroughly musicianly style. There are no vulgar efforts or jocularity, and no clap-trap melodies. They ought to be popular. Some of the songs are as good in their way as anything Mr Maynard has written."—"Lloyd's News," 4th November, 1882.

GRASP THE FLAG!

Patriotic Song.

Words by CARLEON.

Music by

HUGH CLENDON.

"Grasp the flag! We fight for England!
Grasp the flag and clear the way;
English men will English honour
Keep untarnished as the day.
Though opposing foes a barrier
Wall of iron should oppose;
English pluck and English daring
Front the steel, nor failure knows!"

"The victory of our arms in Egypt gives some actualité to this spirited song. As its title announces, it is decidedly martial. The words, by Carleon, are simple and vigorous, and easily singable, while the music is stirring and melodious enough to make 'Grasp the Flag' a popular patriotic song."—Lloyd's Newspaper.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.*

The programme of the second Society's Concert was neither planned nor carried out under a lucky star. It offered us, it is true, only eminent composers, but somehow or other diminished—either by the mode of selection or form of execution. In the latter respect, Herr de Ahna was first to disappoint us by his rendering of Spohr's Violin Concerto in D minor. Of all Spohr's Concertos this is most frequently heard now-a-days, and the way in which Joachim especially played it has left a deep and delicious impression on us all in Vienna. A virtuoso who presents himself with it before the public must at least (!) come near Joachim.† Herr de Ahna has not great tone, but for this we might forgive him, as well as many of his colleagues, were the tone always pure and his execution more uniformly correct and expressive. The Adagio proved more successful, though occasionally spoiled by excessive sentimentality, but technically at least it was irreproachable. The finale, devoid of rhythmical life, seemed to indicate that the performer had no sympathy with it. For many years Herr de Ahna has occupied a prominent position in Berlin, which induces us to think that on the present occasion indisposition may have prevented the full display of his capabilities. There was no lack, however, of applause and calls (Herr de Ahna, as we know, is a native of Vienna.)—Another composition, which we all love and value, surprised us by the new garb in which it was for the first time presented. I mean the Adagio from Beethoven's B flat major Trio, Op. 97, "arranged" by Liszt for the orchestra. The garment is a rich and gorgeous specimen of ornamental tailoring, such as Liszt alone is capable of turning out—but the simplicity of the old Beethovenian dress is far more beautiful and becoming. Nay, Beethoven's scoring of this Adagio—pianoforte, violin, and violoncello—is more than a mere dress; it is the very skin of the delicate body, and cannot be stript off without inflicting severe injury; and no other was the exact tone-colour in which Beethoven beheld his superb creation, fashioning it from out the innermost nature of the three instruments. In a word, a Pianoforte Trio is not suited for a full orchestra. If, moreover, we have to do with a trio which combines and contrasts the three instruments with absolute perfection, we fail to see that any advantage is gained by pompous orchestration.

Earnest criticism ought to protest the more strongly, because instances of this uncalled for scoring and over-arranging have become a fashion. The more sparing their own flow of ideas, the more industriously do some composers bestir themselves in decking out those of others.—Another orchestral composition at the last Society's Concert was the overture (Sinfonia) to J. S. Bach's Sacred Cantata, No. 49: "Ich gehe und suche mit Verlangen," for strings, two oboes, and organ. It was on this occasion scarcely in its proper place, and produced the less impression as the organ of the Musikverein's Room with its strong reverberation did not allow the rapid figuration to come out with sufficient clearness, while the alternating of the organ and orchestra, on which the principal effect depends, lacked the requisite distinctness.

The concert wound up with Franz Schubert's "Easter Cantata," Lazarus (considerably shortened). Despite some great beauties, the effect of the work in its totality is oppressive. Even in 1863, when, after having been forgotten, it was found by Herbeck, and delight at such unexpected treasure-trove, together with the charm of novelty, secured for it a favourable reception, I could not quite share the general enthusiasm. Yet the first performance was given under far more auspicious circumstances, and in a more correct form, than the present one. Herbeck gave Lazarus in the small room, in the evening, and in Passion-Week, that is to say—at the right time and in the right place. The work, with its first part laid at the death-bed, and its second, at the place of burial, belongs to Passion-Week or All Saints' Day, when a reverent greeting awaits it, just as upon a lower level, but in a like spirit, a similar greeting awaits the annual performance of Der Müller und sein Kind. In a large room, the instrumental part of Lazarus is lost, just as the gentle perfume of the pious songs of death is lost on the thousand-headed audience of an afternoon concert. To enter again into the details of the work would be superfluous. After the first performance it was played again in Passion-Week, 1868; but the second was less successful than the first, while the third, and most recent, was less successful than the second. That some of the pieces belong to the finest Schubert has left us is a fact no more to be questioned than that the work as a whole cannot be reckoned among his happiest inspirations. Even Schubert's rich store of musical ideas could not counterbalance the fatal monotony of the book. In addition to his wealth of melody, he must have possessed the pathos of Beethoven and the polyphonic mastery of Bach fully to master the tearful uniformity of his subject. The continued adherence to the same frame of mind, musically represented by the predominance of the slow tempi in "four-four," by the long arioso recitatives, by the absence of bass and contralto in Part I., &c., must end by wearying. We miss most painfully the compensation of polyphonical treatment and vigorous choral writing. The chorus is introduced only at the end of each part, and on both occasions as a slow song of lamentation. These peculiarities impart to the whole almost the character of a vaudeville, leaving out of consideration a total absence of the epic element, indispensable to a strict oratorio style. Between touchingly beautiful numbers there are many others chiefly remarkable for effeminate sentimentality. But the cause of all this, as we have hinted, is to be found in the book, and could no more be hidden at the last performance than at the first. Notwithstanding the efforts of the conductor, Herr Gericke, the work was not well executed. Herr Walter is to be praised for his singing as Lazarus, and, so far as his means permitted, Herr Storwitz as Simon. Mdme Ehnn, as Jemima, was an inadequate successor of Mdme Wilt.

TEN ORIGINAL SONATAS.

(From the "Daily News.")

Ten original sonatas for the pianoforte are about to be published—by subscription—through the eminent firm of Rudall, Carte & Co. The scheme has been organized by Mr Henry W. Carte, who has secured the promise of an original work of the important class referred to from each of the following composers:—Dr Ferdinand Hiller, Herren Gade, Grieg, Reinecke, and Dvorak, Sir J. Benedict, Professor Macfarren, Mr C. E. Stephens, Mr J. F. Barnett, and Mr C. V. Stanford. The project is an artistic one, and deserves especial success in days when the symphonic form of pianoforte music has been almost entirely superseded by compositions of a lighter character.

[Let us hope that the ten sonatas may not only be "original," but good; that the composers, in short, may tread in the footprints of undisputed masters, rather than stumble about in the dark, confounding the "nature of things," after the manner of some recent "epoch-makers," cherished and ministered to by the "advanced people." That "H. J. L." will set to work, practising them all at a breath, may be taken for granted. We wish every success to the scheme.—D. T.]

CHRISTMAS.*

Hail, Christmastide! Fair time of joy and peace,
When all domestic graces sweetly flower;
Love, which doth now in every heart increase,
Pervades, with influence blest, the social hour.

The children's voices, on this happy morn,
Ring out, like silver bells, so sweet and clear;
Let none presume their simple mirth to scorn—
To-day the Christ-child unto them is near.

Methinks bright angels now bend over earth,
And breathe, in tender love, the sweet old tale
Of the Redeemer's lowly-cradled birth,
Whose pathos through all time shall never fail.

Now ring the Christmas chimes with joyous peals—
Their music seems to Heaven our earth to bind;
And o'er each listening heart so softly steals
A sense of goodwill unto all mankind.

* Copyright. SARAH ANN STOWE.

DRESDEN.—Auber's Muette, with new scenery and dresses, has been revived at the Theatre Royal, but the performance was hardly worthy of the place or the work.—Teresina Tua has been playing at the Hôtel de Saxe, exciting, as usual, the utmost enthusiasm.

THE ODE TO THE PASSIONS.

The custom of producing new works at the great provincial musical festivals, wherein the composer has the advantage of a well-trained choir, excellent orchestra, and the best available vocal and instrumental talent of the day for the interpretation of his or her composition, is both a judicious and commendable one. There are many reasons, however, against receiving the dictum of a festival audience as a final standard of judgment; hence another and equally important custom has obtained in connection with festival essays of a successful character, namely, that of submitting the work produced to the verdict of a metropolitan audience. Such a course will, undoubtedly, be speedily adopted in the re-production of The Ode to the Passions, by Mrs Meadows White, better known by her maiden name of Alice M. Smith. The Passions, recently performed with an unusual amount of prestige and success at the late Hereford Festival, is not the work of a tyro in the art of musical composition. Mrs M. White is already recognized as one of the musical geniuses of the day. The author of The Mask of Pandora, and many other excellent classical compositions, her writings are highly esteemed by the most judicious art critics, and form the best answer that can be rendered concerning the oft-mooted question of "the feminine in music," and whether woman can or cannot shine as well in the ranks of musical composition as in other branches of high art. In discussing this question, it seems to have been forgotten that women hitherto have had no opportunity of experience in the orchestra; and as one month's practical knowledge of orchestral effects and possibilities is worth one year of theoretical training, those works which include all the resources of elaborate instrumentation could scarcely have been expected to emanate from the ranks of feminine musicians. Whatever may have been the disabilities under which female composers have hitherto laboured, certain it is that Mrs Meadows White has nobly fought against and triumphantly conquered them; for her works not only display original talent for composition of the highest order, but they are scored and instrumented throughout with a vigour, power, and completeness worthy of any name distinguished in the annals of musical art, whether that name indicates the authorship of a master or mistress. Dr Blinge has well remarked that "all art work is personal to the worker." If, then, Mrs Meadows White can score, avail herself of orchestral resources, and, above all, write, as she ever does, with the true ring of genius, "she takes a licence in her work," and her noble compositions will henceforth sweep out of memory, to say nothing of use, the pitiful remarks of the pseudo art critic of half a century ago, such as "Pretty well—for a woman."

Without reverting to Mrs White's former productions, it is enough to say The Ode to the Passions is unmistakably her chef d'œuvre. It is, as its title implies, a musical rendition of Collins's celebrated ode of that name, the poem having been first set to music in 1774 by Benjamin Cooke, Mus. Doc. Mrs White's score is written for two soprani, contralto, tenor, and bass soli, with chorus and orchestra. There are ten numbers, the first being a short but highly effective introduction, followed by a splendid tenor solo with chorus on the theme, "Fear, Anger, Despair." This is succeeded by a pure Handelian movement for the choir, "When Music," and a graphic fugal movement for tenor, bass, and chorus, very skilfully outwrought, without being laboured or tedious. "The Pleasures of Hope," for soprano solo; "Revenge and Pity," bass solo; and the grand chorus, "Jealousy," are each fine pieces of characteristic writing, and form a crescendo in the interest of the work of a marked description. Nos. 6, 7, and 8, "Melancholy," "Cheerfulness," and "Joy," are complete musical studies, and are sufficient in fragmentary shape to ensure a high reputation for their gifted composer. "Love and Mirth"—No. 9—forms a charming theme for a duet between the tenor and soprano, the last number—a stately and massive chorus to the theme of "Music"—bringing the work to a grand climatic close. The style of this composition as a whole is in strict harmony with the poem, and yet is redolent of the age in which Collins wrote, not in the sense of being "old fashioned," for the varied emotions depicted by the poet are grandly, graphically, and forcibly interpreted in the best forms of modern art. But there is a charm in the adaptation of the words and music, which, whether derived from the feminine element of "intuition," or the loftier realm of "inspiration," realizes in its finest sense the true meaning of music—namely, to clothe ideas in expressive and highly characteristic musical phraseology. In this Mrs Meadows White has succeeded to admiration, and when musical criticism shall be regulated by musical knowledge instead of a slavish obedience to the dicta of prejudice and fashion, when English music shall be praised because it is purely English, and German music shall be admired because it represents German nationality, Mrs White's Ode to the Passions will be esteemed as worthy of any nation, and a work as truly meriting the title of "a grand tone picture" as that of any composer of any country or time.

In advance of the performance of this fine composition in the metropolis the public may be prepared to listen to it with sentiments of the highest appreciation. It is one which certainly settles the question that genius is of neither sex, and the highest scientific training owes nothing to nationality. A rare treat awaits the musical connoisseur in the production of The Ode to the Passions in London, and the gifted composer may well expect an ovation no less brilliant than that with which she was greeted at the Hereford Festival.—The Echo.

* Collins's Ode. Set to music by Alice Mary Smith. First performed at the Hereford Musical Festival, 1882.

ST JAMES'S HALL.

Under the direction of Mr W. G. Cusins, a performance of Handel's Messiah was given at St James's Hall last Saturday evening, supported by Mesdames Albani and Patey, Messrs. J. Maas and Santley as principals, with a chorus and band of 300 performers, the latter—led by Herr Ludwig Straus—selected entirely from the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society. In bringing forward the great Saxon musician's masterpiece on this occasion Mr Cusins was actuated by intentions beyond the mere desire to furnish an equivalent for the Christmas representation of the oratorio hitherto given under the auspices of the Sacred Harmonic Society. In a pamphlet circulated amongst the audience, while giving an exhaustive and interesting account of the work, its history, and of the manner in which it has fared since the death of the composer, Mr Cusins points out that, owing to want of marks of expression in the orchestral and choral parts, the performances of The Messiah are not what they ought to be. The degrees of light and shade which, according to Dr Crotch, used to be taught at rehearsal, are not to be looked for now, simply because The Messiah is never rehearsed, every performer being supposed to know it thoroughly. In this strait Mr Cusins obviously considered that a service to the cause of art would be rendered by remedying the rough and ready style of performance which had previously obtained, and giving a reading in which variety, contrast, and balance of tone were conspicuous features. We have no reason to suppose that the reform initiated by the conductor of Her Majesty's Concerts and those of the Philharmonic Society will fail to bear fruit, but, to judge by Saturday's experience, much that he wishes to accomplish has yet to be realized. How the soloists discharged their tasks can be readily imagined, indeed, no finer quartet could be dreamt of in these days; but the choruses on the whole, left much to desire. Mr Cusins conducted with praiseworthy care, and Mr Pettit supplied the organ part. There was a fair attendance but no crowd.—Standard.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Talking about the advance of music in England, look to the Guildhall Music School orchestra, composed of a hundred and odd amateur performers, all working for the love of the art, unmistakably. I have been accustomed in my native county in the north to hear the best (years ago) of the then amateur performances in England; but Mr Weist Hill, conductor of the Guildhall orchestra, has in such a short time brought this band of really loving gifted amateurs to such wonderful perfection that they feel how they are learning. One can but consider what a general love and cultivation of musical feeling there is in London, in the city, above all, and in this country, with such an intelligent "loving-music" orchestra directed by one of the best musical conductors we have ever had—Mr Weist Hill.—Yours obediently,

A NORTH COUNTRYMAN.

RIO JANEIRO.—During the Italian operatic season recently brought to a close at the Imperial Theatre, the number of performances was 41, Les Huguenots having been given 5 times; Aida, Le Prophète, Semiramide, and La Juive, 4 each; Méfistofele, 3; Il Guarany, L'Africaine, La Forza del Destino, Maria, and I Puritani, 2 each; La Traviata, Faust, Il Trovatore, Rigoletto, and La Favorita, once each.

BOLOGNA.—A flattering compliment, showing the esteem in which he is held here, has been paid Sig. Mancinelli, conductor and director of the Liceo. According to the terms on which he accepted the latter office, his appointment required annual renewal. At their last meeting, however, the Municipal Council made it an appointment for life.

A COMIC CYCLUS.

To Dr Bridge.

SIR,—Is there (I ask you, who know everything that passes or not passes) any truth in a rumour, undulating hereabouts, to the effect that, in emulation of Michael Angelo Tittmarsh Neumann's "cycles," Mr D'Oyly Carte has bent his mound upon a Gilbert-Sullivan, or Sullivan-Gilbert Cyclus, throughout Great Britain, America, and the Colonies? How refreshing would be a breeze thus everywhere globularly wafted, dispersing the fever-breeding epidemic under which we are long-suffering victims! It would clear the atmosphere of marshy miasma and prolong the existence of people not given to opiates stagnant or mephitic mists. Many of us credulously-imaginative Americans are gasping for pure air; but our eminent conductors, exotic and indigenous, persistently dose us with antidotes worse than the poison under which we have writhen. Stimulants more nerve-shaking and sleep-forbidding than those so queerly styled "Symphonic Poems" I am at a loss to conceive. They are only to be likened to the phantoms which delirium paints upon darkness.—I am, sir, with respect, yours,

A VILLAGE CONCERT.

What a relief, after smarting in throat and eyes with stingings of the fog that hugged London during the earlier days of the week, within its folds, to find oneself trotting along the road that winds its track, by the Hampshire Downs, from Petersfield to Portsmouth! Here the clouds, thrust back to their proper region, have really to make a hard fight to keep the sun's rays from falling upon the heights, still covered with snow that appears like whitest lawn thrown across the upheaved bosom of mother earth. Here the fleece of the flocks grazing on the lowlands does not present such a strong contrast to the snow, as did the sooty sheep in Regent's Park to the spotless flakes that lately fell there. Nor is there less difference in the trees. The oaks, standing as it were in mossy slippers, have their trunks covered with lichen, which, if not meant to keep them warm, makes them look clothed and clean; whilst firs and abundance of evergreens lead one to fancy that winter, as other despots, is not impartial in dealing out scourges. "Early moon to-night," said my companion as daylight was fading out of the sky; and surely there it was, looking for all the world as if it had torn a rent with its sharp horns, in the night clouds, on purpose to show me what a pretty village Horndean, the place of my destination, was. There was something in the aspect of my friend's house as I approached that awoke a doubt as to whether the perfectly quiet evening I had reckoned upon should after all be my lot; and this doubt became a certainty, for I was speedily informed of a concert that was to be held up the village at Merchistoun Hall. Although not unacquainted with the dissimulation necessary to society, I could scarcely help betraying chagrin when told I must be one of the party. Had I then escaped the din of the London music-room for rustic chantings? Well, there was no help for it, and submission followed. "Why have you," I inquired on the road, "given your schoolroom"—for that was the only public building known to me in the parish—"such a grand name as Merchistoun Hall? What made you dub a place so redolent of corduroy with so sweet a title?" Before I could get an answer our trap was driven into park-like grounds, lighted up—the strip of a moon having quickly dropt after the sun—with lanthorns such as Dogberry carried on his rounds. We were saluted at the door of the mansion, for such it really was, by sounds from an organ pealing forth Mendelssohnian strains; and entering, I was not a little charmed to find that the drawing-room, in which the company was assembled, opened upon a music-room, at the end of which an organ towered, like an Assyrian idol, up to the roof. It sounded as noble as it looked imposing, and so admirably has Mr Hunter, the builder, made the dispositions that the tone, even at full force, never falls unpleasantly loud, much less overpoweringly, upon the ear of the listener. Upon this occasion Mr Pillow, the popular professor of the district, "touched" the three-decked instrument with excellent effect and ready skill. The following ladies and gentlemen of the neighbourhood performed a well-devised programme:—Mrs G. Prior, Mrs Wilson, Miss Ord, Miss Keeley, Miss Courteney, Misses Poate, Miss Antill; Mr J. W. Pillow and Mr J. D. Antill. The last-named gentleman sang "The Message" (Blumenthal) and a Hunting Song in capital style. Mr Antill has a manly and sympathetic tenor voice, which, judging by the enthusiasm it evoked, is held by his neighbours in high repute. His sister, Miss Antill, told "A Winter's Story" with touching pathos, each word being distinctly and naturally uttered, and each phase of sentiment truly embodied. The brother and sister, I am told, belong to a family, the occupiers of Merchistoun Hall, who are all, more or less, musical. Mrs Wilson, evidently suffering from a cold, bravely attacked songs pitched in a high key, and secured sympathy, if not unbounded admiration. A cyclopean basso banged away at the "Village Blacksmith," yet, strange to say, even he, when dwelling upon the Sunday theme, did not seem altogether unconscious of the tender emotions the churchyard calls up in the breast of him who has dear ones lying there. The rough exterior is sometimes linked to a somewhat gentle heart. The glees were sung with great spirit, the church choir assisting. Indeed, the concert was held "in aid of the church choir and cricket club." A strange combination some may say, but the worthy vicar, the Rev R. F. Maynard, perhaps does not see that innocent pastime is antagonistic to religious duty. Anyhow, the concert gave great satisfaction, and it was pleasant to hear a venerable Baronet, and great landowner, on leaving, say: "I like these meetings, they bring us all together."

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The annual Christmas concert by the pupils of this flourishing school of music took place on Friday evening, in St. James's Hall, under the direction of Mr William Shakespeare. There was the usual complete orchestra of past and present students, seventy in all, while the chorus, of nearly 150 voices, consisted entirely, we believe, of young people at present running their academic course. The bringing together of such an array of performers, coupled with the executive merit made so abundantly manifest, was an achievement that reflected honour upon the institution over which Professor Macfarren presides. Moreover, it proved, whatever may be said on certain platforms, that all English students do not run abroad for a musical education, and that those who stay at home need not be forlorn of hope. Two compositions by pupils had a conspicuous place in the programme, and held that place by unquestionable right. They were a "Concertstück"—why this German word?—for pianoforte and orchestra, the work of Charles S. Macpherson, who played the solo; and a setting of Psalm 137 for soprano solo, chorus, orchestra, and organ, from the pen of F. K. Hattersley (Balfe Scholar). With the weaknesses of these ambitious efforts we do not concern ourselves, but their merits demand and deserve acknowledgment. Each is in its way and degree effective; the real value of both lying, however, in their indication of ability which further training and experience will develop. The creative department of English music was never in a more hopeful state than now, and to the realization of its promise Messrs Macpherson and Hattersley may, if they choose, contribute. Only they must continue to work by the light of classic art, and not be tempted to follow the jack-o'-lanthorns that hover over swamps and bogs. In the first part of the programme the compositions just named were associated with the overture to Die Zauberflöte, Brahms' new pianoforte concerto in B flat, and Weber's song, "O Araby," Oberon. The solo part of the concerto was divided between Miss Margaret Gyde and Miss Annie Mukle, by each of whom it had obviously been well studied. Not less clearly had Mr Shakespeare made preparation of the work a labour of love. Yet the result, however commendable as regards the performers, failed, we think, to advance the concerto in favour. Masterly the music is, beyond question; but it is also uninspired, painfully elaborated, and dry. The song from Oberon, as sung by Miss Ehrenberg, made a "hit." The lady possesses a capital mezzo-soprano voice, and uses it like an artist. She should do good service in time. The second part was wholly taken up with Handel's Ode for St Cecilia's Day, given with a new organ accompaniment by W. Sewell (Novello scholar) who, the audience were assured, had discharged his task "with reverence for the author's design, and in emulation of the manner of his time." It is satisfactory to add that an effort made in the right spirit achieved a successful result. The ode was generally well performed under Mr Shakespeare's intelligent and sympathetic direction, the orchestra and chorus being particularly good, while the solos entrusted to Misses Hardy and Thudichum, Messrs Dyved Lewis and Courtice Pounds, enabled those young artists to make a very favourable impression.—D. T.

Subjoined is the programme:—

Overture, Die Zauberflöte (Mozart); Concertstück (MS.), for pianoforte and orchestra (Charles S. Macpherson, student), Mr C. S Macpherson; Psalm CXXXVII. (MS.), for chorus, soprano solo, orchestra, and organ (F. K Hattersley, Balfe scholar), Solo, Miss Charlotte Thudichum; Concerto in B flat, No. 2, Op 83 or pianoforte and orchestra (Brahms), Miss Margaret Gyde (pupil of Mr Walter Macfarren) and Miss Annie Mukle (pupil of Mr Westlake); Song, "O Araby," Oberon (Weber), Fatima, Miss Alexander Ehrenberg; Ode For St. Cecilia's Day, Composed in 1789 (Handel, additional organ accompaniment by W. Sewell, Novello scholar), solos by Miss Kate Hardy, Miss Charlotte Thudichum, Mr Courtice Pounds, and Mr Dyved Lewis.

Mr William Shakespeare conducted.

CHERUBINI.

X.

Considering the constantly delicate state of his health, we find some difficulty in comprehending the astounding activity of which Cherubini gave at this epoch such manifold proofs. We see him, for instance, engaged, successively or simultaneously, on a number of different things which had no connection with each other, but merely prove to what a degree he was animated by an ardent and sincere love of his art, and how ready he always was to take any trouble when the glory and advantage of that art, which he so cherished, were at stake. Not only did he produce one after the other important works, not only did he write compositions more or less numerous having nothing to do with the stage, not only, as a professor at the Conservatory, did he take an interest in directing the works and studies of his pupils, but he was also the master-mind in the committees charged with planning and carrying out the excellent Methods of Instruction for the use of the establishment; while, lastly, we see him conducting likewise grand concerts in an important theatre, besides being entrusted with the direction of the musical performances at the grand national festivals which the Republican Government got up. Eager for work, always on the breach, truly indefatigable; in turn a composer, a theoretician, an orchestral conductor, and, if necessary—as we shall see presently—a polemical writer. How, we ask, could he satisfy so many demands on him and multiply himself in so prodigious a manner?

Not long after the production of Epicure, he assumed a portion of the artistic responsibility of a concert speculation, the concerts being given in the Théâtre Louvois, which then bore the name of the Théâtre des Troubadours. These concerts were thus announced in a class paper—the Courrier des Spectacles:*—

"Manager's Office of the Théâtre des Troubadours.—The public is informed that in the course of this month there will be given several concerts, in the execution of which Citizens Garat, Kreutzer, the Brothers Romberg, recently arrived in Paris, Citizeness Ribout, Dame Bertaut, and other distinguished artists will take part. The concerts will be under the immediate direction of Citizens Lefebvre, Cherubini, and Garat."

The first concert took place on the 14th Pluviôse (3rd February, 1801), and attracted a good audience; but, though the names of Garat and the two Rombergs, both remarkable virtuosos, appeared in the programme, the performance, as a whole, was not considered satisfactory; a second concert was given on the 26th, but without any great success, while a third, though announced, never came off. The enterprise died at its birth. Some months subsequently we find Cherubini taking part in the dispute which the inspectors of instruction at the Conservatory thought it their duty to sustain in the press with Lesueur, who spent his time in running down the institution, though he had formerly belonged to it. At any rate, the Courrier des Spectacles contains in connexion with this matter, in its number for the 27th Frimaire, Year X., a letter signed by Cherubini and his colleagues, Gossec, Méhul, and Martini. Cherubini also inserted in the same paper under the date of the 16th Pluviôse following, a long article in which he analyses Rameau's harmonic system while noticing Catel's Traité d'harmonie, which the author had just submitted to the special committee of the Conservatory. At the same time, he undertook with his two friends, Boieldieu and Jadin, the publication of a musical miscellany published by Mdme Duhan. This miscellany, which took the title of the Journal d'Apollon, appeared every fortnight, and was made up of French or Italian vocal pieces due exclusively to the three composers.† It was, also, shortly afterwards that Cherubini was mixed up in a commercial scheme started, doubtless, by several composers to defend their authors' rights, disregarded somewhat probably by the music-publishers. One thing, at any rate, is certain. Berton, Boieldieu, Nicolo, Méhul, Jadin, Kreutzer, and Cherubini combined to found a musical publishing firm in which they traded personally with their own works. The house was situated in the Rue Richelieu, then called the Rue de la Loi; it is the same which Boieldieu's younger brother afterwards took on his own account. The trade mark of the firm was a star with the name of one of the associated composers appearing between a couple of the rays.

Cherubini did not, however, give up the stage. He had produced nothing at the Opera since his first work, Démophon, was played there, but he now took advantage of an opportunity which presented itself. An obscure writer, named Mendouze, offered him the book of a two-act opera, Anacréon, ou l'Amour fugitif. Cherubini set it to music, and the new Anacréon, which came six years after Grétry's, made its appearance on our first lyric stage on the 11th Vendémiaire, Year XII. (4th October, 1803). It was not so fortunate as its elder, and, owing to the libretto, was well-nigh a total failure. Castil-Blaze thus speaks of it in his Académie Impériale de Musique:

"It was on a trick once played, long before our revolutions, by that sly rogue, Cupido, on the old troubadour of Teos, that two word-writers, Aignan and Mendouze,‡ knocked up a libretto for Cherubini. La Fontaine translated the ode, handing down the memory of this piece of perfidy.§ The Anacreontic libretto struck the public as very wearisome and icy cold. They received certain scenes, however, with transports of merriment, especially one in which Anacréon, when speaking to his favourite Odalisque, to ask her for something to drink, calls her: Esclave intéressante. For five minutes shouts of laughter prevented the actor from going on. Cherubini had a success, however, despite his unfortunate word-writers. . . . I will mention in Cherubini's Anacréon, the overture, which we still hear at the Conservatory; Corinne's air: 'Jeunes filles aux regards doux,' with its tender melody, graceful character, and forms so often imitated, and which has enjoyed the triple success of theatre, drawing-room, and school; 'De nos cœurs purs,' a harmonious and solemn quartet; and 'Dans ma verte et belle jeunesse,' a brilliantly effective and picturesque trio. The storm has taken its place among the most renowned specimens which have blustered on our stage from Alcyone to Guillaume Tell. When the 'Anacréon Overture' was executed for the first time at the Philharmonic Concerts, London, the audience admired it so much that they insisted on hearing it three times." ‖

The interpreters of Anacréon were Laïs as the poet himself and the admirable Mdme Branchu as Corinne. Mdlle Jaunard enacted Venus, while to Mdme Gardel was entrusted the part, both a singing and dancing one, of Athenaïs. The divertissements were danced by Vestris, his wife, Mdmes Taglioni and Coulon. Despite this cast, and despite the real value of the music, the work fell not only beneath laughter, but—a fact not mentioned by Castil-Blaze—hisses.

"The music was considered agreeable," says Babault, in his Annales Dramatiques, "but sometimes a little too learned for the style of work. This opera was the first ever hissed at this theatre, and, in this respect, will mark an epoch."

* For the 6th Pluviôse, Year IX.

† Here is the advertisement of this publication inserted in the number of the Courrier des Spectacles for the 21st Germinal, Year X.: "New Journal d'Apollon, by Citizens Cherubini, Boieldieu, and Jadin.—This periodical will appear under the title of the Journal d'Apollon. It will contain new compositions by the three musicians; each will supply two a month, which, collected, will form six pieces, consisting alternately of French romances, rondeaux, duets, and airs, and Italian duets and cavatinas or canons for three or four voices. The first number will appear on the 1st Floréal next."

‡ I do not know that Castil-Blaze had any special information about Aignan, when he coupled his name with Mendouze's. Contemporaries mention only the latter.

The press was no less severe than the public, and as the work was not withdrawn from the repertory as soon as it wished, Geoffroy, never backward with his pen, exclaimed in the Journal des Débats: "The Théâtre des Arts¶ authoritatively upholds its Anacréon against the public, who thought the old debauchee, disguised as a hero, very wearisome and very ridiculous." Geoffroy was decidedly too impatient, for the career of Anacréon was short, being limited to a total of seven nights.

PROVINCIAL.

CHELTENHAM.—There are some most enjoyable concerts given every Saturday afternoon at the Montpelier Rotunda by Mr Pollock, which are well patronized by the residents and visitors. The concert under notice, which was the seventh of the series, was exceptionally good. Messrs Cecil Traherne and Ernest Cecil were the singers. They gave some ballads and duets, which, being frequently sung by them, have become associated with their names; among these were "Stay" and "The Time of Roses," ably rendered by the singers and admirably accompanied by the composer, Mdme Mina Gould. "Eyes" (a new duet by the same composer) and "Napoli," by Signor Tosti, pleased the audience immensely, judging from the hearty applause and unanimous "call" at the conclusion of each.

LIVERPOOL.—On Tuesday, Dec. 19th, the Liverpool Philharmonic Society gave Handel's Judas Maccabæus with great success, the principal singers being Mdme Albani, Mdme Billinie Porter, Miss Damian, Mr Maas, and Mr Ludwig. Mr Max Bruch conducted.

MIDDLESBOROUGH.—The first concert of this season in connection with the Middlesborough Musical Union was given on Wednesday evening, Dec. 13, in the Temperance Hall. The singers were Miss José Sherrington, Messrs Henry Guy and Thurley Beale; the instrumentalists—Mrs Frost (harp), Mdlle Brousil (violin), and Mr J. A. Brousil (violoncello). The first part of the concert was devoted to Mr Prout's cantata, Alfred, the clever libretto to which is from the pen of Mr W. Grist, of the Crystal Palace, Sydenham. The performance throughout was eminently successful, the recitatives and solos being sung in a highly creditable manner. The choruses were well rendered, especially "Lift the Raven Standard High" (re-demanded). The singing of Miss Sherrington was admirable. Possessing one of the purest and most flexible of soprano voices, she gave the difficult passages of the soprano music with an ease and grace seldom equalled. In the second part Miss Sherrington sang "The Jewel Song" from Faust splendidly. The expression with which she rendered it will not easily be forgotten by those who heard her. Great praise is due to Mr Kilburn for the excellent way in which he conducted the orchestra.

RUGBY.—On Thursday evening, December the 14th, the Rugby Philharmonic Society held a concert at the Town Hall, when Handel's Messiah was given by a band and chorus numbering about 120, the band being reinforced by instrumentalists from Leicester and Leamington. The soloists were Miss Emily Paget, R.A.M., (who undertook the soprano music at a few hours' notice in consequence of the sudden indisposition of Miss Clutterbuck), Mrs Steel (contralto), of Rugby, Mr G. Banks, (tenor) and Mr J. Smith (bass), of Peterborough Cathedral. The trumpet obbligato was admirably played by Mr A. Robinson, of Birmingham. The band under Herr Pettersson's leadership, played splendidly, and Mr E. Edward proved himself an able conductor. Miss Emily Lawrence presided at the (Estey) organ, and the performance altogether was a great success. The hall was densely crowded and many were unable to gain admission.

CORK.—The second concert of the Cork Orchestral Union was held on Tuesday afternoon, December 19th, in the Assembly Room. The attendance, though large and fashionable, was not as great as if the concert had been held in the evening; but the busy time of the year may account in a great measure for the slight falling off. The feature of this concert was the production of a Grand Fantaisie de Concert, and a better description of it could not be given than in the following: This "fantasia, or 'tone-picture,' is intended to represent musically the different incidents connected with a battle. In the middle part of the last century, a musician of some degree of ability, named Franz Kotzwara (who, for a period, resided in Cork), composed a piece entitled the 'Battle of Prague,' which was in much vogue among pianoforte players about fifty or sixty years a. o. The present fantasia is founded on the lines of Kotzwara's work, some of its themes being partly used as subjects. The orchestral score contains some brilliant effects, the 'attack' movement being specially vivid, while the peculiar discords in the slow movement (in F minor), combined with the wailing characteristics of the instrumentation, are made to represent the 'Regrets for the Slain.'" This work is the composition of Mr W. Ringrose Atkins, the talented conductor and director of the Union, and was selected by the "Alliance Musicale" of Paris and London as one of the four large works to be brought out in their journal for the present year. On the whole, the concert was a decided success, and reflects the greatest possible credit on Mr Atkins, who deserves the thanks of the music loving portion of the Cork people for enabling them to enjoy a treat in music so very seldom afforded even in larger and more important cities.—J. F. McC.

SOUTHSEA.—The attractive programme of the concert at the Portland Hall last week drew a fashionable audience. Miss Alice Roselli gave the famous aria, "Una voce poco fa" (Il Barbiere), with great effect, as well as the popular ballad, "Forget and Forgive." Mdme Enriquez, a general and deserved favourite wherever she sings, gave Pinsuti's "Heaven and Earth" with genuine expression, as well as Blumenthal's "When the House is still." Mr Santley delighted everyone. He was in excellent voice, gaining immense applause after "Gipsy John" and "Father O'Flynn." Mr W. H. Cummings sang Felicien David's "O ma maitresse," with genuine expression. Miss Kathleen O'Reilly was the pianist. She played Chopin's Fantasia, Op. 66, and the same composer's "Berceuse," both exceedingly well. Signor Napoleone Carozzi accompanied the songs like a thorough musician.

STRATFORD.—A full house, first-class artists, a capital programme, and an enthusiastic audience, may be accounted sufficient to justify a concert being designated successful. Each of these requirements was complied with at the second popular concert at the Town Hall on Thursday evening, December 14. The singers were Mdme Patey, Miss Mary Beare, Mdme Colletti, Mr Sidney Tower, and Mr Clive. It is almost superfluous to say that Mdme Patey was enthusiastically received, and that each of her songs was encored. Miss Mary Beare and Mdme Colletti (a pupil of Signor Schira) both made their appearance for the first time before a Stratford audience, and both succeeded in making a favourable impression. Both of Miss Beare's songs were applauded, every one appearing charmed with her clear voice and finished style. Bishop's favourite song, "Tell me, my heart," was exceedingly well sung, and she had to comply with an enthusiastic recall, when she sang "On the banks of Allan Water." Mdme Colletti was not fortunate enough to secure an encore, but her singing of a fine dramatic song, "Love lives for aye," by Signor Schira was, notwithstanding, exceedingly good. Mr Henry Parker, in the unavoidable absence of Mr Wilhelm Ganz, conducted.

PAULINE LUCCA ON HERR JANNER.—Speaking in Berlin of the terrible fire at the Ringtheater, Vienna, the popular Mdme Lucca said: "The manager, Herr Janner, is as innocent as anyone ever overtaken by an unexpected calamity; the Police wanted a scapegoat for their own shortcomings, and the manager had to be that scapegoat. In our Operahouse in Vienna I feel as confident as if I were in a fireproof safe.

MR BYRON has returned to his pleasant retirement in the mazes of Clapham-park—a little cautious regarding the fogs that have lately hung heavily over London and the suburbs, but otherwise in better health and spirits than he has been at any time since the commencement of his long indisposition. The public will be glad to learn that besides the comedy which he has written for the Vaudeville, the popular dramatist is at work on pieces for Mr J. S. Clarke and Mr Toole.

MDME ROSE HERSEE.—We are glad to inform our readers, who we are sure will be equally pleased to learn, that Mdme Rose Hersee, the popular "English prima donna," has recovered from the severe illness which has compelled her, since August, to relinquish all engagements. Mdme Hersee will sing for the first time since her convalescence, at Nottingham, on Tuesday next ("Boxing-day"), in The Messiah, with Mdme Trebelli and Mr Maas, and is engaged by Mr Gye for the Promenade Concerts at the Royal Italian Operahouse, Covent Garden, in January.

On leaving Berlin, Angelo Neumann's "Nibelungen Company" proceed to Amsterdam, where they open on the 2nd and conclude on the 15th January. They then visit the Hague, Rotterdam, Brussels, Antwerp, and Copenhagen, whence they go to Denmark and Sweden. In the spring they are to give four "Wagner Concerts" in Paris (in which theatre?—Le Figaro.)

¶ The name then borne by the Opera.

PART II.—Sonata, in A major, for violoncello, with pianoforte accompaniment (Boccherini)—Signor Piatti; Song (Miss Orridge); Sonata, in G major, Op. 30, No. 3, for pianoforte and violin (Beethoven)—Herr Pachmann and Mdme Norman-Néruda.

Accompanist—MR ZERBINI.

THIS (SATURDAY) AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 23, 1882,

To commence at Three o'clock precisely.

Programme.

Septet, in E flat, Op. 20, for violin, viola, clarionet, bassoon, French horn, violoncello, and double bass (Beethoven)—MM. Joachim, Hollander, Lazarus, Wendtland, Wotton, Reynolds, and Piatti; Song, "Let me wander not unseen" (Handel)—Miss Carlotta Elliot; Barcarolle, in F sharp major, for pianoforte alone (Chopin)—Mdme Haas; Andante, in E major, and Scherzo, in A minor, posthumous, for two violins, viola, and violoncello (Mendelssohn)—MM. Joachim, L. Ries, Hollander, and Piatti; Songs, "Du bist wie eine Blume" (Rubinstein) and "Au Printemps" (Gounod)—Miss Carlotta Elliot; Hungarian Dances, for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment (Brahms and Joachim)—Herr Joachim and Mdme Haas.

Accompanist—MR ZERBINI.

BIRTH.

On November 30th, at 3, Stanhope Place, Hyde Park, W., ANTOINETTE STERLING, the wife of John Mackinlay, Esq., of a daughter.

DEATH.

On Sunday evening, Dec. 17th, at 9, Belgrave Square, after a short illness, ESTHER MATILDA JOHNSTONE, niece of the late Catherine, Dowager Countess of Essex (Miss Stevens).

MDME CHRISTINE NILSSON gave her farewell concert in New York on the 3rd inst., at the Steinway Hall. Hundreds of persons were unable to obtain admission, and the receipts amounted to 6,000 dollars.

MDME ALBANI is expected to reach New York on the 9th January, and to sing at the Symphony Society's concert on the 12th. On the 19th she is to make her operatic début in Chicago.

MDME MONTIGNY-RÉMAURY took part in a "Beethoven Festival" at Hanover, with the brilliant success to which she is accustomed.

BALFE'S anthem, "Save me, O God," was sung in St. Paul's Cathedral on Tuesday, at Evensong, for the first time there.

MR F. LEWIS THOMAS had the honour of performing a selection of music on the organ before H. R. H. The Prince of Wales, on Monday afternoon, the 18th. inst, at the residence of Sir Edward Scott, Bart., Sunbridge Park, Bromley.

MR AUGUST MANNS has gone to Glasgow, and does not return until February.

THOSE who have already in their possession the pianoforte and vocal scores of The Sorcerer, H. M. Pinafore, Pirates of Penzance, and Patience, may now enrich their library with Iolanthe, which has just been issued.

THE last Popular Concert for 1882 (20th of the pre-Christmas series) is announced for this afternoon. Joseph Joachim then leaves England to return in February and remain to the end of the 25th season (Hoch!)—only again, let us hope, to come back to England for the 26th.

THE last Crystal Palace concert, until February 10th, was given on Saturday last, conducted by Mr F. H. Cowen, whose "Scandinavian Symphony" was performed. A general view of the season thus far advanced is reserved for next week.

MR SERGEANT BALLANTINE arrived in New York on the 4th inst. It is hoped the distinguished Q.C. may give some lectures on theatrical life.

FINAL EXAMINATION FOR THE DEGREE OF BACHELOR OF MUSIC.

[Bills for Candidates.]

Thursday, December 7, 1882. 2 to 5 p.m.

HARMONY.

I. Add an Alto and a Bass part to the following Melody. The score must consist of three parts only.

ABBEY. The Scotch Pealter, 1615.

II. Resolve the following chord (1) in the key of A minor, and (2) in that of D major.

Afterwards, by enharmonic change of notation, resolve the chord in at least six other keys. In every case let the progression be preceded and followed by suitable chords to complete the musical phrase.

III. Write parts for Soprano, Alto, and Tenor (each in its proper clef), according to the figuring, above the following Bass. Insert occasional passing notes in any of the parts. All discords except passing notes must be prepared. State, by number of the bars, where and into what keys the music modulates.

IV. Complete the accompaniment to the following melody by the addition of a part, for Viola, according to the figuring. The added part should consist mostly of quavers in arpeggio broken by occasional diatonic or chromatic passing notes, but one or two chords may be introduced if these can be played by "double-stopping." Mark the bowing. State, by number of the bars, where and into what keys the music modulates.

CONCERTS.

LONDON CONSERVATOIRE OF MUSIC.—An event of interest to the friends of this institution took place at Burlington Hall on Saturday evening, when a concert, organized by the pupils, was given as a "setting" to the ceremony of presenting Mr Lansdowne Cottell, founder and principal, with a handsome testimonial in recognition of "his talent and the great attention bestowed by him upon each student individually." The hall was crowded by an audience quite in sympathy with the occasion, so that Mr H. Schlesinger, who made the presentation on behalf of 258 subscribers, had an easy task in creating the necessary amount of enthusiasm. Mr Schlesinger delivered a brief address, touching upon various abstract considerations in connection with music, but finding his audience more completely with him when extolling the merits of Mr Cottell. Two other gentlemen spoke to the same purpose, referring, likewise, to the position of a music school which, established in 1876, now contains a large number of students, some of whom, by an admirable arrangement, receive a free education. In response, Mr Cottell was satisfied to thank his friends, believing, perhaps, that anything more could best be done by the pupils themselves, who would show the measure of efficiency with which the work of the Conservatoire is carried on. The concert, as a note to the programme stated, was intended to represent "a lively manifestation of good-will rather than the classical element of the institution," and on the basis of this fact the students made a plea for indulgence. It may be that the request was superfluous, and, in any case, the audience entered heartily into the seasonable idea of a "lively manifestation of goodwill" by bestowing cordial, yet not indiscriminate, applause upon the performers. Such an occasion and such labours are not for criticism. The work done had widely various degrees of merit, some of it being advanced, some of it elementary, but every effort was tendered by the "simpleness and duty" on which Shakespeare's Athenian Duke set so great value, and this made it welcome. It is unnecessary to go into the details of a concert devoted to songs and light instrumental pieces. Enough if we indicate the features recognized as most worthy. Among these were Mr H. Colonieu's facile playing of a flute solo on airs from Il Trovatore; Mr George Sumpter's rendering of Liszt's wild transcription of the quartet in Rigoletto; the singing by Madame Aubrey of "O luce di quest' anima;" and, by Miss Emilie Conyngham, of Bishop's "Lo, here the gentle lark." The last-named made a very lively impression, justly traceable to a voice of more than average excellence, and to ability beyond common. D'Alquen's "In cellar cool" served Mr Alfred Hervey for the display of a genuine bass voice and a bold, manly style—merits recognized and rewarded by an encore. Among other students who attracted notice were Miss Blanche St Clair, Miss Thilemberg, and Mr T. A. Sisley. These all served to indicate the carrying on of vigorous work under Mr Cottell's supervision, while there were not wanting signs of a spirit of enterprise which will one day, perhaps, attempt the erection of a building for the use of the school.

MDME SAINTON'S ACADEMY.—Among the students' concerts usual at this season, the one given by the pupils of Mdme Sainton-Dolby's Vocal Academy always takes a conspicuous place on account of merit. There is reason to believe that the performance given in Steinway Hall on Thursday evening would have created even more than average satisfaction, but for the influences of our genial climate, which made such inroads upon the resources at Mdme Sainton's command that she thought fit to proffer an explanation. The audience, however, had little reason to complain. A long programme was set before them, and the standard of executive merit, having regard to the youth and inexperience of those engaged, deserved approval. Among the students who earned words of encouragement and praise were the Misses Walton, Willis, Lord, Killik, and Amy Carter. Several of these ladies had been heard before on one or more similar occasions, so that it was possible to note the satisfactory progress made under the care of their accomplished teacher. The first appearances were those of Miss Walton, who sang Costa's "Turn thee unto me" (Eli), and of Miss Willis, whose song was Handel's "Eyes cease from weeping." Criticism here would be out of place, but not so an injunction to persevere in a course entered upon under favourable and promising circumstances. Miss Lord, an American lady, with a fine, rich contralto voice, showed marked improvement in Gounod's "There is a green hill far away," and Miss Killik gave Mdme Sainton's favourite song, "I cannot forget," so well that she was called upon to repeat it. As for Miss Carter, who has long been one of the most hopeful students in the Academy, her rendering of Schubert's "Resting Place" and "The Post" was marked by qualities, both natural and acquired, that should one day become better known. It is pleasant thus to note the signs of merits in young aspirants; it will be still more agreeable to see the pupils working on assiduously, considering nothing done while anything remains to do. "Rome was not built in a day," and the making of a singer is in some respects a finer achievement than the raising of a city. Mdme Sainton was, as usual, assisted by several of her former pupils, those who rendered most valuable service being Miss Adela Vernon and Miss Hilda Coward. Mr Arnold, the talented violin pupil of M. Sainton, also attended, and played some Spanish Dances by Sarasate in capital style, obtaining an easy encore. Concerted music once more formed an attractive feature in the programme. The works presented were Smart's "Night sinks on the wave"; Mendelssohn's motet, "Laudate pueri"; Lassen's "O, holy night"—solo by Miss Coward, violin obbligato by Mr Arnold; the Spinning Chorus in Der Fliegende Holländer (encored); and Mackenzie's "Waken, waken." All these, conducted with much skill by M. Sainton, were given in a style so correct and refined that the pleasure of listening had no drawback. Mr Leipold presided at the pianoforte throughout the evening.—D. T.

TUFNELL PARK CHORAL SOCIETY.—Gade's Psyche was selected for performance by this society on Tuesday evening, Dec. 12th, when the choral results justified the choice, and further demonstrated the value of such a musical body to dwellers in the north of London. It is no little benefit to have the newest and highest works of art brought to the neighbourhood for weekly practice, and public interpretation. The members, on the occasion under notice, showed, by precision and attack, as well as an intimacy with, and a mastery over the varied characteristics of the choruses, that they had paid close attention to the teachings of their able and indefatigable conductor, Mr W. Henry Thomas. Whatever may be the ultimate position of Psyche, whether it prove to be a piece, running for a brief season, and then laid for ever by, or become a standard work, time will reveal. But at present it certainly suffers no neglect, and should such befall it, the English translator will not be charged with failing to use the utmost efforts of his imagination to bring the mythological story exactly to suit the modern ethical palate. Might he not be charged rather with uncommon daring for placing Psyche in the "argument" to represent the human soul undergoing preparation for lasting happiness? Painters and sculptors, as well as poets, have conspired to put a very different complexion on the myth, and perhaps evangelical teachings tagged on the erotic fiction, are a little out of place. But however this may be, it is certain that "words" cannot kill music, or it would have been dead and buried long ago; and Gade's art is probably strong and bright enough to shine through verbal mists. In every page of the work refined taste, technical skill, and fluent expression are made manifest, but at the same time powerful feeling and dramatic force are not so readily detected. The fancy and judgment of the listener are appealed to more than the passion and emotion of the heart. There is nothing in it one could wish unsaid, but a great deal that might have been uttered with more marked emphasis. The musical student will, especially if he hears it with an orchestra, always find agreeable instruction, but the general public will scarcely be moved to enthusiasm. In the absence of a band Mr Frank L. Thomas presided at the pianoforte with commendable skill. The part of Psyche was rendered in a musicianly manner by Miss Margaret Hoare, who brought to the trying music not only the advantages of a cultivated voice, but also the perceptions of a true artist. Mr and Mrs Grylls imparted significance to the music allotted them, and Mr Fred. Partridge sang with ability, while Mr Lewis Thomas did excellent service. The chorus, as it has been already intimated, was altogether without reproach. In the second part of the programme Mendelssohn's setting of the "Forty-second psalm" was given, wherein the members of the Society again acquired distinction; neither should the singing of Miss Bailey and Miss Argent go unchronicled. Miss Bailey has a remarkably sweet voice, that needs only self-command to be heard in all its fulness. Mr George Cox, singing with great success, was awarded an encore. Gounod's Christmas Carlo Bethlehem, a novelty, was very heartily appreciated. At the close of the concert the conductor Mr W. Henry Thomas received an ovation.—S. Y.

Musical Artists' Society.—A critical audience assembled in the concert room of the Royal Academy of Music on Saturday evening, Dec. 16th, to decide on the merits of the new compositions produced under the auspices of the above Society. As on former occasions a judiciously-constructed programme afforded unmixed pleasure to the large gathering. First on the list was a "Toccata and Fugue" for the organ, composed by Mr E. H. Thorne, well executed by Mr E. H. Hawthorne. An effective ballad, "The Fisherwife," the composition of Miss Oliveria Prescott, the talented authoress of a series of articles on "Form and Design in Music," and other interesting works, followed, and was well "told" by Miss von Hennig, who, we understand, came forward at the last moment, the lady who had undertaken to sing it being unable to appear. Miss Prescott's ballad, accompanied by the composer, made a decided "hit." Mr J. Baptiste Calkin then presented six characteristic "Tone pictures," entitled "Youth and Age." As was to be expected from the sympathetic rendering by this clever composer the various "pictures" received adequate colouring, and the kaleidoscopic points showed distinctness and boldness of treatment that evoked considerable applause. Mr W. H. Holmes came next with a seasonable song, "Ah, help the poor," his appearance on the platform calling forth a spontaneous burst of applause. Mr Frank Holmes was the singer, but was evidently labouring under the disadvantage of a cold. Two pianoforte solos, by Mr Charles Gardner, "Deux Morceaux Caractéristiques," and "Impromptu in A flat," capitally rendered by Mr Henry Smith, evinced his musical faculty in an eminent degree. Mr George Gear was to the fore in "Sweet visions," sweetly sung by Miss Ellen Marchant, his second contribution being a tasteful setting of Moore's well-known words, "She is far from the land" (encored). A pianoforte solo, by Mr Arthur O'Leary, "Toccata in F major," was done full justice to by Miss Frances Smith, as, from its intrinsic merit, it deserved to be. A touching song by Mr Arthur Carnall was well sung by a young artist, Miss Amy F. Martin, followed by "The Children's Song," composed by Carr Moseley, specially well rendered by Miss Henden Warde. Undoubtedly the "pièce de resistance" of the evening was Mr Charles E. Stephen's "Grand Sonata" in A flat, for the pianoforte alone. On a first hearing we can safely affirm that, as a solid contribution to chamber music, the work is worthy the composer's reputation. The opening movement, Allegro moderato, showed remarkable power and independence of idea, and this remark, in an enhanced degree, holds good of the second, Andante cantabile. The third movement, Scherzo vivace, gave a marked degree of pleasure, the finale bringing the sonata to a brilliant conclusion amid the plaudits of the audience. It had a suitable executant in Miss Edith Goldsbro'. The concert ended with a contribution, Overture Scherzo, from the pen of Mr E. Aguilar, who performed his own work in masterly style, the merits of which were suitably acknowledged.—Wetstar.

Mr Isidore de Lara had the courage to give a "Vocal Recital" at Steinway Hall on Tuesday morning, Dec. 19th, at which he was the only executant. Stop! He had the assistance of Mrs Bernard Beere, assistance as valuable as it was agreeable, the accomplished lady reciting, in perfection, Tennyson's "May Queen" and Lord Lytton's "Portrait," as well as a clever piece by Mortimer Collins. The courage of Mr de Lara deserved the Victoria Cross, and he gained it—in the form of genuine and hearty applause from a large and sympathetic audience, chiefly composed of the fair sex, as our readers, no doubt, have guessed. We subjoin the programme, as a specimen of the variety of Mr de Lara's accomplishments as vocalist and composer:—

"O Jesu Salvator" (Leo); "To Chloe" (Sterndale Bennett); "Medje" (Gounod); "Only a Song," first time (De Lara); New Song, "Aprile," first time (Tosti); "'Tis all that I can say" (Hope Temple); "Bonjour Suson" (Faure); "Long Ago" (De Lara); "Some Night," "Oriental Serenade," Badoura, and "With Smiling and Weeping" (De Lara).

Mr and Mdme Bodda's concert, given, with the aid of their pupils, at the Marlborough Rooms, on Tuesday evening, Dec. 19, for the benefit of the "Frithville Memorial Home," was musically, and, we trust, it will also turn out financially, successful. It is difficult to single out among so many young students any one for special praise, as all did their "duties" con amore, heart and soul being evidently in their work. Suffice it that their excellent training was observable in the morceaux d'ensemble, and in many of the solos entrusted to them, especially in "Casta Diva" (Norma), sung by Miss Annie Lea, and "Caro nome" (Rigoletto), by Miss Emily Parkinson. The trio, "My Lady the Countess" (Matrimonio Segreto), was admirably sung, and capitally acted by Misses Annie Lea, Schofield, and Millard, all the young students singing with precision and consequent effect, Gounod's chorus, "O Handmaids of Irene," which brought the concert to a termination. Mr and Mdme Bodda alternately accompanied the singers, and must be warmly congratulated on their success.

Mdme Reeves' "Benefit Concert" took place at Morley Hall, Hackney, on Wednesday evening, December 13th, with the assistance of Misses Ella Lemmens and Ellen Marchant; Messrs Charles Manton, W. Phillips and Joseph Lynde, as singers, and Signor Tito Mattei (pianoforte) as instrumentalist. The programme consisted principally of works by modern composers. Mdme Reeves played, with her pupil, Miss Hora, a pianoforte duet on airs from Der Freischütz, and sang "Robert toi que j'aime," and the duet "Parigi o cara" (Traviata), with Mr C. Manton, receiving the applause due to her merit both as pianist and vocalist. Miss Ella Lemmens, the charming young daughter of Mdme Sherrington, gave the waltz from Gounod's Romeo and Juliet, and a song by Molloy, "Ringing the flower bells," with fluency and taste. Signor Tito Mattei played Chopin's "Fantaisie Impromptu" and his own brilliant "Valse de concert" in capital style.

A concert was given last week at the "Bayswater Academy of Music" before a large and fashionable audience. The programme, carried out chiefly by pupils, commenced with an arrangement for eight hands of Weber's overture to Euryanthe, capitally rendered by Mdmes Biggs and Winckworth, Misses Herschell and Langley, and concluded with Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor played by the professors, Dr Helbig, Herren Henkel and Schubert. Miss Rita Mandelson, a young and clever violinist, gave with effect solos by Liuk and Dancla, and Mrs Winckworth sang charmingly Braga's well-known "Serenade," (violin obbligato, Herr Henkel). Among the most effective vocal performances was the duet "Che soave zeffiretto," from Le Nozze di Figaro, the singers being Mdmes Reuben Green and Winckworth.

Leipsic.—The 3rd of April next will be the 40th anniversary of the Conservatory, which now numbers 403 pupils. Of these, 97 are natives of Saxony, ; 218 belong to other parts of Germany; 128 to the rest of Europe; and 57 to countries beyond sea. The number of male students is 199; of female 204, married and single. Of the 128 non-German students, 65 come from Great Britain and Ireland; 17, from Sweden, Norway, and Denmark; 15 from Switzerland; 12, from Austro-Hungary; 10, from Russia; 8, from the Netherlands; and 1, from Spain. Furthermore, of the female students, 50 are English; 12, Scandinavian: 6, Russian; 4, Swiss; 5, Dutch; 2, Austrian; and 1, Spanish. (Then Spaniards are the best judges.—Dr Bilge.)

Mrs Weldon and the Birmingham Festival.—The hearing of the case "Weldon v Jaffray," which was an action brought by Mrs Georgina Weldon, trading as the Musical and Art Association, Oxford Street, London, against Mr John Jaffray, chairman of the Birmingham Musical Festival Committee, was set down for hearing on Tuesday, at the Birmingham County Court, before Mr Motteram, Q.C., the judge. Plaintiff claimed £50 as damages for breach of contract, because of the committee excluding her from the recent musical festival. She made up this amount by claiming items for festival tickets, hotel expenses, railway fares to and from London, cab hire, and lastly, £27 18s. 6d. for loss of time and money which would have been paid to her in respect of various musical criticisms which she had arranged to write. As soon as the case was called, Mrs Weldon's solicitor announced that the plaintiff was ill in bed and could not attend, but that he had seen her that morning, and had induced her to accept the terms offered by the other side. He therefore asked leave to withdraw the case. This was assented to, and the case was accordingly struck out. It was understood that the plaintiff accepted the sum of £30 in full discharge of all claims. The Festival Committee excluded Mrs Weldon from the Town Hall at the performances of the Redemption, because they feared that a disturbance might be occasioned, or that her presence might in some manner affect the proceedings. This fear arose from Mrs Weldon's own writings and M. Gounod's feelings with regard to her. The plaintiff's husband had not been joined in the summons, but the Festival Committee determined not to take advantage of this technical objection.

EXCERPTS FROM PARKE'S MUSICAL MEMOIRS.

Excerpt No. 9.

1787.

The new year's Ode was composed for the first time by Mr William Parsons, who on the death of Mr Stanley in the preceding year, 1786, was appointed master of the King's band, and composer to his Majesty.

At the King's Theatre a new comic opera, called Giannina Berdoni, was performed on the 9th of January. The music was by Cimarosa. In this opera Signora Binini, a new prima buffa, appeared with success. Her voice was sweet, and she sang with great taste. She was encored in a rondo of great beauty. Cimarosa appears to have had great comic talent. The first finale is remarkably fine. On the 4th of March a new serious opera, entitled Giulio Cesare in Egitto, was produced. The music was entirely by Handel, and selected from the various operas of that great master by Dr Arnold. Rubinelli sang the part assigned to him in a chaste and elegant style; and Mara delighted the audience in the air, "Dove sei." Rubinelli never sang with more éclat than in Handel's music. Two new performers, Signora Storace and Signor Morelli, who had been very popular in Vienna, made their first appearance on the 24th of April, in a new comic opera of Paesiello, called Gli Schiavi per amore. They were extremely successful. Signora Storace displayed a clear and powerful voice. She sang in a chaste and pleasing manner, and acted with great animation. Morelli's bass voice was of a fine rich and mellow quality, and his singing and acting were of the first order. They were vehemently applauded. Both the comic and serious opera were now perfect.

In the early part of January Mr Crosdill called on me, by desire of the subscribers, to engage me to take the place of Fischer, the celebrated oboe player, at the ladies' concerts, of which he, under the ladies' directresses, was the manager. The subscribers to these concerts were of the highest class, and were considered superior judges of music. On the first night I played a concerto on the oboe I was complimented by Lords Brudenell, Ashburnham, &c. At this time I lodged in the house of a silk-dyer in New Street, Covent Garden, which occasioned Crosdill pleasantly to observe to a friend, "It would prove an awkward thing if Parke should be wanted in a hurry, for he lives at the Poles!"

This year I became acquainted with Stuart, the well-known and admired portrait painter, who was infallible in his likenesses, though not equally remarkable for the elegance of his draperies. Sitting with him one evening at his house in New Burlington Street, he (who was a little enthusiastical, or pretended to be so), rising from his chair suddenly, exclaimed to me with great vehemence, "Sit still—don't stir for your life!" I stared at him with astonishment, thinking the man was mad, till, in a subdued tone, he added, "I beg your pardon, but your drapery, as you now sit, is very effective, and I wish to make a sketch of it before you move." A few days afterwards I dined at the house of the same artist with a large party; among whom were Mr T. Smith, a gentleman of fortune, and a very particular friend of mine, who had that day been sitting to Stuart for his portrait, and Mr Hall, the successor of that great artist Woollet, and the engraver of the fine prints, "The battle of the Boyne" and "Cromwell dissolving the Long Parliament." These masterly productions, the engraving of which took up several years' labour, were finished on the day preceding our meeting, and, according to custom, the event was celebrated in the artist's gardens, by a discharge of cannon. At that period Mr Shield, the composer, myself, and two or three other friends belonging to the Opera House, had formed a sort of Saturday night's club at the Orange Coffee House in the Haymarket, where we supped after the play and the Italian Opera were ended. It happening, during dinner at Stuart's on Sunday, that I complained of headache, Mr Smith, who had known me ever since I was a boy, said to me in his good-natured and bantering way, "I observe that on Sundays you generally have the head-ache. How happens that?"—"Oh," said Stuart, "I will tell you. If a man's head comes in contact with a club over night, it may be expected that it will ache the next day." Stuart, who had studied under the celebrated historical painter, Benjamin West, acknowledged that his income had for several years averaged fifteen hundred pounds; notwithstanding this he could not contrive to make both ends meet. Therefore, in order to avoid impertinent creditors, he at length departed for North America, his native land. To form some idea of the style of expense of Stuart, it may only be necessary to state that he forgot to pay Fribourg of the Haymarket eighty pounds, which he was indebted to him for snuff only!

Having made a new engagement with Mr Harris, the proprietor of Covent Garden Theatre, by which I secured the privilege of playing at concerts, &c., I attended those of the Prince of Wales at Carlton House, in which his Royal Highness performed on the violoncello. The band consisted of Cramer, Crosdill, Parke (myself), Shield, Blake, Schroeter, and Waterhouse. Schroeter, who had retired from public practice, performed on the pianoforte on these occasions. His style, like his music, was expressive and elegant, and his execution was neat and rapid. He played in so graceful and quiet a manner that his fingers were scarcely seen to move. The admirable pianoforte player, Miss Guest, afterwards Mrs Miles, also played in a similar way.

The Sunday concerts, for which I was engaged, commenced on the 14th of January, at Lord Hampden's. Mrs Billington and Signor Rubinelli were the singers, and Cramer led the excellent band of the professional concert. In one of the overtures the Prince of Wales and the Dukes of Gloucester and Cumberland performed. The two former on the violoncello, and the latter on the violin. The company on that occasion, which consisted of the flower of the nobility and gentry of England, amounted to at least four hundred persons; and the dresses of both ladies and gentlemen were elegant and splendid. There was, however, one gentleman present, most remarkable for the plainness of his costume, which, notwithstanding, eclipsed all the others in value. This was Count Woronzoff, the Russian ambassador, who appeared in a plain dress suite of puce-coloured cloth, the buttons of the whole of which (then worn very large) were covered with diamonds of the first water, as were his large Artois shoe-buckles, knee-buckles, and the button and loop of his chapeau bras. The sombre appearance of one part of his dress, contrasted with the brilliancy of the other, was extremely effective, and might be compared to one of the northern constellations on a clear winter night, with its stars glittering through the sable firmament. It was said that these elegant appendages were presented to Count Woronzoff by his royal mistress, the Empress Catherine.

St. Petersburgh.—The Russian Musical Society gave a special concert at the Conservatory the evening before Anton Rubinstein's birthday in honour of that event, Rubinstein being one of those who founded the Society. When he appeared in the vestibule with his Wife leaning on his arm, he was greeted with tumultuous cheering and conducted into the concert room, tastefully decorated for the occasion. In the middle of the orchestra stood his bust. The programme consisted exclusively of compositions from his pen. Professor Auer conducted.

Royal Academy of Music.—The competition for the Balfe Scholarship took place on Monday. The examiners were Messrs H. C. Bannister, Walter Macfarren, Alberto Randegger, Brinley Richards, E. Prout, Dr Steggall, and Professor Macfarren (chairman). The Scholarship was awarded to Charles K. Macpherson. The competition for the Westmorland Scholarship was held on the same day. The examiners were Messrs Frank R. Cox, Ettiore Fiori, Walter Macfarren, Alberto Randegger, and Professor Macfarren (chairman). The Scholarship was awarded to Miss Charlotte Thudichum.

Karl Eschmann.—"In the person of Johann Karl Eschmann, who died on October 27, Switzerland has lost a highly gifted musician and her most prolific 'master.' Eschmann came of a musical family. Early in the century his grandfather, Jacob, was a shoemaker at Schönenberg, with seven sons, all of whom played on some instrument or other. One became the conductor of an orchestra at Wädenswyl, another a pianist at Lausanne, two entered the French army as bandsmen. Two others became wandering musicians, and travelled with flute and fiddle over the greater part of Central and Southern Europe. One, Heinrich, after various vicissitudes, settled as a teacher of music at Winterthur, where was born to him on April 12, 1826, Johann Karl, the subject of this notice. The old man died only in October last, a few days before his son. Karl was trained to music from his earliest years, and in 1845, when his scholastic education was considered complete, he became a pupil in the Leipsic Conservatory, considered then the first music school in Europe. It was Eschmann's good fortune, while at Leipsic, to make the acquaintance of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, and became one of his private pupils. His first composition was published in 1848, and was well received both by critics and the public. On his return from Germany Karl settled at Zurich, where, besides composing, he taught music and the theory and practice of composition. He afterwards removed to Winterthur, then to Schaffhausen; but in 1866 he returned to Zurich, where he died. He was highly successful as a teacher, and his published works exceed 90. The one by which he is best known, both at home and abroad, though not the most important, is his Frühlingslieder Jugendbrevier, which for 30 years has enjoyed a well-deserved popularity."—Times (Geneva Correspondence.)

Brun, a "lyric and acting tenor," from the Theatre Royal, Copenhagen, will sing for a limited number of nights, with a view to a permanent engagement, at the Royal Operahouse, Berlin.

Herr Leschetizky, the Viennese pianist, will, next month, undertake a concert-tour, in the course of which he will visit Leipsic, Bremen, Wiesbaden, Strassburgh, Cassel, and Mannheim.

The first Patti operatic Matinée on the 2nd inst., at the New York Academy of Music, took place before the largest audience ever known in that building. The opera was La Traviata.

The medal presented in 1834 by the Decurional Council, Geneva, to Paganini, has again come into the possession of the Municipality and been placed in the same case as the renowned artist's violin.

Lo Bianco's new carol, "The Christmas Message," just published by Novello & Co., will be welcomed wherever Christmas carols are sung. Easy, bright, and effective, it cannot fail to be a favourite.

The Vaudeville Theatre is not to be so exclusively given up to old English comedy as might be inferred from its recent productions. The next piece to be brought out is a new and original comedy-drama from the pen of Mr Byron.

Battistini, the barytone, who returned only a short time since from Rio Janeiro, received by telegraph an offer from New York, but was forced to decline it in consequence of previous engagements for Madrid and London.

Mdme Colletti (a pupil of Signor Schira) made her début at a concert given at the Town Hall, Stratford-on-Avon, on Thursday evening, December 14th. She possesses a soprano voice eminently suited for dramatic music, as was apparent in her rendering of Signor Schira's fine song, "Love lives for aye." Mdme Colletti is likely often to be heard in our London Concerts during the ensuing season. The refinement of her style and the beautiful quality of her voice being sure to command attention.

Miss Frederica Jennings, a pupil of Professor Goldberg at the Royal Academy of Music, made her first appearance at the vocal and instrumental concert, which took place on Friday the 1st December, under the direction of Mr Manns, at the Crystal Palace. She sang Mr Dudley Buck's "When the heart is young," and Mr F. Clay's "She wandered down the mountain side," with decided success. Miss Jennings possesses a powerful and clear toned voice, well adapted for the soprano music in oratorios.

Messrs Puttick and Simpson last month sold by auction at their rooms in Leicester Square the orchestral music of the Sacred Harmonic Society. The prices realized were as a rule moderate. For the various relics the bidding was more brisk. The principal lots were as follows:—Crotch's Palestine, manuscript full score, the only copy known—the original score is in the British Museum; £5 5s. (Littleton.) Handel's pitch-pipe, £13 10s. (Edward and Sons.) The Chairman or President's Hammer of the Sacred Harmonic Society, made of oak taken from near Shakspere's tomb, silver mounted, with inscription, £3 10s. (Birens). Bronze statuette of Handel, after the celebrated work of Roubilliac, executed by Messrs Elkington, 22 inches high, £25 10s. (Edward and Sons). A set of 30 chromatic bells, 2 1-5 octaves, with pianoforte action, in iron and walnut-wood case, £8 15s. (Beck). A Broadwood rosewood grand pianoforte, 6¾ octaves, £10. (Bigmore). Messrs Edward and Sons who were acting for Mr George Mence Smith (a member of the Society), purchased the relics with the intention of presenting the statuette to E. H. Mannering, Esq., the honorary secretary of the Sacred Harmonic Society, as a memorial of long and pleasant musical association. The pitch-pipe, bought for the same gentleman, is especially interesting as evidence of the difference of pitch between Handel's time (1759) and the present.

LE PETIT SOLFEGE. Vingt Solfèges pour Voix de Mezzo-Soprano. Par JOS. CURCI. Price 6s. London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street.

"This work for educational purposes will be found of inestimable value, since it is one of the very few which confines itself to the cultivation of the middle of the voice; and whilst the phrases are admirably adapted to develop the breathing powers and volume of the voice, the melodies are so exquisitely harmonised that they must prove of great benefit in the improvement of the taste and ear of a student in singing."—Pictorial World.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

EIGHTY-THREE NATIONAL AND POPULAR SONGS.

THE SONGS OF EASTERN EUROPE.
ONE HUNDRED VOLKSLIEDER OF AUSTRIA, HUNGARY, BOHEMIA, SERVIA, &c.

WITH ENGLISH WORDS BY CLARA KAPPEY.

EDITED BY

J. A. KAPPEY.

Price 2s. 6d. each, paper covers; 4s. cloth.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

THE WOLSELEY MARCH.

FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

Composed, and dedicated to General Lord WOLSELEY, of Cairo, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., by MRS MOUNSEY BARTHOLOMEW.

"Conspicuous among the recent publications of Messrs Duncan Davison & Co. is the 'Wolseley March,' composed by Mrs Mounsey Bartholomew. Mrs Bartholomew is too good a musician for mere 'back' work, and her march rightly claims higher rank than that of ordinary pièces d'occasion. It is a very good thing indeed; worthy of notice for itself alone."—Daily Telegraph.

"Out of Town, a set of humorous part-songs by Walter Maynard, is an attempt to describe in an original form the experiences of a day in the country. We find plenty of interest and a good deal of amusement in the idea as carried out—none the less because Mr Maynard has taken the music of three pieces from well-known classical works, 'A Glimpse of the Pastoral' being an adaptation of passages in Beethoven's Sixth Symphony, while 'A Midsummer Dream' comes from Mendelssohn's Nocturne, and 'The Charm of Rural Life' from the same master's Clowns' Dance. The more numerous part-songs are, both music and words, Mr Maynard's own. Their character may be inferred from the significant titles, 'Beware of the Bull,' 'In the Woods,' 'In the Water,' and 'The Pic-nic.' We commend this diverting little book as a useful adjunct to a convivial season."—Daily Telegraph.

"This collection consists of eight separate part songs, so connected as to be singable together or apart, and suitable either for unaccompanied or accompanied singing. Mr Maynard's idea is distinctly new, and likely, we should imagine, to be welcomed by choirs and choral societies. 'Out of Town' is conceived, as regards the words, in a spirit of simple, unpretentious fun; while the music is in many parts far superior to the music we usually find in the company of humorous words. The singers in No. 1 resolve to go into the country. Mr Maynard has taken the first phrases of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, and scored them for four voices. This has been ingeniously and tastefully done, without any liberties with the original being taken. No. 2 is a charming arrangement in the same manner of the Nocturne from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream; the words celebrating the pleasures of the country. It makes a very good part song. No. 3 is called the 'Charms of Rural Life,' and is of a more humorous character. The music is that of the clown's dance in the Midsummer Night's Dream, which has been cleverly dealt with. In No. 4 Mr Maynard brings his singers in contact with a bull, who soon dissipates their notions about the charms of rural life. It is a vigorous and effective part song. No. 5, 'In the Woods,' is preceded by a charming prelude (andante) for the pianoforte or the orchestra, which is, we think, the most artistic writing in the book. It is melodious and harmonized with refinement. The song itself is a reminiscence of the bull incident. The party recovers its equanimity and goes on the water. The men's voices in this song (No. 6, 'On the Water') are extremely effective, forming a flowing accompaniment to the female voices. No. 7, 'The Picnic,' begins with a four-part fugue, of which the effect is very comic. The theme is set to the words, 'Bring forth the lamb,' &c. It is carefully worked out. The unfortunate people find very soon that they are sitting on a wasp's nest; their terror being very brightly rendered by a clever accompaniment of voices. In the last song they are brought home again, sadder and wiser. Some bars of 'Home, Sweet Home' are cleverly interwoven with the song, and produce an original effect. These songs are certainly original, and they are written in a thoroughly musicianly style. There are no vulgar efforts or joculartity, and no clap-trap melodies. They ought to be popular. Some of the songs are as good in their way as anything Mr Maynard has written."—"Lloyd's News," 4th November, 1882.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.*

The three Quartet Societies of Hellmesberger, Grün, and Radnitzky, commenced their subscription concerts successfully and in quick succession. Herr Hellmesberger and his colleagues are now definitively settled in the large room of the Musical Association, which they formerly used only exceptionally and, as it were, by way of experiment. Some months ago, on the occasion of such an exceptional experiment in the large room, we spoke of the evils connected with the use of so spacious a locality for a stringed quartet. Herr Hellmesberger is as well aware of them as we are, but was compelled by imperative reasons to make the best of them. The "precautionary measures" against fire, now being carried out with such passionate zeal, have so seriously decimated the rows of stalls in the small room that Herr Hellmesberger could no longer accommodate many who had for years been subscribers to his Quartets. The only thing was to remove to the large room. It was then once more proved that from evil there is always a small outcome of good. Numerous persons who had been unable to brave the fearful heat and throng in the small room, which was always crowded to excess, put themselves down as new subscribers. Something of the exquisitely delicate filigree work and cosy intimacy of the old concerts is lost, but, on the other hand, the audience can enjoy what is offered them, without being bathed in perspiration, crushed, and knocked about.

The second of Herr Th. Kretschmann's Afternoon Orchestral Concerts took place in the Ehrbar Room before a closely-packed audience. A "Sinfonietta" by H. Grädener was much applauded, while a Trio (for wind instruments) of Beethoven's, played in a masterly fashion by three members of the orchestra at the Imperial Operahouse, was received with absolute enthusiasm. Here, again, we had to do with an arrangement of which something ought at least to have been said in the programme. Beethoven's Trio, Op. 87 (dating from the year 1794), is written for two oboes and an English horn; at Ehrbar's it was played by an oboe, a clarinet, and a bassoon. As a matter of course, it is impossible to obtain from a clarinet and a bassoon precisely the same effects which Beethoven expected and wished to obtain from instruments of such a different character as the oboe and English horn. We hope that C. M. von Weber's Concerto promised in the programme will be given on a future occasion; the best of that master's clarinet-compositions, most unjustly forgotten, ought to obtain for so admirable a clarinet-virtuoso as Herr Syrinck more applause than all the modern literature of this instrument.

The second Philharmonic Concert opened with Beethoven's "Coriolanus overture," and closed with Schumann's Symphony in B flat major—both performed with admirable precision, most delicate finish, and spirited dash. We cannot, however, suppress a modest doubt with regard to two peculiarities, conspicuous not only at the present but at the preceding concert, in Herr Jahn's mode of conducting. The first is the frequent practice, as in the "Coriolanus overture," of pushing the piano and pianissimo to the extreme limits of the audible, and the second, the much too rapid tempi which prevailed in Schumann's symphony. One indisputable merit in Jahn is the discretion he manifests when accompanying operatic singing, but even a good, sound thing may be exaggerated, as we have frequently seen exemplified of late by the orchestra pianissimo at the Operahouse, where we feel almost inclined to ask why so many violins are told off to do the work. Where no allowance is to be made for the singer the instruments have to accompany, the objection against this violin whispering becomes stronger, and the grounds for its justification less. With regard to the second point, we are not fond of entering into a dispute as to any divergence from the correct time, that is, from the time that appears correct to us and has tradition on its side. This, save in the case of an indisputable mistake, is a delicate point. Of two equally good musicians, one will conceive and feel the same composition somewhat slower or quicker than the other. When criticism appears in print with its complaints, the fact can, in the first place, no longer be verified, and, if it could, there would be wanting a judge competent to decide the question. In such instances the critic can rarely do more than express his own individual feeling. If the tempi in Schumann's symphony struck me as somewhat too quick generally, and in the Scherzo even as much too quick, I can at least give Schumann himself as my authority, for the first time I heard the Symphony he himself conducted, and took it decidedly more slowly. For every one not thoroughly conversant with the work some of the most charming details in the first and last movement were, on the present occasion, lost; in the Scherzo it was not the details but the sturdy and vigorous character of the whole piece which suffered from the exaggeration of the time. Herr W. von Pachmann, the pianist, so well known from his last year's concerts, played Mozart's D minor Concerto with fine tone, perfect execution, and delicate (in the Adagio perhaps a little too delicate) feeling. The applause was boisterous and well deserved. Finally, a hearty reception was accorded to three "Legends" by Anton Dvorak. These "Legends," ten in number, appeared originally as Four-Handed Pianoforte Pieces, and it was not till subsequently that they were scored by the composer. They are some of the most charming pianoforte pieces since Schumann's time; any one called on to select the three most beautiful for performance would find his task rather a difficult one. The Philharmonicans chose No. 2 (G major), No. 5 (A flat major), and No. 6 (C sharp minor), playing all three with thorough delicacy and melodious charm. The instrumentation is bloomy, characteristic, and most purely harmonious. Dvorak has here chosen and blended the most beautiful colours, only there are perhaps too many. The "Legends" are little pictures complete in themselves and as such struck me as more pleasing and more eloquent in their plain old frame than when decked out in gorgeous-coloured orchestral ornaments. What they gain by the latter in brilliancy they lose in homogeneousness of character; however, they form a highly desirable addition to the programme of orchestral concerts. Let me here call the attention of conductors at concerts to Dvorak's Overture, which has just appeared, "Mein Heim," (Op. 62), a fresh, grateful, and effective orchestral piece. The composer has employed as motives two Bohemian Folk's-Song's; with the text of the first, which is almost extravagantly cheerful, I am not acquainted; that of the second and more sentimental is universally known under the title "Kde domóv muj?" ("Wo ist mein Heim?"—"Where is my home?"). It is not necessary, however, to be familiar with the text and import of the two melodies (which are not even mentioned in the score), nor either to know or appreciate Sclavonian, to feel delighted with this composition. Had it not been written long before Brahms' "Akademische Ouvertüre," no one could help supposing that the above clever utilization of popular students' songs had served Dvorak—who is so enthusiastic an admirer of Brahms—as a model. It is with great satisfaction that we learn from foreign musical periodicals that Dvorak's orchestral and chamber music has obtained a firm footing in Germany and England, as well as in Austria. Dresden and Hamburgh have been before us in performing his comic opera, Der Bauer ein Schelm, and even Pesth and Brünn in doing the same for his Stabat Mater. We can easily understand, however, that at a period like ours—musically unproductive as a rule, and in what it does produce reflective and fond of insignificant subtleties—fresh, natural, and original talent like Dvorak's must everywhere produce a most delightful impression. Dvorak may still want the highest qualities of a great composer, but he possesses the quality which is now-a-days rarer than any other—Naïveté.

SAINT-RAPHAËL.—The Municipal Council have named a street after Charles Gounod. It was at an hotel here that Gounod composed Roméo et Juliette, and the piano on which he preluded before sitting down to his task pen in hand is religiously preserved.

WIESBADEN.—After an absence of about six years from this, his native town, August Wilhelmj has again played here, taking part in a concert at the Kurhaus. He was enthusiastically received, the audience rising as soon as they perceived him on the platform and the band greeting him with a flourish. He played Max Bruch's first Violin Concerto and a "Polonaise" by Laub. R. Niemann, from Hamburgh, was the pianist. The orchestral pieces consisted of Beethoven's Leonora Overture, No. 3, and an overture to Hamlet by Stadtfeld, a local composer. The concert-room was lighted for the first time by electricity.

PIANOFORTE PLAYING DURING FIFTY YEARS PAST.

II.

A RECOLLECTION OF MENDELSSOHN.

A note is before me running thus:—"My dear W——, I hope you don't forget that we wish to see you all the Sunday evenings that you can spare.—Adelaide Sartoris." It is without date, but I am able to supply the omission, which marks an interesting event. It was at the beginning of 1844. Most musicians know that when Adelaide Kemble, younger daughter of Charles Kemble, married Mr Frederick Sartoris and retired into private life, she did not sever herself from those attached professional friends her brief but highly successful career had collected around her. Her Sunday evenings were delightful réunions, and those present usually came away with some ineffaceable recollection. Such an evening was the third Sunday in June, 1844, few of those who assisted at which are, to my knowledge, surviving. One particular guest made the occasion especially commemorable. Mendelssohn was there, with all that fascination of manner and singular kindness of nature which distinguished him. The Rev. Sydney Smith was also present, brimming over with good-natured jokes, yet still an attentive and enthusiastic listener. One of the singers specially invited had but recently made a very successful first appearance with the hostess, as Oroveso in Norma, and his fine voice was the theme of universal commendation. Young Weiss, fresh from the pupilage of Balfe, was conspicuous not only by his height but by his amiable and unaffected manners. There were also several distinguished noblemen, and among them Sir Robert Peel, who listened to every note Mendelssohn played with a rapture that was unmistakable. In 1844 Mendelssohn was at the zenith of his fame, exciting the greatest enthusiasm wherever he appeared. Delighted with his reception in England he has on several occasions described his satisfaction. * * * * * * The recollection of his pianoforte playing will ever be a happy memory to all who heard him, but the remembrance of an evening like the one I am trying to describe had something in it even more noteworthy.

Mdme Sartoris had sung from memory a Scotch ballad (she was celebrated for her singing of such music)—one that was new to Mendelssohn, who was so delighted with her unaffected delivery that he at once expressed a desire to hear it again, and to play an accompaniment on the pianoforte. When the song was over, he continued to sit at the pianoforte, the melody of this simple ballad evidently haunting him. Some one—I think it was Sir Robert Peel—longed to hear Mendelssohn extemporize, and those grouped around the piano warmly seconded the request. At first Mendelssohn hesitated, his more intimate friends knowing how great a mental effort such exhibitions entailed upon him, and he, perhaps, not altogether unmindful of the many exacting works at that time occupying his attention.* When, however, Mdme Sartoris taking his hand, and, looking in his face, said "Do," his resistance gave way, and he took for his theme the Scotch song his hostess had just sung. I am not equal to the task of describing how this wonderful man played, but the result was such that no one hearing it could ever forget. At first, his harmonies to the melody were simple enough, and the modulations to which he submitted it equally unstrained. He soon, however, made it the theme of a fugue, which, being elaborately worked out, he dashed off with extraordinary vigour a series of variations baffling description. Their effect upon his audience could be seen by the changing expressions in every face, and the great Minister I have named was even affected to tears. The intensity of the player's gaze, more particularly as he approached the climax, was painful to witness. His eyes appeared twice their natural size, and his excitement was plainly shown in the expression of his face. He had gone through twenty minutes of the most trying brain work, accompanied with a corresponding amount of exhaustion.

I can hardly imagine a finer subject for a picture than that splendidly expressive countenance, eagerly gazed at by a crowd of attentive listeners, entranced by the genius of this marvellously gifted tone-painter. "The Extempore Player" is well worthy of the artist's pencil; but the musical grandeur of the scene can only be recalled as the vague impression of an inspired moment.

PHOSPHOR (of the "Brighton Guardian.")

* He was conductor of the Philharmonic Society of London during May and June, 1844, and himself played Beethoven's G Major Concerto on the 24th June; he also conducted St Paul at the Sacred Harmonic Society, and wrote the overture to Athalie, together with other important works.

THE POPULAR CONCERTS.

Owing to the presence of Herr Joachim and for other reasons, the first half of Mr Chappell's season has been unusually interesting and successful. It came to an end on Saturday last, but before noticing what was then done, some attention may fittingly be given to the work of the previous Monday, so full was it of cause for satisfaction. The concerted music played on that occasion was Beethoven's string quartet in F minor (Op. 95) and Mozart's pianoforte quartet in G minor. These must have been familiar to the audience, as they are to connoisseurs generally, and it can hardly be needful to descant upon the manner of their performance under the lead of Herr Joachim. Let it suffice to say—in saying it how much is implied!—that the rendering was worthy of its text, and that the artists were worthy of the composers. The pianist was Herr Pachmann, a Russian virtuoso, who, as amateurs cannot have forgotten, paid us a visit last season, and made a decided success with the exacting music of Chopin. Herr Pachmann drew this time upon the works which suit him best, and introduced six of the Polish master's studies, four of which were heard at these concerts for the first time. The artist again asserted his special sympathy with Chopin, into whose spirit he appears to enter easily, and of whose utterance he possesses a real mastery. In études we, of course, expect to find manipulative skill predominant, nor did Herr Pachmann fail to gratify those who looked for it. His execution of No. 6, a study in double notes for one hand and wide extensions for the other, was most brilliantly played and had to be repeated at the demand of the audience. No. 9 gave opportunity for another tour de force, which met with like success. The good fortune of the artist was, in short, complete, and Herr Pachmann, with Chopin in hand, will always be welcome at the Popular Concerts. Herr Joachim's violin solo was the Barcarolle and Scherzo from Spohr's "Twelve Salon Duets," which he brings forward from time to time, always with acceptance. The two movements were played on this occasion as exquisitely as ever. In their performance, indeed, there seemed to be no flaw for the keenest hypercriticism to detect. That Herr Joachim was much applauded and compelled to play again will be assumed. Miss Santley's charming talent had ample scope in Gounod's "Au Rossignol," and two songs, "Ye cupids droop each little head," and "Semper Fidelio," from the pen of Miss Maude V. White, who accompanied on the pianoforte. Whatever Miss Santley attempts is well done, and, whether in the luscious strains of Gounod or the thoughtful and refined music of her young countrywoman, she displayed pure taste and artistic method. "Semper Fidelio," the words of which are by Marion Chappell, was encored and repeated.

The programme of Saturday's concert opened with a work always welcomed as a bonne bouche by Mr Chappell's public. We refer to Beethoven's Septet; which was perfectly played by MM. Joachim, Hollander, Lazarus, Wendtland, Wotton, Reynolds, and Piatti; and received with a heartiness of admiration as complete as the veriest fanatic for Beethoven could desire. The second concerted work—Mendelssohn's posthumous Andante and Scherzo for strings—was heard on this occasion for the fourteenth time, and for the fourteenth time the characteristic Scherzo, so brilliant with its composer's sparkling fancy, gave unqualified delight. A selection from Brahms' "Hungarian Dances," as arranged by Herr Joachim for violin and piano, enabled that artist, with Mdme Haas, to win another frank success, while the lady just named essayed Chopin's Barcarolle in F sharp major with fair if not complete success. Miss Carlotta Elliott was once more a very acceptable vocalist. The concerts will be resumed on Monday, Jan. 8, when Mdme Neruda will lead the quartet and Herr Pachmann will again play a selection from Chopin.—D. T.

NEW MUSICAL SCHOLARSHIP.—The authorities of Trinity College, London, have just completed the details of a new Open Scholarship in Music, to be named the "Henry Smart Scholarship," in memory of the late distinguished musician, who was a member of the College Council and an Examiner to the Board up to the date of his death. The scholarship will be open to all comers of either sex under conditions of competition which the Secretary of the College is ready to furnish to applicants, and will entitle the holder to a three years course of training in the organ, pianoforte, and the higher branches of musicianship, preparatory to the professional diploma of the College and to a musical degree at one of the Universities.

CHERUBINI.

As the reader may suppose, the blow was a heavy one for Cherubini, accustomed to greater consideration on the part of the public. Consequently, while Geoffroy complained that Anacréon was played too long, Cherubini protested against the performances being stopped, as may be seen by the analysis of a letter, the destined recipient of which I do not know, but which was evidently aimed at Morel, then manager of the Opera:

"Autographic letter, no date, referring to the suspension of the performances of his opera, Anacréon, which had not been in the bills for a fortnight. . . . He believed he had enemies at the Opera, but had never done his correspondent the wrong of considering him one of their number. . . Under the old system, an author had a right to insist on his piece being performed as long as the receipts did not fall below 1,200 francs."*

It is undoubtedly to the same period that we must assign a letter addressed by Cherubini to Bouilly, and which also I have tracked out in a catalogue of autographs. It is dated, but incompletely: "Monday, 17th Vendémiaire," and is thus mentioned:

"He begs him to hurry on with the book the writer is to set for Feydeau. It is absolutely necessary your piece must avenge me for the one I brought out at the Opera . . . . at Feydeau I have not to fear the infernal clique, so inveterate against everything emanating from those who belong to the Conservatory."†

I have said the date of this letter is "Monday, 17th Vendémiaire." Now the reader will recollect that Anacréon was brought out on the 17th Vendémiaire, Year XII. It strikes me, therefore, as certain that it was while smarting under the failure of the work in question that Cherubini wrote Bouilly the lines which the reader has just perused, and it was evidently then that Bouilly showed him the book of a comic opera entitled Les Arrêts, in reference to which I find, under the date of 1804, the following notice in Cherubini's Catalogue:

"An air to stanzas, treated in two different manners, from the opera of Les Arrêts; I began this work but did not complete it."

Cherubini does not say that the libretto of Les Arrêts was by Bouilly, but chance took upon itself to acquaint me that such was the case. While consulting and summarizing, two years ago, all Herold's papers, liberally placed at my disposal by that great man's son, to assist me in an important work I was undertaking on his father, I came across the trace of a libretto for a comic opera, with this very title, Les Arrêts, and which, after it had been refused by another composer, Bouilly had given to Herold, for the latter to set. It passed, therefore, through the hands of three musicians, and was not used by any one of them after all.

Fourteen months, however, subsequently to the production of his Anacréon there, Cherubini re-appeared at the Opera, but this time with a ballet, Achille à Scyros, which proved a brilliant success. The scenarium, arranged for three acts, was by Pierre Gardel, and the work, in the execution of which Duport, Gardel, Aumer, Milon, Mesdes Saulnier, Bigottini, and Vestris, took part, was given for the first time on the 27th Frimaire, Year XIII. (18th December, 1804). What remains of the score of Achille is a symphonic piece, the "Bacchanal" of the first act, superb in structure and of prodigious effect. Cherubini's music was certainly not without influence on the excellent reception accorded the ballet, the success of which was long-continued, the work being twice revived, once in 1812 and once in 1819.

It was at this period that Cherubini received an offer to go to Vienna and compose the music of two Italian operas for the Imperial Kärnthnerthor Theater, where his opera of Lodoïska was to be previously brought out under his own direction. He accepted the terms proposed, and, on the 26th June, 1805, left Paris for the Austrian capital, taking with him his wife and youngest daughter, then aged only three months.

I here conclude the first part of this essay. Cherubini's active career as a dramatic composer was well nigh finished in France at the period we have reached, and we shall have to analyse only a few more works by him in this capacity. But we shall have to consider the admirable things he wrote in the way of sacred music, we shall soon see him director of the Conservatory, and it will be my task to show him in private life, which I shall do with the help of very copious and highly interesting correspondence kindly entrusted to me. In a short time I shall begin the second part of the essay, starting from Cherubini's journey to Vienna and the production of Faniska and I trust the readers of the Ménestrel will continue the kind indulgence they have hitherto been good enough to manifest towards me in connection with this important work.

It is at the time of the performances of Anacréon, that is under the date of the 18th Vendémiaire, Year XII., that I find this note in the Courrier des Spectacles: "MM. Méhul and Cherubini, on the report of the Director of the Conservatory, were exempted from giving lessons in that institution, as they were specially charged with beating time at the national concerts and festivals."

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.—The Mayor of Liverpool has received a letter from the honorary secretary of the Royal College of Music, in which Mr Morby says provision has been made for scholarships of two classes. First, a scholarship may be founded by the payment of £2,500, bearing any name which may be preferred by the founder, and providing education in the college and maintenance for one pupil in perpetuity. These scholarships maintain the principle of the college, namely, free education obtainable by open competition among all classes of her Majesty's subjects. The other form of scholarship is founded by the payment of £3,000, and provides education and maintenance. This scholarship is obtainable by competition restricted to a district or class, as may be preferred by the founder or founders. For the sake of distinction, the first of these scholarships is called the free or open scholarship, the other the local or close scholarship. The hon. secretary adds: "His Royal Highness the president fully recognizes the right of towns and districts contributing to the funds to restrict the advantages derivable to their own locality; but I may, perhaps, point out that the open scholarships provide free musical education for those possessing the highest talent, and that all the scholarships provided by the very large sum subscribed in London are free and open."

EXCERPTS FROM PARKE'S MUSICAL MEMOIRS.

Excerpt No. 10.

1787.

The professional concert, of which I had by invitation become a member, began in Hanover Square, on Monday the 5th of February. The singers were Signor Rubinellii, Miss Celia Davis, and Mrs Billington. Crosdill played a concerto on the violoncello, and the elder Parke one on the oboe; their fine powerful tones and brilliant execution in which afforded high gratification. On the second night I played an oboe concerto, which was honoured with general and frequent plaudits. When my concerto was ended, the Duke of Cumberland sent for me to his seat, and having complemented me on my performance, presented me with a royal ticket to admit me into Westminster Hall at the trial of Mr Warren Hastings, which the following day I witnessed from the box allotted to peers.

Their Majesties honoured the concert of ancient music with their presence. Mara and Billington were at the head of the vocalists. It commenced on Wednesday, the 7th of February, at Tottenham Street. The Duke of Leeds was director; Cramer led. On the following evening, the first of six subscription concerts given by Madame Mara, at Hanover Square, took place. Mr Harrison and Madame Mara were the singers, and Salomon led the band. Mr Mara, the husband of Madame Mara, played a concerto on the violoncello.

Mr Mara, who did not possess the tenth part of his wife's talent, loved her and his bottle equally, and frequently broke the head of one and cracked the other. Nevertheless he appreciated her superior merit so highly, that he occasionally ran into another extreme, and paid her extravagant attentions, as the following instance will show. This gentleman and Madame being on a visit to the Earl of Exeter, at his splendid seat, Burleigh, near Stamford, in Lincolnshire, and her caprice having induced her one day to inform her husband that she did not like Lord Exeter's claret, he immediately despatched a servant to Stamford for a post-chaise and four horses, in which he proceeded to London, and returned the following evening with a case out of her own cellar.

The oratorios, by command of their Majesties, commenced at the ancient concert rooms, Tottenham Street, on Friday the 23rd of February, with Handel's Athalia; and the oratorios at Drury Lane Theatre the same evening, under the direction of Mr Linley, Dr Arnold, and Madame Mara. The singers were Messrs Reinhold and Dignum, Mrs Crouch, Miss George, and Madame Mara; Mr Shaw led. At the end of the first part I played a concerto on the oboe, which was greatly applauded, and was repeated (by desire) on three subsequent nights.

Madame Mara, whose divine strains were listened to with great delight, occasionally exhibited such symptoms of caprice and hauteur, as to call forth the disapprobation of thepublic, who nevertheless, on her curtseying with even a small show of submission, like a fond parent who regrets having corrected a spoilt child, applauded her to the skies!

On the 21st of March was performed at the King's Theatre, for the benefit of the Lock Hospital, the oratorio of Ruth, originally composed for that charity by Signor Felice Giardini. The principal vocal parts were sustained with great excellence by Mr Reinhold and Mr Kelly, who had lately arrived from the continent, Miss Abrams, and Madame Mara. Mr Barthelemon led the band, and Mr Wesley conducted and performed a concerto on the organ. At the end of the second act Mr Barthelemon played one of Geminiani's concertos on the violin, in a very superior style; and his extempore cadences were so scientific and appropriate, that they appeared to be a continuation of the composer. This gentleman, in the early part of life, had served as a midshipman in the navy of the King of Spain, but preferring the clear and dulcet notes of the fiddle to the hoarse and thundering tones of the cannon, he afterwards made music his profession. A short time after Barthelemon had arrived in England he was recommended to Garrick to compose music to a piece of his, intitled A Peep Behind the Curtain. At their first interview, Garrick, sitting down to a table to make a copy of one of the songs for him to compose by the next morning, Barthelemon, who was prepared with paper, &c., looking over Garrick's shoulder whilst he was writing, set the music to it. When Garrick had finished, he arose, and presenting the poetry to Barthelemon, said, "There, sir, is my song."—"And there, sir," said Barthelemon, "is my music to it!" A Peep Behind the Curtain (an improvement on the Duke of Buckingham's Rehearsal) had an astonishing long run to overflowing houses. In it was introduced a burletta, called Orpheus and Eurydice, the music of which was excellent; and a scene, the most popular of the whole, wherein Orpheus, by the force of his lyre, made not only men but trees and cows dance!

Garrick, who was proverbially fond of money, had agreed to give Barthelemon fifty guineas for composing the music to this piece; but when the awful time to pay him had arrived, Garrick told him that his dancing cows had cost him so much that he could not afford to give him more than forty. A whimsical circumstance occurred to Barthelemon in my presence, whilst leading the band at Vauxhall Gardens. One Saturday night (the then fashionable night of the week), when the gardens were extremely full of genteel company, a bat, who had "winged his cloistered flight" for some time about the walks, to the great annoyance of the visitors, at length, during the second act of the concert, went into the illuminated orchestra, and, after having made two or three circuits round it, flew into the face of Barthelemon, the leader, and hurled him from his elevated seat upon the floor, amidst universal shouts of laughter from the audience. Barthelemon, who fell on his sword and thereby broke it, was soon picked up, and, joining in the laugh, said to those who assisted him: "Well, it is fortunate for me that, in falling on my own sword, I did not do it after the old Roman fashion!"

Mrs Billington, whose popularity was fast increasing, appeared at Covent Garden Theatre on the 13th of April, for the first time, as Mandane, in Arne's fine opera of Artaxerxes. She sang the airs, recitatives, &c., admirably; and in the favourite song, "The soldier tired," her fine voice and brilliant execution produced a general encore. It having become fashionable to bring on our stage popular French pieces, a translation of one, in two acts, founded on Sterne's story of Maria, in his "Sentimental Journey," was produced at Covent Garden Theatre, on the 24th of April, under the title of Nina, with the original music by Dalayrac, adapted to the English words by me. Mrs Billington sang the music of the part of Nina with great feeling and expression, and was loudly and deservedly applauded.

Docter Walcot, who put Nina into English, and who wrote under the assumed name of Peter Pindar, had in early life practised for several years in the West Indies as a physician. He was in the habit of relating anecdotes of persons he had known in that part of the world with great humour, of which the following is a specimen:—Mr S——w, a rich planter in Jamaica, who was a man of eccentric character and unfeeling nature, had an only son, whose disposition was not a whit more amiable than his father's. The old gentleman being taken dangerously ill, refused all medical aid, swearing that if a physician were called in he should have no chance of recovery; therefore, he would leave it all to nature. Nature, however, played him a slippery trick, and he died, leaving to his hopeful son the whole of his extensive property. A short time after the old man's death Dr Walcot met Guaco, who had been many years a domestic slave in the family, when the following short, but pithy dialogue took place:—

Doctor.—"Well, Guaco! so your old master's dead?"

Guaco.—"Ifs, old massa be gone dead."

Doctor.—"And how do you like your young master? He's a chip of the old block, I fancy."

Guaco.—"O, dam im, massa; im all old block."

A Plentiful Supply.*—Referring to the proposed Opéra-Populaire in Paris, Arthur Pougin gives, in La Revue Libérale, the following list of composers, together with the titles of operas which, to his knowledge, are now lying, more or less completed, in their portfolios:—Victor Massé—Cléopâtre; Ernest Reyer—Sigurd; Massenet—Méduse, and Manon Lescaut; Ernest Guiraud—Le Feu; Vaucorbeil—Mahomet; Salvayre—Richard III.; Joncières—Le Chevalier Jean, Le Roi Lear; Litolff—Les Templiers; Ch. Lefebvre—Lucrèce, Le Voile blanc; Edouard Lalo—Fiesque, Le Roi d'Ys; Paladilhe—Patrie, and three acts of a comic opera; Gastinel—Le Roi Barde, La Kermesse, Les Dames des Près; Bruneau—Vercingétorix; Wekerlin—Les Fées, and several separate acts of other works; Louis Lacombe—Winkelried, La Reine des Eaux; Hector Salomon—Bianca Capello, Les Contes d'Hoffmann; Eugène Diaz—Benvenuto Cellini; Danhauser, Maures et Castillans; B. Godard—Les Guelfes; Canoby—La Coupe et les Lèvres, Le Seigneur Pandolphe; Ant. Choudens—La Jeunesse de Don Juan; Deffès—Le Marchand de Venise, Riquet à la Houppe; César Franck—Le Valet de France; Paul Puget—Le Signal, Le Marocain; Dupatro—Gazouillette; Adrien Boieldieu—Alain Blanchard; Boulanger—Monsieur de Bellegarde; De Boisdeffre—Les Lutins; Th. Dubois—Aben-Amet, G. Wasa; Ad. Nibelle—L'Age d'Or; Serpette—Roby; Hignard—L'Archet Magique; d'Osmond—Le Partisan; Legouix—La Tartane; Ch. M. Widor—three acts of comic opera.

"BALFE: HIS LIFE AND WORK." *

This is a volume full of interest for all readers. This is no more than saying that it is a biography, written with knowledge and pains, of a man exceedingly popular in his lifetime, honoured after death, and famous for all generations with whom the love of melodious grace and "the touches of sweet harmony" shall endure. Mr William Alexander Barrett has done well to make his book a popular one; for it concerns, in the best and happiest sense of the term, a popular man. For musicians, the life of Michael William Balfe has no doubt a special interest. Composers and executants alike acknowledge his genius, and there are few in this delightful profession who do not cherish personal recollections of a genial warm-hearted brother. But the memories of Balfe extend far beyond the strictly musical circle of artists and amateurs. Merely to have had "an ear for music," to have been habitually "moved by concord of sweet sounds," is enough to fill any breast with kindly sentiments towards one who has influenced and enriched the tunefulness of the age. If, then, as has often been said, good biographies are the most entertaining and instructive reading, their qualities are specially enhanced by the interest which everybody feels in a musical composer whom we can always call to mind by a few bars of some familiar strain; for this reason—though not for this alone—the lives of musicians, the records of their tastes and troubles, their hopes and cares, their disappointments and their triumphs have ever been among the pleasantest to read and to recall. This chronicle of the bright Irish composer's career, from his early boyhood to his death at the age of sixty-two, still with undeveloped music in him, will prove no exception to the rule. Born in the midst of music, and of theatrical labour, he imbibed at an early age the habitual thoughts and ideas which after-experience enabled him to employ practically. English opera had not dawned when Balfe was a young and struggling man. Bishop, who could no doubt have written a lyric drama, supplied music to pieces like Guy Mannering, The Slave, and The Miller and his Men. But Balfe was cosmopolitan. With great facility he gained command of the bridge of language, familiarised himself with French and Italian literature, and, by consequence, acquired French and Italian habits and modes of thought. He was the only English composer who was ever invited to write an opera for the Paris stage. Of his twenty-nine lyric works, three were composed to French texts, for original productions in Paris, and five were written to Italian libretti. The rest, of course, were English; and he deserved the title bestowed on him since his death, "the champion of English musical art." Mr Barrett's volume contains portraits of Balfe, Malibran, Grisi, and Nilsson, and is further illustrated with photolithographs of parts of the memorial window in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, and the tablet in Westminster Abbey.—D. T.

DARMSTADT.—The Männergesangverein, under the direction of Adolph Kugler, included in the programme of their last concert the "Kyrie," "Gloria," and "Agnus Dei" from a Mass by the late composer, Flotow, who, after the concert, made the Association a present of his autograph score. Mdme von Flotow introduced several songs by her husband, who accompanied her on the piano.—G. Vierling's "secular" oratorio, Alarich, was given under his own direction on the 11th inst.

CHURCH MUSIC AT OXFORD.—The system of Magdalen College, says The Guardian, as might be expected, has been imitated with modifications by many other colleges. But it is quite evident that this system would completely break down in any church or cathedral where the choristers are liable to be called upon to attend special services, whether in the morning, afternoon or evening. Their work and position in the associated school would then be completely upset, and the class-masters would frequently come across a boy who had prepared no work, or missed a lesson because he had been on Church duty. This objection is fatal to any attempt to apply the Magdalen system to a cathedral or church which is energetically carrying on its evangelical work. This system, however, has been ingeniously reversed at St Michael's College, Tenbury, where the estimable warden has founded a school primarily for the improvement of Church music by the training of choristers and the support of a full choral service, but where non-choristers are received as boarders. The St Michael's boys have taken good positions at important schools, and also at the Universities. The hours of the Church services at St Michael's are, however, so regular, and there is such an absence of special services, that the mixed system works admirably, though it cannot be called a pecuniary success, for it is well known that Sir F. Ouseley has for twenty-five years devoted the whole of his private income to the support of the college with a large-heartedness which deserves the gratitude of all Christians.

"THE THEATRE."

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

Promise of improvement, in the new series of this magazine, has been faithfully kept, and the fresh start for the new year is characterised by renewed and augmented vigour in every department, literary, artistic, and mechanical. The contents of the January number, which is excellently printed, and has altogether an attractive look, judged from the standpoint of art and taste, will interest all whose pleasure lies in front of the curtain, or whose business is pursued behind it. According to the new arrangement, two photographic portraits, instead of one, adorn this monthly review of the drama, music, and the fine arts; and these pictures severally represent, in the best style of photography, and with life-like truth, Mrs Bernard-Beere, in The Promise of May, and Mr Wilson Barrett, in The Silver King. A timely essay on pantomimic families is contributed, as the opening article by Mr Dutton Cook; and it is followed by a narrative poem, Ticket o' Leave—a Village Drama, by Mr George R. Sims, which will, doubtless, find ready admittance to the repertory of the dramatic reciter. Notes on the pantomimes which are about to start in the race for public favour are given by Mr George Lancaster, and a projected series of Imitations of German Lays and Ballads is started by Mr W. B. Kingston, with a string of verse after Wieland's poem, "Der Tod und der Saeufer," which, in its English guise, preserves the Teutonic masculinity of the original. Of course the editor, Mr Clement Scott, is responsible for the various criticisms, which occupy a fair amount of space; and he also contributes verse of tuneful quality, in a love-song, entitled "Three Days," and a patriotic ballad, "Run up the Flag," which is to be sung on the stage during Christmas.

OH, WELCOME THE NEW YEAR!

Oh, welcome the New Year
So blessèd and sweet,
With blossoms of gladness
That spring 'neath her feet.
She is given by Heaven
Sad spirits to cheer;
Oh, welcome with gladness
The smiling New Year!

Oh, welcome the New Year!
She cometh to-day
With blessings and sweetness
To brighten man's way.
She whispers of hope
And of happiness dear;
Oh, welcome with gladness
The smiling New Year!

Oh, welcome the New Year!
Hark! hark! the glad bells
Ring out with a music
Which joyfully swells.
Then let all the shades
From thy heart disappear;
Oh, welcome with gladness
The smiling New Year!

MUNICH.—Saint-Saëns' Samson et Délilah is to be produced this season at the Theatre Royal, with the ex-Wagnerian couple, Vogl, in the leading characters. There is, also, some talk of Hector Berlioz's Benvenuto Cellini and Marschner's Hiarne.

VIENNA.—Gounod's Philémon et Baucis, with a partly new cast, will shortly be revived at the Imperial Opera. It was first brought out there on the 4th October, 1878. The first performance of Le Tribut de Zamora is fixed for the 20th January.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—A highly interesting feature in the programme of the ensuing season of this society will be a MS. Motett by Cherubini. The MS. has been for many years in the Royal Library at Buckingham Palace, and Her Majesty the Queen has graciously given her consent to the performance of it by the Philharmonic Society. The work has never yet been heard in public.

THE fifth season of the London Amateur Musical Society has commenced, and the members of the choir have began the rehearsals of two new works, viz., a Stabat Mater by Anton Dvorak, and a Messe Solennelle de Paques by Gounod, in addition to Schumann's Manfred, and other important works. The Society has taken up a new position, and appeals to the sympathy of the general public on the ground of the fact that the performances of the society having hitherto been only of a quasi-public character, tended to narrow the influence the society might otherwise have exercised, and it was "obvious that sooner or later these restrictions would have to be broken through, and the performances of the society brought more prominently forward." The great difficulty will be to ensure sufficient rehearsals, without which no choral society can succeed.—Sporting and Dramatic News.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1882.

A NEW WANT SUPPLIED.

We have received the subjoined interesting communication —"with the editor's compliments":—

"An important addition will be made to the periodical literature of music early in January, when a critical weekly—The Musical Review—will be published. The prospectus promises that the new paper will be conducted independently of any party or trade interest, and will be devoted exclusively to the serious and impartial consideration of the art in all its branches. That such a publication, if conducted in such a spirit, will meet a want largely felt by cultured amateurs, as well as by artists, is not open to doubt."

O Editor! Hoch! As if the Musical World had not existed for less than half a century! And as if the Musical World had no intention of surviving for less than half a century more! O Gemini! It hath specie! It hath boundless credit; immeasurable consideration; esteem deeply embodied; a sly liking from the enlarged and advanced public, with "land and beeves" to boot—as much as ever had Dr Shallow. The editor of that new Review will have "a hi upon him."*

CONCERTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—On "Boxing Day," after the pantomime, the Scots Guards band, under the direction of Mr Clarke, played the grand march, "Royal Review" (Meissler); a selection from Rip Van Winkle, with solos for the leading performers; a fantasia of Verdi's, with solos for Messrs Lewis, Archer, and Sergeant Castle, on the cornet, euphonium, and clarinet; and "L'Esprit Français" polka by Waldteufel. Mr Dan Godfrey, with his Grenadier band, came later and played quick march, "Egypt" (Le Thière); valse, "Myosotis" (Caroline Lowthian); cornet solo, "There is a green hill far away" (Gounod), Sergeant Knight; piccolo solo, "The Wren" (Damaré), Sergeant Roe; and quick march, "The Return of the Guards" (Dan Godfrey), composed for the march through London on the return of the troops from Egypt. The Palace Company's military band performed at intervals during the day, and there were also organ performances by Mr A. J. Eyre. In the evening, the bands of the two regiments already named combined to carry out a further musical programme. Between the intervals, vocal performances by Signor Foli delighted the audience, who numbered some 38,000.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE PROMENADE CONCERTS.—For the first time for many years no pantomime or other dramatic piece is produced here this Christmas: but, in lieu thereof, a new series of promenade concerts, has been instituted, following closely on the termination of those autumn performances of the kind which have for some years succeeded the regular Italian opera season. As at the preceding series, Mr A. Gwyllym Crowe is again the musical director and conductor. The elaborate and picturesque scenic surroundings of the stage are the same as at the previous concerts; the Floral Hall having been re-decorated and elegantly fitted up as a smoking lounge—the electric light being advantageously used in both interiors. Tuesday night's concert began with Hérold's bright and sparkling overture to Zampa, the brilliant execution of which at once manifested the excellence of the orchestra led by Mr Carrodus—a fact which was again proved by the admirable following performance of the exquisite ballet music from Auber's Masaniello, one of the many masterpieces of this composer that are now neglected in favour of far less worthy music. Two Christmas carols—the traditional "God rest you, merry gentlemen," and Dr Steggall's "The Manger Throne"—were well sung by the members of the London Vocal Union, directed by Mr F. Walker; after which the finale to Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony was effectively played by the band; Miss Damian sang, with much expression, Mr F. H. Cowen's ballad "The Last Dream" (encored), which was followed by Mr Carrodus's masterly rendering of the andante and finale from Mendelssohn's violin concerto, Mdme Elly Warnot's brilliant vocalisation in the cavatina "Regnava nel silenzia" (from Lucia di Lammermoor), and a selection from Meyerbeer's L'Étoile du Nord, arranged for orchestra and band of the Coldstream Guards. This piece, which closed the first part of the concert, included important solos, finely played by Mr Carrodus (violin), Mr Radcliff (flute), Mr Barrett (piccolo), Mr Howard Reynolds (cornet), and Mr J. Clinton (clarinet). The second part opened with a selection, similarly arranged, from Mr Arthur Sullivan's Pirates of Penzance, in which prominent solos were assigned to the principal instrumentalists; and this was followed by Mdlle Camilla Nordmann's rendering of the romance "Quell' uomo" ("On yonder rock reclining") from Fra Diavolo, with a pianoforte accompaniment; the remainder of the concert having consisted of well-known vocal and orchestral pieces.—D. N.

THE last of the autumn series of "Musical Evenings" under the direction of Mr Henry Holmes took place at the Royal Academy of Music concert-room on Wednesday evening, Dec. 20. These "Musical Evenings" are a great treat to genuine lovers of instrumental compositions. We subjoin a list of works performed during the past season, and we recommend all who enjoy a real "Musical Evening" to attend the next series, which begins in the same locale on Wednesday, Jan. 24.

FIRST CONCERT (Nov. 1).—String Quartet, in C, Op. 59 (Beethoven); Concerto, in D minor, for pianoforte solo, with string quartet accompaniment (Bach); String Quartet, in F, No. 2, Op. 77 (Haydn). SECOND CONCERT (Nov. 15).—String Quartet, in E flat, No. 4, Op. 58 (Spohr); Quintet, in C, for pianoforte and strings (MS.) (Algernon Ashton); String Sextet, in B flat, Op. 18 (Brahms). THIRD CONCERT (Nov. 29).—String Quintet, in E (MS.) (Henry Holmes); Sonata, in G, Op. 78, for pianoforte and violin (Brahms); String Quartet, in E minor, Op. 95 (Beethoven). FOURTH CONCERT (Dec. 13).—String Quartet, in E flat, Op. 127 (Beethoven); Trio, in F, Op. 80, for pianoforte and strings (Schumann); String Quintet, in C, (Mozart). FIFTH CONCERT (Dec. 20).—String Quartet, in G minor, Op. 27 (Grieg); Sonata, in B flat, pianoforte and violoncello (Mendelssohn); String Quartet, in A, No. 3 (Schumann).

Mr Henry Holmes' coadjutors during the series were Mr W. Frye Parker (second violin), Mr A. Gibson (viola), Mr W. Henry Hill (second viola), Mr E. Howell (violoncello), Mr C. Ould (second violoncello), and Madame Haas (pianoforte).

A CONCERT was given by the committee of the Foresters' Hall concerts, Clerkenwell Road, on "Boxing night," which notwithstanding counter attractions brought together a fair attendance of "the people." The concert began with a pianoforte duet (a Tarantella by Raff) played by Mr W. Henry Thomas and Mr Clement Hoey. Solos on the pianoforte were afterwards played by Miss Florence Waud. The singers were Mdme Liebhart, Misses Hilda Coward and Patrice, Messrs Egbert Roberts and Sidney Tower, who successfully exerted themselves to please their visitors especially Mdme Liebhart who gave Glover's "I may or may not" and Michael Watson's "The Song for me" with so much esprit that the clever songstress was unanimously called upon to repeat them. Solos on the cornet were played by Mr Donoghue, and Mr Howard Paul gave some "Recitations" with musical illustrations.

THE annual Christmas concert by the pupils of Trinity House, Southwark, was given on Thursday, Dec. 21st, at Dunn's Institute, Newington Causeway, when Mr Odoardo Barri's new cantata, The Messenger, was performed by the pupils with great success. In the miscellaneous part of the programme Miss F. Pearce was called upon to repeat her brilliant performance of Ignace Gibsone's "Caprice à la Tarantelle," and Mr Brownlow Baker his new "Valse de Concert." "The Waves' Secret," a new song by the last named composer, well sung by Miss Fudge, and "The Normandy Maid," (Miss A. Patrick), were also re-demanded, while the singing of a three part chorus won well-merited applause.

THE annual concert in aid of the "Post Office Orphan Home" was given on Wednesday evening, December 13, at St James's Hall, and was largely attended. The programme contained the names of eighteen singers, including those of the well-known artists Mesdames Liebhart, Crewe, Reichelmann, and Osborne Williams; Misses Clara Samuell and Carlotta Elliott; Messrs Frank Boyle and J. Bridson. Whether all appeared it is impossible to say, as the length of the programme prevented all but fanatics per la musica from sitting it out. The Post Office Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr H. D. Lodge, gave the overture to La Sirène (Auber), and the march from Suppé's Boccaccio. Sir Julius and Lady Benedict played a duet for two pianofortes on airs from Der Freyschütz (Benedict). Mr George Grossmith gave imitations of popular composers, including Rossini, Balfe, Gounod, and Sullivan, and Mr John Child recited the Forum Scene from Shakspere's Julius Cæsar. Among the vocal successes were "The Song for me" (Michael Watson), sung so much to the satisfaction of the audience by Mdme Liebhart that, after being re-called three times, she was compelled to repeat it, and her success was also very great with Mr Weatherley's "Uncle John." Among the popular songs in the programme were "The gates of the West" (Mdme Osborne Williams), "Rose softly blooming" (Miss Clara Samuell), "Caller Herrin'" (Mdme Reichelmann), &c. The audience were evidently highly pleased with everybody and everything, judging from the hearty applause they gave to singers and players.

A CONCERT was given at the Holborn Town Hall on Thursday, Dec. 21st, in aid of the funds of the "Rahere Almoners." The artists were Miss Clara Dowle (Guildhall School of Music), Miss Florence Cater, R.A.M., Mdme Clara West, Miss Lottie West, and Mr Bantock Pierpoint. The audience were very appreciative. One of the features of the concert was the singing, by Miss Clara Dowle, of Weber's air from Der Freyschütz, "Softly sighs the voice of evening," which deserves especial mention, the scena being well suited to her fine voice and dramatic style. Mr Paul Jerrard, organist of St Mary-le-Bow, Cheapside, accompanied; and the proceedings were arranged and conducted by Mr J. Loaring, organist of St Sepulchre, who played with effect several organ solos during the evening.

AT Mr Aguilar's "performance of pianoforte music" (No. 122), on Wednesday morning, December 20, at his residence, 17, Gloucester Crescent, Hyde Park, the esteemed professor gave the following pieces:—

Sonata in C (Aguilar); Siegmunds Liebesgesang (Wagner-Tausig); Etude in E and Scherzo in C sharp minor (Chopin); Oft in the Stilly Night (transcription), and Waves, Etude caprice (Aguilar); Sonata in A flat, Op. 110 (Beethoven); Schlummerlied and Jagdlied (Schumann); Rhapsodie Hongroise No. 2 (Liszt); River and Summer Sounds (Aguilar); Day Dream and Valse Brillante (Aguilar).

There was a very large audience, who were highly pleased with the musical treat provided for them.

THE students of the Kensington School of Music (principal, Mr William Buels), gave a concert at Cromwell Road on Thursday evening, December 21st. The first piece in the programme was a trio in C major for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by Mozart, well played by three young ladies, Misses Carden, G. Erskine, and C. Erskine, followed by Mozart's "Deh vieni non tardar," agreeably sung by Miss Scales, after which a "promising young pianist," Miss Black, played one of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte. The next piece in the programme was Beethoven's Romanza in F for the violin, played by Miss L. S. Robinson, followed by Handel's aria, "Where'er you walk," sung by Mr Walter Joy, (the owner of a charming voice). The next piece in the programme was a violoncello Romanza by Goltermann, played by Mr B. Reynolds, followed by "He was despised," from Handel's Messiah sung by Miss Marion Burke with genuine pathos and artistic ability. Then came Vieuxtemps' Romance in F for the violin, and Prudent's "Miserere" for the pianoforte, respectively played by Messrs R. Fennings and A. S. Mantell. Mr Henry Leslie's trio, "O memory," was then sung by Misses Flora Mantell, Marion Burke, and Mr Walter Joy, after which Miss C. Erskine played a solo on the violoncello (by M. Saint-Saens), and Miss Agnes Wood, the possessor of a fine soprano voice, sang Haydn's "With verdure clad." Then came one of Mr Arthur Sullivan's popular songs, "My dearest heart," feelingly rendered by Miss Flora Mantell, solos on the pianoforte and violin played by Miss Carden and Miss G. Erskine, the concert finishing with Beethoven's trio in E flat (No. 1 of Op. 1) by Messrs A. S. Mantell, R. Fennings, and B. Reynolds. Mr Edward Lane and Miss Marion Buels accompanied the singers.

MR JOHN LEE.—In our notice last week of the concert given at the Bayswater Academy of Music, we inadvertently omitted to state that Mr John Lee, the well-known professor, accompanied the vocal music, and that all the young singers were his pupils.

PROVINCIAL.

GLASGOW.—PRESENTATION TO MR AIRLIE.—At a social meeting, held in the Cockburn Hotel, Bath Street, on Thursday evening, Dec. 14th, Mr Airlie, the valued secretary of the Glasgow Abstainers' Union, was presented with a handsome dining-room timepiece, with marble and bronze vases en suite, subscribed for by the directors in token of their appreciation of his zeal and ability in promoting the interests of the Union during the past twenty-five years. Mr Lindsay, the president, made the presentation in name of the directors, and in doing so passed a high eulogium on Mr Airlie for his devotion and marked ability in conducting the various agencies of the Union.

EDINBURGH.—A concert was given in Queen Street Hall on Saturday afternoon, Dec. 16th, in aid of the Edinburgh Industrial Brigade, by which the funds of that institution must have been greatly benefitted, judging from the large audience present. The principal piece on the programme was the sacred cantata, The Widow of Nain, composed for the late Worcester Festival by A. J. Caldicott, which was rendered in a highly-finished manner by a choir trained by a well-known accomplished amateur musician. By the courtesy of that gent'eman, we were present at a private performance of the cantata in the Freemasons' Hall; and a second hearing confirmed the high opinion we formed of the work, as well as the masterly and judicious treatment of the various numbers both by choir and soloists. Without desiring to be invidious, we would specially notice the rich voice of the lady who gave the first soprano solo, and subsequently that pertaining to the part of the Widow, "What reward shall I give?" Of the choruses, we might also mention "Man goeth to his long home," "In Rama was there a voice heard," and "They that sow in tears," as being beautifully sung.—Daily Review.

CARMARTHEN.—A concert was given at the Assembly Rooms on Thursday, December 7th, by the Choral Class, under the conductorship of Mr C. A. Cooke, organist of Christ Church, when Handel's Messiah was performed by the members of the Swansea Orchestral Society, Messrs Jones's string band, and Mr F. E. Wade, of Tenby. The solos were rendered by the Rev. T. R. Walters, Mrs Griffiths, Miss Warren, Miss Ann Jones, Mdlle Kirchner, and Mr E. C. Evans; and on Thursday, the 14th inst., the second private concert this season of the Carmarthen Choral Society (conducted by Mr C. Videon Harding, organist of St Peter's Church) was given at the Assembly Rooms. The programme consisted of Haydn's Creation. There was a large auditory. The Society executed the choruses with precision, especially "The Heavens are telling." Miss Claudina Spurrell, in "With verdure clad"; Miss Effie Spurrell, in "On mighty pens"; Miss M. Watkins, in "The marv'lous work"; Mr W. E. Rich, in "Rolling in foaming billows"; and Mr Harding, in "In native worth," acquitted themselves admirably. Messrs Jones's band played the accompaniments.

LEICESTER.—The second annual concert of the Amateur Choralists was given in the Corn Exchange, which was filled in every part. The first part of the programme consisted of the late regretted Mr Francis Howell's oratorio, The Land of Promise, the solo parts being entrusted to Miss Honeybere, Mrs Kirby, Messrs Dunkerton and Shaw. The post of first violin was held jointly by Mr J. T. Kilby and Miss Caunt, Mr J. W. Warner conducting. Both soloists and chorus performed their task con amore, and the audience rewarded them with hearty applause. The second part was miscellaneous, the band playing the overture to La Couronne d'or at the commencement, the intermediate pieces being vocal and violin solos, duets, &c., the concert concluding appropriately with the National Anthem.

LEEDS.—After an interval, the Town Hall organ recitals were resumed on Saturday night, December 16, by the borough organist, Dr Spark. These free concerts for the people, before they were broken off, had come to be looked forward to as a standing thing on Tuesday afternoons and Saturday nights; and the densely crowded hall on Saturday night, when they recommenced, testified to the high favour in which they have come to be held. Cheers were given to Dr Spark and the Mayor as they entered the hall. The first part of the programme consisted of a selection from The Messiah, sung by Misses Annie Woods and Emmeline Kennedy, Messrs C. Bush and S. Northrop; Dr Spark playing the accompaniments and incidental music on the organ, and also the overture and Pastoral Symphony. The fantasia, "The Battle of Tel-el-Kebir," together with the gavotte from Mignon and another by Emile Tavan, as well as selections from Gounod's Faust, completed the programme.

NORWICH.—The selection of Elijah for the first concert given by the Musical Festival Committee this season was justified by the large attendance in St Andrew's Hall on Friday night, Dec. 15th, when Mendelssohn's great work was given, under the direction of Dr Hill. The choruses were given with precision and effect, and the accompaniment was creditably performed by the orchestra, which included the band of the Norwich Philharmonic Society, led by Mr F. W. Noverre. The solos were entrusted to Misses Robertson and Annie Butterworth, Messrs Hirwen Jones and Lucas Williams. Miss Robertson maintained her reputation as an excellent singer, and Miss Butterworth met with full appreciation, being called upon to repeat "O rest in the Lord." Mr Hirwen Jones, in "If with all your hearts," and Misses Bessie Hill and Alden, Messrs A. H. Alden and R. J. Mallett, in the double quartet, "For He shall give His angels," did their duties well. Dr Hill conducted, and the capital performance of the oratorio no doubt repaid him for the labour and attention he must have bestowed upon its preparation. Dr. Bunnett was at the organ, and acquitted himself, as usual, admirably.

SCARBOROUGH.—The musical season at the Spa is over, and the excellent performance by Mr Thomas's band of the works by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., will be greatly missed by all music lovers in Scarborough, and they are numerous. Miss Beata Francis, a cultivated vocalist, made a deep impression at the concerts last week upon those who can appreciate and enjoy a musical treat. Not only has she a very fine voice, but she possesses the power of giving considerable dramatic effect to her singing, and to impart the necessary amount of pathos that appeals at once to a sympathizing heart. We are very glad indeed to learn—and we feel sure the public will share our pleasure—that the committee of the company purpose, next year, to introduce the band on Monday, 30th April, instead of on the first Monday in June as heretofore. The committee think it more practicable to lengthen the Scarborough season by making an early commencement, than to continue the services of the band further into the autumn and winter than is their present practice.

HAWKHURST.—Mr St John Robinson gave two "Christmas Concerts" in the Lecture Hall on Thursday morning and evening, Dec. 27, with the assistance of Misses Agnes King, Leders, and Marie Power, Mesdames Meurant, Hesketh, and Wienholl; and Mr Ernest Bernard. The concert began with a part-song by Mr A. R. Gaul, "The Silent Land," and concluded with the National Anthem. The successes at the concerts were Curschmann's trio, "Ti prego" (Miss Leders, Mdme Hesketh, and Mr St John Robinson), Ascher's romance "Alice, where art thou," (Mr St John Robinson), "The Better Land," by Cowen (Mdme Meurant), Schubert's "Who is Sylvia?" (Mdme Hesketh), and the pianoforte solos by Miss Marie Power. Stephen Adams' "Midshipmite" was done justice to by Mr Bernard. Mr Robinson also gave a concert on the day previous at Ticehurst, with the same artists.

BEDFORD.—At the concert given by the students at the Moravian Ladies' School on Monday, December 11th, a variety of songs, part-songs, and violin solos were given with more or less success, the pièce de résistance being Mr Aguilar's cantata, Goblin Market, in which all the young ladies took part, con amore, the solos being given by Misses J. Laycock and E. Larratt, and the accompaniments played, on the pianoforte and harmonium, by Mr Aguilar and Mr Diemer. The programme included, among other excellent things, a movement from one of Haydn's symphonies, arranged as a pianoforte duet, and played by Messrs A. and F. Johnson, an air with variations by Beethoven, some violin solos played by Miss N. Diemer, and a quartet from Mendelssohn's Son and Stranger, sung by Misses A. Plevy, E. Murray, E. Batt, and E. Larratt, which terminated the concert.

WORCESTER.—A service of song, entitled The Mayflower, was given in George Street Chapel on Tuesday, December 19. The chair was taken by the Rev C. G. Honor. The musical portions of the service were efficiently rendered by the Christ Church choir, Mr Simper accompanying on the harmonium. The connective readings were given by Mr Harry Day. At the conclusion, hearty votes of thanks were passed to the choir, the chairman, and Mr Day. The proceeds will be devoted to reducing the circuit debt.—There was a large company, including many visitors, at the meeting of the Unicorn Hotel Glee Club on the same evening. It was a Scotch night, and the performances were as good as the selection was gratifying both to members and visitors. To mark the occasion as a special one—which proved so successful as to lead to the suggestion that the Scotch night should be repeated, and an Irish night also arranged—the toast, "The twa sides o' the Tweed," was proposed and heartily received; and the part taken by the chairman (Mr John Joseland) in ensuring so pleasant an evening was acknowledged by his health being drunk with great cordiality.—Many who had pleasing recollections of the concerts of the Cathedral School Musical Society in the College Hall, with others to whom the Head Master's invitation was kindly given, attended a concert in the College Hall. A Cathedral school should be the home of musical culture, and the thanks of the citizens of Worcester are due to the Rev E. Vine Hall for the pains he takes in the musical tuition of the King's scholars. The hall had a bright appearance, decorated as it was with plants, and nearly filled with an audience who knew that they would not be disappointed in their expectations of a pleasant concert, Many old boys kindly rendered assistance. The programme was varied, and had a pleasant flavour of the Christmas season.—Berrow's Worcester Journal.

READING.—Gounod's Redemption was performed here in the new Town Hall on Tuesday, December 19th, and the effect produced upon a large and critical audience confirms the now general high opinion of its merits. Great credence will undoubtedly be awarded to the committee of our Philharmonic Society for their courage in entering upon the hazardous enterprise (both musically and financially) of producing so new and difficult a composition, but their success proves the soundness of their judgment and thorough knowledge of the resources at their disposal. A very excellent band was engaged including many well-known London performers, led by Mr Burnett, the chorus consisting, as usual, of the members of the Society. The rendering of the entire work was most creditable to all concerned, the instrumentalists playing with great care, although sometimes lacking in finish and refinement, and the chorus singing with considerable power and spirit, showing evident signs of careful and patient training. The principal vocalists were Misses José Sherrington and D'Alton, Messrs Thurley Beale and Bernard Lane, the last named creating a most favourable impression by his correct intonation and distinct pronunciation. Mr Strickland (organist of St Mary's) conducted with marked ability, and must be congratulated upon the highly successful result of his labours.

BLACKHEATH.—Under the direction of the composer, Mr W. H. Cummings, his charming cantata, The Fairy Ring, was performed on Monday, Dec. 18, at the Rink Concert Hall by the choir and orchestra of the Blackheath Conservatoire (200 in number), aided by Misses Moore, Harris, and Trust, Messrs Albert James, Tinney, and H. R. A. Robinson (accompanist). The cantata was warmly applauded. In the "miscellaneous part" which followed, Misses Andrews, Langley, Gates, together with Mrs Phillips, gave valuable aid, and the hon. sec., Mr W. Webster, won a great success in "Largo al factotum." Over 800 friends of this flourishing institution attended the concert.

NATIONAL ANTHEM FOR INDIA.

The committee of the "National Anthem for India" fund have received a letter from Professor Monier Williams, C.I.E., of which —says the Times—the following are the principal passages:—

"Gentlemen,—In reply to your request that I should express an opinion on the project you have in hand, I have great pleasure in forwarding a contribution to the fund as the best method of testifying my approval of the object it is intended to promote, only stipulating that the amount of my subscription be not taken as the measure of my sympathy with you in this matter.

"The people of India, so far as I have been able to form a judgment after travelling on two occasions through nearly every part of the country, are not mere Brâhman-worshippers, caste-worshippers, and image-worshippers as some suppose; they are inclined to do more homage to the Divine right of Kings as expressed in the concrete impersonations of the government of the day than to any other power or authority in existence. Nor does their separation into countless races, tribes, and creeds prevent the gradual and healthy growth of patriotic feelings. To encourage such ideas and feelings is England's manifest duty, and any project which will tend to link the people of the United Kingdom and their fellow subjects in India closer together in common loyalty to a sovereign loved and honoured by both is worthy of all support.

". . . Happily, there need be no difference of opinion about the proper rendering of 'God.' No better word than Isvara or Isa can be found.—Faithfully yours,

"MONIER WILLIAMS,
"Boden Professor of Sanskrit.

"Oxford, Dec. 11."

SAN FRANCISCO.—Mdme Christine Nilsson's first concert attracted the largest audience ever known here. The Marchioness (Princess Louise) and Marquis of Lorne were present, and invited the gifted artist to dine with them next day.

MR F. H. COWEN'S "Scandinavian Symphony" was performed with great success at Aix-la-Chapelle on the 21st inst. A correspondent writes that "both the work and its composer were received with genuine enthusiasm. At the conclusion of the symphony, which was very finely performed under the direction of the young English composer himself, Mr Cowen was presented with a large laurel wreath, in the name of the town. He was treated in the most courteous manner, not only by the town authorities, but by the musicians and the public generally."

NEW MUSIC.

Conspicuous among the recent publications of Messrs Duncan Davison & Co. is the Wolseley March, composed by Mrs Mounsey Bartholomew. Mrs Bartholomew is too good a musician for mere "hack" work, and her March rightly claims higher rank than that of ordinary pièces d'occasion. It is a very good thing indeed; worthy of notice for itself alone. Out of Town, a set of humorous part-songs, by Walter Maynard, is an attempt to describe, in an original form, the experiences of a day in the country. We find plenty of interest, and a good deal of amusement in the idea as carried out—none the less because Mr Maynard has taken the music of three pieces from well-known classical works, A Glimpse of the Pastoral being an adaptation of passages in Beethoven's Sixth Symphony; while A Midsummer Dream comes from Mendelssohn's Nocturne, and The Charm of Rural Life from the same master's Clowns' Dance. The more numerous part-songs are, both music and words, Mr Maynard's own. Their character may be inferred from the significant titles, "Beware of the Bull," "In the Woods," "In the Water," and "The Pic-nic." We commend this diverting little book as a useful adjunct to a convivial season. Messrs Davison & Co. are the publishers of a number of songs by Harry Croft Hillier, who, we may add, resembles Wagner at least in being his own poet. These pieces may generally be recommended as supplying a good field of selection for amateurs who like an easy song of a character adapted to please an average company. Perhaps we may venture to point out "Dolly's Wooers," "Dan Cupid," and "Love and Barter" as most adapted to become popular. All these are pleasant ditties for a Christmas party. Mr E. D. Perrot's setting of Burns' "Wae is my heart" accords with the simple pathos of the verses, and may be relied on to touch the feelings of those who hear it. The merit is greater than at first appears, so difficult is it to reflect in music the pure and natural style of the Scottish bard. Miss Ida Walter has attempted Longfellow's "The sea hath its pearls" with distinct success. Her music is not ambitious, but it may claim to be well written, and instinct with much of the passion of the words. The song cannot fail to please, and therefore may be recommended. "Amelia," by G. Muratori, is an elegant and easy canzone with Italian and English words; and in "Not once or twice" we find a song of love, by F. Neale, which will obtain plenty of admirers among young people who have not yet discovered that "rare is the love that lasts for life." Sir F. W. Brady's Haymaking, a pleasant story of rustic courtship, though simplest of the simple, is, in its way, prettiest of the pretty. Let those who want a song acceptable all round act upon this assurance. Mr C. A. Rankin has written music to Christina Rosetti's poems on the months, which appeared, if we mistake not, in Macmillan's Magazine; and the whole twelve songs are published by Messrs Duncan Davison & Co. under one cover. There may be passages in some to which we should take exception, but, speaking generally, these works are admirable in design and execution. Mr Rankin here shows considerable range of expression, felicity of musical utterance, and technical skill. Without going through the pieces in detail, we commend the set as being decidedly worthy of attention, whether the attention be that of connoisseurs or of the ordinary amateur. "False and True," by Dr. Spark of Leeds, if deficient in melodic charm, is otherwise commendable, and on all accounts Hope Temple's music to Tennyson's Poet's Song should receive the praise due to a successful ballad. On patriotic grounds Hugh Clendon's "Grasp the Flag" will receive favourable notice just now. It is bold and vigorous, and thus meets the requirements of its class. Messrs Davison & Co.'s pianoforte music for the season is of full average interest. A capital waltz, for example, and one eminently suited to the ball-room, is Muratori's L'Amante ("The Lovers' Waltz"), which is also published as a song, with Italian and English words, and, so to speak, "sings itself." The Folichonne Polka, and Souvenir de Jeunesse Waltz, by Benatonza, are equally welcome contributions to Christmas dance music. For the drawing-room we have Glover's Galop di Bravura, brilliant yet easy; D. R. Munro's Sea Breezes and Art de Danse, two pretty and simple effusions; Von Tugginer's Victoire, a military galop, effectively arranged for four hands; "Alice," a transcription for flute and piano, by J. Harrington Young, of Ascher's celebrated song, and two pieces by Lillie Albrecht—Fantaisie Marziale and The Streamlet. Miss Albrecht knows thoroughly well how to write a drawing-room piece, and the fact is demonstrated here. Of her two works the first-named is the better, being, indeed, an excellent and effective thing of its kind. The Streamlet, nevertheless, has a charm of its own, and might be utilized as an exercise in alternate arpeggios for both hands, with a view to secure uniformity of value and touch.

Conspicuous among recent publications by Messrs Chappell & Co. is the pianoforte score of Iolanthe an examination of which confirms the opinion we formed after a single hearing of the work. Whatever may be the verdict upon Iolanthe as a whole, there can be no doubt that Mr Sullivan's share of it is in advance of anything hitherto done by him in the same line. That is to say, the music, while full of tune and distinguished by humour in its way as fine as that of Mr Gilbert's dialogue, has artistic qualities higher than common. To some this may be a disadvantage, but to the majority, we believe, it will be the reverse, enhancing their pleasure and presenting a piquant combination. Mr. Sullivan deserves praise for moving the standard of his comic opera a degree higher. No doubt he should proceed in this matter with caution, since the public who wish to be simply amused quickly resent attempts to lure them to a more exalted end. Still, as far as a composer can go with safety, he ought to go, and in the present case the limits of prudence have not been overpassed. We do not propose to review a work not intended for calm and deliberate inspection, but to be enjoyed, like a glass of champagne, while the sparkle is fresh within it. Enough that the music will interest and delight many a household this Christmas time. Old and young, grave and gay, can alike find something to their taste in these pleasant pages. As for those who possess a keen sense of humour they will revel in a feast of true Christmas abundance. Mr Sullivan, a humourist always, has never been happier than in the truly mirth-provoking music of his latest opera. To all who want a merry subject for a merry season we say "buy Iolanthe."

Messrs Chappell & Co. have published also an octavo edition of "Old Scottish Ditties," originally brought out in folio by Messrs J Muir Wood & Co., of Glasgow. This volume contains several hundred melodies with their proper words, the symphonies and accompaniments being by Professor Macfarren. Mr J. Muir Wood, an acknowledged authority on Scottish song, and author of the article on that subject in Mr Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, is responsible for the selection and authenticity of pieces; while with regard to Professor Macfarren's work, another authority, Mr T. L. Stillie, of Glasgow, assures us that his accompaniments have in them the true national quality. These facts should recommend the book to all who love Scottish folk-song. We may add that it is handsomely got up, and that the music is well displayed. Rip van Winkle is now a familiar theme, but attention may be called to the pianoforte score, and to the opportunity it affords of becoming intimately acquainted with M. Planquette's agreeable strains. Those who avail themselves of the chance will not regret it, but rather discover beauties in the music which were overlooked amid the dramatic and spectacular interest of the performance. Rip van Winkle naturally set the arrangers to work, and Messrs Chappell now publish a group of dance pieces founded on its airs, and all more or less handsomely illustrated. Thus we have the Rip van Winkle Quadrilles from the experienced hand of Mr Charles D'Albert. The set is as danceable as it is tuneful, the arrangement, moreover, being so easy that very slight abilities are equal to it. Mr D'Albert is likewise responsible for the Gretchen Waltz—title-page adorned with a full-length portrait of Miss Violet Cameron as Rip's wife: the Rip van Winkle Polka, the Rip van Winkle Lancers, the Rip van Winkle Galop, and the Rhine Fay, or Rip van Winkle Waltz. Here is dance music with a fine flavour of freshness in it, such as gives added zest to Terpsichorean pleasures. We have no doubt about its acceptance during the present season. For a different purpose many airs from M. Planquette's opera have been arranged as a pianoforte piece by M. Auguste van Biene. The more popular melodies are all here, and the music is easy enough to suit the least gifted amateur performer. Among other dance music issued by Messrs Chappell we find the Christmas number of Chappell's Musical Magazine—always an abundant and seasonable shilling's worth. The present issue contains ten pieces by D'Albert and other well-known composers, among the ten being such favourities as the Nearest and Dearest Waltz, Torpelo Galop, and Olivette Waltz. At a fraction over a penny each, these things are certainly not dear. Messrs Chappell have now issued a duet number of the Magazine, containing six dances pieces arranged for four hands. The idea is a happy one, and will give pleasure to many a household, if only for an effective version of the famous Sweethearts Waltz. Mr Delbruck's waltz, Visions d'Amour, comes to us in a blaze of gold and colours, but its charm is not all on the outside, the music being melodious and engaging. The same composer's polka, Les Sauterelles, has also much to recommend it as a bright and inspiriting thing. Of a somewhat different and a higher order is the Muriella Polka by "Tito lo-Posa," with the letters of which curious name it is not difficult to make another—Paolo Tosti. This piece is a genuine work of art, worthy of its favourite composer, and fit to be played anywhere as a morçeau de salon. We recommend it cordially. As an occasional piece, the Kassassin Galop, by Mr W. Winterbottom, deserves attention. It appropriately introduces the trumpet call for the "Charge," and is embellished with a lively picture, representing the onrush of the Household Cavalry. In this connection may be noticed a Grand March Heroic—why the inversion à la Française?—by W. Fullerton, who so commemorates the Battle of Tel-el-Kebir. Although there is nothing positively new in the March, it is above the average of such productions, and is written with freedom and spirit. The trio supply a happy contrast, and the coda is especially telling. "One Proof More," a setting of Moore's words, by A. Samuelli, appears to us one example more of unrealized ambition. Mr A. H. Behrend's music to Charles Kingsley's "My Fairest Child" is not ambitious, and distinctly gains its end. The moral is conveyed in homely yet touching strains. The same composer's "Evermore" will, perhaps be popular above its companion, but has less true distinction. Miss Maude V. White's setting of Lord Byron's translation from Catullus, "Ye Cupids, droop each little head," possesses distinct merit; it is musicianly, and imbued with a flavour of old-fashioned quaintness in accord with the words. The song may be recommended to amateurs who want something a little out of the common way. So, for other reasons, may Signor Piatti's "Hymn to God the Father," the words being Ben Jonson's pathetic appeal to Divine mercy. In this piece Signor Piatti shows, besides technical acquirements, a power of forcible expression equal to the nature of the theme, and that is saying no little. We regard the "Hymn" as among the best things of its kind, and worth the attention of those for whom only the best have charm.—D. T.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Glasgow musical season is now in full swing, and a goodly number of concerts have been already given; those, for the most part, are chiefly local, and do not require to be chronicled in your advanced journal. Briefly, the Tonic Sol-fa Society, the Glasgow Select Choir, and many other societies have given concerts, which have all been well attended. The chief point out of all these gatherings was the enormous success at one of Mr Airlie's Saturday Evening Concerts of Miss Marie Schumann, a girl violinist, who is promising great things as a solo player. Her great musical abilities were discovered nearly two years ago, when she was taking part in a Glasgow pantomime. She got introduced to Mr Weist Hill, and he kindly got her into the Guildhall, where she has been under Mr Hill's personal instruction. She has been assisting at one or two concerts, but not yet in a regular way.

The Choral and Orchestral Concerts under the management of the Choral Union, with Mr Manns and his orchestra, have now fairly started in the race. Mr Manns and some of the subscribers have been for a few years pressing to get some additional strings, to strengthen the orchestra. At last this has been done, the orchestra now consisting of seventy (heretofore, sixty), and your readers can judge of the enormously powerful effects these ten extra strings give to the fine orchestra. The opening night of the series—an orchestral concert—proved a very great success. To give a bald list of the numbers performed at this concert—taking into account their exquisite rendering—is quite sufficient at this time, without any criticism. Beethoven's C major Symphony, No. 1; Concert Overture, No. 4, in F, by T. Wingham; Schubert's Intermezzo; Moments Musicals; Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1, in E; and Wagner's Waldweht "Siegfried." Mdme Albani was the vocalist of the evening. As she is an immense favourite here, and was in splendid voice, you can imagine the furore she created. She sang, amongst other things, Herold's "Jours de mon enfance," Handel's "From mighty kings," and Haydn's "My mother bids me bind my hair." The first Saturday Popular Concert—same management, conductor, and orchestra. These entertainments have now fairly got the hold on the class for whom they are intended, and are quite as successful as the "Full-Dress Subscription Concerts" given generally on Tuesday evenings. I need not refer to the excellence of the execution; this is now understood, and need not be repeated from week to week. Enough, all went splendidly.

It so happened that Berlioz's Faust was given at the concluding concert of last season. It was by no means the finest of the series. Indeed, conductor, artists, and audience were all somewhat disappointed at the result. Mr Manns and management feeling this, wisely arranged to give Faust at the opening performance of the season, so as to erase any little feeling of previous disappointment. All combined to retrieve the unlucky effort of last year.

The solo vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Messrs Edward Lloyd and Jardine King. These were all well up in their parts and in grand voice (so much could not be said of last year's soloists). They put their whole soul into the music, and the result was most satisfying. Of the orchestra (remember with the ten strings more added) it was simply as near as possible perfect. The chorus in the former performance did not by any means shine; this time, however, their singing was marked by a careful reading and energetic rendering. Let us hope that the other three choral concerts to follow will prove to be as artistically done. These are The Messiah, The Redemption, and Samson.

At the second Saturday Popular Concert there was another large audience to hear a capital programme discussed by Mr Manns and forces. In making out the programme, the directors have seemingly had an eye to the "merry, merry," and "happy, happy," time of the year, and included one or two humorous pieces, such as the Adagio and Minuet from Mozart's "Village Musicians," and Mr Manns' Humoristic Polka, "Sniff in the Highlands," a clever sketch. The other chief numbers were Beethoven's "Battle Symphony" (Wellington's victory); Michaeli's descriptive piece, "The Forge in the Forest." The vocalist was Miss Frances Hipwell, while Mr C. Ould played a violoncello solo, and Mr John F. Dunn a solo on the violin.

According to the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Zeitung, the state of Herr Hans von Bülow's mind is such that it has been found necessary to place him under restraint.—(Let us hope that this Zeitung is misinformed.—Dr Blidge.)

He invited the celebrated Virtuoso to dinner, and then, as though struck by an afterthought, said: "You can bring your violin with you, you know." "Oh, thank you for the violin," replied the artist, "but it never dines."

At the Christmas service at Dr Allon's church at Islington, Mr Robert Kennedy, of the celebrated family of Scottish vocalists, gave "Comfort ye my people" and "Every valley" with much expression. The church was crowded.

The Government of Venezuela have commissioned two Belgian composers, Arthur d'Hanaens and Alfred Tilman, to write respectively a "Triumphal March" and "Patriotic Chorus" for the National Festival to be celebrated at Caracas next July.

Pauline Lucca closed her engagement at the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, by appearing as the heroine of Carmen, Bizet's now everywhere famous opera. Both she and Mdme Sembrich have received offers from America, and will probably accept them. (Query—about Pauline?—Dr Blidge.)

Welsh singers, assembled from all parts of the country, are to begin an Eisteddfod in New York at Christmas. An effort is also being made to produce a Passion Play at New York, but it is strongly resisted by the religious elements of all denominations. The Mayor is expected to refuse his permission, but he will decide on Thursday.

The original copy of the pianoforte score of Mendelssohn's Elijah, which Mrs Mounsey Bartholomew gave to the Sacred Harmonic Society with a reservation, that if the Society were ever dissolved, the MS should revert to her, has been returned by the Committee to Mrs Bartholomew. There are 43 numbers. "O rest in the Lord," was taken from it for presentation to the Guildhall Library, and has been lost or mislaid ever since.

St George's Chapel.—The old organ of St George's Chapel, Windsor Castle, which included choir, swell, and great organ arrangements, is being remodelled and altered from an F to a C instrument. The new arrangement, which is being carried out by Messrs Gray and Davison of London, will comprise choir swell, great and solo organs, a pneumatic action and four sets of keys. Some time must necessarily elapse before the instrument will be ready for use.

The Banjo.—Most of the important interests are represented in the press, but I was somewhat astonished to find that banjo players have a special journal for their edification. A copy of Stewart's Banjo and Guitar Journal has, however, been sent to me from Philadelphia, and it is described by a Boston authority as "a live banjo paper," though "the guitar part is yet to be heard from." The journal is, in fact, devoted almost entirely to the former instrument, and the correspondence shows that an unexpected number of persons are more or less given to the banjo. What is a "ham," by the way, apart from pork? "Banjo hams" are held up to scorn, and one writer proudly describes himself as "no ham, but a classical banjo player." Another writer is a shoemaker whose soul has been moved by concord of sweet sounds, and who wants to know whether the editor thinks he would do well to abandon shoes and strive to attain eminence with the banjo, his idea apparently being that the editor should support him meanwhile.—Sporting and Dramatic News.

Basle.—A setting, for six-part chorus and orchestra, of Goethe's "Gesang der Parzen" by Johannes Brahms was performed, under the composer's own direction, at the fifth Subscription Concert. It was well received.

THE VOICE AND SINGING.

BY

ADOLFO FERRARI.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING, Price 12s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

VOCAL EXERCISES COMPOSED BY FRANK MORI.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

N.B.—These Vocal Exercises, as taught by the late FRANK MORI, are invaluable both to Students and Professors.

New Edition of "LE PETIT SOLFEGE."

LE PETIT SOLFEGE. Vingt Solfèges pour Voix de Mezzo-Soprano. Par Jos. CURCI. Price 6s. London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street.

"This work for educational purposes will be found of inestimable value, since it is one of the very few which confines itself to the cultivation of the middle of the voice; and whilst the phrases are admirably adapted to develop the breathing powers and volume of the voice, the melodies are so exquisitely harmonized that they must prove of great benefit in the improvement of the taste and ear of a student in singing."—Pictorial World.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

FANTAISIE MARZIALE.

MORCEAU DE SALON,

FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

By

LILLIE ALBRECHT.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"'Fantaisie Marziale' is a brilliant pianoforte piece by Lillie Albrecht, the accomplished young pianist, who knows how to write effectively for, as well as to play well on, the instrument. The principal theme is spirited and is well contrasted by an episode or trio, of a more cantabile character."—The Illustrated London News.

DANSE PYRRHIQUE.

FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

By

BROWNLOW BAKER.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"There is much character in this little sketch which may be conscientiously recommended to young players who love to practise music with what they call a 'decided tune' in it. The pedal-point after the double bar has a good effect, and contrasts well with the principal subject."—The Musical Times.
